Hadad-ezer hearing that Ishb had dismissed his armie, assembled his forces againe, and sent for all the companies that he could leuie out of Mesopotamia, who vnder the command of Shobach passed Euphrates, and incamped at Helam, on the South side thereof, Dauid hearing of this new preparation, assembled all the ablest men of Israel, and marched towards the Syrian armie in Palmyrena, not yet entred into Arabia; to wit, at Helam, a place no lesse distant from Damascus, towards the Northeast, than Hierusalem was towards the Southwest. Now Dauid (speaking humanely) might with the more confidence goe on towards Euphrates (which was the farthest-off journey that euer he made) because he was now Lord of Damascus, which lay in the mid-way. He also possesse himselfe of Thadmor or Palmyrena, which Salomon afterward strongly fortified, and this Citie was but one dayes iourney from Helam, and the river Euphrates. So had he two safe retraites, the one to Thadmor, and the next from thence to Damascus. In this encounter between Dauid and the Syrians, they lost 40000 horsemen, and 7000 chariots, together with Shobach Generall of their armie. The Chronicles call these 40000. Soldiers footmen, and 10 ianits conuerts it, and so is it very probable. For the armie of Israel consisting of footmen, could hardly haue slaughtered 40000. horsemen, except they quitted their horse and fought on foote. So are the chariots taken in this battell, numbered at 7000. in the first of Chron. the 9. in which number, as I conceiue, all the Soldiers that serued in them with the conductors are included; so as there died of the Syrians in this warre against Dauid, before he forc'd them to tribute; 100000. footmen, besides all their horsemen and waggoners, and besides all those that Ishb slew, when they fled at the first encounter, together with the Ammonites before Rabba. Notwithstanding all which, the Adams in following ages gathered strength againe, and afflicted the Kings of Juda often: but the Kings of Israel they impowerfull euen to the last end of that State.

Dauid hauing now beaten the Arabians and Mesopotamians from the partie and confederacie of Ammon: He sent out Ishb the Lieutenant of his armies to forrage and destroy their territorie, and to besiege Rabba, afterward Philadelphia, which after a while the Israelites mastered and possesse. The Kings crowne which weighed a talent of gold, garnished with precious stones, Dauid set on his owne head, and carried away with him the rest of the riches and spoile of the Citie. And though Dauid stayed at Hierusalem, following the warre of Uriah-his wife, till such time as the Citie was brought to extremitie, and ready to be entred: yet Ishb in honour of Dauid forbore the last assault, and entrance thereof, till his masters arriuall. To the people he vsed extreme rigour (if we may so call it being exercised against heathen idolaters) for some of them he tare with barrowes, some he sawed asunder, others he cast into burning kilns, in which he baked tile and bricks.

§. VII.

Of DAVIDS troubles in his reigne, and of his forces.

BVas victorie begetteth securitie, and our present worldly felicitie a forgetfulness of our former miseries, and many times of God himselfe the giuer of all goodnesse: so did these changes, in the fortune and state of this good King, change also the zealous care which formerly hee had to please God in the precise obseruation of his Lawes and Commandements. For hauing now no dangerous apparant enemy (against whom hee was wont to aske counsaile from the Lord) hee began to be aduised by his owne humane affections and vaine desires. For hee was not only satisfied to take Uriahs wife from him, and to vse her by stealth: but hee imbrodered his adultery with Uriahs slaughter, giuing order to his trustie seruant

Ishb to marshall him in the front or point of those Israelites, which gaue an assault vpon the suburbs of Rabba, when there was not as yet any possibility of preuailing. And, that which could no lesse displease God than the rest, he was content that many others of his best seruants and Souldiers should perish together with Uriah, hoping thereby to cover his particular ill intent against him. After which he began by degrees to fall from the highest of happiness, and his dayes then to come were filled with ioyes and woes interchangeable, his trodden-downe sorrowes began againe to spring, and those perils which he had pulled vp by the rootes (as he hoped) gaue him an after-harvest of many cares and discontentments. And it had pleased God to take the witness of Dauids owne mouth against him, as Dauid himselfe did against the Amalekite, which pretended to haue slaine Saul, he had then appeared as worthy of reprehension as the other was of the death he suffered. For when Nathan the Prophet propounded vnto him his owne error, in the person of another, to wit, of him that tooke the poore mans sheepe that had none else, the bereauer being Lord of many: He then vowed it to the liuing Lord, that such a one should die the death. And heercof, although it pleased God to pardon Dauid, for his life, which remission the Prophet Nathan pronounced: yet he deliuered him Gods iustice together with his merie in the tenour following; Now therefore the sword shall neuer depart from thy house, &c. Because thou hast taken his wife to be thy wife, and hast slaine Uriah with the sword of the children of Ammon. Soone after this Dauid lost the child of adulterie which he begot on Bersheba. Secondly, his owne sonne Amnon being in loue with his halfe sister Tamar, by the aduice of his Cousin german the sonne of Shimeab *Dauid*s brother, possesse her by force: which when he had performed, he thrust her from him in a carelesse and despightfull manner. Two yeeres after, which foule and incestuous act, Abshalom cauled him to be murdered, at the feast of his sheep-shearing; not perchance in reuenge of Tamars rauishment alone: but hauing it in his heart to vsurpe the Kingdome; in which, because he could not in any sort be assured of Amnon, hee thought his affaire greatly aduanced by his destruction. So the one brother hauing rauished his owne sister, and then despised her; the other after a long dissembled malice, first, made his owne brother drunken, and then slaughtered him; which done he fled away, and liued vnder the safeguard of Talmay King of Geshur, neere Damascus, who was his grandfather by the mother, but a heathen King. Thirdly, when Abshalom by the inuention of Ishb, (but chiefly because of the great affection of Dauid towards his sonne) was brought againe: first to the Kings fauour, and then to his presence: He began instantly to practise against Dauid his father, seeking by the pretence of common iustice, and by lowly and familiar manner to ail men, and by detraicting from his fathers equitie, to win vnto himselfe a popular reputation. Here began the great affliction, threatened by the Lord as a punishment of Dauids sinne.

The company which Abshalom gathered at the first were but 200. men: which he carried with him from Hierusalem to Hebron: pretending, though impiously, the performance of a vow to God. There when Achishophel repaired vnto him, and many troopes of people from all places, he proclaimed himselfe King, and was by the people (whose hearts God had turned from their lawfull Prince) accepted for a ready, that Dauid doubting to be set vpon on the suddaine, durst not trust himselfe in his owne Citie of Hierusalem, nor in any other walled towne for feare of surpris: but incamped in the fields, & desarts with some 600. of his guards, and few elc. The priests he left in Hierusalem with the Arke of God, from whom he desired to be aduerted of those things that chanced, to whom he directed Hulhai his trustie friend, and seruant, praying him to make himselfe in all his outward actions and counsels of Abshaloms partie and confederacie, thereby the better to discouer vnto him the purposes of Achishophel, a reuolted Counsailler, whose practices hee greatly doubted. And now when treason was in fashion, Ziba also sought to betray his master Abshalom the sonne of Jonathan: And Shimei of the house of Saul (the fire of whose hatred Dauid's prosperitie had smothered, but his aduerfitee illighted) holding himselfe vpon the aduantage of a mountaine side, call stones at Dauid, and moit despitfully cursed him to his face: but Dauid attending no private reuenges, forbadde Abisai to pursue him for the present, yet left him among others in the rolle of his reuenge, to his sonne Salomon. Abisai being now posselt of Hierusalem, was aduised by Achitophel to vse his fathes concubines in some fuch publique place, as all Israel might assure themselves, that hee was irreconcilable to his father: whereof being perswaded, they would then resolutely adhere to Abisai and his cause, without feare of being giuen vp vpon a reconciliation betwene them. This saluage and impious (though craftie counsaile) Achitophel indeed vr-

 10 ged for his owne respect, as tearing that this rebellion might take end to his destruction; who most of all other inflamed Abisai against his father. And now was it fulfilled that Nathan had directly foretold Dauid: I will raise vp euill against thee out of thine owne house, and will take thy wiues before thine eyes, and gise them vnto thy neighbour, and hee shall vse thy wiues in the sight of the Sunne: for thou diddest it secretly, but I will doe this thing before all Israel, and before the Sunne. Hee also gaue aduice to Abisai, that himselfe with an armie of 12000. men might bee employed at the instant for the surprizing of Dauid, which had willingly beene embraced by Abisai, had not Hushai Dauid's faithfull seruant giuen counter-advice, and swayed it: perswading Abisai, that it was fitter and more safe for him with all the strength of Israel,
 20 to pursue his father, then by such a troope, which Dauid's valour and those of his attendants might either indanger or resist. This delay in Abisai, and aduantage of time gained by Dauid, was indeed, after God, the losse of the one and deliuerie of the other. Whereupon Achitophel rightly fearing (by the occasion fore-shewed) the successe which followed, disposed of his owne estate, and then forsooke both the partic and the care of Abisai, and of his owne life.

Dauid being aduertised of this enterprize against him, marched away all night, and past Jordan, possessing himselfe of Mahanaim in the tribe of Gad: the same wherein Isobab himselfe in the warre against Dauid after Saul's death seated himselfe. To which place there repayed vnto him Shobi, the sonne of Nabab the Ammonite, 30 whom Dauid loved, the same which Isephus calleth Shipbar. And though it bee greatly disputed, what this Shobi was, yet the most generall and probable opinion makes him a second brother to Hanun, whom Dauid for his fathes sake established in the Kingdome, after Hanun's overthrow. In thankfullnesse whereof hee releued Dauid in this extremitie. There came also to Dauid's assistance Machir of Lodebar, Gardian in former times to Mephiboseth, and among others Barzilai the Gileadite, who willingly led Dauid and all his companie.

In the meane time both the King and Abisai prepared to fight, Abisai made Amasa Commander of the armie of Israel, the same place which Isob held with Dauid; an office next the King himselfe, like vnto that of the Maiors of the Paiaace 40 anciently in France. Dauid, perswaded by his companie, stayed in Mahanaim, and disposed the forces hee had to Isob, Abisai, and Ittai, giuing them charge in the hearing of all that issued out of the port of Mahanaim, that they should spare the life of Abisai. But Isob, besides that he was very cruell by nature, remembered that Abisai had lately disposed of his Government to Amasa, and therefore the victorie being obtained, and newes brought him that Abisai hung by the haire of his head on a tree, when he could not perswade the messenger to returne and kill him, hee himselfe with his owne seruants dispatch him. It appeared also by the sequell that Isob affected Adonijah whom hee afterward acknowledged, Dauid yet liuing;
 50 and fearing the disposition of Abisai, he embraced the present aduantage offered.

Hereof, together with newes of the victorie, when knowledge was brought to Dauid, he mourned and sorrowed, not onely as a man that had lost a sonne, but as one that had outliued all his worldly ioyes, and scene every delight of life interred. For hee so hid himselfe from his people, as those which hoped for honour and reward after so great a victory, couered themselves also in the Cite, as if they had committed the greatest offences, and had rather deferred death than recompence. Whereupon Isob presenting himselfe before Dauid, perswaded him to dissemble his sorrow for the present, and to shew himselfe to the Armie. For first he told him that hee had discontenanced his faithfull seruants, who had that day preferred his life; inferring that nothing could be more dangerous to a King, than not onely to not acknowledge so great a loue and constancie in his people, who being but few in number, did yet resolutely expose themselves to great perils for his sake; but on the contrary grieue and lament at their good successe. For, no doubt, they might all haue bought their peace of Abisai at an easie rate. Secondly, hee vrged that it was generally beleued, that hee loved his enemies and hated his friends, and that hee witnessed by this his mourning, that hee had not any respect of his Princes, and others his faithfull seruants, but would more haue ioyed if they had all perished, and Abisai liued, than in the victorie by their faithfullnesse and approved valour gotten.

Lastly, hee vsed this prevalent argument, that if the King came not out and shewed himselfe publicly to his men of warre, that they would all that very night abandon him, and returne: concluding with this fearefull threatening: And that will bee worse vnto thee than all the euill that fell on thee from thy youth hitherto. By these over-bold and arrogant speeches (though per chance vttered with a good intent) Isob raised 20 Dauid from his bed of sorrow, and brought him to the gates of the Cite among the people, whom he assured of his loue and affection, especially Amasa, who commanded the Armie of Abisai, to whom he promised the office of Lieutenantship; the same which Abisai had giuen him, and which Isob now enioyed. For Dauid doubted, that if Amasa were not satisfied, hee might draw from him a great part of the strength of Israel, now vnder his commandement.

This done, the King marched towards Jordan homeward, where in his passage he pardoned Shimei, who had lately reuiled him to his face; but this remission was but 30 external, as appeared afterward. He also accepted of Mephiboseth's excuse, whom Ziba had formerly falsely accused and betrayed.

He also intreated Barzilai the Gileadite, his late liberrall Oast, to follow him to Ierusalem, that he might reward his seruice done him; who excusing himselfe by his age, 30 appointed his sonne Chinham to attend the King.

At Gilgal on this side Jordan, all the Tribes assembled, and after some contention which of them ought to haue most interest in Dauid, the Armie brake, and Dauid returned to Ierusalem. But Sheba the sonne of Bichri, a Beniamite, of the faction of the house of Saul, finding some discontentment among the Israelites, withdrew them from Dauid, as from a stranger in whom they had no interest, and it seemeth that many of the people of the out Tribes, and in effect of all but Juda, bare still a good affection to the issues of their first King. Dauid employed his reconciled Captaine
 40 Amasa, to giue him contentment, and to witness his trust, as also because hee conceived that Amasa had interest in those reuolts of Israel more than Isob had. He received commandement from Dauid to assemble the Armie within three dayes, which he foretold: but being onward on his way, Abisai, Isob's brother, was sent after him, with Dauid's guard and best Souldiers, whom also Isob accompanied: and ouertaking Amasa neere Gibeon, pretending to embrace him, gaue him a wound, whereof he fell dead, being no lesse iousalous of Amasa than hee was of Adner, whom he murdered in the same manner, and out of the same impatient ambition. This done, he pursued Sheba, and finding him inclosed in Abel, assaulted the Cite with that furie, 50 that the Citizens by the perswasions of a wife woman there inhabiting, cut off Sheba's his head, and flung it to Isob over the walls: which done, hee retrated his Armie to Ierusalem, and commanded, as before, all the hoste of Israel.

The next act of Dauid's, was the deliuerie of Saul's finnes or kinsmen to the Gileadites, whom those Citizens hung vp in reuenge of their Fathers crueltie. Dauid had know-knowledge from the Oracle of God, that a famine which had continued on the land three yeeres, came by reason of Saul and his house; to wit, for the slaughter of the Gibeonites: and therefore he willingly yielded to give them this satisfaction, both because he had warrant from God himselfe, as also if wee may iudge humanely, to rid himselfe of Sauls line, by whom hee and his might, as well in the present as in the future, be greatly molested and endangered; onely he spared Mephibosheth the sonne of Jonathan, both for the loue hee bare to his father, as for his oath and vow to God.

Now where it is written in the Text, The King took the two sonnes of RISPAA, whom she bare vnto SAUL, and the five sonnes of MICHAEL the daughter of SAUL, whom Ioseph bare to ADRIEL, and deliuered them to the Gibeonites:

Iunius calls this Michol the sister of her that was Dauids wife, the whom Saul married to Phaltiel; but Michol here named had Adriel to her husband: the same which is named Merab in the first of Samuel the eighteenth, who was first promised to Dauid, when hee slue Goliath in the valley of Raphaim: and because it is written that Michol loved Dauid, which perchance Merab did not, whether Dauid had any humane respect in the deliuerie of her children, it is onely knowne to God.

Now whereas the Genea nameth Michol for Merab the wife of Adriel: the better translation were out of the Hebrew word here vsed, hauing an eclipsis or defect, and signifieth, as I am informed, one of the same kindred, as in the 19. verse of the same 21. Chapter it is said of Goliath whose speare was weighty as a weavers beame, when as by the same Eclipsis it must be vnderstood by the brother of Goliath himselfe being formerly slaine.

As by the death of Sauls children God secured the house of Dauid, leauing no head vnto rebellion; so did hee strengthen both the King and Nation against foraine enemies, by the valour of many braue Commanders, the like of whom, for number and qualitie, that people of Israel is not knowne to haue had at any time before or after. Thirtie Captaines of thousands there were, all men of marke, and great reputation in warre.ouer these were fixe Coronels, whose valour was so extraordinary, that it might be well held as miraculous. These Coronels had some difference of place and honour, which seemeth to haue been giuen vpon mere consideration of their vertue. For Abishai the brother of Ioshab, who in the warre against the Ammonites and Aramites was Lieutenant, and commanded halfe the armie, could not attaine to the honour of the first rank, but was faine to rest contented with being principall of the three Coronels of the second order, notwithstanding his necessity in bloud vnto the King, the flourishing estate of his owne house, and his well approved seruices. All these Coronels and Captaines, with the Companies belonging to them, may seeme to haue been such as were continually retained, or at the least kept in readinesse for any occasion, considering that the numbers which were mustered and drawne out, if need required into the field, very farre exceeded thirtie thousand, yea, or thirtie times as many. They were most of them such as had followed the King in Sauls time, and been hardened with his aduersities. Others there were very many, and principall men in their severall Tribes, that repaired vnto him after the death of Saul; but these Captaines and Coronels, (who with Ioshab, that was Generall of all the Kings forces, make up the number of 37.) were the especiall men of warre, and reckoned as Dauids Worthies. The long reigne of Dauid, as it is knowne to haue consumed many of these excellent men of warre, so may it probably be guessed to haue wasted the most of those whose deaths wee finde no where mentioned. For the sonnes of Zeruia, who had been too hard for Dauid, were worne away, and onely Ioshab left in the beginning of Salomons, who wanted his brother Abishai to stand by his side in his last extremitie.

By the actions forepassed in the time of Dauid, it is gathered that hee had reigned now 33. yeeres, or thereabout; when the posteritie of Saul was rooted out, so that hee enjoyed about seuen yeeres of entire quiet and securitie, wherein it pleased God to remove all impediments that might haue troubled the succession of Salomon in his Fathers throne. In this time also Dauid hauing established all things in Iuda and Israel, and the borders thereof, hee againe displeased God by numbring the people, as in ostentation of his power: in which he employed Ioshab, with other Captaines of his armie, who after nine months and twenty dayes trauell, returned with the account and register of all the people, able and fit to beare Armes, and they whereof to the number of thirtie thousand, besides Leui and Beniamin, whereof in Iuda and the Cities thereof five hundred thousand, and in Israel eight hundred thousand.

For this, when by the Prophet Gad hee was offered from God the choice of three punishments, whereof he might submit himselfe to which he pleased; to wit, seuen yeeres famine; three months warre, wherein hee should be vnprosperous in all attempts, and be chased by his enemies; or a generall pestilence to last three dayes: Dauid made choice to bow himselfe vnder the hand of God onely, and left himselfe subiect to that cruell disease, which hath no compassion or respect of persons, of which there perished seuentie thousand. And hereby he hath taught all that liue, that it is better to fall into the hands of God than of men; whereof hee giueth vs this diuine reason; For his mercies are great.

§. VIII.

Of the last acts of DAVID; ADONIAHS faction; the reuenge vpon IOAB and SHIMEI.

Asly, when hee grew weake and feeble, and past the acts and knowledge of women, hee was yet aduised to lie in the armes of a yong and well complexioned maiden, to keepe him warme. In this his weake estate of bodie, when he was in a manner bedrid, Adonijah his eldest sonne (Amnon and Abshalom being now dead) hauing drawne vnto his partie that inuincible, renowned and feared Ioshab, with Abiathar the Priest, beganne manifestly to prepare for his establishment in the Kingdome after his father. For being the eldest now liuing of Dauids sonnes, and a man of a goodly personage, Salomon yet yong, and borne of a mother formerly attainted with adultery, for which her name was omitted by S. Matthew (as Beda, Hugo, Thomas, and others suppose) hee presumed to carrie the matter without resistance. Hereof when Dauid had knowledge by Bathshe the mother of Salomon, who did put him in minde of his faithfull promise, that Salomon her sonne should reigne after him (Nathan the Prophet affirming the same thing vnto the King, and seconding her report of Adonijahs presumption) the King calling vnto him Zadoc the Priest, Nathan the Prophet, and Benaiah the Captaine of his guard, gave charge and commission to anoint Salomon, and to set him on the Mule whereon himselfe vied to ride in his greatest state: which done, Salomon attended, and strongly guarded by the ordinarie and choice men of warre, the Cherubites and Peletites, shewed himselfe to the people. Those tidings being reported to Adonijah, he presently abandoned his affluents, and for the safety of his life he held by the hornes of the Altar, whom for the present Salomon pardoned. After this, Dauid had remaining two especiall cares, whereof he was desirous to discharge his thoughts; the one concerning the peace of the land, which might be disturbed by some rebellion against Salomon; the other concerning the building of the Temple, which hee fought by all means to aduance, and make the businesse publike. To being these intentions to good effect, he summoned a Parliament, consisting of all the Princes of Israel, the Princes of the severall Tribes, all the Captaines and Officers, with all the mighty, and men of power; who repaired vnto Ierusalem.

In

In this assembly the King stood vp, and signified his purpose of building the Temple, shewing how the Lord had approved the motion. Herein he took occasion to lay open his owne title to the Crowne, shewing that the Kingdome was by Gods ordinance due to the Tribe of Juda (as Isaac in his blessing prophetically bequeathed it) and that God himselfe was pleased to make choice of him among all his fathers sonnes. In like manner he said that God himselfe had appointed Salomon by name to be his successor: whereupon he earnestly charged both the people and his sonne, to conforme themselves vnto all that God had commanded, and particularly to goe forward in this worke of the Lords house, which Salomon was chosen to build. Then produced he the patterne of the worke according to the forme which God himselfe had appointed; and so laying open his owne preparations, he exhorted all others to a voluntary contribution.

The Kings proposition was so well approved by the Princes and people, that whereas hee himselfe had giuen three thousand talents of gold, and seuen thousand of silver, they added vnto it seuen thousand of gold, and tenne thousand of silver, besides brasse, iron and iewels, heartily reioicing in the aduancement of so religious a worke. This businesse being well dispatched, a solemne feast with great sacrifice was made, at which time Salomon was againe anointed King, and receiued seate of all the Princes and people of the Land, and of all the Princes his brethren, the sonnes of King David. Salomon being thus established King, his Father David finding himselfe euen in the hands of death, first exhorted his sonne to exercise the same courage and strength of minde, which himselfe had done in all his attempts, and to the end that a happy end might follow the beginning of all his enterprises, he vntured these mightie wordes; Take heede to the charge of the Lord thy God, to walke in his wayes, and keepe his statutes and his commandments, and his iudgements, and his testimonies, as it is written in the Law of Moses, &c. to the performance of which God fastened the succession, and prosperitie of his issues. For this done (sayth God himselfe) Thou shalt not want one of thy posteritie to sit vpon the Throne of Israel.

Secondly, hee aduised him concerning Isab, who out of doubt had serued David from the first assault of Ierusalem to the last of his warres, with incomparable valour and fidelitie, saying that hee fastened himselfe to Adonijah (his master yet liuing) and thereby vexed him in his feeble age. But as God hath neuer left cruelty vnrueged, so wast his will that Isab should drinke of the same cuppe, whereof hee had enticed other men to taste, and suffer the same violence which himselfe had vniually brooken others withall, qui gladio percussit, gladio peribit: for hee had bereaued Ahner and Amasa of their liues, hauing against the one the pretence onely of his brothers laughter, whom Ahner had slaine in the time of warre, and could not auoid him: against the other but a mere ialousie of his growing great in the fauour of David. And though Isab assured himselfe that Ahner and Amasa being dead, there was none left either to equal him or supplant him, yet God (deriding the policies of wicked men) raised vp Benhaiab the sonne of Iehoiadab, to pull him from the Sanctuary, and to cut him in pieces. For David giueth this cause to Salomon against Isab, that hee slue the Captaine of the hoste of Israel, and shed blood of barell in peace; and to this apparant and iust cause, it is not improbable but that David remembered the ill affection of Isab towards Salomon, which Isab made manifest by the vntimely setting vp of Adonijah, David yet liuing. Some other offence Isab had committed against David, of which in these wordes he put his sonne Salomon in mind; Thou knowest also what I O A B the sonne of SEBAIM did me to, &c. Now whether this were meant by the killing of Abisai, contrary to the Kings desire, or by the proud words vsed to him when hee mourned in Mahanaim for Abisai; or whether it were the publishing of *David*s letter vnto him for the killing of Uriah, thereby to disgrace Salomon as defended of such a mother, the Scriptures are silent. True it is, that those great men of warre doe oftentimes behaue themselves exceed-ding insolently towards their Princes, both in respect of their seruice done, as also because they flatter themselves with an opinion, that either their masters cannot misse them, or that they dare not offend them. But this kinde of pride hath ouerthrowne many a wortheie man otherwise deservuing great honour and respect.

Hee also gaue order to Salomon, to ridde himselfe of Shimei, who not long before had cast stones at David, and cursed him to his face. And albeit by reason of his oath and promise David spared Shimei all the time himselfe liued, yet being dust and in the graue, hee slue him by the hand of Salomon his Sonne. Hence it cometh that King Henrie the seuenth of England had his patterne, when hee gaue order to Henrie the eighth to execute Pool as loone as himselfe was buried, hauing made promise to the King of Spain when hee deliuered Pool vnto him, that while hee liued hee would neuer put him to death, nor suffer violent hands to be laid vpon him.

And yet did not the execution of Isab yeeld vnto Salomon any such great profite or assurance as hee hoped for. For he found a yong Adad of Idumaea, and Rezin of Damascus to vex him: who, as the Scriptures witness, were emboldened to enterprize vpon Salomon, hearing that David slept with his fathers, and that Isab the Captaine of the host was dead. Now when David had reigned in all fortie yeeres, to wit, in Hebron seuen yeeres, and in Ierusalem three and thirtie, he died.

For his person, he was of small stature, but exceeding strong. For his internal gifts and graces hee so farre exceeded all other men, as putting his humane frailtie apart, he was said by God himselfe to be a man according to his owne heart. The Psalms which he wrote witness his pietie, and his excellent learning: of whom Hierome to Pauinus: DAVID SIMONIDES MONSTER, PINDARVS & ALCEVS, FLACCVS, quoque CATVLLVS, & SERENVS, Christum tyra personat, & in deuchardo Psalterio ab inferis suscitatur resurgens; DAVID (saith hee) our SIMONIDES, PINDARVS, ALCEVS, HORACE, CATVLLVS and SERENVS, he playeth Christ on his harpe, and on a ten stringed Psalter hee raiseth him vprising from the dead. And being both a King and a Prophet, hee foretelleth Christ more lightfomely and liuely than all the rest.

The booke of the Psalms, saith Gheas, was diuided, ordered and distinguished by Ezekias: but whether all the Psalms were written by David, it is diuersly disputed. For Athanasius, Cyprian, Lyranus, and others conceiue diuers Authors, answering the titles of the seuerall Psalms, as Moses, Salomon, and the rest hereafter named, and that onely 73. Psalms were composed by David himselfe, namely, those which are intituled ipsius David. For the 50. and the 72. with the ten that follow, are bestowed on Asaph the sonne of Barachias, eleuen other on the sonnes of Korah, and eleuen are ascribed to Moses, to wit, the 89. and the ten following, and so they are intituled in the old Hebrew Copies, though the vulgar and Septuagint (three excepted) stile them otherwise. The supposed nine Authors of these Psalms which David wrote not. Sixt: Senenuth nameth as followeth; Salomon, Moses, (whom Aben Ezra, contrary to Hierome, maketh one of *David*s fingers) Asaph, Ethan, Ezrahi, Emen, Ezraira, Jadithum, and the three sonnes of Chore. But S. Chrysostome makes David the sole Author of all the Psalms, and so doth S. Augustine, reasoning in this manner: Al though (saith he) some there are that ascribe these Psalms onely to David, which are ouer-written ipsius David, and the rest intituled ipsi David, to others, this opinion (saith he) Voce Evangelica saluatoris ipsius reseratur, ubi ait quid ipse DAVID in spiritu Christiū dixerit esse suum Dominum, quoniam Psalmus 109. sic incipit, Dixit Dominus Domino meo, Sede a dextris meis, &c. The voyce of the Gospel refutes this opinion, where it saith, that David himselfe in the spirit called Christ his Lord, because the 109. Psalm begins thus: The Lord said vnto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand, &c. Lastly, his testimonies are vsed both by Christ and the Apostles, and he was as a patterne to all the Kings and Princes that succeeded him.

His Storie and all his particular actions, were written by the Prophets, Samuel, Nathan and God, as it is in the first of Chron. 29. ver. 19. For the seuerall parts of the bookes bookes of Samuel which intreat chiefly of David, were as it seemes written by these three holy men.

Constantine Mansseff hath an opinion, that the Troians during the time of the siege, fought for succour from David, and that he stayed neuter in that warre. But it seemeth that Mansseff did miscast the time twixt David and the Troian warre. For it is generally received that Troy fell betwene the times of Abdon and Samson Judges of Israel, about the worlds yeere 2348 and David died in the yeere 2991.

Of the treasures of DAVID and SALOMON.

Verf. 14.

Is treasures were exceeding great. For it is written in the 22. of the first of Chronicles, that he left Salemon for the building of the Temple a hundred thousand talents of Gold, and a thousand thousand talents of silver, and of brasse and yron passing all weight, which is more then any King of the world possit besides himselfe, and his son to whom he left it. For it amounteth to three thousand three hundred thirtie and three cartload and a third of a cartload of silver, allowing two thousand weight of silver or fixe thousand pound sterling to every cartload, besides three score and seuentee millions of French Crownes, or of our money twenty three millions and a thousand pound: a matter, but for the testimony of the Scriptures, exceeding all beleefe. For that any riches were left him it doth not appeare, seeing that the Iudges had not any treasure, nor any soueraine power to make leuies: but when they went to the warres, they were followed by such voluntaries as the seuerall tribes by turnes gaue them: seeing also that Saul who was of a meane Parentage, and perpetually vexed and invaded by the Philistims, could not in all likelihood gather great riches (if any at all) his Territories being exceeding narrow, and thereof the better part possit by his enemies.

Therefore it were not amisse to consider how David within the space of not very many yeeres, might amasse vp such mighty treasures. For though parsimonie be it selfe a great reuenue, yet needs there must haue been some other great meanes. It seemes that hee made the vttermost profit of all that hee had, that was profitable. Eusebius in his ninth booke and last Chapter de preparatione Evangelica, citeth the words of Eusepius, who reporteth that David, among other preparations for the Temple, built a nauie in Melanu (or as Pillapandus correcteth it, Achanis) a Citie of Arabia and from thence sent men to digge for gold in the Iland Prepe, which Orius thinkes, was Ophir, though Eusepius in his place of Eusebius (erring perhaps in this circumstance) saith that this Iland is in the red Sea; from whence, saith this Eusepius, they brought gold into Iury. Pineda lib. 4. de rebus Salomonis c. 1. thinkes that David did this way also to enrich himselfe, and citeth this testimony of Eusepius: and yet certainly David had many other wayes to gather great riches. Much Land doubtlesse hee gained by conquest, from the Canaanites and Philistims, besides those fruitfull valleys neere Jordan in Trachonitis and Basjan, and the best of Syria, and other Countries bordering the Israhelites. These demaines belike he kept in his own hands, and with his infinite number of captiues, which he tooke in his warres, which were notable to redeeme themselves, husbanded those grounds for his greatest advantage. For it is written, 1. Chron. 17. that Iebonathan was ouer his treasures in the field, in the villages, in the Cities, in the townes; that Ezri was ouer the labourers, that tilled his ground; Simeu ouer the vineyards; and Sabdi ouer the store of the wine; Bad Hanan ouer the olive trees, and Joab ouer the store of the oyle, also that hee had herdmen that had charge ouer his cattell, both in the high Lands, and in the plaines, ouer his sheepe, camels, and asses. And this custome of enriching themselves by husbandry and Cattell, the ancient Kings euery where held, both before and after Dauids time. For wee reade of Pharao, that hee spake to Ioseph to appoint some of his brethren or of their seruants, to be Rulers ouer his cattell. We reade of Vezia, that hee loued husbandrie, had much cattell, and plough-men, and dressers of Vines: likewise wee reade it in all Greeke Poets, that the wealth of the ancient Kings did especially consist in their Heards and flocks, whereof it were needfull to cite Augus and Admetus or any other for examples, the rule holding true in all. Now concerning David it is not unlikely, but that those captiues which were not imployed in husbandrie, were many of them vsed by him in all sorts of gainfull professions, as the ancient Romans in like manner vsed their slaves.

To these profits (besides the tributes and impositions which doubtlesse were great, and besides the innumerable presents which ycerely were brought him, or extraordinarily sent him, by Tebu and others) wee may adde the great spoiles which hee found in the Cities and Countries which hee conquered: also the head money which was gathered per legem capitatiouis; By the law of capitation or head money, euery man rich or poore paying halfe a licken of the Sanctuarie, which is about as much as fourteen pence, and so in all it amounted to a wondrous summe in that Kingdome: wherein one thousand thousand five hundred and seuentie thousand fighting men were numbred by Joab. Now although this Law of capitation be thought by some very learned not to haue bene perpetuall (which opinion of theirs neuertheless they conesse is against the Hebrew expolitions) yet David vpon this occasion is not vnlikely to haue put it in practise. And by these meanes might he be able to leaue those huge treasures to Salomon. Yet it may seeme that of this great masse of gold and silver left by David, the least part was his owne in priuate, and so will it appeare the lesse wonderfull that he left so much. Of his owne liberaltie wee finde, that he gaue to the building of the Temple three thousand talents of gold, and seuen thousand talents of silver, a great summe: but holding a very small proportion to the other. Wherefore we are to consider, that the treasures of the Sanctuarie it selfe were exceeding great, as needs they must haue been, hauing receiued continual encrease, without any losse or diminution euer since the time of Moses and Iosuah. The reuenues of the Sanctuarie (besides all manner of tithes and oblations, which defraied the daily expences, and maintayned the Priests and Lenties) were partly raised out of the head money before mentioned; partly out of the spoiles gotten in warre. For all the bootie was diuided into two parts, whereof the Souldiers had one, and the People which remayned at home, had the other halfe; whereby all the Countrie receiued benefite of the victorie, yet so, that the Souldiers had a farre greater proportion than the rest, as being fewer, and therefore receiuing more for euery single share.

Out of this purchase was deducted the Lords tribute, which was one in fiftie, of that which the people receiued, and one in five hundred, of that which was giuen to the Souldiers; namely one hundred and one thousand part of the whole bootie. So in the spoile of Midian, thirtie two thousand women being taken, the armie had sixteene thousand of them for slaves, and the Congregation had other sixteene thousand; but out of the sixteene thousand giuen to the Armie, were exempted two and thirtie for the Lords tribute. Out of the peoples number were taken three hundred and twentie. By this meanes, the lesse that the Armie was which had exposed it selfe to danger, the greater profit had euery Souldier; but when it consisted of many hands, they who remaying at home were faine to vndergoe more than ordinarie trauaile in domestical affaires, did receiue by so much the greater portion. But the Lords tribute was alwaies certaine, yea many times it was increased, either by some especiall commandement, as when all the gold, and silver, and other metalls found in ericho, were consecrated vnto God; or by thankfulness of the Rulers and People, as when after the victorie obtainyd against the Amalians without the losse of one man, all Jewells, Bracelets, Eare-rings, and the like, were offered vp, as voluntary presents.

Now how focuer the Israelites were many times oppressed, and troden downe by other Nations, yet were not the treasures robbed or spoiled; for the enemies neuer gat possession of the Tabernacle that was in Shilo. Wherefore it cannot otherwise be, than that the wealth of the Sanctuarie must haue beene exceeding great; as containing about one hundred part of all the money and other goods found by the Israelites in the whole Land of Canaan; and of all that was purchased by so many victories, as they obtaigned against the bordering Nations. For that this treasure was not defrauded of the due portion, it is euident; seeing that before the time of David and his Lieutenant Ioab, it is recorded that Saul and Abner, and before them Samuel, had vsed to dedicate of the spoiles obtaigned in warre, to maintayne the house of the Lord: the like whereof may be well presumed of the former Iudges and Captaines in other Ages. Certaine it is, that the Conquest of David brought into the Land far greater abundance of riches, than any former victories had purchased, those of Iosua perhaps excepted; but these vast summes of an hundred thousand Talents of siluer, may seeme rather to haue beene made vp, by the addition of his winnings and liberality, to the treasures laid vp in many former Ages, than to haue beene the meere fruits of his owne industrie.

Now concerning the riches of Salomon, it is more manifest how he gathered them, for he receiued of yearly reuenues with his tributes fixe hundred sixtie fixe Talents of gold, besides the Customes of Spices. He had also fixe rich Returnes from the East India, which greatly increased his store. For his ships performed that voyage every three yeeres, and he began that trade in the two and twentieth yeere of his raigne, and ruled fortie yeeres. Besides this, all Judea and Israel were now mathered to his hands; all the Arabians his borderers, the Syrians of Zobab, of Damascene, of Palmyra, of Turra; all of Iedema, Moab, and Ammon, paid him tribute; as likewise did the Philistines, who with the Perizzites, Heuites, Iebusites, and other races of the Canaanites, were not as yet extinguished, though subiected.

Into this flourishing estate was the Kingdome of Israel reduced by David, who after fortie yeeres raigne, and seuerie yeeres of life, dyed in a good age, full of dayes, riches, and honour, and was buried in the Citie of David. It is written by Iosephus that there was hid in David's Tombe a maruailous quantitie of treasures, in so much as Hyracanus (who first of the Chasmanai, or race of the Maccabees, called himselfe King) one thousand and three hundred yeeres after, drew thence three thousand Talents, to rid himselfe of Antiochus then besieging Ierusalem, and afterward Hered opening another Cell, had also an exceeding masse of gold and siluer therein. And it was an ancient custome to burie treasure with the dead. So the Peruvians and other Americans did the like, which being discovered by the Spaniards, they enriched themselves by nothing so much in their first Conquest. That Salomon did burie so much treasure in his fathers graue, it would hardly be beleueed, in regard of the great exactions with which he was faine to burthen the people, notwithstanding all the riches which he got otherwise, or which were left vnto him: were it not withall considered that his want of monie grew from such magnificent employments. Particularly of the Sepulcher of David the Scriptures haue no mention, but only the Sepulchers of the Kings of Juda, as of an honourable place of buriall. Yet the Monumentes of those Kings, as (by Relation of the Duke of Vlika) they remayned within these thirtie yeeres, and are like to remaine still, are able to make any report credible, of the cost bestowed vpon them.

of the Philistims, whom DAVID absolutely mastered: and of sundry other contemporaries with DAVID.

F the Philistims, whose pride David was the first that absolutely mastered, in this conclusion of David's time somewhat heree may be spoken.

They descended of Casloim, who, according to Iydor and Iosephus, was one of the sonnes of Misaim, and was surnamed Philistim, as Elsau was surnamed Edom, and Jacob Israel. There were of them five Cities of peticte principalities; namely, Azotus, or Asdod, Gaza or Atzaph, Ascalon, Geth or Gath, and Azaron. It seemeth that Casloim was the first founder of this nation, because of his kindred on either hand, the Canaanites and the Egyptians.

The first King of these Philistims, which the Scriptures haue named, was that Abimelech which loued Sara, Abrahams wife.

The second Abimelech liued at once with Isaac, to whom Isaac repaired in the time of famine, Abimelech then residing at Gerar in the border of Iudema, which Abimelech 20 fancied Isaac his wife: as his father had done Sara.

After Abimelech the second, the Philistims Kings are not remembred in the Scriptures, till David's time: perhaps the government was turned into an Aristocratie. For they are afterwards named Princes of the Philistims, howsoever Achis be named King of Gath, the same to whom David fled, and who againe gaue him Siklag to inhabit in Saul's time.

After him wee read of another Achis who liued with Salomon, to whom Semai trauided to fetch back his fugitiue seruant, what time the seeking of his seruant was the losse of his life. Ieremie the Prophet speaketh of the Kings of Palistin or Philistim. Amos nameth the King of Ascalon: Zacharias, a King of Gaza. The rest of 30 the warres of the Philistims are remembred in the Catalogue of the Iudges, of Saul and David, and therefore I shall not neede to collect the particulars in this place.

There liued at once with David, the third of the Siluij King of Alba, called Latinius Siluius, who is said to haue ruled that part of Italy fiftie yeeres. And about his fourteenth yeere Codrus the last King of the Athenians died, to whom succeeded the first Prince of those, who being called after Medon, Medontide, without regall name gouerned Athens during their life.

The reasons which moued the Athenians to change their government, were not drawne from any inconuenience found in the rule of Soueraigntie, but in honour 40 of Codrus onely. For when the Grecians of Doris, a region betwene Phocis and the mountaine of Oeta, sought counsaile from the Oracle, for their successe in the warres against the Athenians, it was answered, that then vndoubtedly they should preuaile and become Lords of that State, when they could obtaine any victorie against the Nation, and yet preserve the Athenian King liuing. Codrus by some intelligence being informed of this answer, withdrew himselfe from his owne forces, and putting on the habit of a common souldier, entred the Campe of the Dorians, and killing the first hee encountered, was himselfe forthwith cut in pieces.

Eupides the 31. King of Assyria, which others account but the 30. began to rule 50 that Empire, about the 13. yeere of David, and held it 38. yeeres.

Neere the same time began Iscion the second King of the Heralids, the sonne of Eurythmes in Corinth; and Agis the second of the Heralids in Lacedemon: in honour of which Agis, his succedours were called Agids, for many yeeres after. He restored the Lacomians to their former libertie: hee ouercame the Citizens of Helos

Helos in Laconia, who had refused to pay him tribute: hee condemned them and theirs to perpetual slavery; whereof it came, that all the Messenians, whom at length they brought into the like bondage, were after called Helotes.

In like sort from the Sclani came the word Slave. For when that Nation issuing out of Sarmatia, now called Russia, had seized upon the countrey of Thyria and made it their owne by Conquest, their victorie pleased them so highly, that thereupon they called themselves by a new name, Slaves, which is in their language glorious. But in after-times (that warmer Climate having thawed their northerne hardines, and nor ripened their wits) when they were trodden down, and made servants to their neighbours; the Italians which kept many of them in bondage, began to call all their bondsmen Slaves, viling the word as a name of reproch: in which sense it is now current through many countreys.

Other Chronologers make this Agis, the third King of Sparta, and somewhat later, about the 23. yeere of Dauid, and say, that Acheirsatus was the fourth King of this race, the same whom Eusebius calls Labeus, and sets him in the thirteenth yeere of Salomon.

In the tenth yeere of Acheirsatus, Androclus the third sonne of Codrus assisted by the Jones, built Ephesus in Caria, who after the adjoyning of the Ile of Samos to his territorie, was slaine by the Carians whose countrey hee surped. He was buried (saith Panfaninus) in one of the gates of Ephesus called Magnetes, his armed Statue being set out our him. Strabo reports that after Androclus had subdued the Ionians (the next province to Ephesus on the sea coast of Asia the lesse) he enlarged his Dominions upon the Aeolies, which ioyneth to Ionia: and that his posteritie governed the Cities of Ephesus and Erythrae by the name of Basilides in Strabo his owne time. Of the expedition of the Jones how they came hither out of Peloponessus, I haue * spoken already upon occasion of the returne of the Heraclides into Peloponessus, wherein with the Dories, they expelled the Achets, and inhabited their places in that land: though this of the Jones succeeded that of the Heraclides 100. yeeres.

The Citie of Ephesus became exceeding famous: first, for the temple of Diana therein built; which had in length 425. foote, and 220. in bredth, sustained with 127. pillars of marble, of 70. foote high: whereof 27. were most curiously grauen, and all the rest of choice marble polish't, the worke being first set out by Ctesiphon of Gnossos. Secondly, it became renowned by being one of the first that receiued the Christian faith, of which Timothie was Bishop; to whom, and to the Ephesians, Saint Paul wrote his Epistles so intitled. The other Citie posselt by Androclus in Aeolis was also vniuersally spoken of by reason of Sibylla, furnamed Erythrae: who liued seuen hundred and fourtie yeeres before Christ borne. Saint Augustine auoweth that a Romane Proconsul shewed him in an ancient Greeke coppie certaine verses of this Prophetesse: which began (as Saint Augustine changed them into Latine) in these wordes: Iesus Christus Dei filius saluator. Iesus Christi sonne of God the Lord saluator.

About the time that Isab besieged Rabba in Moab, Vaphres beganne to gouerne in Egypt, the same that was father in Law to Salomon, whose Epistles to Salomon, and his to Vaphres, are remembered by Eusebius out of Polemon. In the 21. of Dauid, was the Citie of Magnesia in Asia the lesse founded, the same which is seated vpon the riuer Meander, where Scipio gaue the great overthrow to Antiochus. In this territorie are the best Horses of the lesse Asia bred, whereof Luce:

Et Magnetis equis, Minya gens cognita remis.

About the same time Cuma in Campania was built by the inhabitants of Chalcu in 50 Euboea, according to Seruius, with whom Strabo ioyneth the Cumani of Aeolis, saying, that to the one of these people the government was giuen, with condition that the other should giue name to the Citie. Of this Cuma was Ephorus the famous schooler of Isocrates.

Euse-

Eusebius and Cassiodor finde the building of Carthage at this time, to wit, in the 31. yeere of Dauid, but much mistaken. For the father of Dido was Mitimus the sonne of Bader brother to Iezabel, who married Achab King of Israel; and betwene the death of Dauid, and the first of Achab, there were waited about 95. yeeres.

In this time also Acausus liued, the second of the Athenian Princes after Codrus, of which there were thirteene in descent before the State changed into a Magistracie of tenne yeeres. Some writers make it probable that the Aeolians led by Gratus, the grand nephew of Orestes, posselt the Citie and Island of Lesbos about this time. In the 32. yeere of Dauid, Hiram began to reigne in Tyre, according to Iosephus, who saith, that in his twelfth yeere Salomon began the worke of the Temple. But it is a familiar error in Iosephus, to misreckon times, which in this point hee doth so strangely, as if hee knew not how at all to cast any account. For it is manifest that Hiram sent messengers, and Cedars to Dauid, soone after his taking of Ierusalem, which was in the very beginning of *Dauid*s reigne ouer Israel, when as yet hee had reigned onely seuen yeeres in Hebron, ouer the house of Isa. Wherefore it must needs be that Hiram had reigned about 30. yeeres before Salomon; vnllesse more credit should be giuen to those Tyrian records which are cited by Iosephus, than to the plain wordes of Scripture contradicting them. For that it was the same Hiram 20 which liued both with Dauid and with Salomon, the Scriptures make it plainly manifest.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of SALOMON.

§ I.

Of the establishing of SALOMON: of birthright, and of the cause of ADONIAHS death, and of SALOMONS wisdom.

SALOMON, who was brought vp vnder the Prophet Nathan, began to reigne ouer Iuda and Israel, in the yeere of the world 2091. Hee was called Salomon by the appointment of God: hee was also called Iedidia, or Theophilus, by Nathan, because the Lord loved him.

Hiram King of Tyre, after *Salomon*s anointing, dispatched Embassadors toward him, congratulating his establishment: a custome betwene Princes very ancient. Whence we read that Dauid did in like sort salute Hannu King of the Ammonites, after *Salomon*s.

his obtaining the Kingdome.

The beginning of Salomon was in bloud, though his reigne were peaceable. For soone after *Dauid*s death, hee caused his brother Adonijah to bee slaine by Benaiah the sonne of Iehoiada, taking occasion from Adonijah his desiring by Bersabee, that the young maid Abisag (which lay in *Dauid*s bosome in his latter dayes, to keepe him warme) might be giuen to him. Whatsoeuer he pretended, it was enough that Adonijah was his elder brother, and fought the kingdome contrary to the will of Dauid, whom God inclined towards Salomon. And yet it is said that a word is enough enough to the wife, and he that sees but the claw, may know whether it bee a Lyon or no: so it may seeme that to the quick-sighted wisdom of Salomon, this motion of Adonijah, was a demonstration of a new treason. For they which had bene concubines to a King, might not after bee touched but by a King: whence Achitophel wilhed Abisai to take his Fathers Concubines as a part of the Royaltie. And David after that wrong, determining to touch them no more, did not give them to any other, but shut them vp, and they remained widowed vntill their death. And this it seems was the depth of Isobeths quarrell against Abner, for hauing his Fathers Concubine. And some signification of this custome may seeme too in the words of God by Nathan to David; I have given thee thy masters house, and thy masters wives. And in the words of Saul, vpbraiding Jonathan, that he had chosen David to the shame of the nakednesse of his Mother. Hereunto perhaps was some reference in this purpose of Adonijah, to marrie with her that was alwaies present with David in his latter daies, and who belike knew all that was past, for the conueying of the Kingdome to Salomon. There might be diuers farther occasions, as either that hee would learne such things by her as might be for the aduantage of his ambition, or that he would perswade her to forge some strange tale about Dauids last Testament, or any thing else that might prouide the title of Salomon.

As for the right of an elder brother which Adonijah pretended, though generally it agreed both with the law of Nations, and with the customes of the Iewes: yet the Kings of the Iewes were so absolute, as they did therein, and in all else what they pleased. Some examples also they had (though not of Kings) which taught them to vse this paternall authoritie in transferring the birthright to a younger sonne: namely, of Isaacs dilhering Esau, and giuing the birthright (which was twice as much as any portion of the other brethren) to Ioseph: of whom hee made two tribes. And that it was generally acknowledged that this power was in David, it appears by the words of Besabe and Nathan to David, and of Jonathan to Adonijah. For as for popular election, that it was necessarie to confirme, or that the refusal of the people had authoritie to frustrate the elder brothers right to the Kingdome, it now here appears in the stories of the Iewes. It is said indeed that the people made Saul King at Gilgal: that is, they acknowledged and established him. For that he was King long before no man can doubt. In like manner elsewhere the phrase of chusing or making their King, is to bee expounded: as where in the prohibition, that they should not make themselves a King, it is said, Thou shalt make him King whom the Lord shall chuse.

But to proceed with the acts of Salomon: at the same time that he put Adonijah to death, he rid himselfe also of Isab, and three yeres after of Shimei, as David had aduised him: he displaced also the Priest Abiathar, who tooke part with Adonijah against him: but in respect of his office, and that he followed David in all his afflictions; and because hee had borne the Arke of God before his Father, he spared his life. And thus being established in his Kingdome, hee tooke the daughter of Pharao King of Egypt to Wife: for so Eusebius out of Eusebius calls him. Hee offered a thousand Sacrifices at Gibeon, where God appearing vnto him in a dreame, bade him aske what he would at his hands; Salomon chooseth wisdom, which pleased God. And God said vnto him, *Because thou hast asked this thing, and hast not asked for thy selfe long life, neither hast thou asked riches for thy selfe, nor hast asked the life of thine enemies, behold, I have done according to thy words: by which wee may informe our selues what desires are most pleasing to God, and what not. For the coueting after long life, in respect of our felices, cannot but proceede of selfe-love, which is the roote of all impietic: the desire of priuate riches is an affection of couetousnesse which God so abhorreth; to affect reuenge, is as much as to take the sword out of Gods hand, & to distrust his Iustice. And in that it pleased God to make Salomon know that it liked him, that he had not asked the life of his enemies, it could not but put him in mind of his brothers slaughter, for which he had not any warrant either from David, or from* from the Law of God. But because Salomon desired wisdom onely, which taught him both to obey God, and to rule men, it pleased God to giue him withal that which he desired not. And I have also giuen thee (saith God) that which thou hast not asked, both riches and honour. This gift of wisdom our Commentators stretch to almost all kinds of learning: but that it comprehended the knowledge of the nature of plants and liuing creatures the Scripture testifieth, though no doubt the chief excellencie of Salomons wisdom, was in the knowledge of gouerning his kingdome: whence, as it were for an example of his wisdom, the Scripture telleth how soone he iudged the controuersie betweene the two harlots.

§. II.

Of Salomons buildings and glorie.

He then entred into league with Hiram King of Tyre, from whom hee had much of his materials, for the Kings Palace and the Temple of God: for the building whereof he had receiued a double charge, one from his father David, and another from God. For like as it is written of David, that he called Salomon his sonne, and charged him to build a house for the Lord God of Israel: so doth Salomon giue the force of a diuine precept to these words, Behold, a sonne is borne vnto thee, &c. Hee shall build an house for my name.

Hee began the worke of the Temple, in the beginning of the fourth yere of his reigne, at which time also hee prepared his fleet at Esionaber to trade for gold in the East Indies, that nothing might be wanting to supplie the charge of so great a worke. For that the Temple was in building, while his fleetes were passing to and fro it is manifest. For the pillars of the Temple were made of the Almagim trees brought from Ophir. Of this most glorious building, of all the particulars (whereof the forme and example was giuen by God himselfe) many learned men haue written, as Salmeron, Montanus, Ribera, Barradas, Azorius, Pillapandus, Pineda, and others, to whom I referre the Reader.

For the cutting and squaring of the Cedars which serued that building, Salomon employed thirtie thousand Carpenters, tenne thousand euery moneth by course: he alioyed eightie thousand Masons in the mountaine, and seuentie thousand labourers that bare burdens, which it is conceiued, he selected out of the Preseliter, besides three thousand three hundred malters of his worke, so as he paid and imployed in all one hundred eightie three thousand and three hundred men, in which number the Zidonians which were more skillfull in hewing timber than the Issalites, may (as I thinke) be included. For Hiram caused his seruants to bring downe the Cedars and Firres from Libanon to the sea, and thence sent them in raftes to Joppa, or the next port to Hierusalem. For in the second of Chronicles the second Chapter, it is plaine that all but the thirtie thousand Carpenters, and the ouersers, were strangers, and as it seemeth the vassalls of Hiram, and of Pharao King of Egypt. In recompence of all this timber and stone, Salomon gaue Hiram twentie thousand measures of wheate, and twentie measures of pure oyle yeerely. Eusebius out of Eusebius in the ninth booke of his preparation the last Chapter, hath left vs a Copie of Salomons Letter to Saron (which was the same as Hiram or Hiram) King of Tyre in these words:

REX SALOMON SVRONI, Tyri, Sydonis, atque Phœnicia regi. Amico paterno salutem. Scias me à Deo magno DAVI D patris mei regnum accepisse, cumq; mihi pater præcepit templum Deo, qui terram ereuit, cedere, ut etiam ad te scriberem præcepit: Scribo igitur, & peto à te, ut artifices atque fabros ad edificandum Templum Dei mittere velis.

King

KING SALOMON to King SYRON, of Tyre, Sydon, and Phœnicia King, and my father's friend, sendeth greeting; You may understand that I have received of the great God of my father DAVID, the Kingdom: and when my father commanded mee to build a Temple to God which created heaven and earth, hee commanded also that I should write to you. I write therefore to you, and beseech you, that you would be pleased to send mee Artificers and Carpenters to build the Temple of God.

To which the King SYRON made this answer.

SYRON, Tyri, Sydonis, & Phœnicia rex, SALOMONI regi salutem. Læti literis gratias egi Deo, qui tibi regnum patris tradidit: & quantum scribis saluos ministrisq; ad condendum Templum esse tibi witten dos, misi ad te milia hominum octoginta, & Architectum Tyrium hominem ex matre Iudæa, virum in rebus architectura mirabilem, Carabis igitur ut necessarij non egeant, & Templo Dei condite ad nos redeant.

SYRON of Tyre, Sydon and Phœnicia King, to King SALOMON greeting: when I read your letters, I gave God thanks, who hath infused you in your fathers Kingdom. And because you write, that carpenters and workmen may be sent to build Gods Temple, I have sent unto you fourscore thousand men, and a Master-builder a Tyrian, borne of a Jewish woman, a man admirable in building. You will be careful that all necessaries be provided for them, and when the Temple of God is built, that they come home to vs.

1. King. s. from the t.v. to the g.

The Copies of these letters were extant in Iosephus time as him selfe affirmeth, and to be seene, saith he, Tam in nostris quam in Tyriorum annalibus, as well in our owne as in the Tyrian annals. But he deliuereth them somewhat in different tearmes, as the Reader may finde in his Antiquities. But were this intercourse betwene Salomon and Hiram either by message or by writing, it is somewhat otherwise deliuered in the Scriptures, than either Eusebius or Iosephus set it downe, but so, that in substance there is little difference betwene the one and the other.

The like letter in effect Salomon is said to haue written to Paphres King of Egypt, 30 and was answered as from Hiram.

But whereas some Commentors vpon Salomon finde that Hiram King of Tyre, and Paphres King of Egypt, gaue Salomon the title of Rex magnus, and cite Eusebius in Eusebius, I doe not finde any such addition of magnus in Eusebius in the last chapter of that ninth booke; neither is it in Iosephus in the eight booke and second chapter of the Jewes antiquities: it being a vaine title vsed by some of the Assyrian and Persian Kings, and vied likewise by the Parthians, and many other after them, in somuch as in latter times it grew common, and was vsurped by meane persons in respect of the great Herodes the first, which was honoured by that name for his noble qualities, as much or more than for his mightinesse.

After the finishing and dedication of the Temple and house of the Lord, Salomon fortified Ierusalem with a treble wall, and repaired Hazer which had bene the ancient Metropolis of the Canaanites, before Iosaphat time: so did he Gaza of the Philistines: he built Bethsur, Gerar and the Millo or munition of Ierusalem. For Pharaoh (as it seemeth in fauour of Salomon) came vp into the edge of Ephraim, and tooke Gerar, which the Canaanites yet held, and put them to the sword, and burnt their Citie. The place and territorie he gaue Salomons wife for a dowrie. And it is probable that because Salomon was then buied in his magnificent buildings, and could not attend the warre, that he entreated his father in law to rid him of those neighbours, which Pharaoh performed. But he thereby taught the Egyptians to visit those partes againe before they were sent for; and in his sonne Rehoboams time Shebacth this mans successor did sacke Ierusalem it selfe.

10. 1.8. ant. c. 2.

Salomon also built Megiddo in Manasse, on this side Iordan; and Balah in Dan: also Thadmor, which may be either Ptolemies Thamaron in the desert of Iuda (or as Iosephus phus thinks Palmyra in the desert of Syria, which Palmyra because it stood on the utmost border of Salomons dominion to the north-east of Libanus, and was of Dauids conquest when he wan Damascus; it may seeme that Salomon therefore bellowed thereon the most cost, and fortified it with the best arte that that age had. Iosephus calls this place Thadmora, by which name (saith hee) giuen by Salomon, the Syrians as yet call it. Hierom in his booke of Hebrew places calls it Thermeth. In after-times, when it was rebuilt by Adrian the Emperour, it was honoured with his name, and called Adrianopolis. In respect of this great charge of building Salomon raised tribute through all his Dominions, besides an hundred and twentie talents of gold received from Hiram seruant, Salomon offered Hiram twentie towns in or neere the vpper Galilee, but because they stood in an vnfruitfull and marish ground, Hiram refused them, and thereof was the territorie called Chabal.

These townes, as it is supposed, lay in Galilee of the Gentiles, Non quod gentes ibi habitarent: sed quia (sub ditone regis gentilis erat, Not that it was possessed by Gentiles (saith Naulerus) but because it was under the rule of a King that was a Gentile. Howlouer it were, it is true that Salomon in his 21. yeere fortified those places, which Hiram refused. Further, he made a iourney into Syria Zobab, and established his tributes; the first and last warre (if in that expedition he were driuen to fight) that hee made in person in all his life. He then visited the border of all his Dominions, passing from Thadmor to the North of Palmyra, and so to the Deserts of Idumea, from whence hee visited Eziongaber and Eloib, the vttermoist place of the South of all his territories, bordering to the red sea: which Cities I haue described in the Storie of Moses.

§. III.

Of SALOMONS sending to Ophir, and of some seeming contradictions about SALOMONS riches, and of PINDEAS conceipt of two strange passages about Affricke.

Ere Salomon prepared his Fleet of Ships for India, with whom Hiram ioyned in that voyage, and furnished him with Mariners and Pilots, the Tyrians being of all other the most expert sea-men. From this part of Arabia, which at this time belonged to Edom, and was conquered by Dauid, did the Fleet passe on to the East India, which was not farre off, namely to Ophir, one of the Ilands of the Moluccas, a place exceeding rich in gold: witnesseth the Spaniards, who notwithstanding all the abundance which they gather in Peru, doe yet plant in those Ilands of the East at Manila, and recouer a great quantitie from thence, and with lesse labour than they doe in any one part of Peru, or new Spaine.

The returne which was made by these Ships amounted to foure hundred and twentie talents, but in the second of Chronicles the eight, it is written foure hundred and fiftie talents: whereof thirtie talents went in expence for the charge of the fleet, and wages of men, and foure hundred and twentie talents, which makes fise and twentie hundred and twentie thousand Crownes came cleere. And thus must those two places be reconciled. As for the place 1. Reg. 10. 14. which speaketh of fixe hundred sixtie and fix talens of gold, that summe, as I take it, is of other receipts of Salomons which were yeerely, and which came to him besides the profits from Ophir.

My opinion of the land of Ophir, that it is not Peru in America (as diuers haue thought) but a country in the East Indies; with some reason why at those times they could not make more speedie returne to Ierusalem from the East Indies: then in three yeeres; and that Thar's in Scripture is diuers times taken for the Ocean, hath bene already declared in the first booke.

Only

of David before and after Salomons birth, whereby wee may best make estimation of the yeeres which they consumed, and consequently learne the true, or most likely yeere of his natiuitie. Seuen yeeres David reigned in Hebron: in his eighth yeere hee tooke Ierusalem, and warred with the Philistims, who also troubled him the yeere following. The bringing home of the Arke seemes to haue bene in the tenth yeere of David, and his intention to build the Temple in the yeere ensuing, at which time he had sufficient leisure, lying in rest. After this he had warres with the Philistims, Moabites, Aramites and Edomites, which must needs haue held him fise yeeres, considered that the Aramites of Damascus raised warre against him, after such time as he had beaten Hadadezer; and that in euery of these warres he had the entire victorie. Neither is it likely that these seruices occupied any longer time, because in thole dayes and places there were no wintering camps in vse, but at convenient seasons of the yeere Kings went forth to warre, dispatching all with violence, rather than with temporizing; as maintaining their armies, partly vpon the spoyle of the enemies countrie, partly vpon the priuate prouision which euery souldier made for himselfe. The 17. yeere of David, in which he tooke Mophibosheth the sonne of Ionathan into his Court, appeareth to haue passed away in quiet; and the yeere following to haue begun the warre with Ammon; but somewhat late in the end of Summer perhaps, it came to triall of a battaile (for Iob after the victorie, returned immediately to Ierusalem) the causes and preparations for that warre haue taken vp all the Summer. Davids personall expedition against the Aramites wherein hee brought all the tributaries of Hadadezer vnder his owne allegiance, appears manifestly to haue bene the next yeeres worke, wherein hee did cut off all meanes of succour from the Ammonites; all Syria, Moab and Idumaea being now at his owne deuotion. By this reckoning it must haue bene the 20. yeere of Davids reigne, and about the fiftieth of his life, in which he sent forth Iob to besiege Rabba, and finished the warre of Ammon: wherein also fell out the matter of Priests wife. So one halfe of Davids reigne was very prosperous: in the other halfe he felt great sorrow by the expectation, execution, and sad remembrance of that heauie iudgement laid vpon him by God for his foule and bloudie offence.

Now very manifest it is, that in the yeere after the death of that child which was begotten in adulterie, Salomon was borne, who must needs therefore haue bene nineteene yeeres old or thereabout, when hee began to reigne at the decesse of his father, as being begotten in the 21. yeere of his fathers reigne, who reigned in all fortie.

This account hath also good coherence with the following times of David, as may be collected out of ensuing actions: for two yeeres passed ere Absalom slew his brother Amnon; three yeeres ere his father pardoned him; and two yeeres more ere he came into the Kings presence. After this he prepared horses and men, and laid the foundation of his rebellion, which seemes to haue bene one yeeres worke. So the rebellion it selfe with all that happened thereupon, as the Commotion made by Sheba, the death of Amasa and the rest, may well seeme to haue bene in the 30. yeere of Davids reigne.

Whether the three yeeres of famine should be reckoned apart from the last yeeres of warre with the Philistims, or confounded with them, it were more hard than needfull to coniecture. Plaine enough it is, that in the tenne remaining yeeres of David there was time sufficient, and to spare, both for three yeeres of famine, for foure yeeres of warre, and for numbering the people, with the pestilence ensuing; as also for his owne last infirmities, and disposing of the Kingdome. Yet indeed it seemes that the warre with the Philistims, was but one yeeres worke, and ended in three or foure fights, of which the two or three former were at Gab or Zeb neere unto Gezer, and the last at Gath. This warre the Philistims undertooke, as it seemeth, vpon confidence gathered out of the tumults in Israel, and perhaps emboldened by Davids old age, for hee fainted now in the battaile, and was afterwards hindered dered by his men from exposing himselfe vnto danger any more. So David had fixer seuen yeeres of rest, in which time it is likely, that many of his great men of Warre died (being of his owne age) whereby the stirring spirit of Adonijah found little succour in the broken partie of Iob the sonne of Zerai.

At this time it might both truly be said by David to Salomon, Then art a wise man, and by Salomon to God, I am but a young child; for nineteene yeeres of age might well agree with either of these two speeches.

Neuerthelesse there are some that gather out of Salomons professing himselfe a child, that he was but eleuen yeeres old when hee beganne to reigne. Of these Rabbi Salomon seemes the first Authour, whom other of great learning and iudgement haue herein followed: grounding themselves perhaps vpon that which is laide of Absolons rebellion, that it was after fortie yeeres, which they vnderstand as yeeres of Davids raigne. But whereas Rehobem the sonne of Salomon was 41. yeeres old when hee beganne to reigne, it would follow hereby that his Father had begotten him, being himselfe but a child of nine or ten yeeres old; the difference betweene their ages being no greater, if Salomon (who reigned fortie yeeres) were but eleuen yeeres old when his raigne began. To auoid this inconuenience, Iosephus allows 80. yeeres of raigne to Salomon; a report so disagreeing with the Scriptures, that it needs no confutation. Some indeede haue in laour of this opinion construed the wordes of Iosephus, as if they included all the yeeres of Salomons life. But by such reckoning hee should haue bene 40. yeeres old at his Fathers death; and consequently should haue bene borne long before his Father had wonne Ierusalem; which is a manifest vntruth. Wherefore the 40. yeeres remembered in Absolons rebellion, may either seeme to haue reference to the space betweene Davids first anointment, and the trouble which God brought vpon him for his wickednesse, or perhaps be read (according to Iosephus, Theodoret, and the Latine translation) foure yeeres; which passed betweene the returne of Absolom to Ierusalem, and his breaking out.

Of SALOMONS writings.

Here remaine of Salomons workes, that the Prouerbs, the Preacher, and the Song of Salomon. In the first he teacheth good life and correcteth manners, in the second, the vanitie of humane nature, in the third hee singeth as it were the Epithalamion of Christ and his Church. For the Booke intituled The wisdome of Salomon, (which some giue vnto Salomon, and some make the elder Philo the Author thereof) Hierome and many others of the best learned make vs thinke it was not Salomon that wrote it. Stylus libri sapientie (saith Hierone) qui SALOMONIS inscribitur, Graeco redollet elegantiam; The stile of the booke of wisdome, which is ascribed to SALOMON, fauoureth of the Grecian eloquence; and of the same opinion was S. Augustine, and yet hee confesseth in the nineteenth Booke and twentieth Chapter of the Citie of God, that the Author of that Booke hath a direct fore-telling of the Passion of Christ in these wordes: Circumueniamus inustum quoniam in iustis est nobis, &c. Let vs circumeuent the righteous, for he is vnpleasing to vs, he is contrarie to our doing, he checketh vs for offending against the Law, he maketh his boast to haue the knowledge of God, and he calleth himselfe the Sonne of the Lord, &c. and so doth the course of all the following wordes point directly at Christ. The Bookes of Ecclesiastes, Prouerbs, and Canties Cantionum, Rabbi Moses Kimchi ascribeth to Iay the Prophet. Simlas and Cedrenus report that Salomon wrote of the remedies of all diseases, and graued the same on the sides of the Porch of the Temple, which they say Ezechias pulled downe, because the people neglected helpe from God by prayer, repaired thither for their recoveries.

Of

Of Salomons bookes of Inuocations and Inchantments to cure diseases, and expell euill spirits, Iosephus hath written at large, though as I conceiue, rather out of his owne inuention, or from some vncertaine report, than truely.

He also speaketh of one Eliasarus, who by the roote in Salomons ring dispossest diuers persons of euill spirits in the presence of Resaijan, and many others, which I will not stand to examine.

Certainly so strange an example of humane frailty hath neuer been read of as this King: who hauing receiued wisdom from God himselfe, in honour of whom, and for his onely seruice, hee built the first and most glorious Temple of the world: he that was made King of Israel and Iudea, not by the law of Nature, but by the loue of God, and became the wisest, richest, and happiest of all Kings, did in the end, by the perswasion of a few weake and wretched Idolatrous Women, forget and forsake the Lord of all the world, and the giver of all goodnesse, of which he was more liberall to this King, than to any that euer the world had. Of whom Siracides writeth in this manner: SALOMON reigned in a peaceable time and was glorious, for God made all quiet round about, that hee might build a house to his name, and prepare the Sanctuary for ever: How wise wast thou in thy youth, and wast filled with vnderstanding, as with a flood: Thy minde covered the whole earth, and hath filled it with graue and darke sentences. Thy name went abroad in the Isles, and for thy peace thou wast beloued, &c. but thus hee concludeth: Thou didst how thy loynes to Women, and wast ouer-come by thy beauty, thou didst staine thine honour, and hast defiled thy posteritie, and hast brought wrath vpon thy children, and felt sorrow for thy folly. cap. 27.

§. VI.
Of the Contemporaries of SALOMON.

NERE the beginning of Salomons reigne, Agelaius the third of the Heracidae in Corinth; Labotes in Lacedemon; and soone after Sylanius Alba the fourth of the Syluij; swayed those Kingdomes: Laesthenes then gouerning Affryia: Asafus and Archippus the second and third Princes after Cadmus ruling the Athenians.

In the sixe and twentieth of Salomons reigne Hiram of Tyre died, to whom Baltasrus succeeded, and reigned seuentene yeeres, after Mercators account, who reckons the time of his rule by the age of his sonnes. Iosephus giues him fewer yeeres. Theophilus Antiochenus against Autolicius findes Bozorius the next after Hiram, if there bee not some Kings omitted betweene the death of Hiram, and the reaigne of Bozorius.

Vasphres being dead, about the twentieth of Salomon, Sefac or Shisak (as our English Genea termes him) beganne to gouerne in Egypt, being the same with him whom Diodorus calleth Sosacris; Iosephus, Sefac; Cedrenus, Susefinus; Eusebius in the column of the Egyptian Kings Smendes, and in that of the Hebrewes Sufac. Iosephus in the eight of his Antiquities reproveth it as an error in Herodotus, that hee ascribeth the acts of Sufeto Sefestris, which perchance Herodotus might haue done by comparison, accounting Sefac another Sefestris, for the great things hee did.

Of the great acts and verities of King Sefestris I haue spoken already in the storie of the Egyptian Princes: only in this hee was reproued, that hee caused foure of his captiue Kings to draw his Caroch, when hee was disposed to bee scene, and to ride in triumph: one of which foure, saith Eutropius, at such time as Sefestris was carried out to take the aire, call his head continually backe vpon the two fore-most wheelles next him; which Sefestris perceiuing, asked him what hee found worthy the admiration in that motion? to whom the captiue King answered, that in those hee beheld the instabilitie of all worldly things; for that both the lowest part of the wheele was suddainly carried about, and became the highest, and the vpmost part was as suddainly turned downe-ward and vnder all: which when Sefestris had iudiciously weighed, hee dismissed those Princes, and all other from the like seruitude in the future. Of this Sefestris, and that hee could not be taken for Sefac, I haue spoken at large in that part of the Egyptian Kings preceding.

CHAP. XIX.

Of SALOMONS Successors vntill the end of IEHOSAPHAT.

§. I.

Of REHOBAM his beginnings: the defection of the ten Tribes, and IEROBAMS Idolatrie.

REHOBAM the Sonne of Salomon by Nehama an Ammonitisse, now fortie yeeres olde, succeeded his Father Salomon, and was anointed at Siechem, where the ten Tribes of Israel were assembled: who attended a while the returne of Rehobam as yet in Egypt, since hee fled thither fearing Salomon. After his arrivall the people presented a Petition to Rehobam, to bee eased of those great Tributes laid on them by his Father. Sic enim firmius ei fore Imperium, si amari mallet quam metui; So should his Empire (saith Iosephus) be more assured, if hee desired rather to be beloued than feared.

whereof hee tooke three dayes to deliberate before his answer, of whom therefore it could not be said as of Dauid, that he was wiser than all his Teachers. For as of himselfe hee knew not how to resolute, so had hee not the iudgement to discern of counsellors, which is the very test of wisdom in Princes, and in all men else. But notwithstanding that he had consulted with those graue and aduised men, that serued his Father, who perswaded him by all meanes to satisfie the multitude: he was transported by his familiars and fauourites, not only to continue on the backs of his subiects those burdens which greatly crusht them; but (vaunting falsely of greatness exceeding his Fathers) he threatned in sharpe, or rather in terrible termes, to lay yet heauier, and more vn-supportable loades on them. But as it appeared by the success, those yonger aduisors greatly mistooke the nature of seueritie, which without the temper of clemencie is no other than crueltie to itselfe: they also were ignorant that it ought to be used for the helpe, and not for the harme of subiects. For what is the strength of a King left by his people? and what cordes or fetters haue euer lasted long, but those which haue beene twisted and forged by loue only? His witlesse parasites could well iudge of the Kings disposition: and being well learned therein, though ignorant in all things else, it sufficed and enabled them sufficiently for the places they held. But this answer of Rehobam did not a little aduance Ieroboams designs. For being fore-told by the Prophet Achish of his future aduancement, these the Kings threats (changing the peoples loue into furie) confirmed and gaue courage to his hopes. For he was no sooner arrived, than elected King of Israel: the people crying out, What portion haue wee in Dauid? we haue no inheritance in the Sonne of Isai. Now though themselves, euen all the Tribes of Israel, had consented to Dauid: anointing at Hieros the second time, acknowledging that they were his bonds and his sith: yet now after the manner of rebels, they forgot both the bonds of nature, and their dutie to God, and, as all alienated resolute hearts doe, they serued themselves for the present with impudent excuses. And now ouer-late, and after time, Rehoboam sent Adoram, one of the Taxers of the people, a man most hateful to all his Subjects, to pacifie them: whom they instantly beat to death with stones. Whereupon the King affrighted, got him from Sibem with all speede, and recovered Ierusalem, where preparing to invade Israel, with an hundred and foure-score thousand chosen men, Shemai in the person of God commanding to the contrarie, all was stayed for the present. In the meane time Ieroboam the new King fortified Sechem on this side, and Penneh on the other side of Iordan; and fearing that the Vnion and exercise of one Religion would also ioyne the peoples hearts againe to the Houle of Dauid; and hauing in all likelihood also promised the Egyptians to follow their Idolatrie: hee let vp two Calues of gold for the Children of Israel to worship, impiously perswading them that those were the Gods, or at least by these heerepresented those Gods, which deliuered them out of Egypt: and refusing the seruite of the Leuites, hee made Priests fit for such Gods. It must needs be that by banishing the Leuites which serued Dauid and Salomon through all Israel, Ieroboam greatly enriched himselfe: as taking into his hands ²⁰ all those Cities which were giuen them by Moses and Iesus, for as it is written, The Leuites left their suburbs, and their possession, and came to Iuda, &c. This irreligious policie of Ieroboam (which was the foundation of an Idolatrie that neuer could be rooted out, vntill Israel for it was rooted out of the Land) was by prophetic and miracles impugned sufficiently when it first beganne, but the affections maintaining it, were so strong, that neither Prophecie nor Miracle could make them yeeld. Ieroboam could not be moued now by the authoritie of Ahia, who from the Lord had first promised vnto him the Kingdome; nor by the withering of his owne hand as hee stretched it ouer the Altar, which also claue a-sunder, according to the signe, which the man of God had giuen by the commandement of ³⁰ God, who againe recovered and cured him of that defect; yet hee continued as obstinate an Idolater as before, for hee held it the safest course in policie to proceede as he had begunne. This impious inuention of Ieroboam, who forsooke God, and the Religion of his forefathers, by God and his Ministers taught them, was by a moderne Historiian compared with the policies of late Ages, obseruing well the practice of his Nation, being an Italian borne. Sic qui hodie (saith hee) politici vocantur, & propria commoda, presentisq; utilitates sibi tanquam vltimum finem constituunt, causam quam vocant status in capite omnium ponunt: pro ipsa tuenda, premonenda, conseruanda, amplianda, nihil non sciendum putant. Si iniuria proximo irroganda, finistria honestissiq; leges subvertende, si religio ipsa pessandanda, si deniq; omnia iura diuina, & humana violanda, nihil per se nec salsq; relinquendum censent, cuncta ruunt, omnia periclitantur, nihil a se ipsis, modo id, quod de re sua esse sibi persuadent, obtemperant, ac si nullus sit qui ista curet, cessareque possit Deus; So they who are now called Politicians, propounding to themselves, as their utmost end and scope, their owne commoditie and present profit; are wont to alledge the case of state forsooth, as the principall point to be regarded: for the good of the state, for advancing, preserving, or encreasing of the state, they thinke that they may doe any thing. If they meane to oppress their neighbour, to ouerturne all lawes of iustice and honestie, if religion it selfe must goe to wracke, yea if all rights of God and Man must be violated, they will trie all courses, be it right, be it wrong, they will doe any thing; let all goe to ruine, what care they, so long as they may haue what they would; as who should say, there were no God that would offer to meddle in such matters, or had power to correct them.

Indeed this allegation of ragione del stato, did serue as well to vp-hold, as at the first it had done to bring in this vile Idolatrie of the ten Tribes. Vpon this ground

Amasia

Amasia the Priest of Bethel, counsaile the Prophet Amos, not to prophetic at Bethel; For (saith he) it is the Kings Court. Vpon this ground euen Iehu that had maledicted the Priests of Baal, in zeale for the Lord, yet would not in any wife depart from that politike sinne of Ieroboam the sonne of Nebat, which made Israel to sinne. It was reason of state that perswaded the last famous French King Henrie the fourth to change his Religion, yet the Protestants whom hee forsooke, obeyed him, but some of the Papists whom hee followed, murdered him. So strongly doth the painted vizzor of wise proceeding delude euen those that know the foule face of impieitie lurking vnder it, and behold the wretched endes that haue euer followed it; where-¹⁰ of Iehu and all the Kings of Israel had, and were themselves very great examples.

§. II.

OF REHOBAM his impietie; for which hee was punished by SESAC: of his end and Contemporaries.

WHile Ieroboam was occupied in setting vp his new Religion, Rehoboam on the other side, hauing now little hope to recouer the Provinces lost, strengthened the principall places remaining with all endeavour: for hee fortified and victualled hitene Cities of Iudah and Beniamin:¹ nor that hee feared Ieroboam alone, but the Egyptians, to whom Ieroboam had not onely fastned himselfe, but withall inuited them to invade Iuda: laying perchance before them the incountable riches of Dauid and Salomon, which might now easily bee had, seeing ten of the twelue Tribes were revolted, and become enemies to the Iudaans. So as by those two wayes (of late yeeres often troden) to wit, change of Religion, and inuitation of forraigne force, Ieroboam hoped to settle himselfe in the seat of Israel, whom yet the powerfull God for his Idolatrie in a few yeeres after rooted out, with all his. Rehoboam also, hauing as hee thought, by fortifying diuers places, assured his estate, forsooke the Law of the liuing God, and made high Places, and Images, and Groves on euery high Hill, and vnder euery greene Tree.

And therefore in the fifth yeere of his raigne, Sesac or Shishac before spoken of, being now King of Egypt, and with whom as well Adad of Idumea, as Ieroboam, were familiar, and his instruments, entred Iudaea with twelue thousand Chariots, and three score thousand Horse, besides foote-men, which Iosaphat numbers at foure hundred thousand. This Armie was compounded of foure Nations; Egyptians, Lubans, Succians, and Cushites. The Lubans were Lybians, the next bordering Region to Egypt, on the West side. The Cushites were of Petrie, and of the Desart Arabia, which afterward followed Zerah against Asa King of Iuda. The Succians according to Iunius his opinion, were of Succoth, which signifieth Tents: hee doth suppose that they were the Troglodites, mentioned often in Plinie, Ptolemie, and other Authors. The Troglodites inhabited not farre from the bankes of the red Sea, in 22. degrees from the line Northward, about fixe hundred English mile from the belt and Maritimate part of Egypt: and therefore I doe not thinke that the Succians, or Succai were those Troglodites, but rather those Arabians which Ptolemie calles Arabes Egyptii, or Iethiophagi, which possesse that part of Egypt betwene the mountaines called Alabastrins, and the red Sea farre neerer Egypt, and readier to be leuiued then those remoued Sauages of the Troglodyta.

With this great and powerfull Armie, Sesac invaded Iudaea, and (besides many other strong Cities) wanne Ierusalem it selfe; of which, and of the Temple, and ⁵⁰ Kings house, he tooke the spoile, carrying away (besides other treasures) the golden shield which Salomon had made, in imitation of those which Dauid recovered from Adad, in the Syrian warre: these Rehoboam supplied with Targets of brasse, which were fit enough to guard a King of his qualitie: whom Syracides calleth, The foolishnesse of the people.

Cap. 47. v. 13.

From this time forward the Kings of Egypt claimed the Soueraignty of Indea, and held the Jewes as their Tributaries: Sefac, as it seemes, rendring vp to Rehoboam his places on that condition. So much may bee gathered out of the wordes of God, where promising the deliuerance of Iuda after their humiliation, hee doth notwithstanding leaue them vnder the yoke of Egypt, in these wordes: Nevertheless, they (to wit, the Indeanes) shall be his seruaunts, that is, the seruants of Sefac.

After this ouerthrow and dishonour, Rehoboam reigned twelue yeeres, and his losses received by Sefac notwithstanding, hee continued the warre against Ieroboam all his life time. After his death Ieroboam gouerned Israel foure yeeres.

Rehoboam liued 58. yeeres, and reigned 17. his storie was written at large by She-miah and Hidden the Prophets, but the same perilled with that of Nathan & the rest.

With Rehoboam, Archippus, and Tersippus, the third and fourth Archontes or Gouernours for life after Codrus, governed in Athens. Abdastartus, or Abstrartus, in Tyre. Doristhus the fifth of the Heraclidein Sparta, according to Eusebius (others make him the sixth) and Priminus the fourth in Corinth. Over the Latines reigned Syluius Albus, and Syluius Atys, the fourth and fifth of the Syluij.

About the 12. of Rehoboam, Abdastartus King of Tyre was murdered by his Nurses sons, or foster brethren, the elder of which vsurped the Kingdom twelue yeeres.

Towards his latter times Periclides, or Pythiades, beganne to gouerne Assyria, the 34. King thereof: and not long after Asartus, the sonne of Balestartus recovered the Kingdome of Tyre from the Phrygers.

¶ III.

Of the great battaile betwene Ieroboam and Abiah, with a Corollarie of the examples of Gods iudgements.

BIAH the Sonne of Rehoboam, inherited his Fathers Kingdome, and his vices. Hee raised an Armie of foure hundred thousand, with which hee invaded Ieroboam, who encountered him with a double number of eight hundred thousand, both Armies ioynd nere to the Mount Ephraim, where Ieroboam was vtterly ouerthrowne, and the strength of Israel broken; for there fell of that side five hundred thousand, the greatest ouerthrow that euer was giuen or received of those Nations. Abiah being now master of the field, recovered Bethel, Ieshanah, and Ephron, soone after which discomfiture, Ieroboam died: who reigned in all 22. yeeres. Abiah, the better to strengthen himselfe, entred into league with Hefson, the third of the Adads of Syria; as may bee gathered out of the 2. of Chron. he reigned but three yeeres, and then died: the particulars of his acts were written by Idolo the Prophet, as some part of his Fathers were.

Here wee see how it pleased God to punish the sinnes of Salomon in his Sonne Rehoboam: first, by an Idolator and a Traitor: and then by the successor of that Egyptian, whose daughter Salomon had married, thereby the better to assure his estate, which while he serued God, was by God assured against all and the greatest neighbouring Kings, and when hee forsooke him, it was torne asunder by his meanest Vassals; Not that the Father wanted strength to defend him from the Egyptian Sefac. For the sonne Abiah was able to leuie foure hundred thousand men, and with the same number hee ouerthrew eight hundred thousand Israelites, and slew of them five hundred thousand, God giuing spirit, courage, and inuention, when, and where it pleaseth him. And as in those times the causes were exprest, why it pleased God to punish both Kings and their People: the same being both before, and at the instant deliuered by Prophets; so the same iust God, who liueth and gouerneth all things for euer, doeth in these our times giue victorie, courage, and discouragement, raise, and throw downe Kings, Estates, Cities, and Nations, for the same offences which were committed of old, and are committed in in the present: for which reason, in these and other the afflictions of Israel, alwayes the causes are set downe, that they might bee as precedents to succeeding ages. They were punished with famine in Dauid time for three yeeres, For Saul and his bloudie house, &c. And Dauid towards his latter end suffered all sorts of afflictions, and sorrowes in effect, for Vriah. Salomon had tenne tribes of twelue torne from his sonne for his idolatrie. Rehoboam was spoyled of his riches and honour by Sefac of Egypt, because the people of Iuda made images, high places, and groues, &c. And because they suffered Sodomites in the land. Ieroboam was punished in himselfe & his posteritie, for the golden Calues that he erected. Ioram had all his sonnes slaine by the Philistines, and his very bowels torne out of his bodie by an excoiating flux, for murdering his brethren. Ahab and Iezabel were slaine, the blood of the one, the bodie of the other eaten with dogs: for the false accusing and killing of Naboth. So also hath God punished the same and the like sinnes in all after-times, and in these our dayes by the same famine, plagues, warre, losse, vexation, death, sicknesse, and calamities, how soeuer the wife men of the world raise these effects no higher than to second causes, and such other accidents; which, as being next their eyes and eares, seeme to them to worke euery alteration that happeneth.

¶ IIII.

Of Asa and his Contemporaries.

O Abiah succeeded Asa, who enjoyed peace for his first ten yeeres, in which time hee established the Church of God, breaking downe the altars dedicated to strange gods, with their images, cutting downe their groues, and taking away their high places. Hee also spared not his owne mother, who was an Idolatresse, but depoling her from her regencie, brake her Idoll, stamp it, and burnt it. Hee also fortified many Cities, and other places, providing (as prouident Kings doe) for the troubles of war in the leasure of peace. For not long after hee was invaded by Zerah, who then commanded all the Arabians bordering Iu'as, and with such a multitude entred the territorie of Assa, as (for any thing that I haue read) were neuer assembled of that Nation, either before or since. For it is written, that there came against the Iudeans Zerah of Aethiopia, with an hoste of tenne hundred thousand, and three hundred Chariots, which Assa encountered with an armie of five hundred and fourescore thousand, leuied out of those two tribes of Iuda and Beniamin, which obeyed him, and with which hee ouerthrew this fearefull multitude, and had the spoyls both of their Cities and Campe.

That this Zerah was not an Ethiopian, I haue *proued already, & were it but the length betwene Ethiopia and Indea, & the strong flourishing Regions of Egypt interuent (who would not suffer a million of strangers to passe through them) it were sufficient to make it appear how foolish the opinion is, that these inuaders were Ethiopians. But in that the Scriptures acknowledge that Gerar was belonging to Zerah, and the Cities thereabouts were spoyled by the Iudeans, in following their victorie, as places belonging to Zerah, and that all men know that Gerar standeth vpon the torrent of Besor, which Dauid past ouer when hee surprized the Amalekites or Arabians, this proueth sufficiently, that Zerah was leader of the Arabians, and that Gerar was a frontier towne, standing on the vttermost South-border of all Indea, from all parts of Ethiopia fixe hundred miles. Also the spoyles which Assa tooke, as the cattell, Camels, and sheepe, whereof hee sacrificed five thousand, shew them to bee Arabians adioyning, and not far off, and not vnknewne Ethiopians. And if it be objected that these desert countries can hardly yeeld a million of men fit for the warre, I answer, that it is as like that Arabia Petrea, and the Desert which compasse two parts of the holy Land, should yeeld ten hundred thousand, as that two tribes of the ther twelve, should arme five hundred and foure score thousand. Besides, it answereth to the promise of God to Abraham, that these nations should exceed in number; for God spake it of Israel, that hee would make him fruitfull, and multiply him exceedingly, that he should beget twelve Princes, &c.

Basia a King of Israel began to reigne in the third of Asa, and fearing the greatness of Asa after his great victorie, entertained Benhadad King of Syria, of the race of Adadzer, to ioyne with him against Asa; and to the end to blocke him vp, hee fortified Rama, which lieth in the way from Ierusalem towards Samarina.

This warre began according to the letter of the Scriptures in the 36. yeere of Asa his reigne: but because in the first of Kings the 16. it is said that Basia died in the 26. yeere of Asa; therefore could not Basia begin this warre in the 35. of Asa his reigne, but in the 35. yeere of the diuision of Juda and Israel: for so many yeeres it was from the first of Ieroboam, who reigned 17. yeeres, to the 16. of Asa. It may seeme strange, that Asa being able to bring into the field an Armie of five hundred and foure score thousand good Souldiers, did not easily drive away Basia, and defeat him of his purposes, the victories of Abia against Ieroboam, and of Asa himselfe against Zerah, being yet fresh in minde, which might well haue emboldened the men of Juda, and as much disheartened the enemies. Questionlesse there were some important Circumstances, omitted in the text, which caused Asa to fight at this time with money. It may be that the employment of so many hundred thousands of hands, in the late seruice against Zerah, had caused many mens priuate busines to lie vndispatched, whereby the people being now intentue to the culture of their lands and other trades, might be vnwilling to stirre against the Israelites, choosing rather to winke at apparant inconuenience, which the building of Rama would bring vpon them in after-times. Such backwardnesse of the people might haue deterred Asa from aduenturing himselfe with the least part of his forces, and committing the successe into the hands of God. Howsoeuer it were, hee tooke the treasures remaining in the Temple, with which hee waged Benhadad the Syrian against Basia, whose employments Benhadad readily accepted, and brake off confederacie with Basia. For the Israelites were his borderers, and next neighbours, whom neither himselfe (after his insuasion) nor his successors after him ever gaue ouer, till they had made themselves masters of that Kingdome. So Benhadad being now entred into Nephtalim, without resistance, hee spoyled diuers principall Cities thereof, and enforced Basia to quit Rama, and to leaue the same to Asa, with all the materials which hee had brought thither, to fortifie the same: which done, Benhadad, who loued neither partie, being laden with the spoiles of Israel, and the treasures of Juda, returned to Damascus. After this, when Hananani the Prophet reprehended Asa, in that hee now relied on the strength of Syria, and did not rest himselfe on the fauour and assistance of God, hee not only caused Hananani to be imprisoned, but hee began to burden and oppress his people, and was therefore strooken with the grievous paines of the gout in his feete, wherewith after hee had bene two yeeres continually tormented, hee gaue vp the ghost when hee had reigned 41. yeeres.

There liued with Asa, Agelaius the sixt of the Heralidae, and Bacia the sixt King of the same race in Corinth, of whom his successors were afterward called Bacidae. Asartus, and Astarimus were Kings in Tyre. Astarimus tooke reuenge on his brother Phelletor, for the murder of Itobalus Priest of the goddesse Astarte, whom Salomon in dotage worshipped. Arys and Capsy ruled the Latines. Pirithiades and Opiratus the Allyrians. Trepius and Phorbas the Athenians. Chemmis reigned in Egypt, who dying in the 36. yeere of Asa, left Cheep his successor, that reigned fiftie fixe yeeres, & vnto the 16. of Ious.

§. V.

§. V.

Of the great alteration falling out in the ten Tribes during the reigne of Asa.

IN the reigne of Asa, the Kingdome of Israel felt great and violent commotions, which might haue reduced the ten Tribes vnto their former allegiance to the house of David, if the wisdom of God had not otherwise determined. The wickednesse of Ieroboam had in his latter dayes, the sentence of heauie vengeance layd vpon it, by the mouth of Abia, the same Prophet which had foretold the diuision of Israel, for the sinne of Salomon, and his reigne ouer the ten Tribes. One sonne Ieroboam had among others, in whom onely God found so much pietie, as (though it sufficed not to with-hold his wrath from that Family) it procured vnto him a peaceable end, an honourable testimony of the peoples loue, by their generall mourning and lamentation at his death, and (wherein he was most happy) the fauourable approbation of God himselfe.

After the losse of this good sonne, the vngodly father was soone taken away: a miserable creature, so conscious of his vile vnthankfulness to God, that hee durst not suffer his owne name to be vsed in consulting with a holy Prophet, assured of the ruine hanging ouer him and his, yea, of Gods extreme hatred; yet for bearing to destroy those accursed Idoles that wrought his confusion. So loth hee was to forsake his worldly wisdom, when the world was ready to forsake him, and all belonging to him, his hateful memory excepted.

Nadab the sonne of Ieroboam, reigned in the second and third yeeres of Asa, which are reckoned as two yeeres, though indeede his fathers last yeere of two and twentie did runne along (how farre is vncertaine) with the second of Asa, whose third yeere was the first of Basia, so that perhaps this Nadab enioyed not his Kingdome one whole yeere. He did not alter his fathers courses, neither did God alter his sentence. It seemes that hee little feared the iudgements denounced against his fathers house: for as a Prince that was secure of his owne estate, hee armed all Israel against the Philistims, and besieged one of their Townes. There (whether it were so, that the people were offended with his ill successe, and recalled to minde their grievous losse of five hundred thousand vnder Ieroboam, counting it an vnluckie familie to the Nation; or whether by some particular indiscretion, hee exasperated them) slaine hee was by Basia, whom the Armie did willingly accept for King in his stead. Basia was no sooner proclaimed King, than hee began to take order with the house of Ieroboam, that none of them might molest him, putting all of them, without mercie, to the sword. That hee did this for priuate respects, and not in regard of Gods will to haue it so, it is euident by his continuing in the same forme of Idolatrie which Ieroboam had begunne. Wherefore hee received the same sentence from God that had been layd vpon Ieroboam; which was executed vpon him also in the same sort. Hee beganne to infect Asa, by fortifying Rama; but was diuerted from thence by the Syrian Benhadad, who did waste his Country, & destroy all the Land of Nephtalim. Foure and twentie yeeres hee reigned: and then dying, left the Crowne to Ela his sonne; who enioyed it, as Nadab the sonne of Ieroboam had done, two yeeres current, perhaps not one compleat.

Ela was as much an idolater as his father: and withall a riotous person. Hee sent an Armie against Gibbethon, the same Towne of the Philistims, before which Nadab the sonne of Ieroboam perished; but hee sate at home the while, feasting and drinking with his Minions, whereby hee gaue such aduantage against himselfe, as was not neglected. Zimri, an ambitious man, remaining with the King at Tirza, finding his Master so dissolute, and his behauiour so contemptible, conceited hope of the like fortune as Basia had found, by doing as Basia had done. Wherefore hee did let vp on Eli in his drunkenesse, and slue him. Presently vpon which fact, he filled himselfe King of Israel: and began his raigne with massacring all the house of Baspha; extending his crueltie not onely to his children, and kinsfolke, but vnto all his friends in Tirza. These newes were quickly blowne to the Campe at Gibbethon, where they were not welcommed according to Zimri his expectation. For the Souldiers in stead of proclaiming him King, proclaimed him Traitor: and being led by Omri, whom they saluted King, they (quitting the siege of Gibbethon) presented themselves before Tirza; which in thort space they may seeme to haue forced. Zimri wanting strength to defend the Citie, not courage to keepe himselfe from falling alive into his enemies hands, did set fire on the Palace, consuming it and himselfe together to ashes. Seuen dayes he is said to haue raigned: accounting (as is most likely) to the time that Omri was proclaimed in the Campe. For Zimri was also an idolater, walking in the way of Ieroboam; and therefore is likely to haue had more time wherein to declare himselfe, than the raigne of seuen dayes, and those consumed partly in murdering the friends of Baspha, partly in seeking to haue defended his owne life. After the death of Eli, there arose another King to oppose the faction of Omri; whereby it may seeme, that Zimri had made his party strong, as being able to set vp a new head, who doubtlesse would neuer haue appeared, if there had not been ready to his hand, some strength, not vnlily to resist and vanquish the Armie which maintained Omri. How long this Tibni, the new Competitor of Omri, held out, I doe not finde; onely it appears that his side was decayed, and so he died, leaving no other Succesor than his concurrent.

§. VI.

A coniecture of the causes hindering the reunion of Israel with Juda, which might haue been effected by these troubles.

1. King. 16. 45.

Any man that shall consider the state of Israel in those times, may iustly wonder how it came to passe, that either the whole Nation, worried with the calamities already suffered vnder these vnfortunate Princes, and with the present ciuill warres, did not returne to their ancient Kings, and reunite themselves with the mighty Tribes of Juda and Benjamin; or that Zimri and Tibni, with their oppressed factions, did not call in Asa, but rather chiefe the one to endure a desperate necessitie of yelcing, or burning himselfe, the other to languish away, a man forsaken: than to haue recourse vnto a remedie, so sure, so ready, and so honourable. To say that God was pleased to haue it so, were a true, but an idle answer (for his secret will is the cause of all things) vnlesse it could be proved, that he had forbidden Asa to deale in that businesse, as he forbade Rehoboam to force the rebellious people to obedience. That the restraint laid by God vpon Rehoboam, did only binde his hands from attempting the suppression of that present insurrection, it appears by the Warre continued betwene Israel and Juda, so many yeeres following: wherein Asa so farre prevailed, that he wanne a great battaile, and recovered some Townes belonging to the other Tribes, which he annexed to his owne Dominion. Wherefore we may boldly looke into the second causes, moouing the People and Leaders of the ten Tribes, to suffer any thing vnder new vplatts, rather than to cast their eyes vpon that Royall house of David, from which the succession of true Kings in lineall descent, had taken away all imputation, that might formerly haue been layd vpon the meane beginnings thereof. To thinke that Omri had preuented his Competitors, in making peace with Asa, were a coniecture more bold than probable. For Omri was not onely an Idolater, but did worse than all that were before him, which as it might serue alone to proue, that Asa, being a godly King, would not adhere to him, so the course which hee professed to take at the very first, of reuenging the massacre committed vpon the

the familie and friends of Baspha, (As his mortall enemy) giues manifest reason, why Zimri, who had wrought that great execution, should more iustly than he, haue expected the friendship of Juda in that quarrell. Wherefore, in searching out the reason of this backwardnesse in the ten Tribes (which was such that they may seeme to haue neuer thought vpon the matter) to submit themselves to their true Princes; it were not amisse to examine the causes, moouing the people to reuenge the death of Eli, an idle drunkard, rather than of Asadab the sonne of Ieroboam, who followed the warres in person, as a man of spirit and courage. Surely it is apparant, that the very first defection of the ten Tribes, was (if we looke vpon humane reason) occasioned by desire of breaking that heauie yoke of bondage wherewith Salomon had galled their neckes. Their desire was to haue a King that should not oppresse them; not to haue no King at all. And therefore when the arrogant folly of Rehoboam had caused them to renounce him, they did immediately choole Ieroboam in his stead, as a man likely to afford that libertie vnto them, for which hee had condescended in their behalfe. Neither were they (as it seemes) herein altogether deueiled. For his affliction of popularitie appears in his building of decayed townes, and in the institution of his new deuiled idolatry; where hee tolde the people, that it was too much for them, to traualle so farre as to Ierusalem. But whether it were so, that his moderation, being voluntarie, began to cease, towards the latter end of his reigne, and in the reigne of his sonne, when long time of possession had confirmed his title, which at the first was onely good by courtesy of the people: or whether the people (as often happens in such cases) were more offended by some prerogatives of a King that he still retained in his owne hands, than pleased with his remission of other burdens: it is cleerely apparant, that the whole armie of all Israel ioynd with Baspha, taking in good part the death of Asadab, and eradication of Ieroboams house.

Now the reigne of Baspha himselfe, was (for ought that remaineth in writing of it) euery way vnfortunate; his labour and cost at Rama was cast away; the other side of his Kingdome harried by the Syrians; neither did hee winne that one towne of Gibbethon from the Philistims, but lest that businesse to his sonne, who likewise appears an vnprofitable sluggard. Wherefore it must needs be, that the fauour of the people toward the house of Baspha grew from his good forme of Ciuill gouernment, which happily he reduced to a more temperate method than Ieroboam euer meant to doe. And surely hee that shall take paines to looke into those examples, which are extant of the different courses, held by the Kings of Israel and Juda, in administration of iustice, will finde it most probable, that vpon this ground it was that the ten Tribes continued so auerle from the line of David; as to thinke all aduersitie more tolerable, than the weightie Scepter of that house. For the death of Iosab and Shimei was indeed by them deferred; yet in that they suffered it without forme of iudgement, they suffered like vnto men innocent. The death of Adonijah was both without iudgement, and without any crime objected, other than the Kinges louelie: out of which by the same rule of arbitrarie iustice (vnder which it may be supposed that many were cast away) he would haue slaine Ieroboam (if hee could haue caught him) before hee had yet committed any offence, as appears by his confident returne out of Egypt, like one that was knowne to haue endured wrong, hauing not offered any.

The like and much more barbarous execution, to wit, without law, Iehoram did vpon his brethern, and vpon sundry of his greatest men; as also Iosab did so put to death Zachariah, the sonne of Iehoiada, who had made him King, even in the court of the house of the Lord: and MANASSES did shed innocent blood exceeding much, till he replenished Ierusalem from corner to corner; and this was imputed to him as another fault, besides his sinne, wherewith hee made Juda to sinne. Contrariwise, among the kings of Israel we finde no monument of such arbitrarie proceeding, vnlesse perhaps the words of Iehoram the sonne of Asab (which were but words) may bee taken for an instance, instance, when hee said, God doe so to mee, and more also, if the head of ELISHA the sonne of SHAPHAT fall stand on him this day; whereby it is not plain whether he meant to kill him without more adoe, or to haue him condemned as a false prophet, that had made them hold out against the Aramites, till they were faine to eate their owne children, which he thought a sufficient argument to proue, that it was not Gods purpose to deliuer them. The death of Naboth the weeth rather the libertie which the Israelites enioyed, than any peremptorie execution of the Kings will. For Naboth did not feare to stand vpon his owne right, though Ahab were euen sicke for anger, neither was hee for that cause put to death, as vpon commandement, but made away by conspiacie, the matter being handled after a iudiciall forme, to which might giue satisfaction to the people, ignorant of the deuice, though to God it could not.

2. Chron. 24. 21.

2 King. 6. 31.

2 King. 19. 10.

The murder of the Prophets is continually ascribed to Iezabel, an impudent woman, and not vnto the King her husband. Neither is it certaine, that there was no Law made whereby their liues were taken from them; but certaine it is, that the people, being idolaters, were both pleased with their death, and laboured in the execution. So that the doings of the Kings of Iuda (such as are registered) prouoe them to haue vsed a more absolute manner of command, than the Kings of the tenne Tribes. Neither doe their sufferings witness the contrary. For of those which reigned ouer Iuda, from the diuision of the Kingdom, to the captiuitie of the ten tribes, three were slaine by the people, and two were denied a place of buriall amongst their ancestors. Yea, the death of Achaziah and his brethren, slaine by Iehu, with the destruction of all the Royall seed by Athalia, did not (for ought that we can reade) stirre vp in the people any such thirst of reuenge, as might by the suddenness and vniuersitie testifie the affliction to be general, and proceeding from a louing remembrance of their Princes; vntill we should thinke that the death of Athalia, after seuen yeeres reigne, were occasioned rather by the memory of her ill purchasing, than by the present fence of her tyrannicall abusing the gouernement, whereon shee had seized. On the other side, such of the Kings of Israel as perished by treason (which were seuen of the twentie) were all slaine by conspiacie of the great men, who aspired by treason to the Crowne: the people being so farre from embrouing their hands in the blood of their Soueraignes, that (after Nadab) they did neuer forbear to reuenge the death of their Kings, when it lay in their power; nor approoue the good successe of treason, vntill seare compelled them. So that the death of two Kings, being thoroughly reuenged vpon other two, namely the death of Ela and Zacharias, vpon Zimri and Shalum, who traitorously got and vsurped, for a little while, their places; only three of the seuen remaine, whose endes how the people tooke, it may be doubtfull. Though indeede it is precisely said of the slaughter, committed on *Ahab*s children by Iehu, that the people durst not fight with him that did it, because they were exceedingly afraid; and the same feare might be in them at the death of Peka, whose history (as others of that time) is cursorily passed ouer. The like may be pronounced, and more absolutely, of the Kings of England, that neuer any of them perished by furie of the people, but by treason of such as did succeed them, neither was there any moue vrging so forcibly the death of King Edward and King Richard when they were in prison, as feare lest the people should stirre in their quarrell. And certainly (how soeuer all that the law calls treason, be interpreted, as tending finally to the Kings destruction) in those treasonable insurrections of the vulgar, which haue here most prevailed, the fury of the multitude hath quenched it selfe with the blood of some great Officers; no such rebellions, how soeuer wicked and barbarous otherwile, thirsting after the ruine of their naturall Soueraigne, but rather forbearing the advantages gotten vpon his Royall person: which if any man impute vnto grosse ignorance, another may more charitably, and I thinke, more truly ascribe to a reuerent affection. Wherefore that fable of Briareus, who, being loosened by Pallas, did with his hundred hands giue assistance to Iupiter, when

all

all the rest of the Gods conspired against him, is very fitly expounded by Sir Francis Bacon, as signifying, that Monarches neede not to feare any courbing of their abso-luteneffe by mightie subiects, as long as by wisdom they keepe the hearts of the people, who will bee sure to come in on their side. Though indeede the storie might very well haue borne the same interpretation, as it is rehearsed by Hammer, who tells vs that Pallas was one of the conspiacie, and that Thetis alone did marre all their practice, by loosening Briareus. For a good forme of gouernment sufficeth by it selfe to retaine the people, not onely without assistance of a laborious Wit, but euen against all deuices of the greatlest and shrewdest politicians; e-very Sherife and Constable, being sooner able to arme the multitude, in the Kings behalfe, than any ouer-weening Rebelle how mightie soeuer, can against him.

This declaration of the peoples loue, being seldome found in Iuda, makes it very likely, that the rule it selfe of gouernment there was such, as neither gaue occasion of contentment vnto the subiects, nor of confidence in their good affection, to the Kings. Vpon which reasons it may seeme that the multitude was kept vually disarmed. For otherwise it would haue bene almost impossible, that Athalia the sister of Ahab, a stranger to the royall blood of Iuda, should by the onely authoritie of a Queene mother haue destroyed all the seede of Dauid, and vsurped the Kingdome very neere seuen yeeres without finding any resistance. Yea when Iehoiada the high Priest had agreed with the Captaines and principall men of the land to set vp Iashob their lawfull King, whereunto the whole nation were generally well affected; hee was faine to giue to these Captaines and their men, the speeres and the shields that were King DAVIDS, and were in the house of the Lord. But we neede not enter into such particulars. Questionlesse, the Tribes which thought obedience to their Princes to be a part of their dutie toward God, would endure much more with patience, than they which had Kings of their owne choice or admiffion, holding the Crowne by a more vncertaine tenure.

And this, in my opinion, was the reason, why the tenne tribes did neuer seeke to retorne to their ancient Lords: but after the destruction of their sixe first Kings, which died in the reigne of Asa, admitted a seventh of a new family, rather than they would consubiect themselves, with those of Iuda and Beniamin, vnder a more honourable, but more heauie yoke.

So, Asa hauing scene the death of seuen kings of Israel, did himselfe after one and fourtie yeeres reigne, leauing Iehosaphat his sonne to deale with Ahab the son of Omri, who was the eight King ouer the tenne tribes.

2. VII.

Of IEHOSAPHAT and his contemporaries.

IEHOSAPHAT, who succeeded Asa, was a Prince religious and happie; hee destroyed all the Groves, Altars, and high places dedicated to idolatrie, and sent searchers to all places and people wanting instruction; hee recovered the Tribute due vnto him by the Arabians and Philistims: from the one hee had siluer, from the other sheepe and goates to the number of fifteene thousand and four hundred. The numbers of his men of warre were more than admirable: for it is written that Achaz had the command of three hundred thousand, Iehohanan of two hundred and fourescore thousand, and Amasias of two hundred thousand; also that hee had, besides these, in Beniamin of those that bare shields, which wee call Targetiers, and of Archers vnder Eliada

two hundred thousand, and vnder the commaundement of Iehorab a hundred and fourescore thousand: which numbred together, make eleuen hundred and sixtie thousand, all which are saide to haue waited vpon the King, besides his garrisons.

That Iuda and Beniemin, a territorie not much exceeding the Countie of Kent, should musther eleuen hundred and sixtie thousand fighting men, it is very strange, and the number farre greater than it was found vpon any other view. Iosh in Dauid's time found five hundred thousand: Rihobam found but an hundred and fourescore thousand: Abia foure hundred and eight thousand: Asa five hundred and fourescore thousand: Amaziah inrolled all that could beare armes, and they amounted to three hundred thousand: Yeziah three hundred and seuen thousand and five hundred. Surely, whereas it is written that when newes was brought to Iehosaphat that Moab and Ammon were entred his territorie to the West of Jordan, and that their numbers were many, hee feared (to wit) the multitude, it is not likely that hee would haue feared euen the armie of Xerxes, if hee could haue brought into the field eleuen hundred and three-score thousand fighting men, leaving all his strong Cities manned. I am therefore of opinion (referring my selfe to better iudgement) that these numbers specified in the second of Chronicles the seuenteenth, distributed to severall leaders, were not all at one time, but that the three hundred thousand vnder Adnah, and the two hundred and fourescore 20 thousand vnder Iehohannan, were after ward commaunded and mustered by Amasiah, Eliade, and Iehosaphat: for the grosse and totall is not in that place set downe, as was vnder the other Kings formerly named. Again as the aydes which Iehosaphat brought to Abah did not leue that he was a Prince of extraordinarie power, so the Moabites and Ammonites which hee feared could neuer make the one halfe of those numbers, which hee that commaunded least among Iehosaphat's leaders had vnder him.

This mightie Prince notwithstanding his greatnesse, yet he ioyned in friendship with Abah King of Israel, who had married that wicked woman Iezabel. Him Iosaphat visited at Samaria, and caused his sonne Ioram to marrie Athalia, this Achab's daughter.

Abah perswaded Iosaphat to assist him in the warre against the Syrians, who held the Citie of Ramoth Gilead from him, and called together foure hundred of his Prophets, or Baalites to foretell the successe: who promised him victorie. But Iehosaphat beleueed nothing at all in those diuiners, but resolved first of all to conferre with some one Prophet of the Lord God of Israel. Heere vpon Achab made answer that hee had one called Mitchaiab, but hee hated that Prophet, because hee alwayes foretold of euill, and neuer of any good towards him. Yet sent hee for Mitchaiab was to the King but by the way the messenger prayed him to consent with the rest of the Prophets: and so promise victorie vnto them as they did. But 40 Mitchaiab spaketh the truth, and repeated his vision to both Kings, which was that God asked who shall perswade Achab, that hee may goe up and fall at Ramoth Gilead? to whom a spirit that stood before the Lord answered, that hee would enter into his prophets, and bee in them a false spirit to delude. For as it is said by Christ: Non enim vos estis qui loquimini, sed spiritus patris vestri loquitur in vobis. It is not you that speake, but the spirit of your father speaks in you: so in a contrarie kinde did the deuill in the prophets of Baal, or Satan, incourage Achab to his destruction. And as P. Martir vpon this place well obserueth, these euill spirits are the ministers of Gods vengeance, and are vied as the hangmen and tormentors, which Princes sometime employ. For as it pleaseth God by his good Angels, to save and deliuer from destruction, of which the Scriptures haue many examples: so on the contrarie, it is by the euill that he punisheth and destroyeth, both which are said to performe the will of their Creator, sicet non eodem animo. Ecclesiasticus remembreth a second sort of malignant natures, but they are euery-where visible. There are spir-

rits, faith he, created for vengeance, which in their rigour lay on fire strokes. In the time of destruction they shew forth their power, and accomplish the wrath of him that made them.

Now Mitchaias hauing by this his reuelation greatly displeased the King, and the Prophets whose spirit hee discovered, was strooken by Zikhiab one of Baals prophets, and by Achab himselfe committed to prison: where he appointed him to be refused and fed with bread of affliction till he returned in peace. But Mitchaiab, not fearing to reply, answered, If thou returnest in peace, the Lord hath not spoken by me. Neuertheless Achab went on in that warre, and was wounded to death. Iehosaphat returned to Ierusalem, where he was reprehended by Iehu the Prophet for assisting an idolatrous Prince, and one that hated God.

After this the Aramites or Damascens, ioyned with the Moabites, Ammonites and Idumeans to invade Iudea: who passe Iordan and encampe at Engaddi, and when Iehosaphat gathered his armie, the Prophet Ishaziel foretold him of the victorie, which should bee obtained without any blood-shed of his part: and so when Iehosaphat approached, this assembly of nations, the Ammonites and Moabites, disagreeing with the Idumeans, and quarrelling for some causes among themselves, those of Ammon and Moab set vpon the Idumeans, and brake them vtterly: which done they also invaded each other; in which broile Iehosaphat arriving tooke the spoile of 20 them all without any losse of his part, as it was foretold and promised by God. Notwithstanding this victorie, Iehosaphat forgetting that hee was formerly reprehended for assisting an Idolatrous King, did not withstanding ioyne with Ochazias, the sonne of Achab, in preparing a Fleet to send to Ophir, hoping of the like returne which Salomon had: but as Eliexor the Prophet foretold him, his shippes perished and were broken in the port of Ezion Giber, and so that enterprize was ouer-

Yet hee taketh part with Iehoram the brother of Ochazias, against the Moabites, with which Kings of Iuda and Israel the Edomites ioyne their forces, not forgetting, it seemes, that the Moabites, assisted by the Ammonites, had not long before destroyed 30 their armie.

The Moabites, subiects to Dauid and Salomon, forsaking the Kings of Iuda, gaue themselves for vassals to Ieroboam, and so they continued to his successors till the death of Achab: but Iehosaphat, notwithstanding the Idolatrie of his Colleague, yet as it seemeth, he was drawne into this warre both to bee auenged of the Ammonites for their defection from Iuda to Israel, as also because they had lately ioyned themselves with the Syrians against Iosaphat, and thirdly, to punish their double rebellion who first forsooke Iuda and now Israel.

Both Kings resolved to passe by the way of Idumea, thereby the better to assure that nation, for wee finde that both Moab, Ammon and Edom were all in the field 40 together at Engaddi against Iehosaphat: But whether they had then declared themselves against Iehosaphat, it is not certaine, for in the 2. of Chronicles. 11. vers. 8. it is written that in the time of Iehoram, the sonne of Iehosaphat, Edom rebelled, and therefore it seemeth to mee that the Edomites, when they were slaine by Moab and Ammon, not finding themselves furnished in such conditions as they required, offered to turne from them, and to ioyne themselves with the armie of Iuda. For that they were numbered among the enemies of Iosaphat, it is plaine in the 2. of Chron. the 20. and as plaine e. 2. v. 8. that they were not declared, nor had made them a King, till Iehosaphat's death. Now in the passage of these Kings towards Moab, whether it were by the extraordinary heat of the yeere, or whether the Idumeans ha-
50 uing a purpose to rebell, misled the armie of Iuda and Israel with intent to inseeble them for want of water; true it is, that they suffered the same, if not a greater thirst than the armies of Craesus and M. Antonius did in their Parthian expeditions; and had, in all likelihood, vtterly perished, had not Elisha taught them to cut trenches, whereinto the water sprang, by which not only Iehosaphat and his armie, but Iehoram King of Israel an Idolator was relieved: the great mercie and goodnesse of God, hauing euer bene prone to faue the euill for the good, whereas hee neuer destroyed the good for the euill.

Brech. ter. sancti.

The miserable issue of this warre, and how Moab burnt his sonne, or the sonne of the King of Edom, for sacrifice on the rampire of his owne Citie, I haue already written in the life of Iehoram among the Kings of Israel. Iehosaphat reigned twentie five yeeres and died, he was buried in the valley of Iehosaphat, and a part of the Tyrans set ouer his graue is yet to be seene, saith Brochard. His acts are written at large by Iehu the sonne of Hanani.

There lived with Iehosaphat, Ophrates in Assyria, Capetus and Tiberinus Kings 10 of the Albans in Italie; of the latter the riuier Tiber (formerly Albula) tooke name.

In Iehosaphat's time also ruled Mecades or Mesades in Athens; Agelas or Agesslaus in Corinth; and Archilauus of the same race, of the Heracidae the seuenth in Lacedaemon. Balsarus ruled the Tyrans; Achab, Ochazias and Iehoram the Israelites.

Of IEHORAM the sonne of IEHOSAPHAT, and AHAZIA.

§. I.

That IEHORAM was made King sundry times.2. *Kin. 2. v. 1.*2. *Kin. 1. 17.*2. *Kin. 3. v. 1. and 9.*2. *Kin. 8. 16.*2. Kin. 23. 42.

IEHORAM the sonne of Iehosaphat King of Juda began to reigne at thirtie two yeeres of age, and liued vntill hee was fourtie yeeres olde, being eight yeeres a King: but of these eight yeeres, which Iehoram is saide to haue reigned, foure are to be reckoned in the life of his father, who going to the Syrian warre with Ahab, left this Iehoram King in his stead, as Ahab did his sonne Ahazias. This appeares by the severall beginnings, which are giuen in Scripture to the two Iehorams kings of Israel and Juda, and to Ahazias the eldest sonne of Ahab. For Ahazias is saide to haue begun his reigne, in the seuenteenth yeere of Iehosaphat, Iehoram the brother of Ahazias succeeded him in the second yeere of Iehoram the sonne of IEHOSAPHAT King of Juda, that is, in the next yeere after that Iehoram of Juda was designed king by his father; it being (as wee finde elsewhere) the eighteenth yeere of IEHOSAPHAT himselfe, who went with the Israelites against Moab. Hereby it appeares that the full power and execution of the royall office was retained still by Iehosaphat, who governed absolutely by himselfe, not communicating the rule with his sonne. But in the fift yeere of IEHORAM King of Israel, which was the two and twentieth of Iehosaphat, the olde King tooke vnto him, as partner in the Gouvernement, this his eldest sonne, who was at that time thirtie two yeeres olde, his Father being fiftie seuen. Now forasmuch as IEHOSAPHAT reigned twentie five yeeres, it is euident that his sonne did not reigne alone till the eighth of Iehoram King of Israel. The like regard is to be had had in accounting the times of other Kings of Juda and Israel, who did not alwayes reigne precisely so long as the bare letter of the text may seeme at first to affirme: but their yeeres were sometimes compleat, sometimes only current, sometimes confounded with the yeeres of their successors or foregoers, and must therefore be found by comparing their times with the yeeres of those others, with whom they did begin and end.

It were perhaps a thing lesse needfull than curious, to enquire into the reasons mouing Iehosaphat either to assume vnto him his sonne as partner in the Kingdome, whilst he was able him selfe to command both in peace and in warre, the like hauing neuer bene done by any of his progenitors, or hauing once (in the seuenteenth of his reigne) vouchsafed vnto him that honour, to resume it vnto himselfe, or at leastwise to deterre the confirmation of it, vntill foure or five yeeres were passed. Yet forasmuch as to enter into the examination of these passages, may be a meane to find some light, whereby we may more cleerely discouer the causes of much extraordinary businesse ensuing, I hold it not a misse to make such coniecture, as the circumstances of the storie briefly handled in the Scriptures may seeme to approue:

Wee are therefore to consider, that this King Iehosaphat was the first of Reheboams issue that ever entred into any streight league with the Kings of the ten Tribes. All that reigned in Juda before him, had with much labour and long warre, tired themselves in vaine, making small profit of the greatest advantages that could be wished. Wherefore Iehosaphat thought it the wisest way, to make a league offensive and defensive betweene Israel and Juda, whereby each might enioy their owne in quiet.

This confederacie made by a religious King, with one that did hate the Lord, could not long prosper, as not issuing from the true root and fountain of all wisdom: yet as a piece of sound policie, doubtlesse it wanted not faire pretences of much common good thereby likely to arise, with mutuall fortification of both those kingdomes, against the incircumcised nations their ancient enemies. This apparant benefit, being so inestimable aiewell, that it might not easily be lost, but continue as hereditarie from father to sonne, it was thought a very good course to haue it confirmed by some sure bond of affinitie, and thereupon was Athalia the daughter of Omr and sister of Ahab King of Israel, giuen in marriage to Iehoram, who was sonne and heire apparant to the King of Juda. This Ladie was of a masculine spirit, and had learned so much of Queene Iezabel her brothers wife, that the durst vndertake, and could thoroughly perform a great deale more in Ierusalem, than the other knew how to compass in Samaria. Shee was indeede a fire-brand, ordained by God to consume a great part of the noblest houses in Juda, and perhaps of those men or their children, whose worldly wisdom, regardless of Gods pleasure, had brought her in.

The first fruits of this great league, was the Syrian warre at Ramoth Gilead, wherein Juda and Israel did aduenture equally, but the profit of the victorie should haue redounded wholly to Ahab: as godly Princes very seldom so thrise by marching with Idolators, but rather serue the turnes of those false friends, who being ill affected to God himselfe, cannot be well affected to his seruants. Before their setting forth Ahab designed, as King, his sonne Ahazias; not so much perhaps in regard of the vncertaine euent of warre (for none of his predecessors had euer done the like vpon the like occasions) nor as fearing the threatnings of the Prophet Micah (for he despised them) as inuiting Iehosaphat by his owne example, to take the same course, wherein he preuailed.

§. II.

§. II.

Probable conjectures of the motives inducing the old King IEROSAPHAT to change his purpose often, in making his sonne IERORAM King.

MAny arguments doe very strongly prooue Iehoram to haue bene wholly ouer-ruled by his wife; especially for his forsaking the religion of his godly Ancestors, and following the abominable superstitions of the house of Achab. 10

That she was a woman of intolerable pride, and abhorring to liue a priuate life, the whole course of her actions witnesse at large. Much vaine matter shee was able to produce, whereby to make her husband thinke that his brethren and kindred were but meane and vnworthy persons in comparison of him, and of his children, which were begotten vpon the daughter and sister of two great Kings, not vpon base women and meere subiects. The Court of Achab, and his famous victories obtained against the Syrian Benhadad, were matter sufficient to make an insolent man thinke highly of himselfe, as being allied to honorably; who could otherwise haue found in his heart well enough, to despise all his brethren, as being the eldest, and heire apparent to the Crowne, whereof already he had, in a manner, the possession.

How soone his vices brake out, or how long hee dissembled them and his idolatrous religion, it cannot certainly be knowne. Like enough it is, that some smoke, out of the hidden fire, did very soone make his fathers eyes to water; who thereupon caused the young man to know himselfe better, by making him fall back into ranke among his younger brethren. And surely the doings of Iehosaphat about the same time, argue no small distemper of the whole country, through the misgovernment of his vngodly sonne. For the good old King was faine to make his progresse round about the land, reclaiming the people vnto the seruice of God; and appointing Judges throughout all the strong Cities of Iuda City by City. This had bene a needlesse labour, if the religion taught and strongly maintained by Asa, and by himselfe, had not suffered alteration, and the course of Iustice bene peruerced, by the power of such as had borne authoritie. But the necessitie that then was of reformation, appeares by the charge which the King did giue to the Iudges; and by his commission giuen to one of the priests in spiritual causes, and to the steward of his house in temporal matters, to be generall ouerscers.

This was not till after the death of Ahaziah the sonne of Achab; but how long after it is vncertaine. For Iehoram the brother of Ahaziah beganne his reigne (as hath bene already noted) in the eighteenth of Iehosaphat, which was then accounted the second of Iehoram, Iehosaphat's sonne, though afterward this Iehoram 40 of Iuda had another first and second yeere, euen in his fathers time, before hee reigned alone; as the best Chronologers and expositors of the holy text agree. So hee continued in priuate estate, vntill the two and twentieth of his fathers reigne, at which time, though the occasions inducing his restitution to former dignitie are not set downe, yet wee may not thinke, that motives thereto, appearing substantially, were wanting. Iehoram of Israel held the same correspondencie with Iehosaphat that his father had done; and made vse of it. Hee drew the Iudeans into the warre of Moab, at which time it might well bee, that the young Prince of Iuda was againe ordained King by his father, as in the Syrian expedition hee had bene. Or if wee ought rather to thinke, that the preparations for the enterprize against Moab did not occupie so much time, as from the eighteenth of Iehosaphat, in which yeere that nation rebelled against Israel, vnto his two and twentieth; yet the daile negotiations betwene the two Kings of Iuda and Israel, and the affinitie betwene them contracted in the person of Iehoram, might might offer some good occasions thereunto. Neither is it certaine how the behaviour of the younger sonnes, in their elder brothers disgrace, might cause their Father to put him in possession for feare of tumult after his death; or the deepe dissimulation of Iehoram himselfe might winne the good opinion both of his Father and Brethren; it being a thing vniually in mischievous fell natures, to be as abiect and feruile in time of adueritie, as insolent and bloudy vpon aduantage. This is manifest, that being repolished of his former estate, hee demeaned himselfe in such wise towards his brethren, as caused their Father to enable them, not onely with store of siluer, and 10 of gold, and of precious things, (which kinde of liberality other Kings doubtlesse had vnto their younger sonnes) but with the custody of strong Cities in Iuda, to assure them, if it might haue been by vnwonted means, against vnwonted perils.

§. III.

The doings of IERORAM when he reigned alone; and the rebellion of Edom and Libna.

BVt all this providence auailed nothing; for an higher providence had otherwile determined of the sequele. When once the good old man, their Father, was dead, the younger sonnes of Iehosaphat found strong Cities, a weake defence, against the power of him to whom the Citizens were obedient. If they came in vpon the summons of the King their brother, then had hee them without more ado; if they stood vpon their guard, then were they Traitors, and so vnable to hold out against him, who besides his owne power, was able to bring the forces of the Israelitish Kingdome against them, so that the apparant likelyhood of their final overthrow, sufficed to make all forsake them in the very beginning. Howsoever it was, they were all taken and slain, and with them for company many great men of the Land; such belike, as either had 30 taken their part, when the Tyrant fought their liues, or had bene appointed Rulers of the Countrey, when Iehoram was depouled from his Government; in which Office they, without forbearing to doe iustice, could hardly auoide the doing of many things derogatory to their young Master, which if he would now call treason, saying that he was then King, who durst say the contrary?

After this, Iehoram tooke vpon him, as being now Lord alone, to make innovations in Religion: wherein he was not contented as other Idolatrous Princes, to giue way and faile conduct vnto Superstition and Idolatrie, nor to prouoke and encourage the people to that sinne, whereto it is wonderfull that they were so much addicted, hauing such knowledge of God, and of his detesting that about all other sinnes; but 40 he vied compulsion, and was (if not the very first) the first that is registered, to haue set tyf Irreligion by force.

Whilest he was thus busied at home, in doing what hee listed, the Edomites his Tributaries rebelled against him abroad; and hauing bitwene, since Dauid's time, been gouerned by a Pierrey, did now make vnto themselves a King. Against these Iehoram in person made an expedition, taking along with him his Princes, and all his Chariots, with which hee obtained victory in the field, compelling the Rebels to flie into their places of aduantage, whereof he forced no one, but went away contented with the honour that hee had gotten in beating and killing some of those whom hee should haue subdued, and kept his seruants. Now began the prophetic 50 of Isaac to take effect, wherein hee fore-told, that Esaú in process of time should breake the yoke of Isaac. For after this the Edomites could neuer be reclaimed by any of the Kings of Iuda, but held their owne so well, that when, after many ciuill and forraine warres, the Semes by sundry Nations had bene brought low; Antipater the Edomite, with Herod his Sonne, and others of that race following them, be- came came Lords of the Jews, in the decrepit age of Israel, and reigned as Kings, even in Jerusalem it selfe.

The freedome of the Edomites, though purchased somewhat dearly, encouraged Libna, a great Citie within Juda, which in the time of Isaiah had a peculiar King, to rebell against Iehoram, and let it selfe at libertie. Libna stood in the confines of Beniamin and of Dan, farre from the assistance of any bordering enemies to Juda, and therefore so vnlutely it was to haue maintained it selfe in libertie, that it may seeme strange how it could escape from vtter destruction, or at the least from some terrible vengeance, most likely to haue beentaken, by their powerfull, cruell, and thorough incensed Lord. The Israelites held such good intelligence at that time with Juda,¹⁰ that he would not haue accepted the Towne, had it offered it selfe vnto him: neither doe we read that it sought how to cast it selfe into a new subiection, but continued a free estate. The rebellion of it against Iehoram, was, because he had forsaken the Lord God of his Fathers; which I take to haue not onely bene the first and remote cause, but euen the next and immediate reason, moouing the inhabitants to doe as they did: for it was a Towne of the Leuites: who must needs be driuen into great extremities, when a religion contrary to Gods Law, had not onely some allowance to countenance it by the King, but compulsiue authority to force vnto it all that were vnwilling. As for the vse of the Temple at Jerusalem (which being deuout men they might feare to lose by this rebellion) it was neuer denied to those of the ten reuolted Tribes by any of the Religious Kings, who rather invited the Israelites thither, and gaue them kinde entertainment: vnder Idolaters they must haue bene without it whether they liued free or in subiection. Yet it seemes that priuate reasons were not wanting, which might moue them rather to doe than to suffer that which was vnwarrantable. For in the generall visitation before remembered, wherein Iehosaphat reformed his Kingdome, the good old King appointing new Gouernours, and giuing them especial charge to doe iustice without respect of persons, vsed these wordes, The Leuites shall bee Officers before you; Bee of good courage, and doe it, and the Lord shall be with the good. By these phrales, it seemes, that hee encouraged them against the more powerfull, than iust proceedings of his sonne; whom if the Leuites did (according to the trust reposed in them) neglect in discharging their duties, likely it is that he meant to be euen with them, and make them now to feele, as many Princes of the Land had done, his heauie indignation. How it happened that Libna was not hereupon destroyed, yea, that it was not (for ought that wee can read) so much as besieged or molested, may iustly seeme very strange. And the more strange it is in regard of the mighty Armies which Iehosaphat was able to raise, being sufficient to haue ouerwhelmed any one Towne, and buried it vnder the earth, which they might in one moneth haue cast into it with shouells, by ordinary approaches.

But it seemes that of these great numbers which his Father could haue leuiued, there were not many whom Iehoram could well trust; and therefore perhaps hee thought it an easier losse, to let one Towne goe, then to put weapons into their bandes, who were more likely to follow the example of Libna, than to punish it. So desperate is the condition of Tyrants, who thinking it a greater happinesse to be feared, than to be loued; are faine themselves to stand in feare of those, by whom they might haue bene dreadfull vnto others.

¶ IIII.

Of the miseries falling vpon Iehoram, and of his death.

These afflictions not sufficing to make any impression of Gods displeasure in the minde of the wicked Prince a Prophecie in writing was deliuered vnto him, which threatned both his people, his children, his wiues, and his owne body. Hereby likewise it appears that hee was a cruell Persecutor of Gods seruants; in as much as the Prophets durst not reprove him to his face, as they had done many of his Predecessors, both good and euill Kings, but were faine to denounce Gods iudgements against him by letters, keeping themselves close and farre from him. This Epistle is saide to haue bene sent vnto him from Elias the Prophet. But Elias was translated, and Elizeus prophesied in his stead before this time, euen in the dayes of Iehosaphat. Wherefore it may be that Elias left this prophecie in writing behinde him, or that (as some coniecture) the error of one letter in writing, was the occasion that wee reade Elias for Elizeus. Indeepe any thing may rather bee beleued than the Tradition held by some of the Jewish Rabbins, that Elias from heauen did send this Epistle; a tale somewhat like to the fable of our Ladies letters, deuised by Erasmus, or of the Verse that was sent from heauen to S. Giles.

But whosoever was the Author of this threatening Epistle, the accomplishment of the prophecie was as terrible, as the sentence. For the Philistines and Arabians brake into Juda, and tooke the Kings house, wherein they found all, or many of his children, and wiues, all which they slew, or carried away, with great part of his goods. These Philistines had not presumed since the time of Dauid, to make any offensive warre till now; for they were by him almost consumed, and had lost the best of their Townes, maintaining themselves in the rest of their small Territorie, by defensiu armes, to which they were constrained at Gibbethon by the Israelites. The Arabians were likely to haue bene then as they are now, a naked people, all horsemen, and ill appointed; their Countrey affording no other furniture, than such as might make them fitter to robbe and spoile in the open fields, than to offend strong Cities such as were thicke set in Juda. True it is that in ages long after following, they conquered all the South parts of the world then knowen, in a very short space of time, destroying some, and building other some very flatly Cities. But it must be considered; that this was when they had learned of the Romanes the Art of Warre; and that the prouisions which they found, together with the Arts which they learned, in one subdued Prouince, did make them able and skilfull in pursuing their conquest, and going onward into Regions farre removed from them. At this day hauing lost in effect all that they had gotten, such of them as liue in Arabia it selfe are good horsemen, but ill appointed, very dangerous to passengers, but vnable to deale with good Souldiers, as riding stark naked, and rather trusting in the swiftness of their horses, than in any other means of resistance, where they are well opposed. And such, or little better, may they seeme to haue bene, that spoiled Juda in the time of Iehoram. For their Countrey was alwayes baraine and desert, wanting manuell Arts whereby to supply the naturalls with furniture: neither are these bands named as chiefe in that action, but rather adherents of the Philistines. Out of this we may inferre, that one halfe, yea or one quarter of the numbers found in the least muster of Juda and Beniamin vnder Iehosaphat (wherein were enrolled three hundred and eightie thousand fighting men) had bene enough to haue driuen away farre greater forces than these enemies are likely to haue brought into the field, had not the people bene vnable to deale with them, for lacke of weapons, which were now kept from them by their Princes ielousie, as in Sauls time by the policie of the Philistines.

It may seeme that the house of the King which these invaders tooke, was not his his Palace in Ierusalem, but rather some other house of his abroad in the Countie, where his wives and children at that time lay for their recreation: because we read not that they did sacke the Citie, or spoyle the Temple, which would have invited them as a more commodious bootie, had they got possession thereof. Yet perhaps they tooke Ierusalem itselfe by surprize, the people being disarmed, and the Kings guards too weak to keepe them out; yet had not the courage to hold it, because it was so large and populous, and therefore having done what spoyle they could, with-drew themselves with such purchase as they were able safely to conueigh away.

The slaughter committed by Iehu vpon the two and fortie brethren of Abasia, or (as they are called elsewhere) so many of his brothers Sonnes, and the cruell massacre wherein all the Royall seede perished (onely Ioa excepted) vnder the tyrannie of Abasia, following within two yeeres after this invasion of the Philistims, and Arabians, make it seeme probable, that the sonnes of Iehoram were not all slaine at once, but that rather the first murder begane in his owne time, and was seconded by many other heauie blowes, wherewith his house was incessantly stricken, vntill it was in a manner quite hewed downe.

After these calamities, the hand of God was extended against the bodie of this wicked King, smiting him with a grievous discale in his bowels, which left him not vntill his guts fell out, and his wretched soule departed from his miserable carcasce. The people of the Land, as they had small cause of comfort in his life, so had they not the good manners to pretend sorrow for his death; wherefore he was denied a place of buriall in the Kingdome, who was guided by the same spirits that had bene his Fathers cuill Angels. Abasia had other matters to trouble her head, than the pompous enterring of a dead husband. Shee was thinking how to provide for the future, to maintaine her owne greatnesse, to retaine her fauourites in their authoritie, and to place about her Sonne such Counsellours, of the house of Ahab, as were fittest for her turne. Wherefore shee thought it vnseasonable to make much ado about a thing of nothing, and offend the peoples eyes, with a stately funeral of a man by them detested: but rather chose to let the blame of things passed bee layd vpon the dead, than to procure an ill opinion of her selfe and hers, which it now did concerne her to auoide. Such is the quality of wicked Infligators, hauing made greedie vse of bad employments, to charge, not only with his owne vices, but with their faults also, the man whose euill inclinations their sinister counsailes haue made worse, when once hee is gone, and can profit them no longer. The death of Iehoram fell out indeede in a busie time; when his friend and cousin the Israelite, who had the same name, was entangled in a difficult warre against the Aramites; and therefore could haue had no better leisure to helpe Abasia, in setting of things according to her owne minde, than he had (perhaps through the same hinderance) to helpe her husband, when he was distressed by the Philistims. Yea rather hee needed and craved the assistance of the men of Iuda, for the taking in of Ramoth Gilead, where they had not sped so well the last time, that they should willingly runne thither againe, vnlesse they were very fairly intreated.

The acts of this wicked man I haue thought good to handle the more particularly (pursuing the examination of all occurrences, as farre as the circumstances remembred in holy Scripture, would guide me by their directions) to the end that it might more plainly appeare, how the corrupted affections of men, impugning the revealed will of God, accomplish neuertheless his hidden purpose, and without miraculous meanes, confound themselves in the seeming wise deuices of their owne folly: as likewise to the end that all men might learne, to submit their iudgements to the ordinance of God, rather than to thinke, that they may safely dispense with his commandements, and follow the prudent conceits which worldly wisdom dictateth vnto them. For in such kinde of vnhappy subtilties, it is manifest that

Abasia was able to furnith both her Husband and her Sonne, but the issue of them partly hath appeared already, and partly will appeare, in that which immediately followeth.

§. V.

Of the raigne of AHAZIA, and his businesse with the King of Israel.

AHAZIAS, or Abasia, the sonne of Iehoram and Abasia, beganne his raigne ouer Iuda in the twelfth yeere of Iehoram, the sonne of Ahab, King of Israel, and reigned but that one yeere. Touching his age, it is a point of more difficultie than importance to know it; yet hath it bred much disputation, whereof I see no more probable conclusion, than that of Tornellius, alleaging the Edition of the Servians at Rome, Anno Domini 1588. which saith that hee was twentie yeeres old in the beginning of his Kingdome, and the Annotations thereupon, which cite other Copies, that giue him two yeeres more. Like enough hee is to haue begone yong: for hee was gouerned by his Mother, and her Minuters, who gaue him counsaile by which hee perished. In matter of Religion he altered none of his Fathers courses. In matter of State, he likewise vp-held the league made with the house of Abab. Hee was much bulied in doing little, and that with ill successe. He accompanied his Cousin the Israelite against Ramoth Gilead, which they wanne, but not without blowes: for the Aramites fought so well, that the King of Israel was faine to aduerture his owne person, which escaped not vnwounded. The Towne being wonne was manned strongly, in expectation of some attempt likely to bee made by Hazael king of Aram: which done, Iehoram King of Israel with-drew himselfe to the Citie of Ieruel, where with more quiet hee might attend the curing of his woundes, and Abasia returned to Ierusalem. It seemes that hee was but newly come home (for hee reigned in all scanty one yeere, whereof the former expedition, with the preparations for it, had taken vp a great part) when hee made a new iourney, as it were for good manners sake, to visit the King of Israel, who lay sore of his woundes. Belike Abasia was brewing some new plots, which his presence would haue hindred, and therefore sought euery occasion to thrust him abroad: for otherwise it was but a vaine piece of worke so to leaue his kingdome, hauing no other businesse than by way of complement to goe see one whom hee had scene yesterday. Certaine it is that the Lord had resolved at this time to put in execution that heauie iudgement, which hee had laid by the mouth of Elias the Prophet vpon the house of Abab. And hereunto at this time had hee disposed not onely the concurrence of all other things, which in mans eyes might seeme to haue bene accidentall; but the very thoughts and affections of such persons, as intended nothing lesse than the fulfilling of his high pleasure. Of these Abasia doubtlesse was one; whose mischieuous purposes it will shortly bee needfull for explanation of some difficulties arising, that wee diligently consider and examine.

§. VI.

How AHAZIA perished with the house of Ahab; and how that Familie was destroyed by IEHU.

IN the whole Armie of Israel, with all the principall Captaines lying in Ramoth Gilead, a Disciple of Elihu the Prophet came in among the Captaines that were sitting together, who calling out from among them Iehu, a principall man, tooke him apart, and anointed him King ouer Israel, rehearsing vnto him the prophetic of Elias against the house of Abab.

Abab, and letting him vnderstand that it was the pleasure of God to make him executioner of that sentence. The falshood of the Messenger was such as bred in the Captaines a desire to know his errand, which Iehu thought meete to let them know, as doubting whether they had ouer-heard all the talke or no. When hee had acquainted them with the whole matter, they made no delay, but forth-with proclaimed him King. For the propheticie of Elias was well knowne among them, neither durst any one oppose himselfe against him, that was by God ordained to performe it.

Iehu, who had vpon the sudden this great honour throwne vpon him, was not slow to put himselfe in possession of it, but vsed the first heate of their affections who ioyned with him, in setting on foote the businesse which nerely concerned him, and was not to be fore-slowed, being no more his owne than Gods.

The first care taken was that no newes of the reuolt might bee carried to Israel, whereby the King might haue had warning either to fight or flee: this being fore-seene, hee marched swiftly away, to take the Court while it was yet secure. King Iehoram was now so well recovered, of his wounds, that hee could endure to ride abroad, for which cause it seemes that there was much feasting, and ioy made, especially by Queene Iezabel, who kept her state so well, that the brethren of Abasias comming thither at this time, did make it as well their errand to salute the Queene, as to visit the King.

Certaine it is, that since the rebellion of Amab against Israel, the house of Abab did neuer so much flourish as at this time. Seventy Princes of the blood Royall there were that liued in Samaria; Iehoram the sonne of Queene Iezabel had wonne Ramoth Gilead, which his Father had attempted in vaine, with losse of his life; and hee wonne it by valiant fight, wherein hee receiued wounds, of which the danger was now past, but the honour likely to continue. The amitie was so great betwene Israel and Juda, that it might suffice to daunt all their common enemies, leaving no hope of successe, to any rebellious enterprizer: so that now the propheticie of Elias might be forgotten; or no otherwise remembered, than as an vnlkele tale by them that beheld the maiestieall face of the Court, wherein so great a friend as the King of Juda was entertained, and fortie Princes of his blood expected.

In the midst of this securitie, whilest these great Estates were (perhaps) either consulting about prosecution of their intents, first against the Ammites, and then against Moab, Edom, and other rebels and enemies: or else were triumphing in ioy of that which was already wellatchieued, and the Queene Mother dressing her selfe in the brauest manner to come downe amongst them; tidings were brought in, that the watchman had from a Tower discovered a company comming. These newes were not very troublesome for the Armie that lay in Ramoth Gilead, to bee readie against all attempts of the Ammites, was likely enough to bee discharged vpon some notice taken that the enemy would not, or could not stirre. Onely the King sent out an Horse-man to know what the matter was, and to bring him word. The messenger comming to Iehu, and asking whether all were well, was retained by him, who intended to giue the Kings little warning as might bee. The seeming negligence of this fellow in not returning with an answer, might argue the matter to bee of small importance; yet the King to bee satisfied, sent out another that should bring him word how all went; and he was likewise detained by Iehu. These dumbe shewes bred some suspicion in Iehoram, whom the watchmen certified of all that happened. And now the company drew so neere, that they might, though not perfectly, be discerned, and notice taken of Iehu himselfe by the furious manner of his marching. Wherefore the King that was loth to discover any weakness, caused his Chariot to be made ready; and issued forth with Abasias King of Juda in his company, whose presence added maiestie to his traine when strength to resist, or expedition to flee had been more needfull. This could not be done so hastily, but that Iehu was come euen to the Townes end; and there they met each other in the field field of Naboth. Iehoram beganne to salute Iehu with termes of peace, but receiuing a better answer, his heart failed him, so that crying out vpon the treason to his fellow King, he turned away to haue fled. But Iehu soone ouertooke him with an arrow, where-with he strooke him dead, and threw his carke into that field, which, purchased with the blood of the rightfull owner, was to be watered with blood of the vniust possessor. Neither did Abasias escape so well, but that he was arrested by a wound, which held him till death did seize vpon him.

The Kings Palace was ioyning to the wall, by the gate of the Citie, where Iezabel might soone be aduertised of this calamitie, if shee did not with her owne eyes behold it. Now it was high time for her to call to God for mercie, whose judgement, pronounced against her long before, had ouer-taken her, when shee least expected it. But thee, full of indignation, and proud thoughts, made her selfe readie in all haste, and painted her face, hoping with her stately and imperious lookes to daunt the Traitor, or at the least to vter some Apophibegme, that should expresse her braue spirit, and brand him with such a reproach as might make him odious for euer. Little did shee thinke vpon the hungry dogs, that were ordained to deuoure her, whose paunches the stibum, with which shee besmeared her eyes, would more offend, than the scolding language where-with shee armed her tongue, could trouble the eares of him that had her in his power. As Iehu drew neere, shee opened her window, and looking out vpon him, beganne to put him in minde of Zimri, that had not long ioyned the fruits of his treason, and murder of the King his Master. This was in mere humane valuation stoutly spoken, but was in deede a piece of miserable folly, as are all things, howsoever laudable, if they haue an ill relation to God the Lord of all. Her owne *Eunuch*es that stood by and heard her, were not affected so much as with any compassion of her fortune; much lesse was her enemy daunted with her proud spirit. When Iehu saw that shee did vse the little remainder of her life in seeking to vexee him; hee made her presently to vnderstand her owne estate, by deedes and not by words. He onely called to her seruants to know which of them would be of his side, and soone found them readie to offer their seruice, before the very face of their proud Ladie. Hereupon he commanded them to cast her downe head-long: which immediately they performed without all regard of her greatnesse and estate, wherein shee had a few houres before shined so gloriously in the eyes of men; of men that considered not the iudgements of God that had bene denounced against her.

So perished this accursed woman by the rude hands of her owne seruants, at the commandment of her greatest enemy, that was yesterday her subiect, but now her Lord: and shee perished miserably struggling in vaine with base groomes, who contumeliously did hale and thrust her, whilest her insulting enemy fate on horse-back, adding indignitie to her griefe by scornfull beholding the shamefull manner of her fall, and trampling her bodie vnder foote. Her dead carcase that was left without the walls was deuoured by dogges, and her very memorie was odious. Thus the vengeance of God rewarded her Idolatrie, murder, and oppression, with slow, but sure payment, and full interest.

Abasias King of Juda fleeing a pace from Iehu, was ouer-taken by the way where he lurked; and receiuing his deadly wound in the Kingdome of Samaria, was suffered to get him gone (which he did in all haste) and seeke his buriall in his owne Kingdome: and this fauour hee obtained for his grand-fathers sake, not for his fathers, nor his owne. He died at Megidda, and was thence carried to Ierusalem, where hee was entered with his Ancestors, hauing reigned about one yeere.

CHAP. XXI.

Of ATHALIA, and whose Sonne he was that succeeded vnto her.

p. I.

s. Chron. 22. 9.

AFTER the death of Abazias, it is saide that his house was not able to retaine the Kingdome: which note, and the proceedings of Athalia vpon the death of her Sonne, haue giuen occasion to diuers opinions concerning the Pedegree of Iosab, who raigned shortly after. For Athalia being thus dispoiled of her Sonne, vnder whose name shee had reled at her pleasure, did forth-with lay hold vpon all the Princes of the blood, and slew them, that so she might occupie the Royall Throne her selfe, and raigne as Queene, rather than liue a Subiect. Shee had before-hand put into great place, and made Counsaillours vnto her sonne, such as were fittest for her purpose, and readie at all times to execute her will: that shee kept a strong guard about her it is very likely, and as likely it is that the great execution done by Iehoram, vpon the Princes, and many of the Nobilitie, had made the people tame, and fearefull to stirre, whatsoeuer they law or heard.

Yet ambition, how violent soeuer it bee, is seldome or neuer so shamelesse as to refuse the commoditie of goodly pretences offering themselves; but rather scrapes together all that will any way serue to colour her proceedings. Wherefore it were not absurd for vs to thinke, that Athalia, when shee saw the Princes of the Royall blood, all of them in a manner, slaine by her husband, and afterwards his owne children destroyed by the Philistines, began euen then to play her owne game, reducing by artificiall practice, into faire likelihoods, those possibilities where-with her husbands bad fortune had presented her. Not without great show of reason, either by her owne mouth, or by some trustie creature of hers, might shee giue him to vnderstand, how needfull it were to take the best order whilst as yet hee might, for feare of the worst that might happen. If the issue of Dauid, which now remained onely in his Familie, should by any accident faile (as wofull experience had already shewed what might after come to passe) the people of Iuda were not unlikely to chuse a King of some new stocke, a popular seditious man peraduenture, one that to countenance his owne unworthinesse, would not care what aspersions hee laide vpon that Royall house, which was fallen downe. And who could assure him, that some ambitious spirit, fore-seeing what might be gotten thereby, did not already contriue the destruction of him, and all his feede? Wherefore it were the wisest way to designe by his authoritie, not onely his Succellour, but also the reuersion, and so to provide, that the Crowne might neuer be subiect to any risling, but remaine in the disposition of them that loued him best, if the worst that might bee feared coming to passe, his owne posteritie could not retaine it.

Such perswasions being vrged, and earnestly followed, by the importunate sollicitation of her that gouerned his affections, were able to make the iealous Tyrant thinke thinke that the only way to frustrate all deuices of such as gaped after a change, was to make her Heire the last and youngest of his house, whom it most concerned, as being the Queene-Mother, to vp-hold the first and eldest.

If Athalia tooke no such course as this in her husbands times, yet might shee doe it in her Sonnes. For Abazias (besides that he was wholly ruled by his Mother) was not likely to take much care for the securitie of his halfe-brethren, or their children; as accounting his Fathers other wiues, in respect of his owne high borne Mother, little better than Concubines, and their children basely begotten. But if this mischieuous woman forgate her selfe so farre in her wicked policie, that shee lost all opportunitie which the weakenesse of her husband and sonne did afford, of procuring to her selfe some seeming Title; yet could shee afterwards faime some such matter, as boldly shee might: being sure that none would aske to see her euidence, for feare of being sent to learne the certaintie of her sonne or husband in another world. But I rather thinke that shee tooke order for her affaires beforehand. For though shee had no reason to suspect or feare the suddaine death of her sonne, yet it was the wisest way to provide betimes against all that might happen, whilst her husbands issue by other women was young and vnable to resist. We plainly find that the Brethren or Nephewes of Abazias, to the number of two and fortie, were sent to the Court of Israel, only to salute the children of the King, and the children of the Queene. The slender occasion of which long iourney, considered together with the qualitie of these persons (being in effect all the stocke of Iehoram that could be growne to any strength) makes it very suspitious that their entertainment in Iezabels house would only haue bene more formall, but little differing in substance, from that which they found at the hand of Iebn. Hee that looks into the courses held both before and after by these two Queenes, will finde cause enough to thinke no lesse. Of such as haue aspired vnto Lordships not belonging to them, and thrust out the right Heires by pretence of Testaments, that had no other validitie than the sword of such as claimed by them could giue. Histories of late, yea of many Ages, afford plentifull examples: and the rule of Salomon is true: Is there any thing Ecclesi. 1. 10.
 30 whereof one may say, Behold, this is new? it hath bene already in the old time that was before vs. That a King might shed his brothers blood, was proued by Salomon vpon Adonia; that he might aliene the Crowne from his naturall Heires, Dauid had giuen proofe: but these had good ground of their doings. They which follow examples that please them, will neglect the reasons of those examples, if they please them not, and rest contented with the practice, as more willingly shewing what they may doe, than acknowledging why Salomon slew his brother that had begunne one rebellion, and was entering into another. Iehoram slew all his brethren, which were better than hee: DAVID purchased the Kingdome, and might the more freely dispose of it, yet he disposed of it as the Lord appointed; if Iehoram, who had lost much and gotten nothing, thought that hee might aliene the remainder at his pleasure; or if Abazias sought to cut off the succession of his brethren, or of their issue: either of these was to be answered with the wordes which Iehoiada the Priest vsd afterwards, in declaring the title of IOASH: Behold, the Kings sonne must raigne; as the Lord hath said of the sonnes of DAVID. Wherefore though I hold it very probable, that Athalia did pretend some title, whatsoever it might bee, to the Crowne of Iuda; yet is it most certaine that shee had thereunto no right at all, but only got it by treachery, murder, and open violence; and so shee held it fixe whole yeeres, and a part of the seventh, in good seeming-securitie.

§. II.

How IERU spent his time in Israel, so that he could not molest ATHALIA.

IN all this time Iehu did neuer goe about to disturbe her; which in reason hee was likely to desire, being an enemy to her whole House. But hee was occupied at the first in establishing himselfe, rooting out the posteritie of Abah, and reforming somewhat in Religion: afterwards in warres against the Amite, wherein hee was so farre overcharged, that hardly hee could retaine his owne, much lesse attempt vpon others. 10
Of the line of Abah there were seuentie living in Samarita, out of which number Iehu by letter aduised the Citizens to set vp some one as King, and to prepare themselves to fight in his defence. Hereby might they gather how confident hee was, which they well vnderstood to proceede from greater power about him, than they could gather to resist him. Wherefore they tooke example by the two Kings whom hee had slaine, and being exceedingly afraid of him, they offered him their seruice, wherein they so readily shewed themselves obedient, that in lesse than one dayes warning, they sent him the heads of all those Princes, as they were inioyned by a second letter from him. After this hee surprized all the Priests of Baal by a subtiltie, 20
faining a great sacrifice to their god, by which meanes he drew them altogether in to one Temple, where he slew them; and in the same zeale to God vterly demolished all the monuments of that impietie.

Concerning the Idolatrie deuiled by Ierobam, no King of Israel had euer greater reason than Iehu to destroy it. For he needed not to feare lest the people should be allured vnto the house of Dauid; it was (in appearance) quite rooted vp, and the Crowne of Iuda in the possession of a cruell Tyrannesse: he had receiued his kingdom by the vnexpected grace of God; and further, in regard of his zeale expressed in destroying Baal out of Israel, hee was promised, notwithstanding his following the linne of Ierobam, that the Kingdom should remaine in his Familie, to the fourth Generation. But all this would not serue; he would needs helpe to piece out Gods 30 providence with his owne circumspection; doing therein like a foolish greedie gamester, who by stealing a needelesse Card to assure himselfe of winning a stake, forfeits his whole rest. He had questionlesse displeased many, by that which he did against Baal; and many more he should offend by taking from them the vse of a superstition, so long practized as was that Idolatrie of Ierobam. Yet all these, how many sooner they were, had neuer once thought vpon making him King, if God, whom, to retaine them, hee now forsooke, had not giuen him the Crowne, when more difficulties appeared in the way of getting it, than could at any time after be found in the means of holding it.

This ingratitude of Iehu drew terrible vengeance of God vpon Israel, whereof 40
Hazael King of Damascus was the Executioner. The crueltie of this barbarous Prince we may finde in the prophetic of Elisema, who fore-told it, saying: Their strong Cities shall thou set on fire, and their young men shalt thou slay with the sword, and shalt dash their infants against the stones, and rent in pieces their women with child. So did not onely the wickednesse of Abah cause the ruine of his whole house, but the obstinate Idolatrie of the people bring a lamentable miserie vpon all the Land: For the furie of *Hazael*s victorie was not quenched with the destruction of a few Townes, nor wearied with one inuasion; but he smote them in all the coasts of Israel, and wasted all the Countrey beyond the River of Jordan. Notwithstanding all these calamities, it seems that the people repented not of their Idolatrie; For in those dayes the Lord 50 beganne to loath Israel, but rather it is likely, that they bemoaned the noble House of Abah, vnder which they had beaten those enemies to whom they were now a prey, and had brauely fought for the conquest of Syria, where they had enlarged their border, by winning Ramoth Gilead, and compelled Benhadad to restore the Cities which his Father had wonne: whereas now they were faine to make wofull shifts, lying vnder a Lord that had better fortune and courage in murdering his Master that had put him in trust, than in defending his people from their cruell enemies. Thus it commonly falls out, that they who can finde all manner of difficulties in seruing him, to whom nothing is difficult, are, in stead of the ease and pleasure to themselves propounded by contrarie courses, ouerwhelmed with the troubles which they sought to auoide, and therein by God whom they first forsooke, forsaken, and left vnto the wretched labours of their owne blinde wisedome, wherein they had reposed all their confidence.

§. III.

Of ATHALIAHs GOVERNMENT.

IHese calamities falling vpon Israel, kept Athalia safe on that side, giuing her leisure to looke to things at home; as hauing little to doe abroad, vnlesse it were so that shee held some correspondence with Hazael, pretending therein to imitate her husbands grand-father King Aha, who had done the like. And some probability that shee did so may be gathered out of that which is recorded of her doings. For wee finde, that this wicked ATHALIA and her children brake up the house of God, and all things that were 20 dedicate for the house of the Lord did they bestow vpon BALIM. Such a sacrifice, though it proceeded from a desire to set out her owne Idolatrie, with such pompe as might make it the more glorious in the peoples eyes, was not likely to want some faire pretext of necessitie of the State so requiring: in which case others before her had made bold with that holy place, and her next successfull was faine to doe the like, being thereunto forced by Hazael, who perhaps was delighted with the taste of that which was formerly thence extracted for his sake.

Vnder this impious gouernment of Athalia, the education of the Priests and Levites was very notable, and serued (no doubt) very much to retaine the people in the religion taught by God himselfe, howsoeuer the Queens proceedings aduanced the contrarie. For the pueritie of that sacred Tribe of Leui must needs haue been exceeding great at this time; all their lands and possessions in the ten Tribes being vterly lost, the oblations and other perquisites, by which they liued, being now very few, and small; and the store laid vp in better times vnder godly Kings, being all taken away by shamefull robbes. Yet they vp-held in all this miserie the seruice of God, and the daily sacrifice, keeping duly their courses, and performing obedience to the high Priest, no lesse than in those dayes wherein their entertainment was farre better.

§. IIII.

Of the preservation of IOAS.

IERHOIADA then occupied the high Priest-hood, an honourable, wise and religious man. To his carefulnesse it may be ascribed, that the state of the Church was in some slender sort vp-held in those vnhappy times. His wife was Iehoshabet, who was daughter of King Ieroram, and sister to Ahasia, a godly Ladie and vertuous, whose pietie makes 50
it seeme that Athalia was not her Mother, though her access to the Court argue the contrarie: but her discreet carriage might more easily procure her welcome to her owne Fathers house, than the education vnder such a Mother could haue permitted her to be such as shee was. By her care IOASH the young Prince that reigned soone after, was conueighed out of the nourserie, when Athalia destroyed all the Kings children, and was carried secretly into the Temple, whereas secretly hee was brought vp. How it came to passe that this young child was not hunted out, when his bodie was missing, nor any great reckoning (for ought that we finde) made of his escape, I will not stand to examine: for it was not good in policie, that the people should heare say, that one of the children had auoided that cruell blow; it might haue made them hearken after innovations, and so bee the lesse conformable to the present government. So Iosb was deliuered out of that slaughter, he and his Nurse being gone no man could tell whither, and might bee thought peraduenture to bee cast away, as hauing no other guard than a poore woman that gaue him sucke, who foolishly doubting that shee her selfe should haue bene slaine, was fled away with him into some desolate places, where it was like enough that shee and hee should perish. In such cases flatterers, or men desirous of reward, easily coine such tales, and rather sweare them to bee true in their owne knowledge, than they will lose the thanks due to their ioyfull tidings.

†. V.
Whose Sonne IOAS was.

†. I.
Whether IOAS may be thought likely to haue bene the Sonne of AHAZIA.

NOW concerning this Iosb, whose sonne he was, it is a thing of much difficultie to asseigne, and hath caused much controuersie among writers. The places of Scripture, which call him the sonne of AHAZIA, seeme plaine enough. How any figure of the Hebrew language might giue that title of Sonne vnto him, in regard that he was his Successor, I neither by my selfe can finde, nor can by any helpe of Authors learne how to answer the difficulties appearing in the contrarie opinions of them, that thinke him to haue bene, or not, the naturall Sonne of Ahasia. For whereas it is said, that the house of AHAZIA was not able to retaine the Kingdome; some doe inferre that this Iosb was not properly called his Sonne, but was the next of his kindred, and therefore succeeded him, as a sonne in the inheritance of his Father. And hereunto the murder committed by Athalia, doth very well agree. For these perceiuing that the Kingdome was to fall into their hands, in whom shee had no interest, might easily finde cause to feare, that the tyrannie exercised by her husband, at her instigation vpon so many noble Houses, would now bee reuenged vpon her selfe. The ruine of her Idolatrous religion might in this case terrifie both her and her Minions; the sentence of the Law rewarding that offence with death; and the Tragedie of Iezabel teaching her what might happen to another Queene. All this had little concerned her, if her owne grand-child had bene heire to the Crowne; for shee that had power enough to make her selfe Queene, could with more ease, and lesse enuie, haue taken vpon her the office of a Protector, by which authoritie shee might haue done her pleasure, and bene the more both obeyed by others, and secure of her owne estate, as not wanting an Heire. Wherefore it was not needefull, that she should be so vnnatural, as to destroy the child of her owne sonne, of whose life she might haue made greater vse, than shee could of his death: whereas indeede, the loue of grand-mothers to their Nephewes, is little lesse than that of Mothers to their children.

This argument is very strong. For it may seeme incredible, that all naturall affection should be cast aside, when as neither necessitie yetgh, nor any commoditie thereby gotten requirerh it, yea when all humane policie doth teach one the same, which nature without reason would haue perswaded.

†. II.

†. II.

That IOAS did not descend from NATHAN.

BUT (as it is more easie to finde a difficultie in that which is related, than to shew how it might haue otherwise been) the pedigree of this Iosb is, by them which thinke him not the sonne of Ahasia, set downe in such sort that it may very iustly be suspected. They say that he descended from Nathan the sonne of Dauid, and not from Salomon, to which purpose they bring a Historie (I know not whence) of two families of the race of Dauid, saying that the line of Salomon held the kingdome with this condition, that if at any time it failed, the familie of Nathan should succede it. Concerning this Nathan the sonne of Dauid there are that would haue him to bee Nathan the Prophet, who, as they thinke, was by Dauid adopted. And of this opinion was Origen, as also S. Augustine sometime was, but afterward hee reuoked it, as was meet; for this Nathan is reckoned among the sonnes of Dauid, by Bathshua the daughter of Amnes, and therefore could not be the Prophet. Gregory Nazianzen (as I finde him cited by Peter Martyr) and after him, Erasmus, and Faber Stapulensis, haue likewise held the same of Iosb, deriuing him from Nathan. But Nathan, and those other brethren of Salomon by the same mother, are thought, vpon good likelihoods, to haue been the children of Vria the Hittite: and so are they accounted by sundry of the fathers, and by Lyra, and Abulenfis, who follow the Hebrew expofitors of that place in the first of Chronicles. The words of Salomon calling himselfe the onely begotten of his mother, doe approue this expofition: for wee reade of no more than two sonnes which Bathshua or Bathsheba did beare vnto Dauid, whereof the one, begotten in adultery, died an infant, and Salomon onely of her children by the King did liue. So that the rest must needs haue been the children of Vria, and are thought to haue been Dauid's onely by adoption. Wherefore, if Iosb had not been the sonne of Ahasia, then must that pedigree haue been false, wherein S. Matthew deriueh him lineally from Salomon; yea, then had not our blessed Sauiour issued from the loynes of Dauid, according to the flesh, but had onely been of his line by countesse of the Nation, and forme of Law, as any other might haue been. As for the authority of Philo, which hath drawne many late writers into the opinion that Iosb was not of the posteritie of Salomon, it is enough to say, that this was Prier Annus his Philo: for no other edition of Philo bath any such matter; but Annius can make Authors to speake what he list.

†. III.

That IOAS may probably be thought to haue bene the sonne of IERORAM.

IN so doubtfull a case, if it seeme lawfull to hold an opinion that no man hath yet thought vpon, methinks it were not amisse to lay open at once, and peruse together two places of Scripture, whereof the one telling the wickedness of Ieroram the sonne of Iehosaphat King of Juda, for which hee and his children perished, rehearteth it as one of Gods mercies towards the house of Dauid, that according to his promise he would giue him alight, and to his children for ever: the other doth say, that for the offences of the same IERORAM, there was not a sonne left him, save IEHOAHAS the youngest of his sonnes. Now, if it were in regard of Gods promise to Dauid, that after those massacres of Ieroram, vpon all his brethren, and of the Philistims, and Arabians vpon the children of Ieroram, one of the seede of Dauid escaped, why may it not be thought that hee was said to haue escaped, in whom the line of Dauid was preferred? for had all the race of Salomon been rooted vp in these wooll T ragedies, and the progenie of Nathan succeeded in place thereof, like enough it is that some remembrance more particular would haue been extant, of an euent so so memorable. That the race of Nathan was not extinguished, it is indeed apparent by the Genealogie of our Lord; as it is recounted by S. Luke: but the preferuation of the house of David, mentioned in the bookes of Kings and Chronicles, was performed in the person of Iehobab, in whom the Royal branch of Salomon, the naturall, and not onely legall issue remaining of David, was kept aliue. Wherefore it may be thought that this Iosif, who followed Athalia in the Kingdome, was the yongest sonne of Iehoram, whose life Athalia as a stepdame, was not likely to pursue. For it were not easily understood, why the preferuation of David's line, by Gods speciall mercie, in regard of his promise made, should pertaine rather to that time, when besides Athalia himselfe, there were two and fortie of his brethren, or (as in another place they are called) sonnes of his brethren remaining aliue, which afterwards were all slaine by Iehu; than haue reference to the lamentable destruction and little lesse than extirpation of that progenie, wherein one onely did escape. Certainly that inhumane murder which Iehoram committed vpon his brethren, if it were (as appeareth in the Historie) reuenged vpon his owne children; then was not this vengeance of God accomplished by the Philistims and Arabians; but being onely begun by them, was afterwards prosecuted by Iehu, and finally tooke effect by the hands of that same wicked woman, at whose instigation hee had committed such barbarous outrages. And from this execution of Gods heauie iudgement layd vpon Iehoram and all his children, onely Iehobab his yongest sonne was exempted; whom therefore if I should affirme to be the same with Ios, which is called the sonne of Athalia, I should not want good probability. Some further appearance of necessity there is, which doth argue that it could no otherwise haue bene. For it was the yongest sonne of Iehoram in whom the race was preserved; which could not in any likelihood be Athalia, seeing that he was twenty yeeres old at the least (as is already noted) when hee began to raigne, and consequently, was borne in the eighteenth or twentieth yeere of his Fathers age. Now, I know not whether of the two is more vnlkely, either that Iehoram should haue begotten many children before hee was eightene yeeres old, or that hauing (as hee had) many wiues and children, hee should vpon the sudden, at his eighteenth yeere, become vnfruitfull, and beget no more in twenty yeeres following: each of which must haue been true, if this were true that Athalia was the same Iehobab, which was his yongest sonne. But this inconuenience is taken away, and those other doubts arising from the causelesse cruelty of Athalia, in seeking the life of Ios, are easily cleared, if Ios and Iehobab were one. Neither doth his age withstand this opinion. For he was seuen yeeres old when hee began to reigne; which if wee vnderstand of yeeres compleat, he might haue been a yeere old at the death of Iehoram, being begotten somewhat after the beginning of his sickness. Neither is it more absurd to say that he was the naturall sonne of Iehoram, though called the sonne of Athalia, than it were to say, as great Authors haue done, this difficultie notwithstanding, that hee was of the posteritie of Nathan. One thing indeed I know not how to answer, which had it concurred with the rest, might haue serued as the very foundation of this opinion. The name of Iehobab, that soundeth much more neere to Ios, than to Athalia, in an English eare, doth in the Hebrew (as I am informed by some, skilfull in that language) through the diuersitie of certaine letters, differ much from that which is most resembleth in our Westerne manner of writing, and little from the other. Now, although it be so that Athalia herselfe be also called Asaria, and must haue had three names, if hee were the same with Iehobab; in which manner Ios might also haue had several names; yet, because I finde no other warrant hereof than a bare possibility, I will not presume to build an opinion vpon the weak foundation of mine owne coniecture, but leaue all to the consideration of such as haue more abilitie to iudge, and leisure to consider of this point.

†. IIII.

†. IIII.

Vpon what reasons ATHALIA might seeke to destroy Ios, if he were her owne grandchild.

If therefore we shall follow that which is commonly receiued, and interpret the text according to the letter, it may be said, that Athalia was not onely blinded by the passions of ambition and zeale to her idolatrous worship of Basim, but pursued the accomplishment of some naturall desires, in seeking the destruction of her grandchild, and the rest of the blood Royall. For whether it were so that Athalia (as proud and cruell women are not alwayes chaste) had imitated the libertie of Iezabel her sister in law, whose whoredomes were vpbraid by Iehu to her sonne; or whether she had children by some former husband, before she was married vnto Iehoram (which is not vnlikely in regard of her age, who was daughter of Omri, and sister to Ahab) certaine it is that she had sonnes of her owne, and those old enough to be employed, as they were, in robbing of the Temple. So it is not greatly to be wondered at, that to settle the Crowne vpon her owne children, shee did seeke to cut off, by wicked policie, all other claimes. As for Ios, if he were his grandmother, yet shee might mistrust the interest which his mother would haue in him, lest when he came to yeeres, it might withdraw him from her deuotion. And heretofore (besides that women doe commonly better loue their daughters husbands, than their sonnes wiues) there is some appearance in the reigne of her sonne: for shee made him spend all his time in idle journeys, to no other apparant end, than that shee might rule at home; and hee liuing abroad be estranged from his wife, and entertaine some new fancies, wherein Iezabel had cunning enough to see his tutorlesse. But when the sword of Iehu had rudely cut in sunder all these fine deuices, then was Athalia faine to goe roundly to worke, and doe as shee did, whereby the thought to make all sure. Otherwise, if (as I could rather thinke) she were onely stepdame to Ios, we neede not seeke into the reasons mouing her to take away his life; her owne hatred was cause enough to dispatch him among the first.

§. VI.

A digression, wherein is maintained the liberty of vsing coniecture in Histories.

Thus much concerning the person of Ios, from whom, as from a new roote, the tree of David was propagated into many branches. In handling of which matter, the more I consider the nature of this Historie, and the diuersitie betweene it and others, the lesse me thinkes I neede to suspect mine owne presumption, as deserting blame, for curiositie in matter of doubt, or boilelesse in libertie of coniecture. For all Histories doe giue vs information of humane counsailes and euents, as farre forth as the knowledge and faith of the writers can afford; but of Gods will, by which all things are ordered, they speake onely at random, and many times fallily. This we often finde in profane writers, who ascribe the ill successe of great vndertakings to the neglect of some impious Rites, whereof indeede God hath horrid the performance as vehemently, as they thought him to be highly offended with the omission. Hereat we may the lesse wonder, if we consider the idolatry made by the Iewes in Egypt vnto Jeremie the Prophet reprehending their idolatry. For, howsoeuer the written Law of God was knowne vnto the people, and his punishments layd vpon them for contempt thereof were very terrible, and euen then but newly executed; yet were they so obstinately bent vnto their owne wills, that they would not by any means be drawne to acknowledge the true cause of their affliction. But they told the Prophet roundly, that they would worship the Queene of Heauen, as they and their

their Fathers, their Kings and their Princes had vied to do; For then (said they) had we plenty of victuall, and were well, and felt no evil: adding that all manner of miseries were befallen them, since they left off that seruice of the Queene of Heauen. So blinde is the wisdom of man, in looking into the counsaile of God, which to finde out there is no better nor other guide than his owne written will not peruerbed by vaine additions.

5. Phil. Sid. in his Appl. for Poetry.

But this Historie of the Kings of Israel and Juda hath herein a singular prerogative above all that haue been written by the most sufficient of merely humane authors: it setteth downe expressly the true, and first causes of all that happened; not in imputing the fault of Ahab to his ouer-forwardnesse in barraile; the ruine of his familie, to the securitie of Ieroboam in Ierel; nor the victories of Hazael, to the great commotions raised in Israel, by the coming of Iehu; but referring all vnto the will of God, I meane, to his revealed will: from which that his hidden purposes doe not varie, this story, by many great examples, giues most notable prooffe. True it is, that the concurrence of second causes with their effects, is in these bookes nothing largely described; nor perhaps exactly in any of those Histories that are in these points most copious. For it was well noted by that worthy Gentleman, Sir PHILIP SIDNEY, that Historians doe borrow of Poets, not onely much of their ornament, but somewhat of their substance. Informations are often false, records not alwayes true, and notorious actions commonly insufficient to discouer the passions which did set them first on foote. Wherefore they are faine (I speake of the best, and in that which is allowed, for to take out of Linie every one circumstance of Claudius his journey against Adraball in Italie, fitting all to another businesse, or any practice of that kinde, is neither Historical nor Poetical) to search into the particular humour of Princes, and of those which haue governed their affections, or the instruments by which they wrought, from whence they doe collect the most likely motives, or impediments of euery businesse; and so figuring as neere to the life as they can imagine, the matter in hand, they iudiciously consider the defects in counsaile, or obliquity in proceeding.

Yet all this, for the most part, is not enough to giue assurance, howsoever it may giue satisfaction. For the heart of man is vnsearchable: and Princes, howsoeuer their intents bee seldome hidden from some of those many eyes which prie both into them, and into such as liue about them; yet sometimes either by their owne close temper, or by some subtil miste, they concale the truth from all reports. Yea, many times the affections themselves lie dead, and buried in obliuion, when the preparations which they begate, are conuerted to another vse. The industrie of an Historian, hauing so many things to weary it, may well be excused, when finding apparent cause enough of things done, it forbeareth to make further search; though it often fall out, where sundry occasions worke to the same end, that one small matter in a weake minde is more effectually, than many that seemes farre greater. So comes it many times to passe, that great fires, which consume whole houles or Townes, begin with a few straws, that are wasted or not scene; when the flame is discovered, hauing fastened vpon some wood-pile, that catcheth all about it. Questionless it is, that the warre commenced by Darius, and pursued by Xerxes against the Greekes, proceeded from desire of the Persians to enlarge their Empire: howsoever the enterprize of the Athenians vpon Sardes, was noised abroad as the ground of that quarrell: yet Herodotus telleth vs, that the wanton desire of Queene Mithras, to haue the Grecian dames her bondwomen, did first moue Darius to prepare for this warre before he had receiued any injury; and when he did not yet so much desire to get more, as to enioy what was already gotten.

I will not here stand to argue whether Herodotus bee more iustly reprehended by some, or defended by others; for alleading the vaine appetite, and secret speech of the Queene in bed with her husband, as the cause of those great evils following; this I may boldly affirme, (hauing I thinke, in euery estate some sufficient witness) that matter matter of much consequence, founded in all seeming vpon substantiall reasons, haue issued indeed from such pettie trifles, as no Historian would either thinke vpon, or could well search out.

I therefore it was a good answer that Sixtus Quintus the Pope made to a certaine Frier, coming to visite him in his Popedom, as hauing long before in his meane estate, bene his familiar friend. This poore Frier, being emboldened by the Pope to vse his old libertie of speech, aduentured to tell him, that he very much wondred how it was possible for his Holinesse, whom he rather tooke for a direct honest man, than any cunning politician, to attaine vnto the Papacie; in compassing of which, al the subtiltie (sayd hee) of the most crafty braines, linde worke enough: and therefore the more I thinke vpon the Art of the conclaue, and your vnaptnesse thereto, the more I needs must wonder. Pope Sixtus to satisfie the plaine dealing Frier, dealt with him againe as plainly, saying, Hadst thou liued abroad as I haue done, and scene by what folly this world is gouerned, thou wouldest wonder at nothing.

Surely, if this be referred vnto those exorbitant engines, by which the course of affaires is moued; the Pope said true. For the wisest of men are not without their vanities, which requiring and finding mutual toleration, worke more closely, and earnestly, than right reason either needs or can. But if we lift vp our thoughts to that supreme Gouernour, of whose Empire all that is true, which by the Poet was said of Iupiter:

Vento, et urbes, regna,q; trisita Dinosq; mortalesq; turbas, Imperio regit vnus aquo.*

Who rules the duller earth, the wind-swolne streames,
The ciuill Cities, and th' infernall realmes,
Who th' host of heauen and the mortall band,
Alone doth gouerne by his iust command.

Then shall wee finde the quite contrary. In him there is no vncertaintie nor change; he foreseeeth all things, and all things disposed to his owne honour; Hee neither deceiueth nor can be deceiued, but continuing one and the same for euer, doth constantly gouerne all creatures by that law, which hee hath prescribed and will neuer alter. The vanities of men beguile their vaine contriuers, and the perpetitie of the wicked, is the way leading to their destruction: yea, this broad and headlong passage to hell, is not so delightfull as it seemeth at the first entrance, but hath growing in it, besides the poisons which infect the soule, many cruell thornes deeply wounding the bodie, all which, if any few escape, they haue onely this miserable advantage of others, that their descent was the more swift and expedite. But the seruice of God is the path guiding vs to perfect happinesse, and hath in it a true, though not compleat felicitie, yielding such abundance of ioy to the conscience, as doth easily counteruaile all afflictions whatsoever; though indeed those brambles that sometimes teare the skinne of such as walke in this blessed way, doe commonly lay hold vpon them at such time as they sit downe to take their ease, and make them with themselves at their iournies end, in the presence of their Lord whom they faithfully serue, in whose presence is the fulnesse of ioy, and as whose right hand are pleasures for euermore.

Wherefore it being the end and scope of all History, to teach by example of times past, such wisdom as may guide our desires and actions, we should not maruaile though the Chronicles of the Kings of Iuda and Israel, being written by men inspired with the Spirit of God, instruct vs chiefly, in that which is most requisite for vs to know, as the meanes to attaine vnto true felicitie, both here, and hereafter, propounding pounding examples which illustrate this infallible rule, The feast of the Lord is the beginning of Wisdom. Had the expedition of Xerxes (as it was foretold by Daniel) been written by some Prophet after the captivity: wee may well beleue that the counsaile of God therein, and the executioners of his righteous will, should haue occupied either the whole or the principall room in that narration. Yet had not the purpose of Darius, the desire of his Wife, and the businesse at Sardes, with other occurrences, been the lesse true, though they might haue bene omitted, as the lesse materiall: but these things it had bene lawfull for any man to gather out of profane Histories, or out of circumstances otherwise appearing, wherein hee should not haue done iniurie to the Sacred Writings, as long as he had forborne to derogate to from the first causes, by ascribing to the second more then was due.

Such, or little different, is the businesse that I haue now in hand: wherein I cannot beleue that any man of iudgement will tax mee, as either fabulous or presumptuous. For he doth not faile, that rehearseth probabilities as bare coniectures; neither doth he depraue the Text, that seeketh to illustrate and make good in humane reason, those things, which authority alone, without further circumstance, ought to haue confirmed in euery mans beliefe. And this may suffice in defence of the libertie, which I haue vsed in coniectures, and may hereafter vsed when occasion shall require, as neither vnlawfull, nor misbecoming an Historian.

The conspiracie against ATHALIA.

When Athalia had now fixe yeeres and longer worn the Crowne of Isa- da, and had found neither any forsaie enemy, nor domestical aduer-sarie to disturbe her possession, suddenly the period of her glory, and reward of her wickednesse meeting together, tooke her away without any warning, by a violent and shamefull death. For the growth of the young Prince began to be such, as permitted him no longer to be concealed, and it had been very vnfitting that his education should bee simple, to make him seeme the childe of some poore man (as for his safetie it was requisite), when his capacite required to haue bene inducted with the stomake and qualities meete for a King. All this Iehoiada the Priest considered, and withall, the great increase of impietie, which taking deepe roote in the Court, was likely to spread it selfe ouer all the Countrey, if care were not vsed to weede it vp very speedily. Wherefore he associated vnto himselfe some of the Captaines, in whose fidelitie he had best assurance, and hauing taken an oath of them, and shewed them the Kings sonne, he made a Covenent with them, to aduance him to the Kingdome. These drew in others of the principall men, to countenance the action, procuring at the first onely that they should repaire to Jeru- salem, where they were further acquainted with the whole matter. There needed not many perswasions to winne them to the businesse: the promise of the Lord vnto the house of Dauid, was enough to assure them, that the action was both lawfull, and likely to succcede as they desired.

But in compassing their intent some difficulties appeared: For it was not to be hoped, that with open force they should bring their purpose to good issue; neither were the Captaines, and other associates of Iehoiada able by close working, to drawe together so many trustie and seruicable hands as would suffice to manage the businesse. To helpe in this case, the Priest gaue order to such of the Leuites, as had finished their courses in waiting on the Diuine seruice at the Temple, and were now re-lieued by others that succeeded in their turnes, that they should not depart vntill they knew his further pleasure. So by admitting the new commers, and not discharging the old, he had, without any noise, made vp such a number, as would bee able

able to deal with the Queens ordinarie Guard, and that was enough, for if the Ty-rannesse did not preuaile against them at the first brunt, the fauour of the People was like to shew it selfe on their side, who made head against her. These Leuites were placed in the inner Court of the Temple, about the person of the King, who as yet was kept close; the followers of the Captaines, and other adherents, were bestowed in the vtter Courts: As for weapons, the Temple it selfe had store enough; King Dauid had left an Armourie to the place, which was now employed in defence of his issue.

All things being in a readinesse, and the day come, wherein this high designe was to be put in execution; Iehoiada deliuered vnto the Captaines, Armour for them and their adherents; appointed a guard vnto the Kings person; produced him openly, and gaue vnto him the Crowne; vling all ceremonies accustomed in such solemnities, with great applause of the people. Of these doings, the Queene was the last that heard any word; which is not so strange as it may seeme: for insolent natures, by dealing outrageously with such as bring them ill tidings, doe commonly loose the benefit of hearing what is to bee feared, whilst yet it may bee prevented, and haue no information of danger, till their own eyes, amazed with the sudden-nesse, behold it in the shape of ineuitable mischiefe.

All Jerusalem was full of the rumour, and entertayned it with very good liking.
Some carried home the newes, others ranne forth to see, and the common joy was so great, that without apprehension of perill, vnder the windowes of the Court, were the people running and prailing the King. Athalia hearing and beholding the extraordinarie concourse, and noise, of folkes in the streets, making towards the Temple, with much vnusuall passion in their lookes, did presently conceiue, that somewhat worthe of her care was happened; though, what it might bee, shee did not apprehend. Howsoeuer it were, shee meant to vie her owne wisdom in looking into the matter, and ordering all as the occasion might happen to require. It may bee, that shee thought it some especiall solemnitie vsed in the Diuine seruice, which caused this much ado; and hereof the vnaccustomed number of Leuites, and of other deuout men, about the towne, might giue some presumption.

2 Chron. 23. 14.

Many things argue that shee little thought vpon her owne Tragedie; although Iosaphus would make it seeme otherwise. For we finde in the Text, Shee came to the people into the house of the Lord (which was neere to her Palace) and that when shee looked and saw the King stand by his pillar, as the manner was, with the Princes, or great men of the Land by him, and the Trumpeters proclaiming him, shee rent her clothes, and cryed, Treason, Treason. Hereby it appears that shee was quietly going, without any mistrust or feare, to take her place, which when shee found occupied by another, then shee began to afflicte herselfe, as one cast away, and cryed out in vaine vpon the Treason, whereby shee saw that shee must perill. But that shee came with a guard of armed men to the Temple, (as Iosaphus reporteth) and that her companie being beaten back, shee entred alone, and commanded the people to kill the young Tyrant, I finde no where in Scripture, neither doe I hold it credible.
For had shee truly knowne how things went, shee would surely haue gathered her friends about her, and vsed those forces in defence of her Crowne, by which shee gat it, and hitherto had held it. Certainly, if it were granted, that shee, like a new Semiramis, did march in the head of her troupe, yet it had bene meere madnesse in her, to enter the place alone, when her assistants were kept out; but if shee perceiuing that neither her authoritie, nor their owne weapons, could preuaile to let in her guard, would neuertheless take vpon her to command the death of the new King, calling a child of teene yeeres old a Conspirator, and bidding them to kill him, whom shee saw to bee armed in his defence, may wee not thinke that shee was mad in the most extreme degree? Certaine it is that the counsaile of God would haue taken effect, in her destruction, had shee vsed the most likely meanes to disap-point it: yet wee neede not so cut her throate with any morall impossibilities. It is enough to say, that the godly zeale of Iehotada found more easie successe, through her indiscretion, than otherwise could have beene expected; so that at his appointment, shee was without more adoe, carried out of the Temple and slaine, yea so, that no blood, saue her owne, was shed in that quarrell; her small traine, that she brought along with her, not daring to stand in her defence.
Aaa enough

§. VIII.

The death of ATHALIA, with a comparison of her and IZABEL.

Most like it is, that Athalia had many times, with great indignation, bewailed the rashnesse of her Nephew Iehoram the Israelite, who did foolishly cast himselfe into the very throat of danger, gaping vpon him, only through his eager desire of quickly knowing what the matter meant: yet, shee her selfe, by the like bait, was taken in the like trap, and hauing liued such a life as Iezabel had done, was rewarded with a futable death. These two Queenes were in many points much alike, each of them was Daughter, Wife, and Mother to a King; each of them ruled her husband; was an Idolatresse, and a Murtheresse. The only difference appearing in their conditions, is, that Iezabel is more noted as incontinent of body, Athalia as ambitious: So that each of them 20 suruiuing her husband about eight yeeres, did spend the time in satisfying her owne affections; the one ying tyrannie, as the exercise of her haughtie minde; the other painting her face, for the ornament of her vnchaste body. In the manner of their death little difference there was, or in those things which may seeme in this world to pertaine vnto the dead when they are gone. Each of them was taken on the fudaine by Conspirators, and each of them exclaiming vpon the Treason, receiued sentence from the mouth of one that had liued vnder her subiection; in execution whereof, Iezabel was trampled vnder the feet of her enemies horses; Athalia slaine at her owne horse-gate; the death of Athalia hauing (though not much) the more 30 leisure to vex her proud heart; that of Iezabel, the more indignitie, and shame of body. Touching their buriall, Iezabel was deuoured by Dogges, as the Lord had threatned by the Prophet Elias; what became of Athalia wee doe not finde. Like enough it is, that she was buried, as hauing not persecuted and slaine the Lords Prophets, but suffered the Priests to exercise their function; yet of her buriall there is no monument; for shee was a Church-robbet. The seruice of Baal erected by these two Queenes, was destroyed as soone as they were gone, and their Chaplaines, the Priests of that Religion, slaine. Herein also it came to passe, alike, as touching them both when they were dead; the Kings who sue them, were afterwards afflicted, both of them by the same hand of Hazeel the Syrian; in which point Athalia had the greater honour, if the Syrian (who seemes to haue bene her good friend) 40 pretended her reuenge, as any part of his quarrell to Juda. Concerning children, all belonging to Iezabel, perished in few dayes after her: whether Athalia left any behinde her, it is vncertaine; shee had sonnes liuing after shee was Queene, of whom, or of any other, that they were slaine with her, we doe not finde.

This is a matter not vnworthie of consideration, in regard of much that may depend vpon it. For if the children of Athalia had bene in Ierusalem when their Mother fell, their death would surely haue followed hers as neerely, and bene registered, as well as the death of Mattan the Priest of Baal. That Law by which God forbade that the children should die for the fathers, could not haue saued these vngodly Imps, whom the clause following would haue cut off, which commands, that 50 euery man shall die for his owne sinne. Seeing therefore that they had bene professors & aduancers of that vile and Idolatrous worship of Baal, yea had robbed the Temple of the Lord, and enriched the house of Baal with the spoile of it; likely it is, that they should not haue escaped with life, if Iehoiada the Priest could haue gotten ten them into his hands. As there was lawfull cause enough requiring their death, so the securitie of the King and his friends, that is, of all the Land, cruied as much, and that very earnestly. For these had bene esteemed as heires of their mothers Crowne, and being reckoned as her assistants in that particular businesse of robbing the Temple, may be thought to haue carried a great sway in other matters, as Princes and fellowes with their Mother in the Kingdome. Therefore it is euident, that either they were now dead, or (perhaps following Hazeel in his warres against Iebu) absent from Ierusalem; whereby Iehotada might, with the more confidence, aduerture to take Armes against their Mother, that was desolate.

CHAP. XXII.

Of IOAS and AMASIA, with their Contemporaries; where somewhat of the building of Carthage.

§. I.

Of IOAS his doings, whilest IEHOIADA the Priest liued.

By the death of Athalia, the whole Countrie of Inda was filled with great ioy and quietnesse, wherein ioas a childe of seuen yeeres old or there-about, began his raigne, which continued almost fortie yeeres. During his minority, hee liued vnder the protection of that honorable man Iehoiada the Priest, who did as faithfully gouerne the Kingdome, as hee had before carefully preferred the Kings life, and restored him vnto the Throne of his ancestors. When hee came to mans estate, he tooke by appointment of Iehoiada two wiues, and begat Sonnes and Daughters, repairing the family of Dauid, which was almost worne out. The first Act that hee tooke in hand, when he began to rule without a Protector, was the reparation of the Temple. It was a needfull piece of worke, in regard of the decay wherein that holy Place was fallen, through the wickednesse of vngodly Tyrants; and requisite it was that he should vp-hold the Temple, whom the Temple had vp-held. This businesse hee followed with so earnest a zeale, that not only the Leuites were more 40 slack than he, but even Iehotada was faine to be quickned by his admonition. Mooney was gathered for the charges of the worke, partly out of the taxe imposed by Moser, partly out of the liberalltie of the people who gaue so freely, that the Temple, besides all reparations, was enriched with vessels of gold and silver, and with all other Vntiles. The sacrifices likewise were offered, as vnder godly Kings they had bene, and the seruice of God was magnificently celebrated.

2 Chron. 24. 14.

§. II.

The death of Iehoiada, and Apostasie of IOAS.

BVt this endured no longer than the life of Iehoiada the Priest: who having lived an hundred and thirtie yeeres, dyed before his Countrie could haue spared him. He was buried among the Kings of Iuda, as he well deserved, having preferred the race of them, and restored the true Religion, which the late Princes of that house, by attempting to eradicate, failed but a little, of rooting vp themselves, and all their issue. Yet his honorable Funerall seemes to haue bene giuen to him, at the motion of the people; it being said, They buried him in the Citie of DAVID. As for the King himselfe, who did owe to him no lesse than his Crowne and life, he is not likely to haue bene Author of it, seeing that he was as easily comforted after his death, as if hee had thereby bene discharged of some heauie debt.

For after the death of Iehoiada, when the Princes of Iuda beganne to flatter their King, he soone forgate, not only the benefits, received by this worthie man his old Councellour, but also the good precepts which he had received from him, yea and God himselfe, the Author of all goodnesse. These Princes drew him to the worship of Idols, wherewith Iehoram and Athalia had so infected the Countrie, in fifteene or sixteene yeeres; that thirtie yeeres, or there-about, of the raigne of IOAS, wherein the true Religion was exercised, were not able to cleere it from that mischief. The King himselfe, when once hee was entred into these courtes, ranne on head-long, as one that thought it a token of his libertie, to despise the seruice of God; and a manifest prooffe of his being now King indeede, that hee regarded no longer the fowre admonitions of deuout Priests. Hereby it appears, that his former zeale was onely counterfeited, wherein like an actor vpon the stage, he had striven to expresse much more liuely affection, than they could shew, that were indeed religious.

§. III.

The causes and time of the Syrians invading Iuda in the dayes of IOAS.

BVt God, from whom hee was broken loose, gaue him ouer into the hands of men, that would not easily be shaken off. Hazael King of Aram, hauing taken Gath, a Towne of the Philistims, addressed himselfe towards Ierusalem, whither the little distance of way, and great hope of a rich bootie, did incite him. He had an Armie hearted by many victories, to hope for more; and for ground of the warre (if his ambition cared for pretences) it was enough, that the Kings of Iuda had assailed the Israelites, in their enterprises vpon Aram, at Ramoth Gilead. Yet I thinke he did not want some further intigation. For if the Kingdome of Iuda had molested the Aramites, in the time of his predecessour, this was thoroughly recompensed, by forbearing to succour Israel, and leauing the ten Tribes in their extreme miserie, to the furie of Hazael himselfe. Neither is it likely, that Hazael should haue gone about to awake a sleeping Dogge, and stirre vp against himselfe a powerfull enemy, before hee had assured the conquest of Israel, that lay betwene Ierusalem and his owne Kingdome, if some oportunitie had not promised such ealie and good successe, as might rather aduance, than any way disturbe, his future proceedings against the ten Tribes. Wherefore I hold it probable, that the sonnes of Athalia, mentioned before, were with him in this action, promising (as men expelled their Countries vially doe) to draw many partakers of their owne to his side; and not to remaine, as IOAS did, a neutral in the warre betwene him and Israel, but to ioyne all their forces with his, as they had

cause, for the rooting out of Iehu his posteritie, who, like a bloudie Traytor, had vtterly destroyed all the kindred of the Queenes, their mother, euen the whole house of Ahab, to which he was a subiect. If this were so, Hazael had the more apparant reason to invade the Kingdome of Iuda. Howsoever it were, wee finde it plainly, that IOAS was afraid of him, and therefore tooke all the hallowed things, and all the gold that was found in the treasures of the house of the Lord, or in his owne house, with which present hee redeemed his peace: the Syrian (questionlesse) thinking it a better bargaine, to get so much readily paid into his hand for nothing, than to hazard the assurance of this, for the possibilitie of not much more. So Hazael departed with a rich bootie of vnhappie treasure, which, belonging to the liuing God, remained a small while in the possession of this mightie, yet corruptible man, but sent him quickly to the graue. For in the thirtie seuenth of IOAS, which was the fifteenth of Iehoiadas, he made this purchase; but in the same or the very next yeere he died, leauing all that he had vnto his Sonne Benhadad, with whom these treasures prospered none otherwise, than ill-gotten goods are wont.

This enterprise of Hazael is, by some, confounded with that warre of the Aramites vpon Iuda, mentioned in the second Booke of Chronicles. But the reasons alleged by them that hold the contrarie opinion, doe forcibly prooue, that it was not all one warre. For the former was compounded without blood shed or fight; in the later, IOAS tryed the fortune of a battaile, wherein being put to the work, hee lost all his Princes, and hardly escaped with life: In the one, Hazael himselfe was present; in the other, he was not named: but contrariwise, the King of Aram then reigning (who may seeme to haue then bene the Sonne of Hazael) is said to haue bene at Damascus. The first Armie came to conquer, and was so great, that it terrified the King of Iuda; The second was a small compaignie of men, which did animate IOAS (in vaine, for God was against him) to deale with them, as hauing a very great Armie.

Now, concerning the time of this former inualion, I cannot perceiue that God forsooke him, till he had first forsaken God. There are indeede some, very learned, who thinke that this expedition of Hazael was in the time of Iehoiada the Priest, because that storie is ioyned vnto the restauration of the Temple. This had bene probable, if the death of Iehoiada had bene afterwards mentioned in that place of the second Booke of Kings, or if the Apostasie of IOAS or any other matter implying so much, had followed in the relation. For it is not indeede to be doubted, that the Lord of all may dispose of all things, according to his owne will and pleasure, neither was he more vniust in the afflictions of Iob that righteous man, or the death of Iehoiada that godly King, than in the plagues which he laid vpon Pharaoh, or his iudgements vpon the house of Ahab. But it appears plainly, that the rich furniture of the Temple, and the magnificent seruice of God therewithall, which are ioyned together, were vied in the house of the Lord continually, all the dayes of Iehoiada; soone after whose death, if not immediately vpon it, that is (as some very learnedly collect) in the fixe, or thirtie seuenth yeere of this IOAS his raigne, the King falling away from the God of his Father, became a foule Idolater.

And indeede we commonly obserue, that the crosses which it hath pleased God sometimes to lay vpon his seruants, without any cause notorious in the eyes of men, haue alwayes tended vnto the bettering of their good. In which respect, euen the sufferings of the blessed Martyrs (the death of his Saints being precious in the sight of the Lord) are to their great aduantage. But with euil and rebellious men, God keepeth a more euen, and more strict account; permitting vially their faults to get the start of their punishment, and either delaying his vengeance (as with the Amonites) till their wickednesse be full; or not working their amendment by his correction, but suffering them to runne on in their wicked courtes, to their greater miserie. So hath he dealt with many; and so it appears that he dealt with IOAS. For this vnhappie man did not onely continue an obstinate Idolater, but grew so forgetfull of God and all goodnesse, as if he had strouento exceede the wickednesse of all that went before him, and to leaue such a villainous patterne vnto others, as few or none of the most barbarous Tyrants should indure to imitate.

§. IIII.

How ZACHARIA was murdered by IOAS.

SVndry Prophets haue laboured in vaine to reclaim the people from their superstition, Zacharia the sonne of Iehoadas the Priest, was stirred vp at length by the Spirit of God, to admonish them of their wickednesse, and make them vnderstand the punishment due vnto it, whereof they stood in danger. This Zacharia was a man so honourable, and sonne to a man so exceeding beloued in his life time, and reuerenced, that if IOAS had reputed him (as Ahab did Elías) his open enemy, yet ought he in common honestie, to haue cloaked his ill affection, and haue vsed at least some part of the respect that was due to such a person: On the other side, the singular affection which he and his father had borne vnto the King, and the vnrecountable benefits, which they had done vnto him, from his first infancie, were such, as should haue placed Zacharia in the most hearty and assured loue of IOAS, yea though he had bene otherwise a man of very small make, and not verie good condition. The truth is, that the message of a Prophet sent from God, should bee heard with reuerence, how simple soeuer he appears that brings it. But this King IOAS, hauing already scorned the admonitions and protestations of such Prophets as first were sent, did now deale with Zacharia, like as the wicked husbandman in that parable of our Saviour, dealt with the heire of the Vineyard; who said, This is the heire, come let vs kill him, that the inheritance may be ours. By killing Zacharia he thought to become an absolute Commander, supposing belike that hee was no free Prince, as long as any one durst tell him the plaine truth, how great soeuer that mans deserving were, that did so, yea though Gods commandement required it. So they conspired against this holy Prophet, and stoned him to death at the Kings appointment; but whether by any forme of open Law, as was practised vpon Achaz, or whether surprising him by any close treacherie, I doe neither reade nor can conjecture. The dignity of his person, considered together with their treacherous conspiracie, makes it probable, that they durst not call him into publike iudgement, though the manner of his death, being such as was commonly, by order of Law, inflicted vpon malefactors, may argue the contrarie. Most likely it is, that the Kings commandement, by which he suffered, tooke place in stead of Law: which exercise of meere power (as hath bene already noted) was nothing strange among the Kings of Iuda.

§. V.

How IOAS was shamefully beaten by the Aramites, and of his death.

THis odious murder, committed by an vnthankfull snake vpon the man in whose boosome he had bene fostered, as of it selfe alone it sufficed, to make the wretched Tyrant hateful to men of his owne time, and his memorie detested in all ages; so had it the well-descried curse of the blessed Martyr, to accompanie it vnto the throne of God, and to call for vengeance from thence, which fell downe swiftly, and heavily vpon the head of that vngenerall monster. It was the last yeere of his reigne; the end of his time comming then vpon him, when he thought himselfe beginning to lue how he liued without controulement. When that yeere was expired, the Aramites came into the Countrey, rather as may seeme to get pillage, than to performe any great action; action; for they came with a small companie of men: but God had intended to doe more by them, than they themselves did hope for.

That IOAS naturally was a coward, his bloudie malice against his best friend, is, in my iudgement proofe sufficient: though otherwise his base composition with Hazael, when hee might haue leauied (as his sonne after him did mulster) three hundred thousand chosen men for the warre, doth well enough shew his temper. Yet now he would needs bee valiant and make his people know, how stout of disposition their King was, when he might haue his owne will. But his timorous heart was not well cloaked. Forto encounter with a few bands of rousers, hee tooke a verie great Armie, so that wife-men might well perceiue, that he knew what he did, making shew as if he would fight for his Countrey, and expose his person to danger of warre, when as indeed all was meere ostentation, and no perill to be feared; he going forth so strongly appointed, against so weake enemies. Thus might wisemen thinke, and laugh at him in secret; considering what adoe he made about that, which in all apparent reason was (as they say) a thing of nothing. But God, before whom the wisdom of this world is foolishnesse, did laugh not onely at this vaine-glorious King, but at them that thought their King secure, by reason of the multitude that he drew along with him.

When the Aramites and King IOAS met, whether it were by some folly of the leaders, or by some amazement happening among the Souldiers, or by whatsoever meanes it pleased God to worke, so it was, that that great Armie of Iuda recedde, a notable over-throw, and all the Princes were destroyed: the Princes of Iuda, at whose perswasion the King had become a Rebelle to the King of Kings. As for IOAS himselfe (as Abulensis and others expound the storie) hee was forely beaten and hurt by them, being (as they thinke) taken and shamefully tormented, to bring out of him an excessive ranfome.

And surely, all circumstances doe greatly strengthen this conjecture. For the text (in the old translation) saith, they exercised vpon IOAS ignominious iudgements; and that departing from him, they dismissed him in great languor. All which argues, that they had him in their hands, and handled him ill-fauouredly. Now at that time IOAS the son of Iehoadas reigned ouer Israel, and Benhadad the son of Hazael ouer the Syrians in Damascus; the one a valiant vnder-taking Prince, raised vp by God to restore the State of his miserable Countrey; the other inferior euery way to his father, of whose purchases he lost a great part, for want of skill to keepe it. The difference in condition found betwene these two Princes, promising no other euent than such as after followed, might haue giuen to the King of Iuda good cause to bee bold, and plucke vp his spirits, which Hazael had beaten downe, if God had not bene against him. But his fearefull heart being likely to quake vpon any apprehension of danger, was able to put the Syrian King in hope, that by terrifying him with some shew of warre at his doores, it were ealie to make him craue any tolerable conditions of peace. The vnexpected good successe hereof, already related, and the (perhaps as unexpected) ill successe, which the Aramites found in their following warres against the King of Israel, sheweth plainly the weaknesse of all earthly might, resisting the power of the Almighty. For by his ordinance, both the Kingdome of Iuda, after more than fortie yeeres time of gathering strength, was vnable to driue out a small companie of enemies; and the Kingdome of Israel, hauing so bene trodden downe by Hazael, that onely fiftie Horse-men, ten Chariots, and ten thousand Foot-men were left, prevailed against his Sonne, and recovered all from the victorious Aramites. But examples hereof are euery-where found, and therefore I will not insist vpon this; though indeed we should not, if we be Gods children, thinke it more tedious to heare long and frequent reports of our heavenly Fathers honour, than of the noble acts performed by our fore-father vpon earth.

When the Aramites had what they listed, and saw that they were not able, being ing so few, to take any possession of the Countrey, they departed out of Inda laden with spoile, which they sent to Damascus, themselves belike falling vpon the ten Tribes, where it is to be thought that they sped not halfe so well. The King of Inda being in ill case, was killed on his bed when he came home, by the sonnes of an Ammonitessie, and of a Moabitessie, whom some (because onely their Mothers names being strangers, are expressed) thinke to haue bene bond-men. Whether it were contempt of his fortune, or feare, lest (as Tyrants vse) hee should reuenge his disaster vpon them, imputing it to their fault, or whatsoever else it were that animated them to murder their King; the Scripture tells vs plainly, that, for the blood of the children of Iehoiada, this befell him. And the same time when hee had bene vied as the pretence of their conspiracie, in excuse of the fact when it was done. For Amaziah, the sonne and successor of Iosias, durst not punish them, till his Kingdome was established: but contrariwise, his bodie was judged vnworthie of buriall in the Sepulchres of the Kings: whereby it appears, that the death of Zecharia caused the treason, wrought against the King, to find more approbation, than was requisite, among the people, though afterwards it was recompensed by his Sonne, vpon the Traytors, with well-deferred death.

§. VI.

Of the Princes living in the time of Iosias: Of the time when Carthage was built; and of Dido.

I Here liued with Iosias, Alexander and Diognetus in Athens: Eudemus and Aristomedes in Corinth: about which time Agrippa Sylulius, and after him Sylulius Aluatus, were Kings of the Albani in Italie. Ocrasætes, commonly called Anacynadaraxes, the thirtieth King succeeding vnto Ophratanes, began his raigne ouer the Assyrians, about the eighteenth yeere of Iosias, which lasted fortie two yeeres. In the sixteenth of Iosias, Cephrenes, the fourth from Sesac, succeeded vnto Cheops in the Kingdome of Egypt, and held it fiftie yeeres.

In this time of Iosias, was likewise the raigne of Pigmalion in Tyre, and the foundation of Carthage by Dido, the building of which Citie is, by diuers Authors, placed in diuers ages, some reporting it to be seuentie yeeres yonger than Rome, others about foure hundred yeeres elder, few or none of them giuing any reason of their assertions, but leauing vs vncertaine whom to follow: Iosephus, who had read the Annals of Tyre, counting one hundred fortie and three yeeres and eight moneths from the building of Salomons Temple, in the twelfth yeere of Hiram King of Tyre, to the founding of Carthage by Dido, in the seuenth of Pigmalion. The particulars of this account (which is not rare in Iosephus) are very perplexed, and serue not verie well to make cleere the totall summe. But whether it were so that Iosephus did omit, or else that he did mis-write, some number of the yeeres, which hee reckoned in Fractions, as they were diuided among the Kings of Tyre, from Hiram to Pigmalion; we may well enough beleue, that the Tyrian writers, out of whose Bookes he giues vs the whole summe, had good meanes to know the truth; and could rightly reckon the difference of time, betwene two workes no longer following one the other, than the memorie of three or foure generations might easily reach. This hundred fortie and foure yeeres current, after the building of Salomons Temple, being the eleuenth yeere of Iosias, was a hundred fortie and three yeeres before the birth of Rome: and after the destruction of Troy, two hundred eighty and nine: a time so long after the death of Aeneas, that wee might truly conclude all to bee fabulous which Virgil hath written of Dido, as Aulus noteth, who doth honor her Statua with this Epigramme.

Aulus Ep. 117.

ILLA ego sum Dido vultu quam conspicis hostes, astimulata modis pulchra, virgineis.
Talis eram, sed non MARO quam multis finxit erat mens, Vitæ necesse fuit lata cupidinebus (Namq; nec AENEAS vidit me Troius unquam Nec Libyam aduenit, clasibus Iliacis.
Sed furias fugiens, atq; arma prociacis IARBAE, Servauit, fateor, morte pudicitiam;
Pectore transfixo, caecos quod pertulit enses)
Non furor, aut laeso crudus amore dolor.
Sic cecidisse iunat: vixi sine vulnere fama,
Vita virum, positum manibus oppeti.
Inuida cur in me stimulasti Musa MARONEM, Fingeret ut nostra dampna pudicitiae?
Vos magis historici lectores credite de me
Quam qui furta Deum concubitusq; canunt.
Falsidici vates: temerant qui carmine verarum,
Humansq; deos assimulant vitij.

Which in effect is this,

I Am that Dido which thou here dost see,
 Cunningly framed in beauteous Imagie.
 Like this I was, but had not such a foule,
 As MARO fained, incestuous and foule.
AENEAS neuer with his Troian hoast
 Beheld my face, or landed on this coast.
 But flying proud IARBAE villanie,
 Not mou'd by furious loue or iealousie;
 I did with weapon chaft, to fauour my fame,
 Make way for death vntimely, ere it came.
 This was my end; but first I built a Towne, Reueng'd my husbands death, liu'd with renowne.
 Why did'st thou stirre vp VIRGIL, enuious Muse, Falsely my name and honour to abuse?
 Readers, beleue Historians; not those Which to the world looves thefts and vice expose.
 Poets are liars, and for verses sake
 Will make the gods of humane crimes partake.

From the time of Dido vnto the first Punick warre, that Carthage grew and flourished in wealth and conquests, we find in many histories: but in particular we find little of the Carthaginian affaires before that warre, excepting thole few things that are recorded of their attempts vpon the Isle of Sicily. Wee will therefore deferre the relation of matters concerning that mightie Citie, vntill such time as they shall encounter with the State of Rome, by which it was finally destroyed; and prosecuted in the meane while the Historie that is now in hand.

§. VII.

The beginning of AMAZIA his reigne. Of IOAS King of Israel, and ELISHA the Prophet.

AMAZIAS, the sonne of Iosb, being twentie five yeeres old when his father dyed, tooke possession of the Kingdome of Juda, wherein he laboured to demean himselfe, as his new beginning might be least offensive. The Law of Moses he protested to observe; which howsoever it had bene secretly despised since the time of Iehoram, by many great persons of the Land, yet had it by prouision of good Princes, yea and of bad ones (in their best times) imitating the good, but especially by the care of holy Priests, taken such deepe roote in the peoples hearts, that no King might hope to be very plausible, who did not conform himselfe vnto it. And at that present time, the laughter, which the Aramites had made of all the Princes, who had with-drawne the late King from the seruice of God, being seconded by the death of the King himselfe, even whilest that execrable murder, committed by the King vpon Zecharias, was yet fresh in memorie, did serue as a notable example of Gods iustice against Idolaters, both to animate the better sort of the people in holding the Religion of their fathers, and to discourage Amazias from following the way, which led to such an euill end. He therefore, hauing learned of his father the arte of dissimulation, did not only forbear to punish the Traytors that had slaine King Ioas, but gaue way to the time, and suffered the dead bodie to be interred, as that of Iehoram formerly had bene, in the Citie of Dauid, yet not among the Sepulchres of the Kings of Juda. Neuertheless, after this, when (belike) the noise of the people hauing wearied it selfe into silence, it was found that the Conspirators (howsoever their deede done, was applauded as the handie-woke of God) had neither any mightie partakers in their fact, nor strong maintainers of their persons, but rested secure, as hauing done well, seeing it was not ill taken; the King, who perceived his gouernement well established, called them into question, at such a time, as the heate of mens affections, being well allayed, it was easie to distinguish betweene their treasons and Gods judgement, which, by their treasons, had taken plausible effect. So they were put to death without any tumult, and their children (as the Law did require) were suffered to liue; which could not but giue contentment to the people, seeing that their King did the office of a iust Prince, rather than of a reuenging sonne. This being done, and his owne life the better secured, by such exemplarie iustice, against the like attempts, Amazias carried himselfe outwardly as a Prince well affected to Religion, and so continued in rest, about twelue or thirteene yeeres.

As Amazias gathered strength in Juda by the commoditie of a long peace, so Ioas the Israelite grew as fast in power, by following the warre hotly against the Aramites. He was a valiant and fortunate Prince, yet an Idolater, as his Predecessors had bene, worshipping the Calues of Ieroboam. For this sinne had God so plagued the house of Iehu, that the ten Tribes wanted little of being vtterly consumed, by Hazael and Benhadad, in the time of Iehu and his sonne Iehoshaphat. But as Gods benefites to Iehu, sufficed not to with-draw him from this politike Idolatrie; so were the miseries, rewarding that impietie, vnable to reclaime Iehoshaphat from the same impious course: yet the mercy of God beholding the trouble of Israel, condescended vnto the prayers of this vngodly Prince, euen then when hee and his miserable subjects, were obstinate in following their owne abominable wayes. Therefore in temporall matters, the ten Tribes recovered space, but the fauour of God, which had bene infinitely more worth, I doe not find, nor beleuee, that they fought; that they had it not, I finde in the words of the Prophet, saying plainly to AMAZIAS, The Lord is not with Israel, neither with all the house of Ephraim.

Whe-

Whether it were so, that the great Prophet Elisha, who liued in those times, did fore-tell the prosperitie of the Israelites vnder the Raigne of Ioas; or whether Iehoshaphat, wearied and broken with long aduersitie, thought it the wisest way, to discharge himselfe in part of the heauie cares attending those vnhappy Syrian warres, by laying the burthen vpon his hopefull sonne; we finde that in the thirtie-seuenth yeere of IOAS, King of Juda, IOAS the sonne of IEHOHAZ began to raigne ouer Israel in Samarina, which was in the fiftieth of his fathers raigne, and some two or three yeeres before his death.

It appeares that this yong Prince, euen from the beginning of his Rule, did so well husband that poore stocke which hee receiued from his Father, often Chariots, fiftie Horse-men, and ten thousand Foot, that he might seemelike to proue a thriuer. Among other circumstances, the wordes which he spake to Elisha the Prophet, argue no lesse. For IOAS visiting the Prophet, who lay sicke, spake vnto him thus; O my father, my father, the Chariot of Israel, and the horse-men of the same: by which manner of speech hee did acknowledge, that the prayers of this holy man had stood his Kingdome in more stead, than all the Horses and Chariots could doe.

This Prophet who succeeded vnto Elias, about the first yeere of Ioram the sonne of Ahab King of Israel, dyed (as some haue probably collected) about the third or fourth yeere of this Ioas, the Nephew of Iehu. To shew how the Spirit of Elias was doubled, or did rest vpon him; it exceedeth my facultie. This is recorded of him, that hee did not only raise a dead child vnto life, as Elias had done, but when hee himselfe was dead, it pleased God that his dead bones should restore life vnto a carcase, which touched them in the graue. In fine, hee bestowed, as a legacie, three victories vpon King Ioas, who thereby did set Israel in a faire way of recovering all that the Aramites had vlsurped, and weakening the Kings of Damascus in such sort, that they were neuer after terrible to Samarina.

§. VIII.

Of AMAZIA his warre against EDOM; His Apostasie; and ouerthrow by IOAS.

THE happie successe which Ioas had found in his warre against the Aramites, was such as might kinde in Amazias a desire of vndertaking some expedition, wherein himselfe might purchase the like honour. His kingdome could furnish three hundred thousand seruiceable men for the wars; and his treasures were sufficient for the payment of these, and the hire of many more. Cause of warre hee had very iust against the Edomites, who hauing rebelled in the time of his grand-father Iehoram, had about fiftie yeeres bene vnreclaymed, partly by meanes of the troubles happening in Juda, partly through the sloth and timorousnesse of his father Ioas. Yet, forasmuch as the men of Juda had in many yeeres bene without all exercise of warre (excepting that vnhappy fight wherein they were beaten by a few bands of the Aramites) he held it a point of wisdom to increase his forces, with Souldiers waged out of Israel, whence hee hired for an hundred talents of silver, an hundred thousand valiant men, as the Scripture telleth vs, though Iosaphat diminish the number, saying that they were but twentie thousand.

This great Armie, which with so much cost Amazias had hired out of Israel, he was faine to dismisse, before hee had employed it, being threatned by a Prophet with ill successe, if hee strengthened himselfe with the helpe of those men, whom God (though in mercy hee gaue them victorie against the cruell Aramites) did not loue, because they were Idolaters. The Israelites therefore departed in great anger, taking in ill part this dismissal, as an high disgrace; which to reuenge, they fell vpon

a peece of Iuda in their returne, and shewed their malice in the slaughter of three thousand men; and some spoile, which they carryed away. But Amazia with his owne forces, knowing that God would be affilant to their journey, entered courageously into the Edomites Countre; ouer whom obtaining victorie, hee slew ten thousand, and tooke other ten thousand prisoners, all which hee threw from an high rocke; holding them, it seemes, rather as Traytors, than as iust enemies. This victorie did not seeme to reduce Edom vnder the subiection of the crowne of Iuda, which might be the cause of that seueritie, which was vsed to the prisoners; the Edomites that had escaped, refusing to buy the liues of their friends and kinsmen at so deare a rate, as the losse of their owne libertie. Some townes in mount Seir, Amazia 10 tooke, as appears by his carrying away the Idols thence; but it is like they were the places most indefensible, in that he left no garrisons there, whereby he might another yeere the better haue pursued the conquest of the whole Countre. Howsoever it were, he got both honor by the journey, & gaine enough, had he not lost himselfe.

Among other spoiles of the Edomites, were carried away their gods, which being vanquished and taken prisoners, did deserve well to be led in triumph. But they contrariwise, I know not by what strange witchcraft, so belorded this vnworthie King Amazia, that hee let them up to bee his gods, and worshipped them, and burred in- 15 cense vnto them.

For this when he was rebuked by a Prophet sent from God, hee gaue a churlish 20 and threatening answer; asking the Prophet, who made him a Counsellor, and bidding him hold his peace for feare of the worlth. If either the costly stiffe, whereof these Idols were made, or the curious workmanship and beautie, with which they were adorned by Artificers, had rauished the Kings fancy; me thinks, he should haue rather turned them to matter of profit, or kept them as house-hold ornaments and things of pleasure, than thereby haue suffered himselfe to be blinded, with such vnreasonable deuotion towards them. If the superstitious account wherein the Edomites had held them, were able to worke much vpon his imagination; much more should the bad seruice which they had done to their old Clients, haue moued him thereupon to laugh, both at the Edomites, and them. Wherefore it seemes to me, 30 that the same affections caried him from God, vnto the seruice of Idols, which afterwards moued him to talke so roughly to the Prophet reprehending him. He had alreadie obeyed the warning of God by a Prophet, and sent away such auxiliarie forces as he had gathered out of Israel; which done, it is said, that he was encouraged, 40 and led forth his people, thinking belike, that God would now rather assist him by miracle, than let him faile of obtaining all his hearts desire. But with better reason he should haue limited his desires by the will of God, whose pleasure it was, that Esau, hauing broken the yoke of Isaac from his necke, accordingly as Isaac had foretold, should no more become his seruant. If therefore Amazia did hope to reconquer all the Countre of Edom, he failed of this expectation; yet so, that he brought home 45 both profit and honor, which might haue well contented him.

But there is a foolish and a wretched pride, wherewith men being transported, can ill endure to ascribe vnto God the honour of those actions in which it hath pleased him to vfe their owne industrie, courage, or force-sight. Therefore it is commonly scene, that they, who entring into battaile, are carefull to pray for aide from heaven, with due acknowledgement of his power, who is the giner of victorie; when the field is won, doe vaunt of their owne exploits: one telling how he got such a ground of advantage; another, how he gaue checke to such a battallion; a third, how hee seized on the enemies Canon; eury one struing to magnifie himselfe, whilest all forget God, as one that had not bene present in the action. To ascribe to fortune 50 the effects of another mans vertue, is, I confesse, an argument of malice. Yet this is true, that as he which findeth better successe, than he did, or in reason might expect, is deeply bound to acknowledge God the Authour of his happinesse; so hee whose meere wisdom and labour hath brought things to a prosperous issue, is doubly doubly bound to shew himselfe thankfull, both for the victorie, and for those vertues by which the victorie was gotten. And indeed so farre from weakenesse is the nature of such thanksgiving, that it may wel be called the height of magnanimity; no vertue being so truly heroicall, as that by which the spirit of a man aduanceth it selfe with confidence of acceptation, vnto the loue of God. In which sense it is a braue speech that Euander in Virgil, vseth to Aeneas, none but a Christian being capable of the admonition,

Finge Deo.*

10 With this Philosophie Amazia (as appears by his carriage) troubled not his head: he had shewed himselfe a better man of warre than any King of Iuda, since the time of Iehosaphat, and could be well contented, that his people should thinke him little inferior to David: of which honour hee law no reason why the Prophets should rob him, who had made him loose a hundred talents, and done him no pleasure, he hauing preuailed by plaine force and good conduct, without any miracle at all. That he was distempered with such vaine thoughts as these (besides the wickedness of his impietie following) Iehosaphat doth testifie; saying, That hee despised 15 God, and that being putt vp with his good successe, of which neuerthelesse hee would not acknowledge God to bee the Authour, hee commanded Joas King of Israel to become his subject, and to let the tenne Tribes acknowledge him their Soueraigne, as they had done his Ancestors King David and King Salomon. Some thinke that his quarrell to Joas was rather grounded vpon the iniurie done to him by the Israelites, whom he dismissed in the journey against Mount Seir. And likely it is, that the sense of a late wrong had more power to stirre him vp, than the remembrance of an olde title, forgotten long since, and by himselfe neglected thirtene or fourteene yeeres. Neuerthelesse it might so be, that when he was thus prouoked, he thought it not enough to requite new wrongs, but would also call olde matters into 30 question; that so the Kings of Israel might, at the least, learne to keepe their subjects from offending Iuda, for feare of endangering their owne Crownes. Had Amazia desired onely recompence for the iniurie done to him, it is not improbable that he should haue had some reasonable answer from Joas, who was not desirous to fight with him. But the answer which Joas returned, likening himselfe to a Cedar, and Amazia in respect of him to no better than a thistle, shewes that the challenge was made in insolent termes, stust perhaps with such proud comparison of nobilitie, as might be made (according to that which Iehosaphat hath written) betweene a King of ancient race, and one of lesse nobilitie than vertue.

It is by Sophocles reported of Aias, that when, going to the warre of Troy, his father did bid him to be valiant, and get victorie by Gods assistance, he made answer, 40 that by Gods assistance, a coward could get victorie, but he would get it alone without such helpe: after which proud speech, though hee did many valiant acts, hee had small thanks, and finally killing himselfe in a madnesse, whereinto he fell vpon disgrace receiued, was hardly allowed the honour of buriall. That Amazia did vter such words, I doe not find: but hauing once entertained the thoughts, which are parents of such words, hee was rewarded with successe according. The verie first counsaile wherein this Warre was concluded, serues to proue that hee was a wife Prince indeed at Ierusalem, among his Paraites; but a foole when hee had to 50 deale with his equals abroad. For it was not all one, to fight with the Edomites, a weakie people, trusting more in the site of their Countrey than the valour of their Souldiers; and to encounter with Joas, who from his poore beginnings had rayled himselfe to such strength, that hee was able to lend his friend a hundred thousand men, and had all his Nation exercised, and trained vp, in a long victorious warre. But as Amazia discouered much want of judgement, in vndertaking such a match; 60

so in prosecuting the businesse, when it was set on foot, hee behaued himselfe as a man of little experience, who hauing once onely tried his fortune, and found it to be good, thought that in warre there was nothing else to doe, than send a defiance, fight, and winne. Ios on the contrarie side, hauing bene accustomed to deale with a stronger enemy than the King of Iuda, vsed that celeritie, which peradventure had often stood him in good stead against the Aramite. Hee did not sit waiting till the enemies brake in and waited his Countrey, but presented himselfe with an Army in Iuda, ready to bid battaile to Amazias, and saue him the labour of a long iourne. This could not but greatly discourage those of Iuda; who (besides the impression of feare which an inuasion beates into people, not inured to the like) hauing deuoured, in their greedie hopes, the spoyle of Israel, fully perswading themselves to get as much, and at as easie rate as in the iourne of Edom; were so farre disappointed of their expectation, that well they might suspect all new assurance of good lucke, when the olde had thus beguiled them. All this notwithstanding, their King that had stomacke enough to challenge the patrimonie of Salem, thought like another Dauid, to winne it by the sword. The issue of which foolehardinesse might easily be foreseene in humane reason; comparing together, either the two Kings, or the qualitie of their Armies, or the first and ominous beginning of the Warre. But mere humane wisdom, howsoever it might foresee much, could not haue prognosticated all the mischiefe that fell vpon Amazias. For as soone as the two Armies came in sight, God, whose helpe this wretched man had so despoiled, did (as Iosephus reports it) strike such terror and amazement into the men of Iuda, that without one blow giuen, they fled all away, leaving their King to shift for himselfe, which hee did so ill, that his enemy had soone caught him, and made him change his glorious humour into most abiect basenesse. That the Armie which fled, sustained any other losse than of honour, I neither find in the Scriptures nor in Iosephus; it being likely that the soone beginning of their flight, which made it the more shamefull, made it also the more safe. But of the mischiefe that followed this ouerthrow, it was Gods will that Amazias himselfe should sustaine the whole disgrace. For Ios carried him directly to Ierusalem, where he had him procure that the gates might be opened, to let him in and his Armie; threatening him otherwise with present death. So much amazed was the miserable caytiue, with these dreadfull wordes, that he durst doe none other, than perswade the Citizens, to yeeld themselves to the mercie of the Conqueror. The Towne, which afterwarde being in weaker state, held out two yeeres, against Nebuchadnezzar, was vtterly dismayed, when the King, that should haue giuen his life to saue it, vsed all his force of command and intreatie to betray it. So the gates of Ierusalem were opened to Ios, with which honour (greater than any King of Israel had euer obtained) hee could not rest contented, but, the more to despight Amazias and his people, he caused foure hundred cubits of the wall to be throwne downe, and entred the Citie in his Chariot through that breach, carrying the King before him, as in triumph. This done, he sackt the Temple, and the Kings Palace, and so, taking hostages of Amazias, hee dismissed the poore creature that was glad of his life, and returned to Samaria.

p. IX.

A discourse of the reasons hindering Ios from vniuing Iuda to the Crowne of Israel, when he had wonne Ierusalem, and held Amazias prisoner. The end of Ios his Reigne.

EE may justly maruaile how it came to passe, that Ios, being thus in possession of Ierusalem, hauing the King in his hands, his enemies forces broken, and his owne entrie, could bee so contented to depart quietly, with a little spoyle, when hee might haue seized vpon the whole Kingdome. The reigne of Athalia had giuen him cause to hope, that the issue of Dauid might be dispossessed of that crowne; his owne Nobilitie, being the sonne and grand childe of Kings, together with the famous acts that hee had done, were enough to make the people of Iuda thinke highly of him; who might also haue preferred his forme of gouernment, before that of their owne Kings, especially at such a time, when a long succession of wicked Princes had smothered the thanks, which were due to the memorie of a few good ones. The commoditie that would haue ensued, vpon the vnion of all the twelue Tribes, vnder one Prince, is so apparant, that I need not to insist on it. That any message from God forbade the Israelites (as afterwards in the victorie which Peka the sonne of Romelia got vpon Ahaz) to turne his present aduantage, to the best vse, wee doe not reade. All this makes it the more difficult to resolue the question, why a Prince so well exercised, as Ios had bin, in recouering his owne, and winning from his enemy, should forsake the possession of Ierusalem, and willtully neglect the possibilities, or rather cast away the full assurance of so faire a conquest, as the Kingdome of Iuda.

But concerning that point, which, of all others, had bene most materiall, I mean the desire of the vanquished people to accept the Israelite for their King, it is plainly seene, that entring Ierusalem in triumphant manner, Ios was vnable to concoct his owne prosperitie. For the opening of the gates had bene enough to haue let him not only into the Citie, but into the Royall Throne, and the peoples hearts, whom by faire intreatie (especially hauing sure means of compulsion) hee might haue made his owne, when they saw themselves betrayed, and basely giuen away by him whose they had bene before. The faire mark which this opportunity presented, hee did not ayme at, because his ambition was otherwise and more meanelly busied, in leuelling at the glorie of a triumphant entrie through a breach. Yet this error might afterwards haue bene corrected well enough, if entring as an enemy, and shewing what he could doe, by spending his anger vpon the wall, he had within the Citie done offices of a friend, and laboured to shew good will to the inhabitants. But when his pride had done, his courtesinesse beganne, and sought to please it selfe, with that which is commonly most readie to the spoyler, yet should be most forborne. The treasure wherewith Sesac, Hazael, and the Philistines, men ignorant of the true God & his Religion, had quenched their greedy thirst, ought not to haue tempted the appetite of Ios, who though an Idolatour, yet acknowledged also and worshipped the eternall God, whose Temple was at Ierusalem. Therefore when the people saw him take his way directly to that holy place, and lay his rauenous hands vpon the consecrated vessels, calling the family of Obed Edom (whose children had hereditarie charge of the treasure) to a strict account, as if they had bene Officers of his owne Exchequer, they considered him rather as an execrable Church-robber, than as a Noble Prince, an Israelite and their brother, though of another Tribe. Thus following that course, which the most vertuous King of our age (taxing it with the same phrase) hath wisely auoyded by stealing a few Apples, hee lost the inheritance of the whole Orchard. The people detested him, and after the respite of a few dayes, might by comparing themselves one to one, perceiue his Souldiers to be no better than men of their owne mould, and inferiour in number to the inhabitants of so great a Citie. It is not so easie to hold by force a mightie towne entered by capitulation, as to enter the gates opened by vnadvised feare. For when the Citizens, not being disarmed, recover their spirits, and begin to vnderstand their first error; they will thinke vpon every aduantage, of place, of prouisions, of multitude, yea of women armed with tile-stones, and rather chooseth by desperate resolution, to correct the euills growne out of their former cowardice, than suffer those mischiefs to poyson the body, which in such halfe-conquests, are easily tasted in the mouth. A more liuely example hereof cannot be desired, than the Citie of Florence, which through the weakenesse of Peter de Medicis, governing therein as a Prince, was reduced into such hard termes, that it opened the gates vnto the French King Charles the Eighth, who not plainly professing himselfe either friend or foe to the Estate, entred the Towne, with his Armie, in triumphant manner, himselfe and his horse armed, with his lance vpon his thigh. Many insolencies were therein committed by the French, and much argument of quarrell minitred, betweene them and the Townes-men: so farre forth that the Florentines, to preferue their libertie, were driuen to prepare for fight. To conclude the matter, Charles propounds intolerable conditions, demanding huge summes of readie money, and the absolute Signorie of the State, as conquered by him, who entred the Citie in Armes. But Peter Caponi, a principall Citizen, catching these Articles from the Kings Secretarie, and tearing them before his face, bade him sound his trumpets, and they would ring their bells: which peremptorie wordes made the French bethinke themselves, and come readily to this agreement, that for fortie thousand pounds, and not halfe of that money to be paid in hand, Charles should not onely depart in peace, but restore whatsoeuer he had of their Dominion, and continue their assured friend. So dangerous a matter did it seeme for that braue Armie, which in few moneths after wanne the Kingdome of Naples, to fight in the streets, against the armed multitude of that populous Citie. It is true, that Charles had other businesse (and so perhaps had Ioas, as shall anon be shewed) that called him away: but it was the apprehension of imminent danger that made him come to reason. In such cases the firing of houses, vually drawes every Citizen to saue his owne, leauing victorie to the Souldier: yet where the people are prepared and resolute, women can quench, as fast as the enemy, hauing other things to looke vnto, can set on fire. And indeed that Commander: is more giuen to anger than regardfull of profit, who vpon the vncertaine hope of destroying a Towne, forsakes the assurance of a good composition. Diuersitie of circumstance may alter the case: it is enough to say, that it might be in Ierusalem, as we know it was in Florence.

How strongly soeuer Ioas might hold himselfe within Ierusalem, he could not easily depart from thence, with his bootie safe, if the Armie of Iuda, which had bene more terrified than weakened in the late encounter, should re-enforce it selfe, and giue him a checke vpon the way. Wherefore it was wisely done of him, to take hostages for his better securitie, his Armie being vpon returne, and better loden than when it came forth; for which causes it was the more vnapt to fight.

Besides these impediments, within the Citie and without, seruing to coole the ambition of Ioas, and keepe it downe from aspiring to the Crowne of Iuda; it appears that somewhat was newly fallen out, which had reference to the anger of Elisha the Prophet; who when this Ioas had smitten the ground with his arrowes thrice, told him that he should no oftner smite the Aramites. The three victories which Israel had against Aram, are by some, and with great probability, referred vnto the fifth, sixth and seventh yeeres of Ioas: after which time, if any losses ensuing had blemished the former good successe, it might the King of Israel haue likened himselfe to a stately Cedar, and worke could hee haue either lent the Indaan one hundred thousand men, or meet him in battaille, who was able to bring into the field three hundred thousand of his owne. Seeing therefore it is made plaine by the

the words of Elisha, that after three victories, Ioas should find some change of fortune, and suffer losse; we must needs conclude, That the Aramite prevailed vpon him this yeere, it being the last of his Raigne. That this was so, and that the Syrians, taking aduantage of Ioas his absence, gaue such a blow to Israel, as the King at his returne was not able to remedie, but rather fell himselfe into new misfortunes, which increased the calamitie, wee may euidently perceiue in that which is spoken of Ieroboaam his sonne. For it is said, That the Lord saw the exceeding bitter afflictions of Israel, and that hauing not decreed to put out the name of Israel from vnder the heauen, he preferred them by the hand of Ieroboaam, the sonne of Ioas. This is enough to proue, that the victorious Raigne of Ioas was concluded with a sad catastrophe; the riches of the Temple halting his miserie and death, as they had done with Sefer, Athalia, and Hazael, and as afterwards they wrought with Antiochus, Craesus, and other sacrilegious Potentates.

Thus eyther through indignation conceived against him, by the people of Ierusalem, and courage which they tooke to set vpon him within the Walls: or through preparation of the Armie that lay abroad in the Countrey, to bid him battaile in open field, and recover by a new charge the honour which was lost at the former encounter; or through the miseries daily brought vpon his owne Countrey, by the Syrian in his absence, if not by all of theses Ioas was driuen to lay aside all thought of winning the Kingdome of Iuda; and taking hostages for his quiet passage, made all haste homewards, where hee found a sad welcome, and being viterly forsaken of his wonted prosperitie, forsooke also his life in few moneths after, leauing his Kingdome to Ieroboaam the second, his fortunate and valiant sonne.

The end of AMAZIA his Raigne and Life.

30  Ny man is able to ghesse how Amazias looked, when the enemy had left him. He that had vaunted so much of his owne great prowesse and skil in armes, threatening to worke wonders, and set vp anew the glorious Empire of Dauid, was now vncafed of his Lyons hide, and appeared nothing so terrible a beast as he had bene painted. Much argument of scoffing at him he had minitred vnto such, as held him in dislike; which at this time, doubtlesse, were very many: for the shame that fals vpon an insolent man, seldome failes of meeting with abundance of reproch. As for Amazias (besides that the multitude are alwayes prone to lay the blame vpon their Governours, euen of those calamities which happened by their owne default) there was no child in all Ierusalem, but knew him to be the root of all this mischiefe. He had not onely challenged a good man of Warre, being himselfe a Daltard; but when he was beaten and taken by him, had basely pleaded for the common enemy, to haue him let into the Citie, that with his owne eyes hee might see what spoyle there was, and not make a bad bargain by heare-say. The father of this Amazias, was a beastly man; yet when the Aramites tooke him and tormented him, hee did not offer to buy his owne life at so deare a rate, as the Citie and Temple of Ierusalem. Had he offered, should they haue made his promise good? Surely the baile which they had made in condescending to this hard match, was very vnfortunate: for by keeping cur the Israelite (which was easie enough) any little while, they should soone haue bene rid of him, seeing 50 that the Aramites would haue made him runne home, with greater speed than hee came forth. Then also, when hauing trusted vp his baggage, hee was ready to bee gone, a little courage would haue serued to perswade him to leaue his load behind; had not their good King deliuered vp Hostages, to secure his returne, as loth to defraud him of the recompence due to his paines taken.

Such

Such exprobrations could not but vex the heart of this vnhappy King: it had bene well for him, if they had made him acknowledge his faults vnto God, that had punished him by all this dishonour. But we find no mention of his amendment. Rather it appeares, that he continued an Idolatour to the very last. For it is said of him, that after his turning away from the Lord, they wrought treason against him in Ierusalem; a manifest prooffe that he was not reclaimed, vnto his liues end. And certainly, they which tell a man in his aduersitie of his faults passed, shall sooner bee thought to vpbraid him with his fortune, than to seeke his reformation. Wherefore it is no maruaile, that Priests and Prophets were lesse welcome to him, than euer they had bene. On the other side, flatterers, and such as were desirous to put a heart into him, whereof themselves might alwayes be masters, wanted not plausible matter to reuiue him. For hee was not first, nor second, of the Kings of Iuda, that had bene ouercome in battaile. Dauid himselfe had abandoned the Citie, leaving it, before the Enemie was in sight, vnto Absalom his rebellious sonne. Many besides him had received losses, wherein the Temple bare a part. If Iosabab might so easily haue bene kept out; why did their Ancestors let Sesac in? Asa was reputed a vertuous Prince, yet with his owne hands hee emptied the Temple, and was not blamed, but held excusable by necessity of the State. Belike these traducers would commend no actions but of dead Princes: if so, hee should rather liue to punish them, than dye to please them. Though wherein had hee giuen them any cause of displeasure? It was hee indeed that commanded to set open the gates to Iosabab; but it was the people that did it. Good seruants ought not to haue obeyed their Masters Commandements, to his disadvantage, when they saw him not master of his owne Person. As his captiuitie did acquite him from blame, of all things that hee did or suffered in that condition; so was that misfortune it selfe, in true estimation, as highly to his honour, as deeply to his losse. For had hee bene as hasty to flye, as others were; hee might haue escaped, as well as others did. But seeking to reach the base Multitude courage, by his Royall example, he was shamefully betrayed by those in whom hee trusted. Vnworthy creatures that could readily obey him, when speaking another mans wordes, being prisoner, he commanded them to yeeld, hauing neglected his charge, when leading them in the field, hee bad them stand to it, and fight like men. The best was that they must needs acknowledge his mischance, as the occasion whereby many thousand liues were saved; the Enemie hauing wisely preferred the surprise of a Lion that was Captaine, before the chase and slaughter of an Armie of Stags that followed him.

These or the like words comforting Amazias, were able to perswade him, that it was euen so indeed. And such excuses might haue serued well enough to please the people, if the King had first studied how to please God. But hee that was vnwilling to ascribe vnto God the good successe foretold by a Prophet; could easily find how to impute this late disaster, vnto fortune, and the fault of others. Now concerning fortune, it seemes that hee meant to keepe himselfe safe from her, by sitting still; for in fifteene yeeres following (so long hee out-liued his honour) we find not that hee stirred. As for his subjects, though nothing henceforth bee recorded of his government, yet we may see by his end, that the middle time was ill spent among them, increasing their hatred, to his owne ruine. He that suspecteth his owne worth, or other mens opinions, thinking that lesse regard is had of his person, than hee beleueeth to be due to his place, will commonly spend all the force of his authoritie, in purchasing the name of a serueman. For the affected lowrenesse of a vaine fellow, doth many times resemble the grauitie of one that is wise: and the feare wherein they liue, which are subiect vnto oppression, carries a shew of reuerence, to him that does the wrong; at least it serues to dazle the eyes of vnderlings, keeping them from prying into the weaknesse of such as haue iurisdiction ouer them. Thus the time, wherein, by well vsing it, men might attaine to be such as they ought, they doo vsually mispend, in seeking to appeare such as they are not. This is a vaine and decei-deceivable course, procuring instead of the respect that was hoped for, more indignation than was feared. Which is a thing of dangerous consequence; especially when an vnable spirit, being ouerparted with high authoritie, is too passionate in the execution of such an Office, as cannot be checked but by violence. If therefore Amazias thought by extreme rigour to hold vp his reputation, what did heeclie than strive to make the people thinke hee hated them, when of themselves they were apt enough to beleue, that hee did not loue them? The best was that hee had, by reuenging his fathers death, provided well enough for his owne securitie: but who should take vengeance; (or vpon whom?) of such a murder, wherein euerie one had a part? Surely God himselfe, who had not giuen comfort and aidment or leaue vnto the people, to take his office out of his hand, in shedding the blood of his Anoynted. Yet as Amazias, carelesse of God, was carried headlong by his owne affection; so his subjects, following the same ill example, without requiring what belonged vnto their duties, rose vp against him, with such headlong fury, that being vnable to defend himselfe in Ierusalem, hee was driuen to forsake the Citie, and flic to Lachis, for safegard of his life. But so extreme was the hatred conceived against him, and so general, that neyther his absence could allay the rage of it in the Capitall Citie, nor his presence in the Countrey abroad procure friends, to defend his life. Questionlesse, he chose the Towne of Lachis for his refuge, as a place of all other best affected to him; yet found hee there none other fauour, than that the people did not kill him with their owne hands: for when the Conspirators (who doubted not themselves about rayling an Armie for the matter) sent pursuers after him, hee was abandoned to death. Lachis was the vtmost Citie of his Dominion Westward, standing somewhat without the border of Iuda; so that he might haue made an escape (if hee durst adventure) into the Territorie of the Philistines, or the Kingdomes of Israel. Therefore it may seeme that hee was detained there, where certaine it is that hee found no kind of fauour: for had not the people of this Towne, added their owne treason to the general insurrection; the murderers could not at so good leisure as they did, haue carried away his bodie to Ierusalem, where they gaue him buriall with his fathers.

§. XI.

Of the Interregnum, or vacancie, that was in the Kingdom of Iuda, after the death of AMAZIA.

It hath already bene shewed, that the raignes of the Kings of Iuda and Israel were sometimes to be measured by compleat yeeres; otherwhiles, by yeeres current: and that the time of one King is now and then confounded with the last yeeres of his fathers Raigne or the first of his sonnes. But we are now arrived at a meere vacation, wherein the Crowne of Iuda lay voyd eleuen whole yeeres: a thing not plainly set downe in Scriptures, nor yet remembered by Iosephus, and therefore hard to be beleueed, were it not proved by necessary consequence.

Twice we find it written, that AMAZIA, King of Iuda, liued after the death of IOAS King of Israel fifteene yeeres; whereupon it follows, that the death of AMAZIA, was about the end of fifteene yeeres compleate, which IOAB the second (who in the fifteenth yeere of AMAZIA made King ouer Israel) had raigned in Samarita. But the succession of PEZZIA, who is also called Azarias, vnto his father in the Kingdom of Iuda; was eleuen yeeres later than the sixteenth of IOAB: for it is expressed, that AZARIA beganne to raigne in the seuen and twentieth yeere of TEROBAM; the sixteenth yeere of his life, being ioyned with the first of two and fittie that hee raigned. So the Interregnum of eleuen yeeres cannot be diuided, without some hard meanes vsed, of interpreting the text other wise than the letters sound.

Yet

Yet some conjectures there are made, which tend to keepe all euen, without acknowledging any voyde time. For it is thought that in the place last of all cited, by the seuen and twentieth yeere of Ieroboam, we should perhaps vnderstand the seuen and twentieth yeere of his life; or else (because the like wordes are no where else interpreted in the like sense) that Azaria was cleauen yeeres vnder age, that is, five yeeres old, when his father died, and so his sixteenth yeere might concur with the seuen and twentieth of Ieroboams or that the text it selfe may haue suffered some wrong, by miswriting twentie seuen for seuteene yeeres, and so, by making the seuteene yeere of Ieroboam to be newly begun, all may be salued. These are the conjectures of that worthie man Gerard Mercator: concerning the first of which, it may suffice, that the Author himselfe doth easily let it passe, as improbable; the last is followed by none that I know, neither is it fit, that vpon every doubt, we should call the text in question, which could not be satisfied in all copies, if perhaps it were in one: as for the second, it may be held with some qualification, that Azaria began his Raigne being five yeeres old; but then must we adde those cleauen yeeres which passed in his minoritie, to the two and fiftie that followed his sixteenth yeere, which is all one, in a manner, with allowing an interregnum.

But why should we be so careful to auoide an interregnum in Iuda, seeing that the like necessitie hath enforced all good Writers, to acknowledge the like vacancy, twice happening within few yeeres, in the Kingdome of Israel? The space of time betweene Ieroboams death, and the beginning of Zachariabs Reigne, and such another gap found betweene the death of Iehoiada, and the beginning of Iehoiakims, haue made it easily to be admitted in Samaria, which the consideration of things as they stood in Iuda, when Amazias was slaine, doth make more probable to haue happened there, yea although the necessitie of computation were not so apparant.

For the publike furie, hauing so farre extended it selfe, as vnto the destruction of the Kings owne person, was not like to be appeased without order taken for obtaining some redresse of those matters, which had caused it at the first to breake forth into such extremity. We need not therefore wonder how it came to passe, that they which already had throwne the miselues into such an horrible treason, should afterwards dare to withhold the Crowne from a Prince of that age, which being interested in all ornaments of Regalitie, is neuer thelesse exposed to many injuries, proceeding from head-strong and forgetfull subjects.

As for their conjecture, who make Azaria to haue bene King but one and forty yeeres, after hee came out of his nonage; I dare not allow it, because it agrees too hardly with the text. The best opinion were that, which giues vnto Ieroboam cleauen yeeres of Raigne with his Father, before hee beganne to raigne single in the sixteenth of Amazias; did it not swallow vp almost the whole Raigne of Ioua, and extending the yeeres of those which raigned in Israel (by making such of them compleat, as were only current) and take at the shortest the Raignes of Princes ruling in 40 other Nations. But I will not stand to dispute further of this: euery man may follow his owne opinion, and see mine more plainly in the Chronologicall Table, drawne for these purposes.

§. XII.

Of Princes Contemporary with Amazias, and more particularly of Sardanapalus.

THE Princes liuing with Amazias, and in the cleauen yeeres that followed his death, were Ioua and Ieroboam in Israel; Cepherus and Myserinus in Egypt; Sylaius Alladius, and Syluius Auentinus in Alban; Agamemnon in Cerinth; Diogenetus Pheredus, and Arifbron in Athen; in Lacedemon Thecleus, in whose time the Spartans wan from the Achians, Gerathus, Amysus, and some other Townes.

But

But more notable than all these, was Affrian Sardanapalus, who in the one and twentieth yeere of Amazias, succeeding his father Orazapes or Anasyndaraxes, reigned twentie yeeres, and was slaine the last of the cleuen void yeeres which fore-went the Raigne of Azaria. In him ended (as most agree) the line of Ninus, which had held that Empire oge thousand, two hundred and fortie yeeres. A most luxurious and effeminate Palliard he was, passing away his time among strumpets, whom he imitated both in apparell and behaviour.

In these voluptuous courses hee liued an vnhappy life, knowing himselfe to be so vile, that he durst not let any man haue a sight of him; yet scene he was at length, and the sight of him was so odious, that it procured his ruine. For Arbaces, who governed Medis vnder him, finding meanes to behold the person of his King, was so incensed with that beastly spectacle, of a man disguised in womans attire, and struing to counterfeite an harlot, that hee thought it great shame to liue vnder the command of so vnworthie a creature. Purposing therefore to free himselfe and others from so base subiection, he was much encouraged by the prediction of Beleus or Belofus a Chaldean, who told him plainly, that the Kingdome of Sardanapalus should fall into his hands. Arbaces well pleased with this propheticke, did promise vnto Belofus himselfe the gouernment of Babylon; and so concluding how to handle the busines, one of them stirred vp the Medes, and allured the Persians into the quarrell, the other perswaded the Babylonians and Assyrians to venture themselves in the same cause. These foure Nations armed fortie thousand men against Sardanapalus, who in this danger was not wanting to himselfe, but gathering such forces as hee could, out of other Nations, encountered the rebels, as one that would by deedes refute the tales that they had told of him. Neither did his carriage in the beginning of that warre, answere to the manner of his retirednesse. For in three battailes hee carried away the better, driving Arbaces and his followers into such fearefull termes, that had not Belofus promised them constantly some vnexpected succours, they would forthwith haue broken vp their Campe. About the same time, an Armie out of Bactria was coming to assist the King; but Arbaces encountering it vpon the way, perswaded so strongly by promise of libertie, that those forces joyntly caused selues with his. The sodaine departure of the enimie seeming to be a flight, caused Sardanapalus to feast his Armie, triumphing before victorie. But the Rebels being strengthened with this new supply, came vpon him by night, and forced his Camp, which through ouer-great securitie was vnprepared for resistance.

This ouerthrow did so weaken the Kings heart, that leauing his wiues brother Salamenus to keepe the field, he withdrew himselfe into the Citie of Nineue; which, till new aides that he sent for should come, hee thought easily to defend; it hauing bene propheticke, that Ninieue should neuer be taken, till the Riuer were enemy in the Towne. Of the greatnesse and strength of Ninieue, enough hath bene spoken in our discourse of Ninus. It was so well victualled, that Arbaces (hauing in two battailes ouerthrowne the Kings Armie, and slaine Salamenus) was faine to lye two whole yeeres before it, in hope to winne it by famine; whereof yet he saw no appearance. It seemed that he wanted Engines and skill to force those wals, which were a hundred foot high, and thicke enough for three Chariots in front to passe vpon the rampire. But that which he could not doe in two yeeres, the Riuer of Tygris did in the third: for being high swolne with raines, it not only drowned a part of the Citie through which it ranne, but threw downe twentie furlongs of the wall, and made a faire breach for Arbaces to enter.

Sardanapalus, eyther terrified with the accomplishment of the olde Oracle, or seeing no meanes of resistance left, shutting vp himselfe into his Palace, with his wiues, Eunuchs and all his treasures, did set the house on fire, wherewith hee and they were together consumed. Strabo speaks of a monument of his, that was in Anchiale a Citie of Cilicia, whereon was found an inscription, shewing that he built that Citie and Thursus vpon one day: but the addition hereto, bidding men eate and

and drinke, and make merry, encouraging other, with verses well knowne, to a voluptuous life, by his owne example, telline that his nature was more prone to sensuality, than to any vertue becoming a Prince.

There are some that faintly report otherwife of his end; saying that Arbaces, when hee first found him among his Concubines, was so enraged, that suddenly hee slew him with a dagger. But the more general consent of Writers agrees with this relation of Diodorus Siculus, who citeth Ctesias a Greeke Writer, that liued in the Court of Persia, where the truth might best be knowne.

Concerning the Princes which reigned in Assyria; from the time of Semiramis, vnto Sardanapalus, though I beleue that they were sometimes (yet not, as Orosius hath it, incessantly) buied, in offensive or else defensive armes; yet for the most part of them I doe better trull Diodorus Siculus, who saith that their names were ouerpassed by Ctesias, because they did nothing worthie of memory. Whatsoeuer they did; that which Theophrastus Antiochenus hath said of them is verie true; Silence and obliuion hath oppressed them.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of VZZIA.

§. I.

The prosperitie of VZZIA, and of Jeroboam the second, who reigned with him in Israel. Of the Anarchie that was in the tenne Tribes after the death of Jeroboam. Of Zacharia, Salm, Menahem and Pekahia.

VZZIA, who is also called Azarias the sonne of Iotham, was made King of Juda, when he was sixtene yeeres old, in the seuen and twentieth yeere of Jeroboam the sonne of Ios King of Israel. Hee serued the God of his father Dauid, and had therefore good successe in all his enterprises. Hee built Eloth; a Towne that stood nere to the Red Sea, and restored it to Juda. Hee ouercame the Philistims, of whose Townes hee dismantled some, and built others in sundrie parts of their Territories. Also hee got the maiestie ouer some parts of Arabia, and brought the Ammonites to pay him tribute. Such were the fruits of his prosperous warres, wherein (as Isaiah rehearseth his acts) he beganne with the Philistims, and then proceeded vnto the Arabians and Ammonites. His Armie consisted of three hundred and seuen thousand men of warre, ouer which were appointed two thousand fixe hundred Captaines. For all this multitude the King prepared shields, and spearres, and helmetts, and other Armes requisite; following therein happily a course quite opposite vnto that which some of his late predecessors had held, who thought it better policie to vse the seruice of the Nobilitie, than of the multitude; carrying forth to warre the Princes and all the Chariots.

As the victories of Vzzia were farre more important, than the atchievements of all that had reigned in Juda, since the time of Dauid; so were his riches and magnificent workes, equally if not superior to any of theirs that had bene Kings betwene him and Salomon. For besides that great conquests are wont to repay the charges of Warre with triple interest, he had the skill to vse, as well as the happinesse to get. Hee turned his Lands to the best vse, keeping Ploughmen and Dressers of Vines, in grounds conuenient to such husbandry. In other places hee had Cattell feeding, whereof he might well keepe great store, hauing wonne so much from the Ammonites and Arabians, that had abundance of waste ground seruing for pasture. For defence of his Cattell and Herdsmen, hee built Towres in the wilderness. He also digged many Cisternes or Ponds, Isophne calls them Water-courses; but in such drie grounds, it was enough that he found water, by digging in the most likely places. If by these Towres hee so commanded the water, that none could without his consent, releue themselves therewith; questionlesse he tooke the onely course, by which he might securely hold the Lordship ouer all the Wilderness; it being hardly passable, by reason of the extreme drought, when the few Springs therein found, are left free to the vse of Trauailers.

Besides all this cost, and the building both of Eloth by the Red Sea, and of sundrie Townes among the Philistims; hee repaired the wall of Jerusalem, which Ios had broken downe, and fortified it with Towres, whereof some were an hundred and fiftie Cubits high.

The State of Israel did neuer so flourish, as at this time, since the diuision of the twelue Tribes into two Kingdomes. For as Vzzia preuailed in the South, so (if not more) Jeroboam the sonne of Ios, King of the tenne Tribes, enlarged his border on the North; where obtaining many victories, against the Syrians, he wanne the Royall Citie of Damascus, and he wanne Hamath, with all the Countrie thereabout from the entring of Hamath, vnto the Sea of the Wilderness, that is (as the most expound it) vnto the vast deserts of Arabia, the end whereof was vndiscovered. So the bounds of Israel in those parts, were in the time of this Jeroboam, the same (or not much narrower) which they had bene in the Raigne of Dauid.

But it was not for the pietie of Jeroboam, that hee thrived so well; for hee was an Idolater: it was only the compassion which the Lord had on Israel, seeing the exceeding bitter affliction, whereinto the Aramites had brought his people, which caused him to alter the successe of warre, and to throw the victorious Aramites, vnder the feet of those, whom they had so cruelly oppressed. The line of Iehu, to which God had promised the Kingdome of Israel: vnto the fourth generation, was now not farre from the end; and now againe it was inuited vnto repentance, by new benefites, as it had bene at the beginning. But the sinne of Jeroboam the sonne of Nebat, was held so precious, that neither the Kingdome it selfe, given to him by God, was able to draw Iehu from that politike Idolatrie, nor the misery falling vpon him and his posteritie, to bring them to a better course of Religion; nor yet, at the last, this great prosperitie, of Jeroboam the sonne of Ios, to make him render the honour that was due, to the onely giuer of victorie. Wherefore the promise of God, made vnto Iehu, that his sonnes, vnto the fourth generation, should sit on the throne of Israel, was not enlarged; but, being almost expired, gaue warning of the approaching end, by an accident (so strange, that wee, who find no particulars recorded, can hardly ghesse at the occasions) forgoing the last accomplishment.

When Jeroboam the Sonne of Ios, after a victorious raigne of one and fortie yeeres, had ended his life, it seemes in all reason that Zacharia his Son, should forthwith haue bene admitted, to raigne in his stead; the Nobilitie of that race hauing gotten such a lustre, by the immediate succession of foure Kings, that any Competitor, had the crowne passed by election, must needs haue appeared base; and the verue of the last King, hauing bene so great, as might well serue to lay the foundation of a new house, much more to establish the alreadie confirmed right of a family so rooted in possession. All this notwithstanding, two or three and twenty yeeres did passe, before Zacharia the Sonne of Ieroboam was, by vniforme consent, receiued as King. The true originall causes hereof were to be found at Dan and Be-thel, where the golden Calues did stand: yet second instruments of this disturbance, are likely not to haue bene wanting, vpon which, the wisdom of man was ready to cast an eye. Probable it is, that the Captaines of the Armie (who afterwards slew one another, so fast, that in fourteene yeeres there raigned fise Kings) did now by head-strong violence, rent the Kingdome asunder, holding each what hee could, and eyther despiſing or hating some qualities in Zacharia, vntill, after many yeeres, wearied with dissention, and the principall of them perhaps, being taken out of the way by death, for want of any other eminent man, they consented to yeeld all quietly to the sonne of Ieroboam. That this Anarchie lasted almost three and twentie yeeres, we find by the difference of time, betwene the fiftieth yeere of Vzzia, which was the last of Ieroboam his one and fortieth (his seven and twentieth concurring with the first of Vzzia) and the eight and thirtieth of the same Vzzia, in the last fixe moneths whereof, Zacharia raigned in Samaria. There are some indeed that by supposing Ieroboam to haue raigned with his father eleuen yeeres, doe cut off the interregnum in Juda (before mentioned) and by the same reason, abridge this Anarchie, that was before the Raigne of Zacharia in Israel. Yet they leaue it twelue yeeres long: which is time sufficient to proue, that the Kingdome of the ten Tribes was no lesse dis tempered, than as is already noted. But I choole rather to follow the more common opinion, as concurring more exactly with the times of other Princes raigning abroad in the World, than this doubtfull conjecture, that giues to Ieroboam two and fiftie yeeres, by adding three quarters of his fathers Raigne, vnto his own, which was it selfe indeed too long, that hee may well seeme to haue begonne it very yong: for I doe not thinke, that God blessed this Idolater, both with a longer raigne, and with a longer life, than he did his seruant Dauid.

Thus much being spoken of the time, wherein the throne of Israel was void, before the raigne of Zacharia, little may suffice to be said of his Raigne it selfe, which lasted but a little while. Sixe moneths onely was he King; in which time he declared himselfe a worshipper of the golden Calues; which was enough to iustifie the judgement of God, whereby he was slaine. He was the last of Iehu's house, being (inclusiuely) the first of that line; which may haue bene some cause of the troubles impeaching his orderly succession: the propheticke hauing determined that race in the fourth generation. But (besides that Gods promise was extended vnto the vtmost) there was no warrant given to Sallum or to any other, for the death of Zacharia, as had bene giuen to Iehu, for the slaughter of Ieroboam, and for the eradication of A-bahi's house.

Zacharia hauing bene sixe moneths a King, was then slaine by Sallum, who raigned after him, the space of a month in Samaria. What this Sallum was, I doe not find; save onely that he was a Traytour, and the sonne of one Iabeſo, whereby his father got no honour. It seemes that he was one of those, who in time of faction had laboured for himselfe; and now, when all other Competitors were sitten downe, thought easily to preuaile against that King, in whose person the race of Iehu was to faile. Manifest it is, that Sallum had a strong partie: for Tiphſab or Thapſa, and the Coast thereof euen from Tirzah, where Menabem, his enemy and supplanter then lay, refused to admit, as King in his stead, the man that murdered him. Yet at the end of one moneth, Sallum receiued the reward of his treason, and was slaine by Menabem who raigned in his place.

Menabem the sonne of Gadi, raigned after Sallum tenne yeeres. In opposition to Sallum, his hatred was deadly, and inhumane: For hee not onely destroyed Tiphſab, and all that were therein, or thereabouts, but he ripped vp all their women with child, because they did not open their gates and let him in. Had this cruelty bene vsed in reuenge of Zacharias death, it is like that hee would haue bene as earnest, in procuring vnto him his Fathers Crowne when it was first due. But in performing that office, office, there was vsed such long deliberation, that wee may plainly discouer Ambition, Disdain, and other priuate passions, to haue bene the causes of this basely outrage.

In the time of Menabem, and (as it seemes) in the beginning of his Raigne; Pul, King of Assyria, came against the Land of Israel; whom this new King appeared, with a thousand talents of siluer, leauiſt vpon all the substantiall men in his Countrey. With this money the Israelite purchased, not only the peace of his Kingdome, but his owne establishment therein: some factious man (belike) hauing either inuited Pul thither, or (if he came vncalled) fought to vsf his helpe, in deposing this ill beloued King. Iosephus reports of this Menabem, that his Raigne was no milder than his entrance. But after ten yeeres, his tyrannic ended with his life: and Pekahia, his Sonne, occupied his roome.

Of this Pekahia the storie is short: for hee raigned only two yeeres; at the end whereof, he was slaine by Pekah, the Sonne of Remaliah, whose treason was rewarded with the Crowne of Israel, as, in time coming, another mans Treason against himselfe shall be. There needs no more to be said of Menabem, and his Sonne, save that they were, both of them, Idolaters; and the Sonne (as wee finde in Iosephus) like to his Father in cruelty. Concerning Pul the Assyrian King, who first opened vnto those Northerne Nations the way into Palestina, it will shortly follow in order of the storie, to deliuer our opinion: whether he were that Belofus (called also Belus) and by some, Phul Belochus) who joyned with Arbaee the Median, against Sardanapalus, or whether he were some other man. At the present it is more fit wee relate the end of Vzzia's life, who out-liued the happineſſe wherein we left him.

§. II.

The end of VZZIA his Raigne and life.

AS the zeale of Iehoiada, that godly Priest, was the meane, to preferre the linage of Dauid, in the person of Ioas; so it appears, that the care of holy men was not wanting to Vzzia, to bring him vp, and aduance him to the Crowne of Juda, when the hatred borne to his Father A-mazias, had endangered his succession. For it is said of Vzzia, that hee sought God in the dayes of Zacharia (which vnderstood the visions of God) and when as he sought the Lord, God made him prosper.

But, when he was strong, his heart was lifted up to his destruction: for hee transgressed v. 16. against the Lord his God, and went into the Temple of the Lord to burne incense, vpon the Altar of incense. Thus he thought to enlarge his owne authoritie, by meddling in the Priests office, whose power had in euery extremity bene so helpful to the Kings of Juda, that mere gratitude, and ciuill policie, should haue held backe Vzzia from inuoluing thereupon; yea, though the Law of God had bene silent in this case, and not forbidden it. Howsoeuer the King forgot his dutie, the Priests remembered theirs, and God forgot not to assist them. Azaria the high Priest interrupted the Kings purpose, and gaue him to vnderstand, how little to his honour it would proue, that he tooke vpon him the office of the sonnes of Aaron. There were with Azaria foure score other Priests, valiant men, but their valour was shewed onely in assisting the high Priest, when (according to his dutie) hee reprehended the Kings presumption. This was enough, the rest God himselfe performed. Wee finde in Iosephus, that the King had apparelled himselfe in Priestly habit, and that hee threatened Azarias and his Companions, to punish them with death, vnlesse they would be quiet. Iosephus, indeed, enlargeth the storie, by inserting a great Earthquake, which did teare downe halfe an Hill, that rowled foure furlongs, till it rested against another Hill, spoyling vp the high-ways, and spoyling the Kings Garden in the passage. With this Earth-quake, he sayth, that the rooffe of the Temple did cleaue, cleave, and that a Sunne-beame did light vpon the Kings face, which was presently infected with leprosie. All this may haue beene true; and some there are who thinke that this Earth-quake is the same, which is mentioned by the Prophet Amos; wherein they doe much misse-reckon the times. For the Earth-quake spoken of by Amos, was in the daies of Ieroboam King of Israel, who dyed seuen and thirtie yeeres before Vzzia; so that Iotham the Sonne of Vzzia, which supplied his Fathers place in government of the Land, should, by this account, haue beene then vnborne: for hee was but siue and twentie yeeres old, when hee beganne to raigne as King. Therefore, thus farre only wee haue assurance; that while Vzzia was wiold with the Priests, the leprosie rose vpon in his forehead, before the Priests. Hereupon he was caused, in all haste, to depart the place, and to liue in a house by himselfe, vntill he dyed; the rule ouer the Kings house, and ouer all the Land, being committed to Iotham, his Sonne, and Successor. Iotham tooke not vpon himselfe the stile of King, till his Father was dead; whom they buried in the same field wherein his Ancestors lay interred, yet in a Monument a-part from the rest, because he was a Leper.

§. III.

Of the Prophets which liued in the time of Vzzia; and of Princes then ruling in Egypt, and in some other Countries.

IN the time of Vzzia were the first of the lesser Prophets, Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, and Jonas. It is not indeed set downe, when Joel, or Obadiah, did prophesie: but if the Prophets, whose times are not expressed, ought to bee ranged (according to S. Hieromes rule) with the next before them; then must these two be iudged contemporarie with Hosea and Amos, who liued vnder King Vzzia. To enquire which of these siue was the most ancient, it may perhaps be thought, at least a superfluous labour; yet if the age wherein Homer liued, hath so painefully bene sought, without reprehension; how can he be taxed, which offers to search out the antiquitie of these holy Prophets? It seemes to me, that the first of these, in order of time, was the Prophet Jonas; who foretold the great victories of Ieroboam King of Israel; & therefore is like to haue prophesied in the dayes of Ieroboam, whilst the affliction of Israel was exceeding bitter; the Text it selfe intimating no lesse: by which consequence, he was elder than the other Prophets, whose workes are now lost. That which remaineth of him, seemes, not without reason, vnto some very learned, to haue belonged vnto the time of Sardanapalus, in whose dayes Ninive was first of all destroyed. This Prophet rather taught Christ by his sufferings, than by his writings now extant: in all the rest are found expresse promises of the Messias.

In the Raigne of Vzzia likewise it was, that Esaï, the first of the foure great Prophets, beganne to see his visions. This difference of greater and lesser Prophets, is taken from the Volumes which they haue left written (as S. Augustine giues reason of the distinction) because the greater haue written larger Bookes. The Prophet Esaï was great indeed, not only in regard of his much written; or of his Nobilitie, (for their opinion is rectified, who thinke him to haue beene the sonne of Amos the Prophet) and the high account wherein he liued; but for the excellencie, both of his stile and argument, wherein he so plainly foretellet the Birth, Miracles, Passion, and whole Historie of our Sauour, with the calling of the Gentiles, that hee might as well be called an Euangelist, as a Prophet; hauing written in such wise, that (as Hierome sayth) one would thinke he did not foretell of things to come, but compile an Historie of matters already past.

Bocchoris was King of Egypt, and the ninth yeere of his Raigne, by our computation

tion (whereof in due place we will giue reason) was current, when Vzzia tooke possession of the Kingdome of Inda.

After the death of Bocchoris, Aphsis followed in the Kingdome of Egypt, vnto him succeeded Anysis; and these two occupied that Crowne lix yeeres. Then Sabacus, an Ethiopian, became King of Egypt, and held it siue yeeres, whereof the tenne first ranne along with the last of Vzzia his Raigne and life. Of these and other Egyptian Kings, more shall be spoken, when their affaires shall come to be intermedied with the businesse of Inda.

In Atens, the two last yeeres of Ariphron his twentie, the seuen and twentieth of Thespis, the twentieth of Agamnestor, and threeth first of Aeschylus his three and twentie, made euen with the two and fiftie of Vzzia; as likewise did in Alba the last seuen of Siluius Auentinus his seuen and thirtie, together with the three and twentie of Siluius Procas, and two and twentie the first of Siluius Amulius. In Media Arbaces beganne his new Kingdome, in the first of Vzzia, wherein, after eight and twentie yeeres, his Sonne Sesarmus succeeded him, and raigned thirtie yeeres. Of this Arbaces, and the diuision of the Assyrian Empire, betwene him and others, when they had oppressed Sardanapalus, I hold it convenient to vse more particular discourse, that we may not wander in too great vncertainty in the storie of the Assyrian Kings, who haue alreadie found the way into Palestina, and are not likely to forget it.

§. IIII.

Of the Assyrian Kings, descending from Phyl: and whether Phyl and Belosus were one person; or heads of sundrie Families, that raigned a-part in Ninive and Babylon.

BY that which hath formerly bene shewed of Sardanapalus his death, it is apparant, that the chiefe therein was Arbaces the Median; to whom the rest of the Confederates did not only submit themselves in that Warre, but were contented afterwards to bee judged by him; receiving by his authoritie sentence of death, or pardon of their forfeited liues. The first example of this his power, was shewen vpon Belosus the Babylonian, by whose especiall aduice and helpe, Arbaces himselfe was become so great. Yet was not this power of Arbaces exercised in so tyrannicall manner, as might giue offence in that great alteration of things, eyther to the Princes that had assisted him, or to the generallitie of the people. For in the condemnation of Belosus, he vsed the counsaile of his other Captaines, and then pardoned him of his owne Graces; allowing him to hold, not only the Citie and Prouince of Babylon, but also those treasures, for embelzing whereof his life had bene endangered.

In like manner, he gaue rewards to the rest of his partakers, and made them Rulers of Prouinces; retaining (as it appeares) only the Soueraignetie to himselfe, which to vse immoderately hee did naturally abhorre. Hee is said, indeed, to haue excited the Medes against Sardanapalus, by propounding vnto them hope of transferring the Empire to their Nation. And to make good this his promise, hee destroyed the Citie of Ninive; permitting the Citizens neuertheless to take and carrie away euery one his owne goods. The other Nations that ioyined with him, as the Persians and Bablians, he drew to his side, by the allurements of libertie; which he himselfe so greatly loued, that by slacke too much the reines of his owne Soueraignetie, hee did more harme to the generall estate of Media, than the pleasure of the freedome, which it enjoyed, could recompence. For both the Territory of that Country was pared narrower by Salmanassar (or perhaps by some of his Progenitors) whom wee finde, in the Scriptures, to haue held some Townes of the Medes, and the civill administration was so disorderly, that the people themselves were glad to see that reformation, which Deceus, the fifth of Arbaces his Line, did make in that government; by reducing them into stricter termes of obedience.

How the force of the Assyrians grew to be such, as might in fourecore yeeres, if not sooner, both extend it selfe vnto the conquest of Israel, and teare away some part of Media, it is a question hardly to be answered; not only in regard of the destruction of Nimue, and subversion of the Assyrian Kingdome, whereof the Medes, vnder Arbaces, had the honour who may seeme at that time to have kept the Assyrians vnder their subiection, when the rest of the Prouinces were at libertie; but in consideration of the Kings themselves, who reigning afterwards in Babylon, and Ainue, are confounded by some, and distinguished by others; whereby their Historie is made vncertaine.

I will first therefore deliuer the opinion generally receiued, and the grounds whereupon it stands: then, producing the obiections made against it; I will compare together the determination of that worthe man Ioseph Scaliger, with those learned that subscribe thereto, and the iudgement of others that were more ancient Writers, or have followed the Ancients in this doubtfull case. Neyther shall it be needfull to set downe a-part the severall authorities and arguments of Iudrie men adding somewhat of weight or clearnesse one to another: it will be enough to relate the whole substance of each discourse: which I will doe as briefly as I can, and without feare to be taxed of partialitie, as being no more addicted to the one opinion than to the other, by any fancie of mine owne, but merely led by those reasons which vpon examination of each part, seemed to me most forcible, though to others they may perhaps appeare weake.

That which, untill of late, hath passed as currant, is this; That Belofus was the same King, who, first of the Assyrians, entred Palestina with an Armie; being called Pul, or Phul, in the Scriptures, and by Annins his Authours with such as follow them, Phul Belofus. Of this man it is said, that he was a skilfull Astrologer, subtile, and ambitious; that he got Babylon by composition made with Arbaces; and that not therewith content, he got into his hand part of Assyria: finally, that he reigned eight and fortie yeeres, and then dying, left the Kirgdom to Tegles phalsar his Sonne, in whose Posteritie it continued some few descents, till the house of Mesodach prevailed. The truth of this, if Annins his Metasthenes were selfe sent prooffe, could not be gainesaid; for that Authour (such as he is) is peremptorie herein. But, howsoever Annins his Authours deferre to be suspected, it stands with no reason, that we should conclude all to be false which they ascribe. They, who maintaine this Tradition, iustifie it by diuers good Allegations, as a matter confirmed by circumstances found in all Authours, and repugnant vnto no Historie at all. For it is manifest by the relation of Diodorus (which is indeed the foundation whereupon all have built) that Arbaces and Belofus were Partners in the action against Sardanapalus; and that the Bactrians, who joyned with them, were thought well rewarded with libertie, as like-wile other Capitaines were with governments: but that any third Person was so eminent, as to haue Assyria selfe, the chiefe Country of the Empire, bestowed vpon him, it is a thing whereof not the least appearance is found in any Historie. And certainly it stood with little reason, that the Assyrians should be committed vnto a peculiar King, at such time as it was not thought meet to trust them in their owne wals and houses. Rather it is apparent, that the destruction of Nimue by Arbaces, and the transplantation of the Citizens, was held a needfull policie because thereby the people of that Nation might be kept downe, from aspiring to recover the Souerainetie, which else they would haue thought to belong, as of right, vnto the Seat of the Empire.

Vpon such considerations did the Romans, in ages long after following, destroy Carthage and dissolve the Corporation, or Bodie politike, of the Citizens of Capua; because those two Townes were capable of the Empire: a matter esteemed dangerous dangerous euen to Rome it selfe, that was Miſtreſſe of them both. This being so, how can it be thought that the Assyrians in three or foure yeeres had erected their Kingdome a-new, vnder one Pul? or what must this Pul haue bene (of whose descents, or intermeddling, or indeed of whose very name, wee find no mention in the Warre against Sardanapalus) to whom the principall part of the Empire fell, eyther by generall consent in diuision of the Prouinces, or by his owne power and purchase very soone after? Surely he was none other than Belofus; whose neere Neighbourhood gaue him opportunitie (as he was wise enough to play his owne game) both to get Assyria to himselfe, and to empeach any other man, that should haue attempted to seize vpon it. The Prouince of Babylon, which Belofus held, being (as Herodotus reports) in riches, and power, as good as the third part of the Persian Empire, was able to furnish him with all that was requisite for such a businesse: if that were not enough, he had gotten into his owne hands all the gold and silver that had bene in the Palace of Nimue. And questionlesse to restore such a Citie as Nimue, was an enterprife fit for none to take in hand, except he had such means as Belofus had; which Pul, if he were not Belofus, is likely to haue wanted.

Besides all this, had Pul bene a distinct person from Belofus, and Lord of Assyria, which lay beyond the Countreys of Babylon and Mesopotamia, it would not haue bene an easie matter for him, to passe quite through another mans Kingdome with an Armie, seeking bootie aſtate off in Israel: the only action by which the name of Pul is knowne. But if we grant, that he, whom the Scriptures call Pul or Phul, was the same whom prophane writers haue called Belofus, Belſet, and Belſheſ, (in like manner as Iosephus acknowledgeth, that hee, whom the Scriptures called neuer otherwise than Darius the Mede, was the Sonne of Aſſages, and called of the Greekes by another name, that is, Cyaxares) then is this scruple vtterly renoued. For Babylon and Mesopotamia did border vpon Syria and Palestina: so that Belofus, hauing settled his affaires in Assyria towards the East and North, might with good leisure encroach vpon the Countreys that lay on the other side of his Kingdome, to the South and West. He that looks into all particulars, may find euery one circumstance concurring, to proue that Phul who invaded Israel, was none other than Belofus. For the Prince of the Arabians, who joyned with Arbaces, and brought no small part of the forces wherewith Sardanapalus was ouerthrowne, did enter into that action, merely for the loue of Belofus. The friendship of these Arabians was a thing of maine importance, to those that were to passe ouer Euphrates with an Armie into Syria. Wherefore Belofus, that held good correspondence with them; and whose most fruitfull Prouince, adjoining to their barraine quarters, might yeerely doe them inestimable pleasures; was not only like to haue quick passage through their borders, but their vtmost assistance; yea, it stands with good reason, that they, who loued not Israel, should for their owne behoofe haue given him intelligence, of the destruction and ciuill broyles among the tenne Tribes; whereby, as this Pul got a thousand salents, so it seems that the Syrians and Arabians, that had felt an heauie Neighbour of Ieroboam, recovered their owne, setting vp a new King in Damasco, and clearing the Coast of Arabia, (from the Sea of the Wildernesse to Hamath) of the Hebrew Garrisons. Neyther was it any new acquaintance, that made the Nations diuided by Euphrates hold together in so good termes of friendship: it was ancient consanguinitie; the memorie whereof was auailable to the Syrians, in the time of Dauid, when the Aramites beyond the River came ouer willingly, to the succour of Hadadezer, and the Aramites about Damasco. So Belofus had good reason to looke into those parts; what a King reigning so farr off as Nimue, should haue to doe in Syria, if the other end of his Kingdome had not reached to Euphrates, it were hard to shew.

But concerning this last argument of the businesse which might allure the Chaldeans into Palestina, it may be doubted, lest it should seeme to haue ill coherence with that which hath bene said of the long Anarchie that was in the tenne Tribes.

For if the Crowne of Israel were worne by no man in three and twentie yeeres, then is it likely that Belofus was eyther vnwilling to stirre, or vnable to take the advantage when it was faile, and first discouered. This might haue compelled thoe, who alone were not strong enough, to seeke after helpe from some Prince that lay further off; and so the opinion of thoe that distinguish Phul from Belofus, would be somewhat confirmed. On the other side, if we say, that Belofus did passe the River of Euphrates, as loone as hee found likelihood of making a prosperous journey, then may it seeme that the inter-regnum in Israel was not so long as we haue made it: for three and twentie yeeres leisure would haue afforded better opportunitie, which ought not to haue bene lost.

For answere herunto, we are to consider, what Orosius and Eusebius haue written concerning the Chaldees: the one, that after the departure of Arbaces into Media, they laid hold on a part of the Empire; the other, that they preuailed and grew mightie, betwene the times of Arbaces and Deiotes the Medes. Now, though it be held an error of Orosius, where he supposeth that the occupying of Babylonia by the Chaldeans, was in manner of a rebellion from the Medes; yet herein hee and Eusebius doe concur, that the authoritie of Arbaces did reſtraine the ambition, which by his abſence grew bold, and by his death, regardfull only of it ſelfe. Now, though ſome haue conjectured that all Aſſyria was giuen to Belofus (as an ouerplus, beſides the Province of Babylon, which was his by plaine bargain made aforehand) in regard of his high deſeruings, yet the opinion more commonly receiued is, that hee did only encroch vpon that Province by little and little, whileſt Arbaces liued, and afterwards dealing more openly, got it all himſelfe. Seeing therefore, that there paſſed but twelue yeeres betwene the death of Arbaces, and the beginning of Menabem his Raigne; maniſt it is, that the conqueſt of Aſſyria, and ſettling of that Country, was worke enough to hold Belofus occupied, beſides the reſtauration of Ninive, which alone was able to take vp all the time remaining of his Raigne, if perhaps he liued to ſee it finiſhed in his owne dayes. So that this argument may rather ſerue to prove that Phul and Belofus were one perſon; forasmuch as the iourney of Phul againſt Israel was not made vntill Belofus could find leiſure; and the time of aduantage which Belofus did let ſlip, argued his buſineſſe in ſome other quarter, namely in that Province of which Phul is called King. Briefly, it may bee ſaid, that he who conquered Aſſyria, and performed ſomewhat vpon a Countrey ſo farre diſtant as Paleſtina, was likely to haue bene, at leaſt, named in ſome Hiſtorie, or, if not himſelfe, yet his Countrey to haue bene ſpoken of for thoſe victories: but we neither heare of Phul, in any prophane Authour, neyther doth any Writer, ſacred or prophane, once mention the victories or acts whatſoeuer of the Aſſyrians, done in thoſe times; whereas of Belofus, and the power of the Chaldeans, wee find good Record.

Surely, that great ſlaughter of ſo many thouſand Aſſyrians, in the quarrell of Sardanapalus, together with other calamities of that long and vnfortunate warre, which ouerwhelmed the whole Countrey, not ending but with the ruine and vtter deſolation of Ninive, muſt needs haue ſo weakened the ſtate of Aſſyria, that it could not in thirtie yeeres ſpace be able to invade Paleſtina, which the ancient Kings, raigning in Ninive, had, in all their greatneſſe, forborne to attempt. Yet theſe afflictions, diſabling that Countrey, did helpe to enable Belofus to ſubdue it; who hauing once extended his Dominion to the borders of Media, and being (eſpecially if he had compounded with the Medes) by the interpoſition of that Countrey, ſcure of the Scythians, and other warlike Nations on that ſide, might very well turne Southward, and trie his fortune in thoſe Kingdomes, whereinto ciuill diſſention of the inhabitants, and the bordering enuie of the Arabians and Arames about Damaſcus, friends and Couſins to the Chaldeans and Mepopotemians, did inuite him. For theſe, and the other before alledged reaſons, it may be concluded, That what is ſaid of Phul in the Scriptures, ought to be vnderſtood of Belofus; euen as by the names of Nebuchad-

NECCAR,

NECCAR, Darius the Mede, Artabastus, and Achſuerus, with the like, are thought, or knowne, to be meant the ſame, whom prophane Hiſtorians, by names better knowne in their own Countreies, haue called Nabopolassar, Cyaxares, and Aſſuerus: eſpecially conſidering, that hereby we ſhall neither contradiſt any thing that hath bene written of olde, nor neede to trouble our ſelues and others with framing new conjectures. This in effect is that, which they alledge in maintenance of the opinion commonly receiued.

Now this being once granted; other things, of more importance, will of themſelues eaſily follow. For it is a matter of no great conſequence to know the truth of this point (conſidering it apart from that which depends thereon) Whether Phul were Belofus, or ſome other man: the whole race of theſe Aſſyrian and Babylonian Kings, wherein are found thoſe famous Princes, Nabonaſſar, Mardacempadus, and Nabopolassar (ſo famous for the Aſtronomically obſeruations recorded from their times) is the maine ground of this contention. If therefore Belofus or Beleſus were that Phul which invaded Israel; if he and his poſteritie raigned both in Ninive and in Babylon; if he were father of Teglat-Phul-ſar, from whom Salmaſſar, Senacherib, and Aſarhaddon deſcended; then it is maniſt, that we muſt ſeek Nabonaſſar, the Babylonian King, among theſe Princes; yea, and conclude him to be none other then Salmaſſar, who is knowne to haue raigned in thoſe yeeres, which Ptolemy the Mathematician hath aſſigned vnto Nabonaſſar. As for Merodach, who ſupplanted Aſarhaddon, maniſt it is, that he and his ſucceſſors were of another houſe. This is the ſcope and end of all his diſputation.

But they that maintain the contrarie part, will not be ſatisfied with ſuch conieſtures. They lay hold vpon the conſequence, and by ſhaking that into pieces, hope to ouerthrow all the premiſſes, vpon which it is inferred. For (ſay they) if Nabonaſſar, that raigned in Babylon, could not be Salmaſſar, or any of thoſe other Aſſyrian Kings, then is it maniſt, that the races were diſtinct, and that Phul and Beleſus were ſeueral Kings. This conſequence is ſo plaine, that it needs no confirmation. To proue that Nabonaſſar was a diſtinct perſon from Salmaſſar, are brought ſuch arguments as would ſtagger the reſolution of him that had ſworne to hold the contrarie. For firſt, Nabonaſſar was King of Babylon, and not of Aſſyria. This is proued by his name, which is merely Chaldean, whereas Salmaſar, the firſt part of Salmaſſar's name, is proper to the Aſſyrians. It is likewiſe proued by the Aſtronomically obſeruations, which proceeding from the Babylonians, not from the Aſſyrians, doe ſhew, that Nabonaſſar, from whom Ptolemy draws that of Ephraim, or account of times, was a Babylonian, and no Aſſyrian. Thirdly, and more ſtrongly, it is confirmed by the ſucceſſor of Nabonaſſar, which was Mardacempadus, called in his owne language Mero-dac-ken-pad, but more briefly in Eſay his prophetic, Merodach, by the former part of his name; or Merodach Baladan, the ſonne of Baladan. Now if Merodach, the ſonne of Baladan, King of Babel, then was the ſonne of Nabonaſſar, then was Nabonaſſar none other then Baladan King of Babel, and not Salmaſſar King of Aſſyria.

What can be plainer? As for the cadence of theſe two names, Nabonaſſar & Salmaſſar, which in Greek or Latine writing hath no difference, we are taught by Scaliger, that in the Hebrew letters there is found no affinity therein. So concerning the places of Babylonia, whereinto Salmaſſar carried captive ſome part of the ten Tribes; it may well be granted, that in the Province of Babylon Salmaſſar had gotten ſomewhat, yet will it not follow that he was King of Babylon it ſelfe. To conclude, Merodach began his raigne ouer Babylon in the ſixt yeere of ſeſeckir, at which time Salmaſſar tooke Samaria; therefore, if Salmaſſar were King of Babylon, then muſt we ſay that he and Merodach, yea and Nabonaſſar, were all one man. Theſe are the arguments of that noble and learned Writer Ioſeph Scaliger; who not contented to follow the common opinion, founded vpon likelihood of conieſtures, hath drawne his proofes from matter of more neceſſary inference.

Touching all that was laid before of Phul Beleſus, for the prouing that Phul and Beleſus

Belofus were not sundrie Kings; Ioseph Scaliger pitties their ignorance, that haue spent their labour to so little purpose. Honest and painefull men he confesse that they were, who by their diligence might haue wonne the good liking of their Readers, had they not, by mentioning Annius his Authors giuen such offence, that men refused thereupon to reade their Bookes and Chronologies. A short answer.

For mine owne part, howeouer I beleue nothing that Annius his Berosus, Metaphrastes, and others of that stamp affirms, in respect of their bare authoritie; yet am I not so squeamish, but that I can well enough digest a good Booke, though I finde the names of one or two of these good fellows alleaged in it: I haue (some-what peraduenture too often) already spoken my minde of Annius his Authors: I neuertheless, I may say here againe, that where other Histories are silent, or speake not enough, there may we without shame borrow of these, as much as agrees with that little which elsewhere we finde, and serueth to explaine or enlarge it without improbabilities.

Neither indeede are those honest and painefull men (as Scaliger termes them, meaning, if I mistake him not; good silly fellows) who set downe the Assyrian Kings from Pul forwards, as Lords also of Babylon, taking Pul for Belofus, and Salmanassar for Nabonassar, such Writers as a man should be ashamed or vnwilling to read. For (to omit a multitude of others, that herein follow Annius, though disliking him in generally) Gerard Mercator is not so slight a Chronologer, that hee should be laughed out of doores, with the name of an honest meaning fellow.

But I will not make comparisons between Scaliger and Mercator, they were both of them men notably learned: let vs examine the arguments of Scaliger, and see whether they be of such force, as cannot either be refuted or auoided. It will easily be granted, that Nabonassar was King of Babylon; that hee was not King of Assyria, some men doubt whether Scaliger reasons be enough to proue. For though Nabonassar be a Chaldean name, and Salmanassar an Assyrian; yet what hinders vs from beleueing, that one man in two languages might be called by two feuerall names? That Astronomie flourished among the Chaldees, is not enough to proue Nabonassar either an Astrologer, or a Chaldean. So it is, that Scaliger himselfe calls them, Prophetas I know not who, that in their sleepe haue dreamt of NABONASSAR, that hee was an Astrologer.

Whether Nabonassar were an Astrologer or no, I cannot tell; it is hard to maintaine the negative. But as his being Lord ouer the Chaldeans, doth not proue him to haue bene learned in their sciences; so doth it not proue him, not to haue bene also King of Assyria. The Emperor Charles the first, who was borne in Gant, and Philip his Sonne, King of Spaine, and Lords of the Netherlands, had men furre more learned in all Sciences, and particularly in the Mathematics, among their Subjects of the Low Countries, then were any that I read of then liuing in Spaine, if Spaine at that time had any; yet I thinke, Posteritie will not vse this as an argument, to proue that Spaine was none of theirs. It may well be, that Salmanassar or Nabonassar, did vse the Assyrian Souldiers, and Babylonian Schollers: but it seemes, that hee and his posteritie, by giuing them selues wholly to the more warlike Nation, lost the richer, out of which they first issued; as likewise King Philip lost partly, and partly did put to a dangerous hazard all the Netherlands, by such a course. As for the two vnanswerable arguments, (as Scaliger termes them, being me thinks none other than answers to somewhat that is or might be alleaged on the contrarie side) one of them which is drawne from the vnlike found and writing of those names, Salmanassar and Nabonassar in the Hebrew, I hold a point about which no man will dispute; for it is not likewise of found, but agreement of time, and many circumstances else, that must take away the distinction of persons: the other likewise may be granted; which is, that Salmanassar might be Lord of some places in the Prouince of Babylon, yet not King of Babylon it selfe: this indeede might be so, and it might be otherwise.

Hitherto

Hitherto there is nothing saue conjecture against conjecture. But in that which is alleaged out of the Prophet Esaie, concerning Merodach the Sonne of Babylus; and in that which is said of this Merodach, or Mardochempidus, his being the successor of Nabonassar, and his beginning to reigne in the sixt yeere of Itzekia, I finde matter of more difficultie, than can be answered in bair. I will therefore desire the handling of these objections, vntill I meete with their subject in his proper place; which will be when we come to the time of Itzekia, wherein Merodach lived & was King. Yet that I may not leaue too great a scruple in the minde of the Reader, thus farre will I heretofore him; that how strong soeuer this argument may seeme, Scaliger himselfe did liue to retract it, ingenuously confessing, that in thinking Merodach to be the Sonne of Nabonassar, he had bene decieued.

Now therefore let vs consider, in what sort they haue fashioned their storie, who taking Pul to be a distinct person from Belofus or Belesus, haue in like sort, as was necessarie, distinguished their off-spring, making that of Pul to faile in Alarhadion, which left all to Merodach the Babylonian. And here I must first confesse mine owne want of Bookes, if perhaps there be many, that haue gone about to reduce this narration into some such order, as might present vnto vs the bodie of this Historie, in one view. Diuers, indeede, there are, whom I haue seene, that since Ioseph Scaliger deliuered his opinion, haue written in fauour of some one or other point thereof:

13 But Serhus Calaisius himselfe, who hath abridged Scaliger his learned Worke, Le clementine Temporum, hath not bene carefull to giue vs notice, how long Belesus, Baldan, Pul, or Tiglat Palsar, did reigne, (perhaps because he found it not exprest in Scaliger) but is content to set downe Nabonassar for the same person with Nabonassar, which Scaliger himselfe reuoked. In this case: therefore I must lay downe the plot of these deuided Kingdomes, in such sort as I finde it continued by Augustinus Tormellus; who onely of all that I haue seene, sets downe the succession, continuance, and acts, of those that reigned in Assyria after Sardanapalus, distinguishing them from Belofus, and his Posteritie, of whom he hath the like remembrance. This Tormellus is a Regular Clarke of the congregation of S. Paul, whose Annales were printed the 30 last yeere; he appeares to me a man of curious industrie, sound judgement, and free Spirit; yet many times (and I take it, willingly) forgetfull of thanking, or mentioning those Protestant Writers, by whose Bookes hee hath receiued good information, and enriched his workes by inserting somewhat of theirs. But in this businesse he hath openly professed to follow Scaliger, whose helpe, without wrong or dishonour to himselfe, hee hath both vsed and acknowledged. For mine owne part, I will not spare to doe right vnto Tormellus; but confesse my selfe to haue receiued benefit by his writing; and wish that his Annales had sooner come to light; for that as hee hath much confirmed mee in some things, so would hee haue instructed and emboldened mee, to write more fully and lesse timorously in other things, which now I haue not leisure to reuise. Particularly in that coniecture (which I had faintly deliuered, and yet feared lest it had ouer-hastily passed out of my hand, and bene exposed to other mens contractions) of the foure Kings that invaded the Vallie of Siddim, and were slaine by Abraham, I finde him aduenturing, as I haue done, to say, that they may probably be thought to haue bene some petty Lords; the contrarie opinion of all Writers notwithstanding. But now let vs consider how he hath ordered these last Assyrian and Babylonian Kings.

After the destruction of Sardanapalus, Arbees being the most mightie, fought to gettall to himselfe, but was opposed by Belofus; in which contention, one Phul, a powerfull man in Assyria, sided with Belofus, and they two preuailed so farre, that finally Arbees was content to share the Empire with them, making such a diuision thereof, as was long after made of the Roman Empire, betwene Octavian, Antonine, and Lepidus.

Another coniecture is (for Tormellus offers not this, or the rest, as matter of certaintie) that Arbees made himselfe Soueraigne Lord of all, and placed the seate of

of his Empire in Media, appointing Belofus his Lieutenant in Babylonia, and Phul in Affryia. But in short space, that is, in four yeeres, it came to passe, by the iust judgement of God, that Phul and Belofus rebelled against Arbaces, like as Arbaces had done against Sardanapalus, and in stead of being his Viceroies, made themselves absolute Kings. And to this later opinion Tornellus himselfe leanes, holding it much the more probable, as being more agreeable to that which is found in prophane Histories. Why he did make and publish the former supposition, resolving to hold the later, I shall anon, without any wrong to him, make bold to guesse. Having thus deuised, how Phul and Belofus might, at the first, attaine to be Kings, hee orders their time, and their successors, in this manner.

Four yeeres after Arbaces, Phul begins to raigne, and continues eight and fortie yeeres. Theglathafasar (whose name, and the names of other Princes, I write diuersly, according as the Authors whom I haue in hand are pleased to diuersifie them) succeeding vnto Phul, raigned three and twentie. Salmanassar followed him, and raigned tenne. After him Senacharib raigned seuen: and when hee was slaine, Asarhaddon his sonne renne yeeres; in whom that Line failed.

The same time that Phul tooke vpon him as King of Affryia, or not long after, (why not rather afore? for so it had bene more likely) Belofus vsurped the Kingdome of Babylon, and held it threecore and eight yeeres; at the least threecore and eight yeeres did passe, before Xabonassar followed him in the possession.

To Nabonassar, whom (with Scaliger) hee thinke to be Baladan, are assigned fixe and twentie yeeres: then, two and fiftie to Aerodach, or Mardocempadus: foure and twentie to Ben Merodach: and lastly, one and twenty to Nabalsar, the father of Xabuchodonosor, who is like to offer matter of further disputation.

Concerning the originall of these Affryan and Babylonian Kingdomes, I may truly say, That the conjectures of other men, who giue all to Belofus, and confound him with Phul, appeare to me more needly resembling the truth. Neither doe I thinke, that Tornellus would haue conceived two different wayes, by which Phul might haue gotten Affryia (for how Belofus came to get Babylon, it is plaine enough) if either of them alone could haue contented him. He adheres to the later of the two, as better agreeing with Diodore, and other Historians. But he perceiued, that to make Phul on the suddaine King of Affryia; or to giue him so noble a Prouince, as would, of it selfe, inuite him to accept the name and power of a King, was a thing most vnlutely to haue happened, vnlesse his deserts (whereof wee finde no mention) had bene proportionable to so high a reward. And for this cause (as I take it) hath hee deuised the meanes, whereby Phul might be made capable of so great a share in the Empire. If this were a true or probable supposition, then would a new doubt arise, Why this Phul, being one of the three that diuided all betweene them, was vtterly forgotten by all Historians? yea, why this Diuision it selfe, and the ciuile Warres that caused it, were neuer heard of. Questionlesse, the interuerting of some Treasures by Belofus, with his Iudgement, Condemnation, and Pardon following, were matters of farre lesse note. Therefore I doe not see, how one of the two inconueniences can this way be auoided; but that either wee must confesse, the Dominion giuen to Phul to haue bene exceeding his merits, or else his merits, and name withall, to haue bene strangely forgotten: either of which is enougt to make vs thinke, that rather the conjecture, inserting such a sequele, is wide of the truth. As for the rebellion of Phul and Belofus against Arbaces, it was almost impossible for the Affryans to recouer such strength in foure yeeres, as might serue to hold out in rebellion: for Belofus, it was needlesse to rebell, considering, that Arbaces did not seeke to molest him, but rather permitted (as being an ouergreat fauourer of libertie) euen the Medes, that were vnder his owne Government, to doe what they listed.

But it is now fit that wee peruse the Catalogue of these Kings: not passing through them all (for some will require a large discourse in their owne titles) but spea-speaking of their order and time in generall. If it bee so vnlawfull to thinke, that some of Annius his tales (let them all be counted his tales, which are not found in other Authors as well in his) may bee true, especially such, as contradict no acknowledged truth, or apparant likelihood, why then is it said, that Phul did raigne in Affryia eight and fortie yeeres? For this hath no other ground than Annius. It is true, that painefull and iudicious Writers haue found this number of yeeres, to agree vnto with the course of things in History: yet all of them tooke it from Annius. Let it therefore be the punishment of Annius his forgerie (as questionlesse he is of ten guilty of this crime) that when he tells truth, or probability, hee be not beleened for his owne sake; though for our owne sakes we make vse of his boldnesse, taking his words for good, whereas (nothing else being offered) wee are vniwilling our selues to be Authors, of new, though not vnprobable conjectures. Herein we shall haue this commoditie, that wee may without blushing alter a little, to helpe our owne opinions, and lay the blame vpon Annius, against whom wee shall be sure to finde friends that will take our part.

The reignes of Theglathafasar and Salmanassar did reach, by Annius his measure, to the length of fixe and twentie yeeres the one, and seuentene the other; Tornellus hath cut off two from the former, and seuen from the later of them, to fit (as I thinke) his owne computation; vsing the libertie whereof I spake last: for that any Author, saue our good Metasthenes, or those that borrowed of him, hath gone about to tell how long each of these did raigne, it is more then I haue yet found. To Senacharib and Asarhaddon, Tornellus giues the same length of raigne, which is found in Metasthenes. I thinke there are none many, that will arrogate as Tornellus: yet could I wish, that he had forborne to condemne the followers of Annius, in this business, wherein he himselfe hath chosen, in part, rather to become one of them, than to say, as else he must haue done, almost nothing.

The like libertie we finde that he hath vsed in measuring the reignes of the Chaldeans; filling vp all the space betweene the end of Sardanapalus, and the beginning of Nabonassar, with the threecore and eight yeeres of Belofus. In this respect it was, perhaps, that hee thought Belofus might haue begunne his raigne somewhat later then Phul: for threecore and eight yeeres would seeme a long time for him to hold a Kingdome, that was no yong man when he tooke possession of it. But how is any whit of his age abated by shortning his raigne, seeing his life reacheth to the end of such a time, as were alone, without adding the time wherein hee was a priuate man, enough for a long liue? Indeepe, eight and fortie yeeres had bene little lesse, at such time as hee joyned with Arbaces; and therefore the addition of twentie yeeres did well deserue that note (which Tornellus aduisedly giues) that if his raigne extended not so farre, then the raigne of such as came after him, occupied the middle time, vnto Nabonassar.

I neither doe reprehend the boldnesse of Tornellus, in conjecturing, nor the modestie of Scaliger and Sethus Calvisius, in forbearing to set downe as warrantable, such things as depend only vpon likelihood. For things, whereof the perfect knowledge is taken away from vs by Antiquitie, must be described in History, as Geographers in their Maps describe those Countries, whereof as yet there is made no true discovery, that is, either by leauing some part blank, or by inserting the Land of Pigmies, Rocks of loadestone, with Head-lands, Bayes, great Rivers, and other particularities, agreeable to common report, though many times controlled by following experience, and found contrarie to truth. Yet indeede the ignorance growing from distance of place, allows not such libertie to a Describer, as that which ariseth from the remedlesse obliuion of consuming time. For it is true that the Poet saith;

— Neg

Neg. feruidis
Pars inclusa caloribus
Aundi, nec Porce finitimum latus, Duratq; sole Nives,
Mercatores abigunt: horrida callidi
Vincent aquora Nautae.

Nor Southerne heate, nor Northerne snow
That freezing to the ground doth grow,
The subject Regions can fence,
And keepe the greedie Marchant thence.
The subtile Shipmen way will find,
Storme neuer so the Seas with winde.

Therefore the fictions (or let them be called conjectures) painted in Maps, doe serue only to mislead such discouersers as rashly beleuee them; drawing vpon the publishers, cyther some angry curses, or well deserued scorne; but to keepe their own credit, they cannot serue alwaies. To which purpose I remember a pretie jest of Don Pedro de Sarmiento, a worthe Spanis Gentleman, who had bene employed by his King in planting a Colonie vpon the Streights of Magellan: for when I asked him, being then my Prisoner, some question about an Island in those Streights, which me thought, might haue done cyther benefit or displeasure to his enterprise, he told me merrily, that it was to be called the Painters wines Island; saying, That whilest the fellow drew that Map, his wife sitting by, desired him to put in one Countrey for her; that she, in imagination, might haue an Island of her owne. But in filling vp the blankes of old Histories, we need not be so scrupulous. For it is not to be feared, that time should runne backward, and by restoring the things themselues to knowledge, make our conjectures appeare ridiculous: What if some good Copie of an ancient Author could be found, shewing (if wee haue it not already) the perfect truth of these vncertainties? would it be more shame to haue beleueed in the meane while, Annius or Tornilius, than to haue beleueed nothing? Here I will not say, that the credit, which we giue to Annius, may chance otherwiles to be giuen to one of those Authors whose names he pretendeth. Let it suffice, that in regard of authority, I had rather trust Scaliger or Tornilius, than Annius; yet him than them, if his assertion bee more probable, and more agreeable to approved Histories than their conjecture, as in this point it seemes to me; it hauing moreouer gotten some credit, by the approbation of many, and those not meanly learned.

To end this tedious disputation; I hold it a sure course in examination of such opinions, as haue once gotten the credit of being generall, so to deale as Pacuvius in Capua did with the multitude, finding them desirous to put all the Senators of the Citic to death. He lockt the Senators vp within the State-houise, and offered their liues to the Peoples mercie; obtaining thus much, that none of them should perish, vntill the Commonaltie had both pronounced him wortheie of death, and elected a better in his place. The condemnation was hastie; for as fast as euery name was read, all the Towne cryed, Let him dye; but the execution required more leisure; for in substituting another, some notorious vice of the Person, or baseness of his condition, or insufficiency of his qualitie, made each new one that was offered, to be rejected: so that finding the worse and lesse choise, the further and the more that they fought, it was finally agreed, that the old should be kept for lack of better.

§. V.

§. V.

Of the Olympiads, and the time when they began.

After this diuision of the Assyrian Empire, followes the inslauration of the Olympian games, by Iphitus, in the raigne of the same King Vezia, and in his one and fiftieth yeare. It is, I know, the generall opinion, that these games were established by Iphitus, in the first of Jachim; yet is not that opinion so generall, but that Authors, waighte enough, haue giuen to them a more early beginning. The truth is, that in fitting those things vnto the sacred Historie, which are found in prophane Authors, wee should not bee too carefull of drawing the Ilebreues to those workes of time, which had no reference to their affaires; it is enough, that setting in due order these beginnings of accompts, we ioine them to matters of Israell and Iuda, where occasion requires.

These Olympian games and exercises of actiuitie, were first instituted by Hercules, who measured the length of the race by his owne foot; by which Pythagoras found out the stature and likely strength of Hercules his bodie. They tocke name, not from the Mountaine Olympus, but from the Citie Olympia, otherwile Pisa, neere vito Elis; where also Iupiters Temple in Elis, famous among the Gracians, and reputed among the wonders of the World, was knowne by the name of the Temple of Iupiter Olympius. These games were exercised from euery fourth yeare compleat, in the plaines of Elis, a Citie of Peloponnesus, neere the Riuer Alpheus.

After the death of Hercules, these meetings were discontinued for many yeares, till Iphitus by aduice from the Oracle of Apollo, re-established them, Lycurgus the Law-giuer then liuing: from which time they were continued by the Gracians, till the raigne of Theodosius the Emperour, according to Cedrenus: other thinke that they were dissolued vnder Constantine the Great.

From this institution, Varro accompted the Gracian times, and their stories, to be certaine: but reckoned all before either doubtfull, or fabulous: and yet Plinie giues little credit to all that is written of Greece, till the raigne of Cyrus, who beganne in the five and fiftieth Olympiad, as Eusebius out of Diodore, Cassior, Polybius, and others hath gathered, in whose time the seven wise Gracians flourished. For Solon had speech with Croesus, and Croesus was ouerthrowne and taken by Cyrus.

Many patient and piercing braines haue laboured to finde out the certaine beginning of these Olympiads, namely, to set them in the true yeare of the World, and the raigne of such and such Kings: but seeing they all differ in the first accompt, that is, of the Worlds yeare, they can hardly jumpe in particulars thereon depending.

Cyrl againk Lalin, and Didymus, beginne the Olympiads the nine and fortieth of 40 Osias, or Azarias.

Eusebius, who is contrarie to himselfe in this reckoning, accompts with those that finde the first Olympiad in the beginning of the foure hundredth and sixth yeare after Troy, yet he telleth vs, that it was in the fiftieth yeare of Vezia, which is (as I finde it) two yeares later.

Eratostratus placeth the first Olympiad foure hundred and seven yeares after Troy, reckoning the yeares that passed betwene; to whom Dionysius Halicarnassensis, Dio-dorus Siculus, Solinus, and many others adhere.

The distance betwene the destruction of Troy, and the first Olympiad, is thus collected by Eratostratus. From the taking of Troy, to the descent of Hercules his Po-steritie into Peloponnesus, were fourescore yeares; thence to the Ionian expedition, three score yeares; from that expedition to the time of Lycurgus his gouernment in Sparta, one hundred fiftie nine; and thence to the first Olympiad, one hundred and eight yeares. In this account the first yeare of the first Olympiad is not included.

But

But vaine labour it were, to seeke the beginning of the Olympiads, by numbring the yeares from the taking of Troy, which is of a date farre more vncertaine. Let it suffice, that by knowing the instauration of these games, to haue bene in the foure hundredth and eight yeare current after Troy, we may reckon backe to the taking of that Citie, setting that, and other accidents, which haue reference thereto, in their proper times. The certaintie of things following the Olympiads, must teach vs how to finde when they began.

To this good vſe, we haue the ensuing yeares, vnto the death of Alexander the Great, thus diuided, by the fame Eratosthenes. From the beginning of the Olympiads, to the passage of Xerxes into Greece, two hundredth fourescore and seuenteen yeares; 10 from thence to the beginning of the Peloponnesian Warre, eight and fortie yeares; forwards to the victorie of Lysander, seuen and twentie; to the battaile of Leuctra, thirtie foure; to the death of Philip King of Macedon, siue and thirtie; and finally to the death of Alexander, twelue. The whole summe ariseth to foure hundred fittie and three yeares; which number he otherwise also collecteth, and it is allowed by the most.

Now for placing the institution of the Olympiads in the one and fiftieth yeare of Vezziab, we haue arguments, grounded vpon that which is certaine, concerning the beginning of Cyrus his raigne, and the death of Alexander; as also vpon the Astronomical calculation of sundrie Eclipses of the Sunne, as of that which happened, when 20 Xerxes set out of Sardis with his Armie to inuade Greece; and of diuers other.

Touching Cyrus, it is generally agreed that his raigne as King, before hee was Lord of the great Monarchie, began the first yeere of the siue and fiftieth Olympiad, and that he raigned thirtie yeeres; they who giue him but twentie nine yeeres of raigne (following Herodotus rather than Tully, Iustine, Eusebius, and others) beginne a yeere later, which comes all to one reckoning. So is the death of Alexander set by all good Writers, in the first yeere of the hundredth and fourteenth Olympiad. This later note of Alexanders death, serues well to leade vs backe to the beginning of Cyrus; as many the like obseruations doe. For if we reckon vpwards from the time of Alexander, we shall finde all to agree with the yeeres of the Olympiads, wherein Cyrus 30 beganne his raigne, either as King, or (taking the word Monarch, to signifie a Lord of many Kingdomes) as a great Monarch. From the beginning of Cyrus, in the first yeere of the siue and fiftieth Olympiad, vnto the end of the Persian Empire, which was in the third of the hundredth and twelfth Olympiad, we finde two hundred and thirtie yeeres compleat: from the beginning of Cyrus his Monarchie, which lasted but seuen yeeres, we finde compleat two hundred and seuen yeeres, which was the continuance of the Persian Empire.

Now therefore seeing that the first yeere of Cyrus his Monarchie (which was the last of the sixtieth Olympiad, and the two hundredth and fortieth yeere from the institution of those games by Iphitus) followed the last of the seuentie yeeres, of the captiuitie of Juda, and desolation of the Land of Israel, manifest it is, that we must reckon backe those seuentie yeeres, and one hundred threescore and ten yeeres more, the last which passed vnder the Kings of Juda, to finde the first of these Olympiads; which by this accompt is the one and fiftieth of Vezziab, as wee haue already noted.

The Eclipses whereof we made mention, serue well to the same purpose. For examples sake, that which was scene when Xerxes mustered his Armie at Sardis, in the two hundredth threescore and seuenth yeere of Nabonassar, being the last of the threescore and fourteenth Olympiad; leades vs backe vnto the beginning of Xerxes, 50 and from him to Cyrus, whence we haue a faire way through the threescore and ten yeeres, vnto the destruction of Ierusalem and so vpwards through the raignes of the last Kings of Juda, to the one and fiftieth yeere of Vezziab.

Thus much may suffice, concerning the time wherein these Olympiads beganne.

To

To tell the great solemnitie of them, and with what exceeding great concourse of all Greece they were celebrated, I hold it a superfluous labour. It is enough to say, that all bodily exercises, or the most of them, were therein practised; as Running, Wrestling, Fighting, and the like. Neither did they onely contend for the Maltre in those feates, whereof there was good vſe, but in running of Chariots, fighting with Whorle-bats, and other the like ancient kinds of exercises, that serued onely for ostentation. Thither also repaired Orators, Poets, Musicians, and all that thought themselves excellent in any laudable victorie, to make triall of their skill. Yea the very Cryers, which proclaimed the victories, contended which of them 10 should get the honour, of hauing plaied the best part.

The Eleans were Presidents of those Games; whose iustice, in pronouncing without partialitie, who did best, is highly commended. As for the rewards giuen to the Victors, they were none other than Garlands of Palme, or Olive, without any other commoditie following, than the reputation. Indeepe there needed no more. For that was held so much, that when Diogenes had scene his three Sonnes crowned for their severall victories in those games, one came running to him with this gratulation: Morere, DIAGORAS, non enim in celum ascensus es; that is, DIE, DIAGORAS, For thou shalt not clime up to heauen: as if there could bee no greater happinesse on earth, than what alreadie had befallen him. In the like sense Horace 20 speaks of these Victors, calling them,

Palma caelestis.

Horat. Carm. l. 4.
Ode 2.

Such as like heavenly weights doe come
With an Eleian Garland home.

Neither was it only the voice of the People, or the songs of Poets, that so highly extolled them, which had wonne these Olympian prizes; but euen graue Historians 30 thought it a matter worthie of their noting. Such was (as Tullie counts it) the vanity of the Greekes, that they esteemed it almost as great an honor, to haue wonne the victorie at Running or Wrestling in those games, as to haue triumphed in Rome for some famous victorie, or conquest of a Prouince.

That these Olympian games were celebrated at the full of the Moone, and vpon the fifteenth day of the Moneth Hecatombion, which doth answere to our Iune; and what meanes they vsed to make the Moneth begin with the new Moone, that the fifteenth day might be the full; I haue shewed in another place. Wherefore I may now returne vnto the Kings of Juda, and leaue the merrie Greekes at their games, whom I shall meeete in more serious employments, when the Persian quarrells draw 40 the bodie of this Historie into the coasts of Ionia and Hellefont.

IOTHAM the Sonne of Vezziab, when hee was siue and twentie yeeres old, and in the second of Pekah King of Israel, was anointed King in Ierusalem, his Father yet liuing. He built an exceeding high Gate to the Temple, of threescore cubits vpright, and therefore called Ophel: besides diuers Cities in the Hills of Juda, and in the Forrests, Towers, and Palaces: heinforced the Ammonites to pay him Tribute, to wit, of Silver an hundredth talents, and of Wheate and Barly two thousand measures: hee raigned fixe and twentie yeeres: of whom Iosephus giues this testimonie: Eiusmodi vero 50 Principi

2 Kings 15: 33.

Princeps hic fuit, et nullum in eo virtutis genus desideres: ut qui Deum adeo pie colerit, hominibus suis adeo iuste prefecerit, ut bene ipsam tantæ sibi curæ esse passus sit, & tamopere anxierit, ut videretur regnum hostibus quidem minime contemnendum, domesticis autem eius incolis atque civibus felix, faustum & fortunatum sua virtute effecit; This was such a Prince, as a man could finde no kinde of vertue wanting in him: hee worshipped God so religiously, hee governed his men so righteously, hee was so provident for the Citie, and did so greatly amplify it, that by his vertue and prowess hee made his whole Kingdome not contemptible to his enemies, but to his Servants, Inhabitants and Citizens, prosperous and happy.

This is all that I finde of Iotham: his raigne was not long, but as happy in all 10 things, as he himselfe was deuout and vertuous.

Auchomenes about this time succeeded Phelisteus in Corinth: after whom, the Corinthians erected Magistrates, which gouerned from yeere to yeere. And yet Pausanias in his second Booke, with Strabo and Plutarch, in many places are of opinion, That Corinth was gouerned by Kings of the race of the Basidae, to the time of Cypselus, who droue them out.

Tiglathpalsar, or Tiglathpelezer, the sonne of Phul, the second of the Babylonians and Assyrians that was of this new race, about this time invaded Israel, while Pekah (who murdered his Master Pekaiab) was King thereof. In which Expedition hee tooke most of the Cities of Nephthali and Galile, with those of Gilead, ouer Jordan, and 20 carried the inhabitants captiue. This Tiglath reigned fise and twentie yeeres, according to Metasthenes. But Krentschmuis findes, that with his sonne Salmansar hee reigned yet two yeeres longer: which yeeres I would not ascribe to the sonne, because the Ages of Nabonsar begins with his single raigne, but reckon them to Tiglathpalsar himselfe, who therewith reigned seuen and twentie yeeres:

Eschylus, the sonne of Agamemnon, about the same time, the twelfth Archon in Athenes, ruled fise and twentie yeeres. Alcmenes gouerned Sparta: after whom, the Elate changed, according to Eufebius: but therein surely Eufebius is mistaken. For Diodore, Plutarch, Pausanias, and others, witnesse the contrarie. Pausanias affirmeth, That Polydorus, a Prince of eminent vertues, succeeded his father, and reigned threecore 30 yeeres, and out-liued the Athenian Warre: which was ended by Theopompus, the sonne of Nicanor, his royall companion.

At this time liued Nahum the Prophet, who fore-told the destruction of the Assyrian Empire, and of the Citie of Ninive; which succeeded (saith Iosephus) a hundred and fiftene yeeres after. The Cities of Cyrene and of Aradus were built at this time, while in Media, Soranus and Medius reigned, being the second and third Kings of those parts.

Of Achaz and his Contemporaries.

As, or Achaz, succeeded vnto Iotham in the seuenteenth yeere of Pekah, the sonne of Remalia: the same being also the last yeere of his fathers raigne, who began in the second of the same Pekah, and reigned sixteene, but not complete yeeres. This Achaz was an Idolater, exceeding all his predecessors. Hee made molten Images for Baalim, and burnt his sonne for sacrifice before the Idoll Moloch, or Saturne, which was represented by a man-like brazen bodie, bearing the head of a Calfe, set vp not farre from Jerusalem, in a Valley 50 shadowed with Woods, called Gehinnom, or Tophet, from whence the word Gehenna is vied for Hell. The children offered, were inclosed within the carkasse of this Idoll, and as the fire encreased, so the sacrificers, with a noyse of Cymbals and other Instruments, filled the ayre, to the ends the pitifull cries of the children might might not be heard: which vnnatural, cruell, and deuillish Oblation, Jeremie the Prophet vehemently reprehendeth, and of which S. Hierome vpon the tenth of Mattheu hath written at large. By the prohibition in Leuiticus the eighteenth, it appeareth that this horrible sinne was ancient: in the twelfth of Deuteronomie, it is called an abomination which God hateth. That it was also practised elsewhere, and by many Nations remote from Iudea, diuers Authors witnesse; as Virgil in the second of his Æneids, — Sanguine placitis, &c. and Silius, — Posere cade Deos. Saturne is said to haue brought this custome into Italie, besides the calling of many soules into the Riuer of Tyber, in stead of which, Hercules commanded, that the 10 waxen Images of men should be throwne in and drowned. The Deuill also taught the Carthaginians this kinde of butcherie, in so much, that when their Citie was besieged, and in distresse, the Priest made them beleeue, that because they had spared their owne children, and had bought and brought vp others to bee offered, that therefore Saturne had stirred vp, and strengthened their Enemies against them: whereupon they presently cauled two hundred of the noblest youths of their Citie to be slaine, and offered to Saturne or Satan, to appeale him: who besides these fore-named Nations had instructed the Rhoians, the people of Crete, and Chios, of Messene of Galatia, with the Massagets, and others, in these seruices: Further, as if hee were not content to destroy the soules of many Nations in Europe, Asia, and Africa, 20 (as Acosta writeth) the Mexicans and other people of America, were brought by the Deuill vnder this fearefull seruitude, in which hee holdeth the Floridians and Virginians at this day.

For the wickednesse of this King Achaz, God stirred vp Rezin of Damascus, and Pekah the Sonne of Remialiah, King of Israel against him, who invaded Iudea, and besieged Ierusalem, but entred it not.

The King of Syria, Rezin, possit himselfe of Elab by the Red Sea, and cast the Iewes out of it, and Pekah laughtered in one day an hundred and twentie thousand Iudeans, of the ablest of the Kingdome, at which time Masfiah, the Sonne of Achaz was also slaine by Ziebhri, with Acriram the Gouernour of his house: and Eleanath 30 the second person vnto the King. Besides all this, two hundred thousand prisoners of women and children, the Israelites led away to Samaria: but by the counsell of the Prophet Obed, they were returned and deliuered backe againe.

As Israel and Aram vexed Iudea on the North; so the Edomites and the Philistines, who euermore attended the ruine of Iudea, entred vpon them from the South; and tooke Bethsencer, Ailon, Gadara, Scho, Tinnah, and Gemso, slew many people, and carried away many prisoners. Whereupon when Achaz saw himselfe enuironed on all sides, and that his Idolls and dead gods gaue him no comfort, hee sent to the Assyrian Tiglathpilsar, to desire some aide from him against the Israelites and Aramites, presenting him with the siluer and gold both of the Temple, and Kings 40 House.

Tiglathpilsar wanted not a good example to follow, in making profit of the troubles that rose in Palestina. His Father hauing lately made himselfe from a Provinciall Lieutenant, King of Babylon and Assyria, had a little before led him the way in to Iudea, invited by Menahem, King of Israel. Wherefore now the Sonne willingly harkened to Achaz, and embraced the aduantage. As for Belshazzar himselfe, he was content to assigne some other time for going through with this enterprife: because (as I haue said before) he was not firmly settled at home, and the Syrian Kings lay directly in his way, who were yet strong both in men and fame. But Tiglath, hauing now, with the treasures of Jerusalem, prepared his Armie, first invaded the Terri- 50 torie of Damascus, wanne the Citie, and killed Rezin, the last of the race of the Adads, who beganne with Dauid, and ended with this Achaz. At Damascus Achaz met Tiglath, and taking thence a patterne of the Altar, sent it to Friah the Priest, commanding the like to be made at Jerusalem, whereon at his returne hee burnt Sacrifice to the Gods of the Syrians. In the meane while Tiglath possit all Basam, and the rest beyond beyond Jordan, which belonged to the Tribe of Ruben, Gad, and Manasse. And then passing the Riuer, he mastered the Cities of Galilee, invaded Ephraim, and the Kingdom of Israel, and made them his Vassalls. And notwithstanding that he was invited and waged by Achaz, yet after the spoile of Israel, he posselt himselfe of the greater part of Juda, and as it seemeth, enforced Achaz to pay him Tribute. For in the second of Kings, the eighteenth, it is written of Ezechias, that he revolted from Assur, or rebelled against him, and therefore was invaded by Senacherib. After Achaz had beheld and borne these miseries, in the end of the sixteenth yeere of his reigne hee died: but was not buried in the Sepulchers of the Kings of Juda.

With Achaz liued Medius, the third Prince in Media, who gouerned fortie yeeres, 10 saith Eusebius: Diodorus and Ctesias finde Anticarmus in stead of this Medius, to haue bene Sosarmus his Succellour, to whom they giue fiftie yeeres.

Tiglath Pileser held the Kingdome of Assyria, all the reigne of Achaz: yet so, that Salmanassar his Sonne may seeme to haue reigned with him some part of the time. 20
For we finde that Achaz did send vnto the Kings of Assyria to helpe him. The Gene more saies, that these Kings of Assur were Tiglath Pileser, and those Kings that were vnder his Dominion. But that hee or his Father had hitherto made such conquests, as might giue him the Lordship ouer other Kings, I doe neither finde any Historie, nor circumstance that proueth. Wherefore I thinke that these Kings of Assur, were Tiglath, and Salmanassar his Sonne, who reigned with his Father, as 20 hath bene said before: though how long hee reigned with his Father, it bee hard to define.

At this time beganne the Ephori in Lacedemon, a hundred and thirtie yeeres after Plutarchus saith. Lycorgus, according to Plutarch. Eusebius makes their beginning farre later, namely, in the fiftenth Olympiad. Of these Ephori, Elalus was the first; Theopompus and Polydorus, being then joynt Kings. These Ephori, chosen euery yeere, were controllers, as well of their Senators as of their Kings, nothing being done without their aduice and consent. For (saith Cicero) they were opposed against their Kings, as the Roman Tribunes against the Consuls. In the time of Achaz died Eschylus, who had ruled in Athens euery since the fiftith yeere of Pezzia. Alcemenon the thirteenth of the Medon 30 tide, or Gouernours of the Athenians (so called of Medon who followed Codrus) succeeded his Father Eschylus, and was the last of these Gouernours: he ruled only two yeeres. For the Athenians changed first from Kings (after Codrus) to Gouernours for life; which ending in this Alcemenon, they erected a Magistrate, whom they termed an Archon, who was a kind of Barghomaister, or Gouernor of their City for ten yeeres.

This alteration Pausanias in his fourth Booke beginnes, in the first yeere of the eight Olympiad. Eusebius and Halicanassus in the first of the seventh Olympiad: at which time indeed, Carpus the first of these, began his ten yeeres rule.

The Kingdome of the Latines gouerned about three hundred yeere by the Syllij, of the race of Aeneas, tooke end the same Achaz time: the foundation of Rome, being 40 laied by Romulus and Remus in the eight yeere of the same King. Codemon builds it the eleuenth of Achaz, Bucholzer in the eighth, as I thinke he should, others somewhat later, and in the reigne of Ezechias. Cicero, Eutropius, Orosius, and others, square the time of the foundation to the third yeere of the sixth Olympiad. But Halicanassus, Solinus Antiochenus, Clemens Alexandrinus, and Eusebius, to the first yeere of the seventh: who seeme not only to me, but to many very learned Chronologers, to haue kept herein the best account.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of the Antiquities of Italy, and foundation of Rome in the time of Achaz.

§. I.

Of the old inhabitants, and of the name of Italy.

ND here to speake of the more ancient times of Italy, and what Nations posselt it before the arriual of Aeneas, the place may seeme to inuite vs: the rather because much fabulous matter hath bene mixed with the truth of those elder plantations. Italy before the fall of Troy, was knowne to the Greekes by diuers names: as first Hesperia, then Ausonia, the one name arising of the Seate, the other of the Ausones, a people inhabiting part of it: one ancient name of it was also Oenotria, which it had of the Oenotri: whom Halicanassus thinks to haue bene the first, that brought a Colonie of Arcadians into that Land. Afterward it was called Italy of Italus: concerning which changes of names, Virgil speaks thus.

Terra antiqua, potens armis, atque ubere glebae:
Oenotry celare viri, nunc fama minores
Italiam dixisse, ductis de nomine, gentem.

There is a Land which Greekes Hesperia name, Ancient, and strong, of much fertilitie.
Oenotrians held it, but we heare by fame,
That by late ages of Posteritie,
Tis from a Captaines name called Italy.

Who this Captaine or King may haue bene, it is very vncertaine. For Virgil 40 speaks no more of him, and the opinions of others are many and repugnant. But like enough it is, that the name which hath continued so long vpon the whole Countrey, and worne out all other denominations, was not at the first accepted without good cause. Therefore to finde out the original of this name, and the first planters of this noble Countrey, Remenius hath made a very painful search, and not improbable conjecture. And first of all he grounds vpon that of Halicanassus, who speaks of a Colonie which the Eleans did leade into Italy, before the name of Italy was giuen to it: Secondly, vpon that of Iustinus, who saith, that Brundisium 100 was a Colonie of the Aetolians: Thirdly, vpon that of Strabo, who affirms the same of Temesa or Tempsa, a Citie of the Brutij in Italy: Lastly, vpon the authoritie of Plinius, who shewes that the Italians did inhabite onely one Region of the Land, whence afterward the name was deriued ouer all. Concerning that which is said of the Eleans and Aetolians, who (as hee shewes) had one original, from them hee brings the name of Italy. For the word Italia, differs in nothing from Aetolia, saue that the first Letter is cast away, which in the Greeke 150 words words is common, and the letter (o) is changed into (a) which change is found in the name of Æthalia an Island neere Italie, peopled by the Ætholians: and the like changes are very familiar in the Æolie Dialect, of which Dialect (being almost proper to the Ætolians) the accent and pronunciation, together with many words little altered, were retained by the Latines, as Dionysius Halicarnassensis, Quintilian, and Priscian the Grammarian teach. Hereunto appertaines that of Iulian the Apostata, who called the Greekes, cousins of the Latines. Also the common original of the Greeke and Latines from Iauan; and the Fable of Ianus, whose Image had two faces, looking East and West, as Greece and Italie lay, and was stamped on Coyns, with a Ship on the other side; all which is, by interpretation, referred to Iauan, 10 father of the Greekes and Latines: who sayling ouer the Ionian Sea, that lyes betwene Ætolia and the Westerne parts of Greece and Italie, planted Colonies in both. Now whereas Reynecius thinks, that the names of Atlas and Italus belonged both to one man, and thereto applies that of Berosus, who called Cethim, Italus; though it may seeme strengthened by the marriage of Dardanus, whilst he abode in Italie with Electra, the daughter of Atlas, yet is it by arguments (in my valuation) greater and stronger, easily disproued. For they who make mention of Atlas, place him before the time of Moses; and if Atlas were Cethim, or Rittim, then was he the sonne of Iauan, and nephew of Iapheth, the eldest sonne of Noah: which antiquity farre exceeds the name of Italie, that began after the departure of Hercules: 20 out of the Countrey, not long before the Warre of Troy.

Likewise Virgil, who speaks of Atlas, and of Dardanus his marriage with Electra, hath nothing of his meeting with her in Italie; but calleth Electra and her sister Maia (poetically) daughters of the Mountaine Atlas in Africa, naming Italm among the Kings of the Aborigines; which he would not haue done, had Atlas and Italus bene one person.

As for the authoritie of Berosus in this case, wee neede the lesse to regard it, for that Reynecius himselfe, whose conjectures are more to be valued then the dreames wherewith Annius hath filled Berosus, holds it but a figment.

That the name of Italie began long after Atlas, it appears by the Verses of Virgil last rehearfed, wherein hee would not haue said, ——— Nunc fama minores 30 Italiam dixisse ducis de nomine gentem, had that name bene heard of ere Dardanus left the Countrey. But seeing that, when Hercules, who died a few yeeres before the Warre of Troy, had left in Italie a Colonie of the Eleans (who in a manner were one and the same Nation with the Ætolians, as Strabo, Herodotus, and Pausanias teach) then the name of Italie began: and seeing Virgil makes mention of Italus among the Italian Kings, it were no great boldnesse to say, that Italus was Commander of these Eleans. For though I remember not, that I haue read of any such Greeke as was named Italus; yet the name of Ætolus, written in Greeke Ætolus, was very famous both among the Ætolians, and among the Eleans, he being sonne of a 40 King of Elis, and founder of the Ætolian Kingdome. Neither is it more hard to deuise the name of Italus from Ætolus, then Italia from Ætolia. So may Virgil's authoritie stand well with the collections of Reynecius; the name of Italie being taken both from a Captaine, and from the Nation, of which he and his people were.

¶ II. 50

¶ II.

Of the Aborigines, and other Inhabitants of Latium, and of the reason of the names of Latini and Latium.

IN Italie the Latines and Hetrurians were most famous; the Hetrurians hauing held the greatest part of it vnder their subiection; and the Latines by the vertue and felicitie of the Romans, who were a branch of them, subduing all Italie, and in few ages whatsoever Nation was knowne in Europe: together with all the Westerne parts of Asia, and 10 North of Africa.

The Region called Latium, was first inhabited by the Aborigines, whom Halicarnassensis, Varro, and Reynecius (following them) thinke to haue bene Acadians: and this name of Aborigines (to omit other significations that are trained) imports as much as originall, or native of the place, which they possessed: which title the Acadians are knowne in vaunting manner to haue alwaies vsurped, fetching their antiquitie from beyond the Moone; because indeede, neither were the inhabitants of Peloponnesus enforced to forsake their seates so oft as other Greekes were, who dwelt without that halfe Island, neither had the Acadians so vnure a dwelling as the rest of the Peloponnesians, because their Countrey was lesse fruitfull in land, 20 mountainous, and hard of access, and they themselves as in such places commonly are found) very warlikemen. Some of these therefore hauing occupied a great part of Latium, and held it long, did according to the Acadian manner, stile themselves Aborigines, in that language, which either their new Seate, or their Neighbours thereby had taught them. How it might bee that the Acadians who dwelt somewhat farre from Sea, and are alwaies noted as vnapt men to proue good Mariners, should haue bene Authors of new discoueries, were a question not easie to be answered, were it not so, that both fruitfullnesse of children, in which those ages abounded, inforced the superfluous companie to seeke another seat, and that some 30 expeditions of the Acadians, as especially that of Euaender, into the same parts of Italie, are generally acknowledged.

After the Aborigines, were the Pelagians, an ancient Nation, who sometimes gaue name to all Greece: but their antiquities are long since dead, for lack of good records. Neither was their glorie such in Italie, as could long sustaine the name of their owne Tribe; for they were in short space accounted one people with the former inhabitants. The Sicani, Ausones, Aurunci, Rutuli, and other people, did in ages following disturb the peace of Latium, which by Saturne was brought to some ciuilitie; and he therefore canonized as a god.

This Saturne S. Angustine calleth Stereos or Sterculius, others terme him Stercutius, and say, that hee taught the people to dung their grounds. That Latium tooke his name of Saturne, because he did later, that is, lie hidden there, when he fled from Jupiter, it is a questionlesse fable. For as in Heathenish superstition, it was great vanitie to thinke that any thing could be hidden from God, or that there were many gods of whom one fled from another; so in the truth of Historie, it is well knowne, that no King reigning in those parts was so mightie, that it should be hard to finde one Countrey or another, wherein a man might be safe from his pursuit. And yet, as most fables and poetical fictions, were occasioned by some ancient truth, which 40 either by ambiguity of speech or some allusion, they did mainly and darkly expresse (for so they fained a passage ouer a Riuer in Hell, because death is a passage to another life, and because this passage is hatefull, lamentable, and painefull, therefore they named the Riuer Styx of Hate, Cocytus of Lamentation, and Acheron of Pain: so also because men are stonie-hearted, and because the Greeke Λαοι people, and Λαοι stones, are neere in sound, therefore they fained in the time of Dionysius stones conuerted into men, as at other times men into stones) in like manner it may 50 be be, that the originall of Saturnus hiding himselfe, was some allusion to that old opinion of the wisest of the Heathen, that the true God was ignotus Deus, as it is noted in the Aëtis; whence also Elyas of the true God saies, Tu Deus abscondens te. For it can not be in vaine, that the word Saturnus should also haue this very signification, if it bee deriued (as some thinke) from the Hebrew Satur, which is to hide: Howbeit I denie not, but that the originall of this word, Latium, ought rather to be sought elsewhere.

Reynecius doth conjecture that the Ceteans, who descended of Cethim, the Sonne of Iauan, were the men who gaue the name to Latium. For these Ceteans are remembered by Homer as aiders of the Troians in their Warre. Strabo interpreting the place of Homer, calls them subjects to the Crowne of Troy. Hereupon Reynecius gathers, that their abode was in Asia viz. in agro Elaticeo; in the Elatian Territories, which agreeeth with Strabo. Of a Citie which the Æolians held in Asia, called Elaa, or Elate, Pausanias makes mention: Stephanus calls it Cidamis, or (according to the Greeke writing) Cidanis, which name last rehearsed hath a very neere sound to Cethim, Citim, or Cithim; the Greeke Letter (ϑ) hauing (as many teach) a pronunciation very like to (th) differing only in the strength or weakenesse of vtterance, which is found betwene many English words written with the same letters. Wherefore that these Ceteans being descended of Cethim, Cittim, or Kittim, the Sonne of Iauan, who was Progenitor of the Greekes, might very well take a denomination from the Citie, and Region, which they inhabited, and from thence be called Elatier, or Elaties, it is very likely, considering that among the Aradians, Phocians, Æolians, and Elaens, who all were of the Æolique Tribe, are found the names of the Mountaine Elaus, the Hauen Elaus, the people Elaus, the Citie Elaus, Elate, and Elateia, of which last it were somewhat harsh in the Latine tongue to call the Inhabitants by any other name then Elatini, from whence Latini may come. Now wheteas both the Ceteans and Aradians, had their originall from Cethim, it is nothing vnlikely, that agreeing in language and similitude of names, they might neuertheless differ in sound and pronunciation of one and the same word. So that as he is by many called Sabinus, to whom some (deriuing the Sabines from him) giue the name of Sabinus: in the like manner might he whom the Aradians would call Elaus (of which name they had a Prince that founded the Citie Elateia) bee named of the Ceteans Latinius. Reynecius pursuing this likelihood, thinks, that when Euryphilus, Lord of the Ceteans, being the Sonne of Telephus, whom Hercules begat vpon Anga, the Daughter of Aleu King of Aradia, was slaine by Achilles in the Troian Warre: then did Telephus, brother to Euryphilus, conduct the Ceteans, who (fearing what euill might befall themselves by the Greekes, if the affaires of Troy should goe ill) passed into that part of Italie, where the Aradians were planted by Oenotrus. And Reynecius farther thinks, that Telephus being the more gracious among the Oenotrian Aradians, by the memorie of his Grand-mother Anga, an Aradian Ladie, was well contented to take an Aradian name, and to be called Elaus, which in the dialect and pronunciation either of the Ceteans, or of the Oenotrians, was first Elatinus, and then Latinus: That this name of Elaus may haue been taken or imposed by the Aradians, it is the more easie to be thought, for that there were then two Families, the one of Aphides, the other of Elaus, who were Sonnes of Arca King of Aradia, which gaue name to the Countrie. and betwene these two Families the succession in that Kingdome did passe, almost interchangeably for many ages, till at the end of the Troian warre it fell into the hand of Hippobolus of the race of Elaus, in whose Posteritie it continued vntill the last. Again, the name Latinus, hauing a deriuatiue sound, agrees the better with the supposition of such an accident. This is the conjecture of Reynecius, which if he made ouer-boldly, yet others may follow it with the lesse re-prooffe, considering that it is not easie to finde either an apparent truth, or faire probability among these disagreeing Authors, which haue written the originals of Latium.

¶ III.

Of the ancient Kings of the Latines vntill Æneas his coming.

THe Kings which reigned in Latium before the arrival of Æneas, were, Saturnus, Picus, Faunus, and Latinius. Of Saturnus there is nothing remembered, saue what is mentioned alreadie, and many fables of the Greekes, which whether they be applicable to this man, it is for him to judge, who shall be able to determine, whether this were the Saturnus of the Greekes, called by them Κρονος, or some other, stiled Saturnus by the Abrigines. For the age wherein hee liued, may very well admit him to haue bene the same: but the names of Stercor, and Stercorius (for it may be, this name was not borrowed from the skill which hee taught the people, but rather the soile which they laied on their grounds, had that appellation from him) doe rather make him seeme some other man.

Of Picus it is said, that he was a good Horse-man. The fable of his being changed into a Bird, which we call a Pie, may well seeme (as it is interpreted) to haue growne from the skill which he had in sooth-saying, or diuination, by the flight and chattering of Fowles. Faunus, the Sonne of Picus, reigned after his Father. Hee gaue to Eumolpus the Aradian (who hauing slaine by mischance his Father Echemus King of Aradia, fled into Italie) the waste grounds on which Rome was afterward built.

Fauna, called Catua, the sister of Faunus, was also his Wife, as all Historians agree; shee was held a Prophetesse, and highly commended for her chastitie; which praise in her must needs haue bene much blemished by her marriage, if shee being meercely incestuous.

It is not mentioned that Faunus had by his sister any child, neither doe we reade of any other Wife which he had, saue only that Purphylus giues vnto him Latinius as his Sonne, by a Nymph, called Marica.

But who this Marica was it is not found, saue onely that her abode was about the Riuer Liris neere Minturne.

Of the name Latinius, there are by Pomponius Sabinus recounted foure: one, the Sonne of Faunus, another of Hercules, a third of Vlysses by Circe, the fourth of Telemachus. Suidas takes notice onely of the second, of whom hee saith, that his name was Telephus, and the people anciently named the Citie, were from his surname called Latini. This agrees in effect with the opinion of Reynecius, the difference consisting almost in this only, that Suidas calls Telephus, the Sonne of Hercules, whereas Reynecius makes him his Nephew, by a sonne of the same name. This Latinius hauing obtained the succession in that Kingdome after Faunus, did promise his only Daughter and Heire Launia, to Turnus the sonne of Venilia, who was sister to Amata Latinius his Wife.

But when Æneas arrived in those parts with fiftene ships, or perhaps fewer, wherein might bee imbarcked according to the rate which Thucydides allowes to the Vessells then vsed, about one thousand & two hundred men: then Latinius finding that it would stand best with his assurance, to make alliance with the Troian, and moued with the great reputation of Æneas, which himselfe had heard of in the Warre of Troy, gaue his Daughter to him, breaking off the former appointment with Turnus, who incensed herewith, fought to auenge himselfe by warre: which was soone ended with his owne death.

Of Amata the Wife of Latinius, it is very certaine, that were shee an Italian, shee could not haue borne a Daughter marriageable at the arrival of Æneas; vntill we should wholly follow Suidas, and rather giue the conduct of the Cetei into Italie, to Telephus the Father, than to his Sonne, who serued in the last yeere of the Troian Warre. But Reynecius holds her an Asiatique, and thinks withall, that Launia was borne before Telephus came into Italie. That this name Amata, by which Virgil and Halicarinaſſeus call her, was not proper, but rather a surname, it may seeme by Varro; who calleth her Palatia: which name very well might bee deriued from the Greeke name Pallas, Amata, which signifieth beloued, or deare, was the name by which the High Priest called euery Virgin, whom hee tooke to serue as a Nunne of Vesta; wherefore it is the more easily to be thought a surname, howsoever Virgil discourse of her and Pentia her sister.

Lavinia, the daughter of Latinus, being giuen in marriage to Aeneas, the Kingdome of Latium, or the greater part of that Countrie, was established in that race: wherein it continued vntill it was ouer-growne by the might and greatnesse of the Romans. 10

Of AENEAS, and of the Kings and Governours of Alba.

AENEAS himselfe being of the royall blood of Troy, had the command of the Dardanians: hee was a valiant man, very rich, and highly honoured among the Troians. By his wife Cressa, the daughter of Priamus, hee had a sonne called Ascanius; whose surname was Iulus, hauing before the ruine of Troy (as Virgil notes) bene furnished Ius. But when Aeneas was dead, his wife Lavinia, the daughter of Latinus, being great with child by him, and fearing the power of this Ascanius, fled into the Woods, where she was deliuered of a sonne, called thereupon Sylvius, and surname Posthumus, because hee was borne after his fathers Funerall. This flight of Lavinia was so euill taken by the people, that Ascanius procured her returne, entreated her honourably, and vsing her as a Queene, did foster her young sonne, his halfe-brother Sylvius. Yet afterwards, whether to avoid all occasions of disagreement, or delighted with the situation of the place; Ascanius leauing to his mother in law the Citie Lavinium, which Aeneas had built, and called after his new wiues name, founded the Citie Alba Longa, and therein reigned. The time of his raigne was, according to some, eight and twentie yeeres: Virgil giues him thirtie; others five and thirtie, and eight and thirtie. After his decesse, there arose contention betweene Sylvius, the sonne of Aeneas, and Iulus the sonne of Ascanius, about the Kingdome: but the people inclining to the sonne of Lavinia, Iulus was contented to hold the Priesthood, which he and his race enjoyed, leauing the Kingdome to Sylvius Posthumus, whose posteritie were afterward called Sylvij.

The

The most of these Kings liued in peace, and did little or nothing worthe of remembrance.

Latinus founded many Townes in the borders of Latium: who standing much vpon the honour of their originall, grew thereby to be called Prisci Latini. Of Tiberinus some thinke that the Riuer Tiber had name, being formerly called Albula: but Virgil giues it that denomination of another called Tiberis, before the coming of Aeneas into Italie. The Mountaine Auentinus had name (as many write) from Auentinus King of the Albanes, who was buried therein: but Virgil hath it otherwise. Iulus, the brother of Auentinus, is named by Enchirius as father of another Iulius, and grandfather of Iulius Proculus; who leauing Alba, dwelt with Romulus in Rome. Numitor, the elder sonne of Procas, was decried of the Kingdome by his brother Amulius; by whom also his sonne, Agellus was slaine, and Ilia his daughter made a Nunne of Vesta, that thereby the issue of Numitor might be cut off. But she conceived two sonnes, eyther by her vnkle Amulius, as some thinke; or by Mars, as the Poets saie; or perhaps by some man of warre. Both the children their vnkle commanded to be drowned, and the mother buried quicke, according to the Law; which so ordained, when the Vestall Virgins brake their chastitie. Whether it was so, that the mother was pardoned at the entreatie of Antio, the daughter of Amulius, or punished as the Law required (for Authors herein doe varie) it is agreed by all, that the two children were preferred, who afterward reuenged the crueltie of their vnkle, with the slaughter of him and all his, and restored Numitor their grandfather to the Kingdome: wherein how long hee reigned, I find not, neyther is it greatly materiall to know; for as much as the Estates of Alba and of Latium were presently eclipsed by the swift increase of Rome; vpon which the computation of Time following (as farre as concerns the things of Italie) is dependant. After the death of Numitor, the Kingdome of Alba ceased; for Numitor left no male issue, Romulus chose rather to lue in Rome; and of the Line of Sylvius none else remained. So the Albanes were gouerned by Magistrates; of whom onely two Dictators are mentioned, namely Cains Clutius, who in the dayes of Tullus Hostilius, King of the Romans, making Warre vpon Rome, dyed in the Campe; and Metius Sufsetius, the successor of Clutius, who surrendred the Estate of Alba vnto the Romans, hauing committed the hazard of both Signories to the successe of three men of each side, who decided the quarrell by Combat in which, the three brethren Horatij, the Champions of the Romans, preuailed against the Curatij, Champions of the Albanes. After this Combat, when Metius (following Tullus Hostilius with the Albane forces against the Vientes and Fidenates) withdrew his Companies out of the battaile, hoping thereby to leaue the Romans to such an ouerthrow, as might make them weak enough for the Albanes to deale with Tullus, who notwithstanding this falsehoode, obtained the victorie, did reward Metius with a cruell death, causing him to be ryed to two Chariots, and so torne in pieces. Then was Alba destroyed and the Citizens carried to Rome, where they were made free Denizens, the noble Families being made Patritians; among which were the Iulij: of whom C. Iulius Caesar being descended, not onely gloried in his ancient, royall, and forgotten pedigree, in full assembly of the Romans, then gouerned by a free Estate of the People: but by his rare industrie, valour, and iudgement, obtained the Soueraignie of the Roman Empire (much by him enlarged) to himselfe and his posteritie; whereby the name of Aeneas, and honour of the Troian and Alban Race, was so reuiued, that seldom, if cuer, any one Family hath attained to a proportionable height of glorie.

of the beginning of Rome, and of ROMULVS birth and death.

Rome, which deuoured the Alban Kingdome, I may here best shew the beginnings, which (though somewhat vncertaine) depend much vpon the birth and education of Romulus; the grand-child of Nunnius; the last that reigned in Alba. For how not onely the bordering people, but all Nations betwene Euphrates and the Ocean were broken in peeces by the yron teeth of this fourth Beast, it is not to bee described in one place, hauing bene the worke of many Ages; whereof I now doe handle onely the first, as incident vnto the discourse preceding. Q. Fabius Piccor, Portius Cato, Calpurnius Piso, Sempronius, and others, seeke to deriue the Romans from Ianus; but Herodotus, Marcellus, and many others of equall credit, giue the Gracians for their ancestors; and as Sirach reporteth in his fifth Booke; CAECILIUS rerum Romanorum scriptor eo argumentis colligit, Romanum à Græciæ esse conditum, quod Romani Græco ritu, antiquo instituto HERCULEM sacrum faciunt, matrem quoque EVANDRI venerantur Romanum; CAECILIUS (saith he) a Romane Historiographer, doth by this argument gather, that Rome was built by the Greekes, because the Romanes, after Greekish fashion, by ancient Or dinance doe sacrifice to HERCULES: the Romanes also worship the mother of EVANDER.

Plutarch in the life of Romulus remembers many founders of that Citie: as Romulus the sonne of Visseus and Circæ; Romus the sonne of Emathion, whom Diomedes sent thither from Troy; or that one Romus, a Tyrant of the Latines, who draue the Tuscan out of that Countrey, built it. Solinus bestowes the honour of building Rome vpon Euaner, saying: That it was beforetimes called Valentia. Heraclides giues the denomination to Aspasia Ladie, brought thither by the Gracians: others say, That it was anciently called Febria, after the name of Februa, the mother of Mars; witnesse Saint Augustine in his third Booke de Ciuitate Dei. But Liuius will haue it to be the worke of Romulus, euen from the foundation: of whom and his 30 confors Lucretius to a Roman Citizen vaunting of their originall, answered in these Verbes:

Maiorum quisquis primus fuit ille tuorum, Aut pastor fuit, aut illud quod dicere nolo.*

Yet though thou fetch thy pedigree so farre;
Thy first Progenitor, who ere he were,
Some Shepherd was, or else, that Ile forbear.
meaning eyther a Shepherd, or a Theefe.

Now of Romulus begetting, of his education and preseruatiō, it is said, That he had Rhea for his mother, and Mars was suppoled to be his father; that he was nursd by a Wolfe, found and taken away by Fausula, a Shepheards wife. The same vnnaturall nursing had Cyrus, the same incredible fostering had Semiramis; the one by a Bitch, the other by Birds. But, as Plutarch sayth, it is like enough that Amulius came couered with armour to Rhea, the mother of Romulus, when he begat her with child: and therein it seemeth to mee that hee might haue two purposes; the one, to destroy her, because she was the daughter and heire of his elder brother, from whom he injuriously held the Kingdome; the other to satisfie his appetite, because shee was faire and goodly. For seee being made a Nunne of the Goddesse Vesta, it was death in her, by the Law, to breake her chastitie. I also find in Fauschus his Antiquitez de Gaule, that Merowé, King of the Franks, was begotten by a Monster of the Sea: but Fauschus sayes, Let them beleene it that list; il le croira qui voudra:

also of Alexander, and of Scipio African, there are poetical inuentions: but to answer these imaginations in generall, it is true, that in those times; when the World was full of this barbarous Idolatry, and when there were as many gods as there were Kings, or passions of the minde, or as there were of vices and vertues; then did many women greatly borne, couer such slips as they made, by pretelling to bee forced by more then humane power: so did Oenone confesse to Paris, that shee had bene rauished by Apollo. And Anchises boasted that hee had knowne Venus. But Ihea was made with child by some man of Warre, or other, and therefore called Mars, the God of battell, according to the sense of the time, Oenone was overcome by a strong wit, and by such a one as had those properties ascribed to Apollo. The Mother of Meauée might fancie a Sea Captaine to be gotten with yong by such a one: as the Daughter of Inachus fancied, according to Herodotus, Aeneas was a bastard and begotten vpon some faire Harlot, called for her beautie Venus, and was therefore the child of lust, which is Venus. Romulus was nursd by a Wolfe, which was Lupa, or Lupina, for the Curtelans in those dayes were called Wolfes, quæ nunc (sayth HALICARNASSAEVS) honestiori vocabulo amica appellantur; Which are now by an honest name called friends. It is also written, that Romulus was in the end of his life taken vp into heauen, or rather out of the world by his Father Mars, in a great storme of thunder, and lightning: so was it said that Aeneas vanished away by the Riuer Numicus: but thereof Liuius also speaketh modestly; for he reherbeth the other opinion, that the storme was the furie of the Senators, but seemeth to adhere partially to this taking vp; and many Authours agree, that there was an vnnaturall darkness, both at his birth and at his death, and that hee might bee slaine by thunder or lightning, it is not vnlikely. For the Emperour Anastolus was slaine with lightning, so was Strabo the Father of Pompey slaine with a thunder-bolt: so Carus the Emperour (who succeeded Probus) whilst he lodged with his Armie vpon the Riuer Tigris, was there slaine with lightning. But a Mars of the same kinde might end him that began him; for he was begotten by a man of warre, and by violence destroyed. And that he dyed by violence (which definie followed most of the Roman Emperours) it appeareth by Tarquinius Superbus: who was but the seuenth King after him: who when hee had murdered his Father-in-law, commanded that hee should not bee buried, for (saith he) Romulus himselfe dyed and was not buried. But let Halicarnassæus end this dispute; whose words are these: They (saith he) who draw nereest to the truth, say that he was slaine by his owne Citizens; and that his crueltie in punishments of offenders, together with his arrogancie, were the cause of his slaughter. For it is reported, that both when his mother was vanished, whether by some man, or by a God, the whole body of the Sunne was eclipsed, and all the earth couered with darkness like vnto night, and that the same did happen at his death.

Such were the birth and death of Romulus: whose life historieth by Plutarch, doth containe (besides what is here already spoken of him) the conquest of a few myles which had soone bene forgotten, if the Roman greatnesse built vpon that foundation, had not giuen it memorie in all ages following, euen vnto this day. A valiant man hee was, very strong of bodie, patient of traueil, and temperate in dyet, as forbeareing the vse of wine and delicacies: but his raging ambition he knew not how to temper, which caused him to slay his brother, and neglect reuenge of the death of Tatius, his companion in the Kingdome, that he himselfe might bee Lord alone in those narrow Territories. He reigned euen and thirtie yecres: first alone, then with Tatius, and after his death single, till he was slaine, as is already shewed: after which time the Soueraigntie fell into the hands of Numa, a man to him vnknowne, and more Priest-like than King-like: wherein Rome it selfe in her later times hath somewhat resembled this King. For hauing long bene sole Gouvernesse till Constantinople shared with her: afterwards, when as the Greeke Emperour was cruell by forraigne enemies, and the Latines dispoyle of Imperiall power, the fell into the subjection of a Prelate, swelling by degrees from the Sheepe-hooke to the Sword, & therewith victorious to excessive magnificence, from whence by the same degrees it fell, being driven from luxurie to defensive armes, and therein hauing bin vnfortunate, at length betakes her selfe againe to the Croisers staffe.

And thus much of Rome in this place by occasion of the Storie of the times of King Ahaz, during whose raigne in Iurie, the foundations of this famous Citie were laied.

CHAP. XXV.

Of EZEKIA, and his Contemporaries.

§. I.

Of the beginning of EZECHIAS, and of the agreeing of PTOLOMIAS, NABONASSAR, NABOPOLASSAR and MARDOCEN-PADVS, with the historie of the Bible.

THE first yeere of Ahaz his Raigne was confounded with the last of his father Iotham, so was the later end of his sixtene yeeres taken vp in the three first of Ezekias his Sonne. This appears by the Raigne of Hosea, ouer Israel, which beganne in the twelfth of Ahaz, and therefore the third thereof was concurrent with Ahaz his foureteenth. But the third of Hosea was the first of Ezekia, so it followes, that Ezekia beganne to raigne in his Fathers foureteenth yeere. Like enough it is, that the third yeere of Hosea, the same being the fourteenth of Ahaz, was almost spent when Ezekia beganne, and so the fifteenth yeere of Ahaz may haue beene concurrent, for the most part, with the first of Ezekia.

By supposing that Hosea beganne his Kingdome, when the twelfth yeere of Ahaz was almost compleat, some would find the means how to disioyne the first of Ezekia from the fifteenth of Ahaz, placing him yet one yeere later, of which yeere, Ahaz may perhaps haue liued not many dayes. But seeing that the foureteenth and fifteenth yeeres of Ezekia, may not be removed out of their places; it is vaine labour to alter the first yeere.

In the foureteenth of EZEKIA, SENACHERIS invading Juda, and the Countries adioyning, lost his Armie by a miraculous stroke from Heauen, fled home, and was slaine. The yeere following it was that God added fifteene yeeres to the life of Ezekia, when he had already reigned fouretee of his nine and twentie: and the same yeere was that miracle scene of the Sunnes going backe; of which wonder (as I heare) one Bartholomew Scultet, who is much commended for skill in Astronomy, hath by calculation found the very day which answered vnto the twentie fifth of April, in the Iulian yeere, being then Thursday. I haue not seene any workes of Scultet; but surely to find a motion so irregular and miraculous, it is necessarie that he produce some record of obseruation made at such a time. Howsoeuer it bee, the fifteenth yeere of Ezekia is agreed vpon; and therefore wee may not alter the first. As for that saying, which is vsuall in the like cases, that AHAZ slept with his Fathers, and EZEKIA his Sonne reigned in his stead, it doth no more proue that Ezekia reigned not with his Father, than the like saying doth inferre the like at the death of Iehosaphat, saphat, and succession of Iehoram; whereof, as concerning the beginning of the Sonne to raigne whilest his Father liued, we haue already said enough.

Of this godly King Ezekias, we finde, that his very beginning returned his deuotion and zeale. For whether it were so, that his vnfortunate and vngracious Father (who had out-worne his reputation) gaue way to his Sonnes proceedings, which perhaps it lay not in him to hinder; or whether (as I rather thinke) the first yeere and first month of his raigne, wherein Ezekias opened the doores of the Temple, were to be vnderstood as the beginning of his sole gouernement; we plainly finde it to haue beene his first worke, that he opened the doores of the house of the Lord.

which Ahaz had shut vp, cleansed the Citie and Kingdome of the Idols, restored the Priests to their offices, and elites, commanded the Sacrifices to bee offered which had beene for many yeeres neglected, and brake downe the brazen Serpent of Moses, because the people burnt incense before it, and he called it Achubstan, which signifieth a lump of brass. He did also celebrate the Passe-ouer with great magnificence, inuiting thereunto the Israelites of the ten Tribes: many there were, even out of those Tribes, that came vnto Ierusalem, to this feast. But the generall multitude of Israel did laugh the Messengers of Ezekia to scorn.

It was not long ere they that scorned to solemnize the memorials of their deliuerance out of the Egyptian seruitude, fell into a new seruitude, out of which they neuer were deliuered. For in the fourth of Ezekia his raigne, Salmanassar the Sonne of Tiglath, the Sonne of Belochus, hearing that Hosea King of Israel had practised with Soc King of Egypt against him, invaded Israel, besieged Samarita, and in the third yeere (after the Inhabitants had endured all sorts of miseries) forced it, and carried thence the ten Idolatrous Tribes into Assyria and Media: among whom Tobia and his Sonne of the same name, with Anna his Wife, were sent to Antioch, in whose Seates and Places the Assyrians sent strangers of other Nations, and among them many of the ancient Enemies of the Israelites, as those of Cutha, Ana, Hamab, and Sphenaim, besides Babylonians: whose Places and Nations I haue formerly described in the Treatise of the Holy Land.

These later Assyrian Kings, and the Persians, which followed them, are the first, of whom wee finde mention made both in Prophane and Sacred bookes. These therefore serue most aptly to ioyn the times of the old World, (whereof none but the Prophets haue written otherwise than fabulously) with the Ages following that were better knowne, and described in course of Historie. True it is, that of Cyrus and some other Persians, we finde in the Bible the same names by which other Authors haue recorded them: but of Phul and Salmanassar, with other Assyrian, Chaldean Kings, diuersitie of name hath bred question of the persons. Therefore, whereas the Scriptures doe speake of Salmanassar, King of Assur, who reigned in the time of Ahaz, and Ezekia, Kings of Iuda, and of Hosea King of Israel, whom he carried into captiuitie: and whereas Ptolomie makes mention of Nabonassar, speaking precisely of the time wherein he liued; it is very pertinent to shew, that Salmanassar and Nabonassar were one and the same man. The like reason also requirereth, that it bee shewed of Nebuchadnezzar, that hee was the same, whom Ptolomie calleth Nabopolassar.

Of both these points Bucholers hath well collected sufficient prooffe from the exact calculations of sundrie good Mathematicians. For by them it appears, that betwene Nabonassar and the birth of Christ, there passed seuen hundred fortie and sixe yeeres: at which distance of time the raigne of Salmanassar was. One great prooffe hereof is this, which the same Bucholers is alleageth out of Erasmus Reinholdus, in the Prutenick Tables. Mardocempadus King of Babylon (whom Ptolomie, speaking of three Eclipses of the Moone, which were in his time, doth mention) was the same whom the Scriptures call Merodach, who sent Embassadors to Ezekia, King of Juda. So that if wee reckon backwards to the difference of time, betwene Merodach and Salmanassar, we shall finde it the same which is betwene Mardocempadus and Nabonassar.

Nabonassar. Likewise Euclides doth shew, that whereas from the destruction of Samarita, to the deuastation of Ierusalem, in the nineteenth of Nabuchadnessar, we collect out of the Scriptures, the distance of one hundred thirtie and three yeeres: the selfe same distance of time is found in Ptolome, betwene Nabonassar and Nabopolassar. For, whereas Ptolome seemes to differ from this account, making Nabonassar more ancient by an hundred and fortie yeeres, than the destruction of Ierusalem, wee are to vnderstand that he took Samarita in the eighth yeere of his raigne; so that the seuen foregoing yeeres added to these one hundred thirtie and three, make the accounts of the Scriptures fall euery way with that of Ptolome. Ptolome's computation is, that from the first of Nabonassar, to the fifth of Nabopolassar, there passed one hundred twentie and seuen yeeres. Now it wee adde to these one hundred twentie seuen, the thirteene ensuing of Nabuchadnessar's yeeres, before the Citie and Temple were destroyed, we haue the summe of one hundred and fortie yeeres. In so plaine a case more proofes are needlesse, though many are brought, of which this may serue for all, that Ptolome placeth the first of Nabopolassar, one hundred twentie and two yeeres, after the first of Nabonassar, which agreeth exactly with the Scriptures. To these notes are added the content of all Mathematicians: which in account of times I hold more sure than the authority of any Historie; and therefore I thinke it follie to make doubt, whereas Historians and Mathematicall obseruations doe so thoroughly concur.

Yet forasmuch as that argument of the learned Scaliger doth rest vnanswered, whereby he proueth Babylon the Father of Meroch, to haue bene this Nabonassar, I will not spare to loose a word or two in giuing the Reader satisfaction herein. It is true, that the next obseruations of the heauenly Bodies, which Ptolome recorded, after the time of Nabonassar, were in the raigne of Mardocempadus; the second yeere of whose raigne is, according to Ptolome, concurrent in part with the twentie seuen of Nabonassar. For the second of three ancient Eclipses which hee calculates, being in the second yeere of Mardocempadus, was from the beginning of Nabonassar twentie seuen yeeres, seuentene daies, and eleuen houres: the account from Nabonassar, beginning at high-noon the first day of the Egyptian moneth Thoth, then answering to the twentie sixt of February; and this Eclipse being fiftie minutes before mid-night, on the eighteenth day of that Moneth, when the first day thereof agreed with the nineteenth of February; so that the difference of time betwene the two Kings Nabonassar and Mardocempadus, is noted by Ptolome, according to the Egyptian yeeres. But how does this proue, that Mardocempadus or Meroch, was the Sonne of Nabonassar? yea, how doth it proue, that he was his next Successor, or any way of his Linage? It was enough to satisfie me, in this argument, that Scaliger himselfe did afterwards beleue Mardocempadus to haue bene rather the Nephew, than the Sonne of Babylon, or Nabonassar. For if he might be either the Nephew, or the Sonne, hee might perhaps be neither the one, nor the other. But because our Countrey-man Lydiate hath reprehended Scaliger for changing his opinion; and that both Tornilius, who follows Scaliger herein, and Seruius Calpurnius, who hath drawne into forme of Chronologie, that learned worke, De Emendatione Temporum, doe hold vp the same assertion, confounding Babylon with Nabonassar: I haue taken the paines to search, as farre as my leisure and diligence could reach, after any sentence that might proue the Kindred or succession of these two. Yet cannot I finde in the Atheniensis (for the Scriptures are either silent in this point, or aduers to Scaliger; and other good authorities, I know none, in this business) any sentence more neerely prouing the succession of Meroch to Nabonassar, than the place now last rehearsed: which makes no more, to shew that the one of these was Father to the other, than (that I may vse a like example) the as neere succession of William the Conqueror, to haue bene Sonne, or Grand-child to Edward the Confessor. This considered, wee may safely goe on with our account from Nabonassar, taking him for Salmanassar; and not fearing, that the Readers will be be driuen from our booke, when they finde something in it, agreeing with Annius, forasmuch as these Kings mentioned in Scriptures, reigned in Babylon, and Assyria, in those very times which by Diodorus and Ptolome are assigned to Belesus, Nabonassar, and Mardocempadus; and the rest: no good Historie naming any others, that reigned there in those ages, and all Astronomicall obseruations, fully concurring, with the yeeres that are attributed to these, or numbred from them.

§. II.

Of the danger and deliuerance of India from Sennacherib.

When Salmanassar was dead, and his sonne Sennacherib in possession of the Empire, in the fourteenth yeere of Ezechias, he demanded of him such Tribute as was agreed on at such time as T-glath, the Grandfather of Sennacherib, and Father of Salmanassar, inuited by Assur, invaded Rezen King of Omansus, and deliuered him from the dangerous Warre which Israel had undertaken against him. This Tribute and acknowledgement when Ezechias denied, Sennacherib, hauing as it seemes a purpose to invade Egypt, sent one part of his Armie to lie before Ierusalem. Now though Ezechias (fearing this powerfull Prince) had acknowledged his fault, and purchased his peace, as he hoped, with thirtie hundred talents of siluer, and thirty talents of gold: wherewith he presented Sennacherib, now set downe before Lachis in India, yet vnder the colour of better assurance, & to force the King of India to deliuer hostages, the Assyrian enuironed Ierusalem with a grosse Armie, and hauing his Sword in his hand, thought it the fittest time to write his owne conditions.

Ezechias directed his three greatest Countellers, to parlie with Rabfacer, ouer the Wall; and to receiue his demands: who vsed three principall arguments to perswade the people to yeeld themselves to his Master Sennacherib. For though the Chancellor, Steward, and Secretarie, sent by Ezechias, desired Rabfacer to speake vnto them in the Syrian tongue, and not in the Hebrew, yet hee with a more loud voice directed his speech to the multitude in their owne language. And for the first, hee made them know, That if they continued obstinate, and adhered to their King, that they would, in a short time, be enforced to eate their owne dung, and drinke their owne vrine: Secondly, hee altogether disabled the King of Egypt, from whom the Indians hoped for succour; and compared him to a broken staffe, on which who-so-ever leaneeth, pierceth his owne hand: Thirdly, that the gods who should helpe them, Ezechias had formerly broken and defaced, meaning chiefly (as it is thought by some) the brazen Serpent, which had bene preferred ouer since Moses time: and withall hee bade them remember the gods of other Nations: whom, notwithstanding any power of theirs, his Master had conquered and throwne downe; and for God himselfe, in whom they trusted, hee perswaded them by no meanes to relie on him; for he would deceiue them. But finding the people silent (for so the King had commanded them) after a while, when he had vnderstood that the King of Arabia was marching on with a powerfull Armie, hee himselfe left the Assyrian forces in charge to others, and fought Sennacherib at Lachis in India, either to informe him of their resolution in Ierusalem, or to confere with him concerning the Armie of Tharaca the Arabian. Soone vpon this there came letters from Sennacherib to Ezechias, whom he partly aduised, and partly threatened to submit himselfe: vnto the same blasphemous outrage against the all-powerfull God, as before. But Ezechias sending those Countellers to the Prophet Ezra, which had lately bene sent to Rabfacer, recieued from him comfort, and assurance, that this Heathen Idolater should not preuaile; against whom the King also besought aide from Almighty God, repeating the most insolent and blasphemous parts of Sennacherib's letter, before the

The reason that moued Sennacherib to desire to possesse himself in haste of Ierusalem, was, that he might thereinto haue retreated his Armie, which was departed, as it seemeth, from the siege of Pelusium in Aegypt, for feare of Tarbaca: and though the Scriptures are silent of that enterprize (which in these bookes of the Kings, and of the Chronicles or Paralipomenon, I speake but of the affaires of the Iewes in effect) yet the ancient Berosus, and out of him Iosephus, and S. Hierome, together with Herodotus, remember it as followeth. Herodotus calleth Sennacherib King of Arabia and Affyria: which he might justly doe, because Tiglath his Grand-father held a great part thereof, which he wrested from Pekab King of Israel: as Gilead ouer Jordan, and the rest of Arabia Petræ as adjoining: the same Herodotus also maketh Sethon King of Aegypt, to be Palaus Priest, and reporteth that the reason of Sennacheribs returne from Pelusium in Aegypt, which hee also belied, was, that an innumerable multitude of Rats had in one night eaten in funder the Bow-strings of his Archers, and spoiled the rest of their weapons of that kinde, which no doubt might greatly amaze him: but the approach of Tarbaca, remembered by Iosephus and Berosus, was the more urgent. S. Hierome vpon the seuen and thirrie of Ezay, out of the same Berosus, as also in part out of Herodotus, whom Iosephus citeth somewhat otherwise than his words 20 lie, reports Sennacherib retreat in these words. *Pugnasse autem SENACHERIB Regem Assyriorum contra Aegyptios, & obsidisse Pelusium, iung. extructis aggeribus, arbi- cpendis, venisse TARACHAN Regem Aethiopia in auxilium, & una nocte iuxta Ierusalem, centum octoginta quing. milia exercitus Assyri pestilentia corruisse narrat HERODOTUS: & plenissime Berosus Chaldaice scriptor Historie, quorum fides de proprijs libris petenda est; That SENACHERIB King of the Assyrians fought against the Aegyptians, and besieged Pelusium, and that when his Mounts were built for taking of the Cite, TARACHAS King of the Aethiopsians came to helpe them, and that in one night, neere Ierusalem, one hundred eighty five thousand of the Assyrian Armie perished by pestilence; of these things (saith HIEROME) * HERODOTUS reports: and more at large 30 BEROSUS a writer of Chaldean Stories, whose credit it is to be taken from their owne bookes. Out of Ezay it is gathered, that this destruction of the Assyrian Armie was in this manner: Thou shalt be visited of the Lord of Hosts with thunder and shaking, and a great noise, a whirle-winde and a tempest, and a flame of devouring fire. But Iosephus hath it more largely out of the same Berosus, an authoritie (because so well agreeing with the Scriptures) not to be omitted, *SENNACHERIBVS autem ab Aegyptiaco bello reuertens, ostendit ibi exercitum, quem sub RABASACIS Imperio reliquerat peste diuinitus immixta deletum, primâ nocte posteaquam Vrhem oppugnare ceperat, absumptis cum Ducibus & Tribunis, centum octoginta quing. milibus Militum, quacumque terris, & de reliquis copijs sollicitus, maximis itineribus in regnum suum contendit, ad regiam quae NINUS dicitur. Pbi paulo post per insidias Senatorum, & filijs suis, ADRAAMELECHI, & SELENNARI, vitam amisit: occisus in ipso Templo quod dicitur ARASCI, quem praecipuo cultu dignabatur: quibus ob pacidum a popularibus pulsus & in Armeniam fugientibus, ASARACOLDAS minor filium in Regnum successit; SENACHERIB (saith IOSEPHVS) returning from the Aegyptian warre, foundethere his Armie, which he had left vnder the command of RABASAC, destroyed by a pestilence sent from God, the first night that he had begunne to assault the Towne: one hundred fourescore and five thousand of the Soldiers being consumed with their Chieftaines and Coronells. With which destruction being terrified, and withall afraid what might become of the rest of his Armie, hee made great marches into his Kingdome, to his Royall Cite, which is called Ninus, where 50 flouery after by the treason of two of the eldest of his Sonnes, ADRAAMELECH and SELENNAR or SHAREZER, he lost his life in the Temple dedicated to ARASAC, or NESROCH: whom he especially worshipped. These his sonnes being for their parricide chased away by the people, and flying into Armenia, ASARACOLDAS his younger sonne succe- ded in the Kingdome. Who in the beginning of his raigne sent new troups out of Affyria and Samaria, to fortifie the Colonie therein planted by his grandfather Salmansar. What this Nesre was, it is vncertaine: Hierome in his Hebrew traditions hath somewhat of him, but nothing positively. It is certaine, that Petius Vranus was worshipped by the Affyrians; and so was Iupiter Belus, as Dion, Eusebius, and Cyrrillus witness. Many fancies there are, what cause his sonne had to murder him; but the most likely is, that he had formerly dis-inherited those two, and conferred the Empire on Asarhaddon. Tobit tells vs, That it was fiftie five dayes after Sennacheribs returne, ere he was murdered by his sonnes; during which time he slew great numbers of the Israhelites in Ninewe, till the most iust God turned the Sword against his owne breast.

§. III.

Of EZEKIAS his sickness and recoverie; and of the Babylonian King that congratulated him.

Fer this marvellous deliuerie, Ezekias sickened, and was told by Isaiah, that he must die: but after hee had besought God with teares for his deliuerie, Isaiah, as hee was going from him, returned againe, and had warrant from the Spirit of God to promise him recoverie after three dayes, and a prolongation of his life for fiftene yeeres. But Ezekias somewhat doubtfull of this exceeding grace, prayeth a signe to confirme him: whereupon, at the prayer of Isaiah, the shadow of the Sunne cast it selfe the contrarie way, and went backe tenne degrees, vpon the Dyall of Achaz. The cause that moued Ezekias to lament (saith Saint Hierome) was, because he had as yet no sonne, and then in despair that the Messias should come out of the house of Dauid, or at least of his Seede. His disease seemeth to be the Pestilence, by the medicine giuen him by the Prophet, to wit, a masse of Figges, layed to the Botch or Sore.

This wonder when the Wife-men of Chaldea had told to Merodach, King of Babylon, the first of that house, he sent to Ezekias, to be informed of the cause: at which time Ezekias shewed him all the Treasure hee had, both in the Court and in the Kingdome: for which he was repurchased by the Prophet Isaiah, who told him; 19. *The dayes are at hand, that all that is in thine house, and whatauer thy fathers haue layed up in store to this day, shall be carried into Babel; nothing shall bee left, saith the Lord. It may seeme strange, how Ezekias should haue got any treasure worth the shewing: for Sennacherib had robbed him of all, the yeere before. But the spoile of the same Sennacherib his Campe repayed all with aduantage, and made Ezekias richer vpon the suddaine then euer he had bene: which vnspected wealth was a strong temptation 40 to boasting. After this time Ezekias had rest, and spending without noyse that addition which God had made vnto his life, he died, hauing reigned nine and twentie yeeres. One onely offense he warre he made, which was against the Philistines with good successe. Among his other acts (shortly remembered in Ecclesiasticus) hee 41. §. 3. deuiled to bring water to Ierusalem.*

In two respects they say that hee offended God: the one, that hee rejoyced too much at the destruction and lamentable end of his enemy; the other, that hee too much gloried in his riches, as he could not forbear to shew them to strangers. But the reason which moued Ezekias (speaking humanely) to entertaine the Embassadors of Merodach in this friendly and familiar manner, was, because he came to visit him, and brought him a present, congratulating the recoverie of his health; as also in that Merodach had weakened the house of Sennacherib in Babylon, v- 50 surped that State himselfe, in the last yeere of that King, and held it by strong hand against this sonne Asarhaddon; who was not onely simple, but impaired in strength by by the molestation of his brothers. This advantage Meroдах espied, and remembering, that their ancestor Phul Belochus had set his owne master Sardanapalus besides the cushion, thought it as lawfull for himselfe to take the opportunitie which this Kings weaknesse did offer, as it had bene for Belochus to make vse of the others wicke-nesse: and so, finding himselfe beloved of the Babylonians, and sufficiently powerfull, he did put the matter to hazard, and preuailed. The assertion of this historie is made by the same arguments that were vsed in maintaining the common opinion of Writers, touching Phul Belochus; which I will not here againe rehearse. So of this new Race, which cut a-funder the Line of Ninus, there were only five Kings.

Tiglath Phlassar.	27.
Salmanassar.	10.
Senacherib.	7.

But forasmuch as the last yeere of Salmanassar was also the first of Senacherib his sonne, we reckon the time, wherein the house of Phul held the Assyrian Kingdome, to haue bene an hundred and one yeeres, of which, the last fve and twentie were spent with Ezekia, vnder Salmanassar, Senacherib, and Assarhaddon.

§. IIII.

The Kings that were in Media during the raigne of Ezekia: Of the difference found betweene Iudrie Authors, in rehearsing the Median Kings.

Other contemporaries of Ezekia: of CANDAVLES, GYGES, and the Kings descended from HERCVLES.

IN the time of Ezekia, Medius, and after him Cardicus, reigned in Media. Whether it were so, that varietie of names, by which these Kings were called in severall Histories, hath caused them to seeme more than indeede they were; or whether the sonnes reigning with the fathers, haue caused not onely the names of Kings, but the length of Time, wherein they gouerned Media, to exceede the due proportion: or whether the Copies themselves, of Ctesias and Annius his Metasthenes, haue bene faultie, as neither of these two Authors is ouer-highly commended of trustinesse: so it is, that the names, number, and length of raigne, are all very diuersly reported of these Median Kings, that followed Arbaces: Therefore it neede not seeme strange, that I reckon Medius and Cardicus as contemporaries with Ezekia. For to reconcile so great a difference, as is found in those Writers that varie from Eusebius, is more than I dare vndertake. I will onely here set downe the roll of Kings that reigned in Media, accordingly as Iudrie Authors haue deliuered it.

Annius his Metasthenes orders them and their raignes thus:

Arbaces.	28.	} who reigned	} yeeres.
Atandanes.	50.
Sofarmon.	30.

Diodorus Siculus following Ctesias (as perhaps Annius made his Metasthenes follow Diodore, with some litte variation, that he might not seeme a borrower) placeth them thus.

Asyages.

Mercator hath laboured with much diligence, to reconcile these Catalogues, and to make them also agree with Eusebius. But forasmuch as it seemes to mee an impossible matter, to attaine vnto the truth of these forgotten times, by conjectures founded vpon Ctesias and Metasthenes, I will lay the burthen vpon Eusebius, who liued in an age better furnished than ours, with bookes of this argument. Let it therefore suffice, that these two Kings (whom I haue reckoned as contemporaries with Ezekia) Medius and Cardicus, are found in Eusebius: for whether Cardicus were Diodorus his Arbianes, I will not stay to search. The Kings of Media, according to Eusebius, reigned in this order.

Arbaces.	28.	} reigned	} yeeres.
Sofarmon.	30.
Medius.	40.
Cardicus.	15.
Deioes.	54.
Phraortes.	24.
Cyaxares.	32.
Asyages.	38.

These names, and this course of succession I retaine; but adde vnto these, Cyaxares the sonne of Asyages, according to Xenophon; and sometimes follow Herodotus, in setting downe the length of a Kings raigne, otherwise than Eusebius hath it: of which variations, I will render my reasons in due place.

The twentie nine yeeres of Ezekia were concurrent, in part, with the rule of the foure first that were chosen Gouernours of Athens for ten yeeres; that is, of Charopis, Alcimedus, Elidicus, and Hippones. Touching the first of these I heare nothing, save that Rome was built in his first yeere; of which perhaps himselfe did not heare. Of the second and third I finde only the names. The fourth made himselfe knowne by a strange example of iustice, or rather of crueltye, that hee shewed vpon his owne Daughter. For hee finding that shee had offended in vnchastitie, caused her to be lockt vp with an Horfe, giuing to neither of them any foode: so the Horfe, constrained by hunger, deuoured the vnhappy Woman.

In Rome, the first King, and Founder of that Citie Romulus, did raigne both before, and somewhat after Ezekia.

In Lydia, Candaules the last King, ruled in the same age.

This

This Region was first called Moonia. Lydae the sonne of Arys reigning in it, gave the name of Lydia, if wee beleuee such authoritie as wee finde. This Kingdome was afterward, by the appointment of an Oracle, conferred vpon Argon, who came of Alceus the sonne of Hercules, by Iardana, a bond-woman. The race of these Heraclidae continued reigning fiftie fyeueeres (in which two and twentie Generations passed) the sonne continually succceding the father. Candaules the sonne of Mysus was the last of his race, who doated so much vpon the beautie of his owne Wife, that hee could not bee content to enjoy her, but would needs enforce one Gyges, the sonne of Dasyllus, to behold her naked bodie; and placed the vnwilling man secretly in her chamber, where he might see her preparing to bed-ward. This was not so closely carried, but that the Queene perceived Gyges at his going forth, and vnderstanding the matter, tooke it in such high disdain, that she forced him the next day to requite the Kings follie with treason. So Gyges, being brought againe into the same chamber by the Queene, slew Candaules, and was rewarded not only with his Wife, but with the Kingdome of Lydia. He reigned thirtie eight yeeres, beginning in the last of Ezekia, one yeere before the death of Romulus.

After Gyges, his sonne Ardys reigned nine and fortie yeeres; then Sadyattes, twelue; Halyattes, fiftie seuen; and finally Craesus, the sonne of Halyattes, fourteene yeeres: who lost the Kingdome, and was taken by Cyrus of Persia.

And here by the way we may note, that as the Lydian Kings, whom Craesus his Progenitor dispossessed, are deduced from Hercules, so of the same Hercules there sprang many other Kings, which gouerned severall Countries very long; as in Asia, the Mylians; in Greece, the Lacedamonians, Messeniens, Rhodiens, Corinthians, and Argiues; and from the Argiues, the Macedonians; as likewise from the Corinthians, the *Syracusan*s: besides many great and famous, though priuate, Families.

But of the Heraclidae that reigned in Lydia, I haue not troubled my selfe to take notice in the times of their severall reignes: for little is found of them, beside the bare names, and the follie of this last King Candaules.

CHAP. XXVI.

Of the Kings that reigned in Egypt, betwene the deliuerance of ISRAEL from thence, and the raigne of EZEKIA in Juda, when Egypt and Juda made a league against the Affrians.

§. I.

That many names of Egyptian Kings, found in Historie, are like to haue belonged only to Viceroyes. An example proving this out of WILLIAM of Tyre his Historie of the holy Warre.

HE emulation and quarrells arising in these times, betwene the mightie Kingdomes of Egypt and Affria, doe require our paines, in collecting the most memorable things in Egypt, and setting downe briefly the state of that Countie, which had continued long a flourishing Region, and was of great power, when it contended with Affria for the Mastery. Of Cham the sonne of Noah, who first planted that Countie, and of Osiris, Orus, and other ancient Kings, that reigned there, vntill the Israelites were thence deliuered, more hath bene said a readie than

I can stand to; though I hold it no shame to faile in such coniectures. That which I haue deliuered, in speaking mine opinion of the Egyptian Dynasties, must here againe helpe me. For it may truly be affirmed, That the great number of Kings, which are said to haue reigned in Egypt, were none other than Viceroyes or Stewards, such as Ioseph was, and such as were the Soldanes in later ages. Therefore, I will not onely forbear to seeke after those, whom Hierodotus and Diodorus haue reckoned vp, from the mouthes of Egyptian Priests, deliuering them by number, without rehearsing their names; but will leaue the labour of marshalling them in order, whose names only are found; the yeares of their reignes, and other circumstances, proving them to haue bene Kings in deede, being not recorded.

But that I may not seeme before hand, to lay an imaginarie ground, whereupon after I may build what I list; it were not amisse, to giue vnto the Reader such satisfaction in this point, as apparent reason, and truth of Historie doth afford. First therefore, wee ought not to beleuee those numbers of Generations, which the lying Priests haue reckoned vp, to magnifie their Antiquities. For wee know, that from Abraham, our Saviour Christ was remoued onely fortie two descents, which makes it euident, that in farre shorter time, namely before the Persian Empire, there could not haue passed away twice as many successions in Egypt: especially considering, that many of these, whose continuance is expresse, haue reigned longer than fortie yeeres. It followes that we should square the number of the Egyptian Kings in some euen proportion, to those which did beare rule in other Countries; As for the rest, whose names we finde scattered here and there; any man that will take the paines to reade the nineteenths booke of the holy warre written by William Archbishop of Tyre, may easily perswade himselfe, that it is not hard to find names enow, of such as might be thought to haue reigned in Egypt, being none other than

then Regents or Viceroyes. Yet will I here insert, as briefly as I can, some things making to that purpose for the pleasure and information of such, as will not trouble themselves with turning over many Authors.

When Elhadeth the Caliph ruled in Ægypt, one Dargan, a powerful and a subtle man, made himselfe Soldan, by force and cunning, chaling away Sanar an Arabian, who was Soldan before and after him. This Dargan mislived matter of quarrell to Amalricke King of Jerusalem; and sustained, with little losse, an insuasion, which Amalricke made vpon Ægypt. Hereupon hee grew so insolent and proud, that Sanar the former Soldan hoped to make his partic good against him, if he could get any forces wherewith to enter Ægypt. Briefly, Sanar such to Noradine, King of Damasco, for aide, who sends an Army of his Turkes, vnder the command of Syrac, against the Soldan Dargan. So Dargan and Sanar met, and fought: The Victorie was Dargans; but hee enjoyed it not: for in few daies after, hee was slaine by treason, whereby Sanar did reconer his Dignitie: which to establish, he slew all the Kindred and Friends of Dargan, that he could finde in the great Citie of Cairo.

To all these doings, the Caliph Elhadeth gave little regard: for he thought it little concerned him, which of them liued, and had the administration of the Kingdom, whilst he might haue the profit of it, and enjoy his pleasure. But new troubles presently arise, which (one would thinke) doe neerely touch the Caliph himselfe. Syrac with his Turkes, whom Sanar hath gotten to come into Ægypt, will not now be entreated there to leave him, and quietly goe their way home. They seize vpon the Towne of Belbeis, which they fortifie, and there attend the arriual of more companie from Damasco, for the conquest of all Ægypt. The Soldan perceiues their intent, and findes himselfe not strong enough to expell them; much lesse to repell the Turkish Armie, that was likely to second them. He therefore sends Messengers to King Amalricke of Jerusalem, whom with large promises, he gets to bring him aide, and so drives out the Turkes. Of all this trouble, the great Caliph heares nothing, or not so much, as should make him looke to the playing of his owne game.

A greater mischief ariseth, concerning the Caliph Elhadeth particularly, in his owne Title. Syrac, Captaine of the Turkes that had bene in Ægypt, goes to the Caliph of Baldach (who was opposit to him of Ægypt, each of them claiming as heire to Adanomet, that false prophet, the Soueraignetie ouer all that were of the Saracen Law) and tells him the weakenesse of the Ægyptian, with his owne abilitie of doing seruice in those parts, offering his best means for the extirpation of the Schismaticall Caliph, and the reduction of all Ægypt, with the Western parts, vnder the subiection of the Babylonian. This motion is readily and ioyfully entertained; all the Easterne Provinces are vp in Armes; and Syrac, with a mightie power, defendeth into Ægypt. The noise of this great expedition so affrighteth King Amalricke, that with all his forces he hasteth into Ægypt: well knowing how neerely it concerned him and his Kingdom of Jerusalem, to keep the Saracens from ioyning all vnder one head. Sanar the Soldan perceiuing the faithfull care of the Christians his friends, welcomes them, and bestirs himselfe in giuing them all manner of content, as it becometh him: for by their admirable valour, he finally draue the enemies out of the Countrey. But this victorie was not so soone gotten, as it is quickly told.

Strange it is (which most concerns our present purpose) that of so desperate danger, the Caliph, as yet, seemes to know nothing. May we not thinke him to haue bene King in title only, who meddled so little in the Government? The Soldan, finding that the Christians (without whose helpe, all was lost) could not well stay, so long as his necessities required, makes large offers to King Amalricke, vpon condition, that he should abide by it. He promitteth a great Tribute (William of Tyre calls it a Tribute; the Saracens, perhaps, called it a Pension) which the Kings of Jerusalem should receiue out of Ægypt, for this beuoeufull assistance. But the Christians vnderstanding that the Soldan (how much soeuer he tooke vpon him) was subiect to an higher Lord, would make no bargain of such importance, with any other than the the Caliph himselfe. Hereupon High Earle of Cesarea, and a Knight of the Templars, are sent vnto Elhadeth, to ratifie the covenants. Now shall we see the greatness of the Caliph and his estate.

These Embassadors were conueighed by the Soldan to Cairo; where arriuing at the Palace, they found it guarded by great troupes of Souldiers. The first entrance was through darke Porches, that were kept by many armed bands of Æthiopian, which with all diligence, did reuerence vnto the Soldan, as he passed along. Through these streights the Warders led them, into goodly open Courts, of such beautie and riches, that they could not retaine the grauitie of Embassadors, but were enforced to admire the things which detained their eyes. For there they law goodly marble Pillars, gilded Beames, all wrought ouer with embossed works, curious pauements, fish-ponds of marble with cleare waters, and many sorts of strange Birds, vnkown in these parts of the world, as comming perhaps from the East Indies, which then were vndiscovered. The further they went, the greater was the magnificence; for the Caliph his Eunuches conueighed them into other Courts within these; as farre exceeding the former, as the former did surpass ordinary houses. It were tedious perhaps to rehearse, how, the further they entred, the more high state they found, and cause of maruaile; suffice it, that the good Archbishop, who wrought these things, was neuer held a vaine Author. Finally they were brought into the Caliph's owne lodgings, which were yet more stately, and better guarded, where entering the presence, the Soldan hauing twice prostrated himselfe, did the third time cast off his Sword, that he ware about his neck, and throw himselfe on the ground, before the curtaine, behinde which the Caliph sat. Presently the traueiser, wrought with Gold and pearles was opened, and the Caliph himselfe discovered, sitting with great Maiestie on a throne of gold, hauing very few of his most inward seruants and Eunuches about him. When the Soldan had humbly kissed his Masters feet, he briefly told the cause of his comming, the danger wherein the land stood, and the offers that he had made vnto King Amalricke, desiring the Caliph himselfe to ratifie them, in presence of the Embassadors. The Caliph answered, That he would thoroughly performe all which was promised. But this contented not the Embassadors: They would haue him to giue his hand vpon the bargain; which the Ægyptians, that stood by, thought an impudent request. Yet his greatnes condescended at length, after much deliberation, at the earnest request of the Soldan, to reach out his hand. When the Earle of Cesarea saw that the Caliph gaue his hand, neither willingly nor bare, hee told him roundly thus much in effect. Sir, Truth seeks no holes to hide it selfe; Princes, that will hold covenant, must deale openly, nakedly, and sincerely: Giue vs therefore your bare hand, if you meane that we shall trust you, for we will make no bargaines with your Glove. Much adoe there was about this: for it seemed against the Maiestie of such a Prince to yeelde so farre. But, when it would none other wise be, with a smiling cheare (though to the great griefe of his seruants) hee vouchsafed to let the Earle take him by the bare hand; and so rehearsing the covenants word by word, as the Earle spake them, he ratified all; dismissing finally the Embassadors, with such rewards as testified his Greatnesse.

In this Caliph and his Sultan, we may discern the Image of the ancient Pharaoh, and his Viceroy: we see a Prince of great estate, sitting in his Palace, and not vexing himself with the great preparations made against him, which terrifie his neighbour Countries: we see his Viceroy, in the meane season, vying all Royal power, making warre and peace; entertaining, and expelling Armies of strangers; yea making the Land of Ægypt tributarie to a foraine Prince. What greater authoritie was giuen to Ioseph, when Pharaoh said vnto him, Thou shalt be ouer mine house, and at thy word shall almy people be armed, only in the Kings Throne will I be about thee, Behold, I haue set thee ouer all the Land of Ægypt?

I doe not commend this forme of Government; neither can I approoue the coniecture of mine Author, where hee thinks, that the Ægyptians, euer since Iosephus time, haue felt the burden of that seruitude, which hee brought vpon them, when he bought them, and their Lands, for Pharaoh, Herein I finde his iudgement good; that he affirms this manner of the Egyptian Kings, in taking their ease, and ruling by a Viceroy, to be part of the ancient customes, practised by the Pharaohs. For we finde, that euen the Ptolomies (excepting Ptolemaeus Lagi, and his sonne Philadelphus, founder and establisher of that race) were giuen, all of them, wholly to please their owne appetites, leauing the charge of the Kingdome to Women, Eunuchs, and other minilliers of their desires. The pleasures which that Countrey afforded, were indeede sufficient to inuite the Kings thereof vnto a voluptuous life; and the awfull regard wherein the Egyptians held their Princes, gaue them securitie, whereby they might the better trust their officers, with so ample Commission. But of this matter, I will not stand longer to dispute. It is enough to haue shewed, that the great and almost absolute power of the Viceroyes governing Egypt, is set downe by Moses, and that a liuely example of the same is found in William of Tyre; who liued in the same age; was, in few yeeres after, Chancellour of the Kingdome of Ierusalem; and had full discourse with Hugh Earle of Casarea, touching all these matters. Wherefore it remains, that wee bee not carried away with a vaine opinion, to beleeue that all they were Kings, whom reports of the fabulous Egyptians haue honored with that stile; but rest contented with a Catalogue of such, as we finde by circumstance, likely to haue reigned in that Countrey; after whom it followes that we should make enquire.

¶ II.

Of ACHERRES; whether he were VCHOREVS that was the eighth from OSYMANDYAS, Of OSYMANDYAS and his Tombe.

IN this businesse I hold it vaine to be too curious. For who can hope to 30 attaine to the perfect knowledge of the truth, when as Diodorus varies from Herodotus, Eusebius, from both of them; and late Writers, that haue sought to gather the truth out of these and others, finde no one with whom they can agree? In this case Annus would doe good seruice, if a man could trust him. But it is enough to be beholding to him, when others doe either say nothing, or that which may iustly bee suspected. I will therefore hold my selfe contented, with the pleasure that he hath done me, in saying somewhat of Osiris, Isis, Orus, and those antiquities remoued so farre out of sight: as for the Kings following the departure of Israel out of Egypt, it shall suffice, that Herodotus, Diodorus, and Eusebius, haue not bene silent, and that Reineccius hath taken paines, to range into some good order the names that are extant in these, or found scattering in others.

From the departure of Israel out of Egypt, vnto the raigne of Thooris (who is generally taken to be the same that the Greeks call Proetus) there is little or no disagreement about the Egyptian Kings. Wherefore I set downe the same which are found in Eusebius, and giue to euery one the same length of raigne.

Acherres was the first of these, who succeeded vnto Chenchres, that perished in the Red Sea. This King cemes to Reineccius to be the same whom Diodorus calls Vchoreus, the founder of Memphis. But whereas mention is found in Diodorus of a great King, named Osymandyas, from whom Vchoreus is said to be the eighth; it will either hardly follow, that Timus (as Reineccius coniectures) was the great Osymandyas; or else that this Acherres was Vchoreus: for the distance betwene them was more then eight generations. Mercator iudgeth Osymandyas to haue bene the husband of Aencheres, Orus the second his Daughter; thinking that Manetho

(cited by Iosephus) doth omit his name, and insert his wifes, into the Catalogue of Kings, because he was King in his wifes right. As for Vchoreus, it troubles not Mercator to finde him the eighth from this man: for he takes Ogdorus, not to signifie in this place of Diodore (as that Greece word else doth) the eighth, but to be an Egyptian name, belonging also to Vchoreus, who might haue had two names, as many of the rest had. I will not vex my braines in the vnprofitable search of this, and the like inextricable doubts. All that Diodore hath found of this Osymandyas, was wrought vpon his monument; the most thereof in figures, which I thinke the Egyptians did fabulously expound. For whereas there was pourtraied a great Armie 10 with the siege of a Towne, the captiuitie of the People, and the triumph of the Conqueror; all this, the Egyptians said to denote the conquest of Babylonia made by that King: which how likely it was, let others iudge. I hold this goodly peece of worke, which Diodore so particularly describes, to haue bene erected for a common place of buriall, to the ancient Kings and Queenes of Egypt, and to their Viceroyes; whilst yet they were not so ambitious, as euery one to haue his owne particular monument, struing therein to exceed all others. This appears by the many statues, therein placed, by the Warres, the iudgement Seate, the receiuing of Tribute, the offering Sacrifice to God, the account of Reuenues, and plentie of all Cattails and Foode; all which were there curiously wrought, shewing the 20 seuerall Offices of a Governour. On the Tombe of Osymandyas was this inscription. I am OSYMANDYAS King of Kings; If any desire to know what I am, or where I lie, let him exceede some of my workes. Let them, that hope to exceede his workes, labour to know what he was. But since by those wordes, Or where I lie, it should seeme that hee lay not there interred, wee may lawfully suspect that it was Ioseph, whose body was preferred among the Hebrewes, to be buried in the Land of Canaan, and this empty Monument might King Orus, who out-liued him, erect in honor of his high deserts, among the royall Sepulchers. To which purpose, the plentie of Cattail, and all manner of viands, had good reference. The name Osymandyas doth not hinder this coniecture; seeing Ioseph had one new name giuen to 30 him by Pharaoh, for expounding the dreame, and might, vpon further occasions, haue another, to his encrease of honor. As for that stile, King of Kings, it was perhaps no more than Beglerbeg, as the Turkish Bassas are called, that is, Great about the Great.

Now although it be so, that the reckoning falls outright, betwene the times of Ioseph and Acherres (for Acherres was the eighth in order, that reigned after the great Orus, whose Viceroy Ioseph was) yet will I hereby seeke, neither to fortifie mine owne coniecture, as touching Ioseph, nor to inferre any likelihood of Acherres his being Vchoreus. For it might well bee, that Memphis was built by some such King as was Gehoor, Lieutenant vnto the Calph Elcain, who hauing to his Masters 40
vfe, conquered Egypt, and many other Countries, did build, not farre from old Memphis, the great Citie of Cairo (corruptly so pronounced) naming it El Cabira, that is, an enforcing, or an imperious Mistressse, though he himselfe were a Dalmatian slave.

§. III.

Of Cherres, Armeus, Rameses, and Amenophis. Of Myris, and the Lake that beares his name.

When Acherres had reigned eight yeeres, Cherres succeeded, and held the Kingdome fifteene yeeres: then reigned Armeus five yeeres, and after him Rameses, thre score and eight. Of Armeus and Rameses is that Historie understood by Eusebius, which is common among the Greekes, vnder the names of Danaus and Egyptus. For it is said that Danaus, being expelled out of Egypt by his Brother, fled into Greece, where he obtained the Kingdome of Argos: that he had fiftie Daughters, whom vpon seeming reconciliation, hee gaue in marriage to his Brothers fiftie Sonnes, but commanded euery one of them to kill her husband the first night: that onely Hypermetra, one of his Daughters, did saue her husband Lyncus, and suffered him to escape; finally, That for this fact, all the bloudie sisters, when they died, were enioyed this foolish punishment in Hell, to fill a leaking Vessell with water.

The raigne of Danaus in Argos was indeed in this age; but that Armeus, was Danaus; and Rameses, Egyptus; is more then Reinecius beleues: hee rather takes 20 Armeus to haue bene Myris, or Meris, who caused the great lake to be made which beares his name. For my owne part, as I can easily beleue, that he which fled out of Egypt into Greece, was a man of such qualitie as the Soldan Sanar, of whom we spake before; so doe I not finde how in so short a raigne, as five yeeres, a worke of that labour could be finished, which was required vnto the Lake of Myris, and the Monuments therein; whereof his owne Sepulchre and his wiues being some part, it is manifest that he was not buried in Argos. Wherefore of Myris, and of all other Kings, whose age is vncertaine, and of whose raignes we haue no assurance, I may truly say, that their great workes are not enough to proue them of the house of Pharaoh, seeing that greater deedes or more absolute, then were those of Ioseph, who 30 bought all the people of Egypt as bond-men, and all their Land for bread; of Gehor, who founded Cairo; and of Sanar, who made the Countrie Tributarie; were performed by none of them.

It shall therefore be enough to set downe the length of their raignes, whom we finde to haue followed one another in order of succession: but in rehearsing the great acts which were performed, I will not stand to examine, whether they that did them were Kings or no.

The Lake of Myris is, by the report of Diodore and Herodotus, three thousand six hundred furlongs in compass, and fiftie fadomes deepe. It serued to recue the waters of Nilus, when the owser-flow, being too great, was harmefull to the Countrie; and to supply the defect, by letting out the waters of the Lake, when the Ri- 40 uer did not rise high enough. In opening the sluices of this Lake, for the letting in or out of waters, were spent fiftie talents; but the Lake it selfe defraied that cost; seeing the tribute imposed vpon Fish taken therein, was euery day one talent, which Myris gaue to his Wife to buy sweet ointments, and other ornaments for her bodie. In the middell of it was left an Iland, wherein were the Sepulchers of Myris and his Wife, and ouer each of them a Pyramis, that was a furlong, or (according to Herodotus) fiftie paces high; hauing on the tops their statues, sitting in Thrones. I finde not the description of this Lake in Maps, answerable to the report of Historians: yet it is very great. The yeeres of Armeus are by Manetho diuided, by inserting one 50 Armeus (whom Eusebius omits) that should haue reigned one yeere and odde months of the time; but I hold not this difference worthy of examination.

After Rameses, his sonne Amenophis held the Kingdome fortie yeeres. Some giue him only nineteene yeeres; and Mercator thinks him to haue bene the King

King that was drowned in the Red Sea: whereof I haue already spoken in the first Booke.

§. IIIL.

Of the Kings that raigned in the Dynastie of the Larthes.

ETHIOSIS, or Zethus, reigned after his Father Amenophis, fiftie five yeeres. To him are ascribed the famous acts of that ancient Sesoftris. But the state of the World was not such in these times, that so great an expedition, as the old Sesoftris made, could haue bene either easily performed, or forgotten in the Countries through which he passed, had it now bene performed, as any man will perceiue, if hee looke vpon my Chronologicall Table, and consider who liued with this Zethus. With this King beganne the Dynastie of the Larthes; which Reinecius conjectures to haue had the same signification, wherein the old Kings of Heturria were called Lartes, (the Heturrians being issued out of Lydia, the Lydians out of Egypt) and to haue signified as much as Imperator or Generall. The Warres in which these Kings were Generalls, 20 I take to haue bene against the Ethiopians: for sure I am, that they troubled not the Countrie of Palaestina, that lay next vnto them on the one hand; nor is it likely that they trauielled ouer the desert sands, on the other hand; to seeke matter of conquest, in the poore Countries of Africa. But these Generalls (if the Larthes were such) were not many. Five only had that title; and the last of these tooke it, perhaps, as hereditarie from the first; in such sort as the Roman Emperors were proud for a while, to be called Antonini, till the most vsurtable conditions of Helicabalu, made his Successors forbear the name.

Here it may be objected, that the Dynasties (as appears by this particular) tooke name from the Kings, that the Kings also did administer the gouernment themselves; and that therefore I am deceived in ascribing so much vnto the Vicerotes. But it is to be considered, that what is said of these Larthes, depends only vpon conjecture, and that the authoritie of the Regents, or Vicerotes, might bee great enough, though some few Kings tooke the conduct of Armies into their owne hands. For so we finde in John Leo, that the Soldan of Egypt (after such time as the 30 Soldan Saladine, murdering the Caliph, got the Soueraignetie to himselfe) had vnder him a Viceroy, stiled Eddagadare, who had authoritie to place, or displace, any Magistrates, or Officers; and that this mans Familie was almost as great, as the Soldans owne. Yet was there also the Amir Cabir, or Lord Generall of the Soldans forces, who had the charge of defending the Land, and might as he thought good, spend of the Soldans Treasure. So might the Office of the Vicerotes continue, though the Kings themselves, taking the charge, or title of Generalls vpon them, did somewhat abridge the greatnesse of that second place. As for the names of the Dynasties, it skils not whence they were drawne; whether from their Countrie, as those of the Thebans and Disopolitans, or from some eminent men, or man, who ruled in that time, as many thinke; that the seuenteenth Dynastie was called of the Sheep-heards, because Ioseph gouerned in part thereof; or from the Kings themselves that reigned, as this was laid to be of the Larthes or Generalls. The next, as Manetho (but Annius his Manetho) hath it, was without any Larthes or Generall, yet was it not without Kings, 50 forasmuch as Faphres, and Sesaf, reigned therein, if many others did not. But let vs now returne to the businesse which we left.

Ramfes was King after Zethus, or Sethos, thre score and sixe yeeres. He is mistaken for that second Sesoftris, of whom I haue spoken in the first Booke. I finde nothing worth rehearfall of this Ramfes, or of Amenophis, and Annenemes, that followed him in order, the former of which reigned fortie, the later sixe and twentie yeeres.

yeeres. Wherefore it may well bee, that the name which Zethus had from valour, was taken by these as hereditarie.

Thorus, the last of the Larbes, reigned only seven yeeres; yet is hee thought to have bene that Proteus, of whom Herodotus hath mention, saying, T hat hee tooke Helen from Paris, and after the sack of Troy, restored her to Menelaus. I neede say no more in refutation of this, then that the time of Thorus his reigne, lasted not so long as from the Rape of Helen to her restitution.

This Proteus or Cetes (as he is named by some) together with Thon, and others, mentioned by Greece Writers in this businesse, or in other such matters, may seeme to be vnder-Officers: for such only are like to haue had their residence about Pharos, and the Sea-coast, where Menelaus arrived.

Of Proteus, who detained Helen, it is said, T hat he could foretell things to come, and that hee could change himselfe into all shapes: whereby is signified his craftie head, for which he is growne into a Prouerbe. The Poets fained him a Sea-God, and keeper of Neptunes Scale-fishes, for belike he was some vnder-Officer to the Admirall, having charge of the Fishing about the Ile of Pharos, as was said before.

Remphes, the Sonne of Proteus, is reckoned the next King, by Diodore, as also by Herodotus, who calls him Ramsimus, and tells a long tale, fit to please children, of his couetousnesse, and how his treasure-houfe was robbed by a cunning Theefe, that at last married his Daughter. But of this man may beleeue what he list. How long this King reigned I know not, nor thinke that either hee, or his Father, did reigne at all.

§. V.

Of Egyptian Kings whose names are found scattering in sundrie Authors, their times being not recorded. The Kings of Egypt, according to CEDRENNVS. OF VAPHPRES and SEFAC.

Many other names of Egyptian Kings, are found scattered heere and there; as Tonepher Jobit, of whom Suidas deliueis only the bare name and title; Senemures, or Senepes, mentioned in Macrobius, who perhaps was the same that by Suidas is called Senyes, or Euenes, noted by occasion of a great Phisicion that liued vnder him; Banchyrus, recorded by the same Suidas, for his great iustice; and Thulis, of whom Suidas tells great matters; as that his Empire extended to the Ocean Sea; that he gaue name to the Ile of Thule, which some take to be Iceland; and that he consulted with the Deuill, or (which is all one) with Seraphis, desiring to know, who before him had bene, or after him should be so mightie as himselfe. The answer or confession of the Deuill was remarkable; which I finde Englished in the translation of Plessis his worke, Of the trueneesse of Christian Religion. The Greece Verses are somewhat otherwise, and more imperfect in those Copies that I haue of Cedrenus and Suidas, but the sense is all one; which is this:

First God, and next THE WORD, and then THE SPIRIT, Which three be ONE, and joyne in ONE all three;
Whose force is endless. Get thee hence fraile wight,
The Man of Life vnknowne excelleth thee.

I should haue thought that Suidas had borrowed all this of Cedrenus, had I not found somewhat more in Suidas, than Cedrenus hath hereof; as the forme of inuocation which Thulis vsed, and that clause, of his giuing name to the Iland: though in this last point I hold Suidas to be decciued; as also Cedrenus is, or (at least) seemes

to me, in giuing to this King such profound antiquitie of raigne. Indeece the very name of that Booke, cited often by Cedrenus, which he calls Little Genesis, is alone enough to breede suspition of some imposture: but the Frictly stuffe that hee alledgeth out of it, is such as would serue to discredit himselfe, were it not otherwife apparant, that he was a man both deuout, and of good judgement, in matters that fell within his compasse. I will here set downe the List of olde Egyptian Kings deliuered by him, and leaue the censure to others.

The first King of Egypt that he sets downe, is Mizraim, the sonne of Cham. After him hee findes many of a new race, deriuing their pedigree thus: Nimrod, the sonne of Chus, was also called Oriou; and further, tooke vpon him the name of the Planet Saturne, had to wife Semiramis, who was of his owne Linage, and by her three sonnes; Picus, surnamed Iupiter, Belus and Ninus. Picus chaling his father out of Assyria into Italie, reigned in his stead thirtie yeeres, and then gaue vp that Kingdome to Inno, his sister and wife, and to Belus his sonne: after which Belus, who reigned only two yeeres, Ninus had the Kingdome, and married his owne mother Semiramis. But Picus went into Italie, to visite his olde father Saturne; Saturne forthwith resigned the Kingdome to him. Picus Iupiter reigned in Italie threecore and two yeeres, had threecore and tenne Wiues or Concubines, and about as many children: finally died, and lyes buried in the Ile of Crete. The principall of Iupiter sonnes were Fannus, Perseus, and Apello. Fannus was called by the name of the Planet Mercurie: hee reigned in Italie, after his father, siue and thirtie yeeres: and then (finding that all his brethren conspired against him) he went into Egypt, with abundance of Treasure; where, after the death of Mizraim, hee got the Kingdome, and held it nine and thirtie yeeres. After Mercurie, Vulcan reigned in Egypt foure yeeres and a halfe. Then Sol, the sonne of Vulcan, reigned twentie yeeres and a halfe. There followed in order Solus, Osiris, Orus, and Thules, of whom we spake before: the length of their severall raignes is not set downe. After Thules, was the great Sesoftris King twentie yeeres. His successor was Phraao, called Narecho, that held the Crowne fiftie yeeres, with which there passed from him the surname of Phraao, to a very long posteritie.

These reports of Cedrenus I hold it enough to set downe as I finde them: let their credit rest vpon the Author.

Others yet we finde, that are said to haue reigned in Egypt, without any certaine note, when, or how long: about whom I will not labour, as fearing more to be reprehended of vaine curiositie, in the search made after these already rehearsed, then of negligence, in omitting such as might haue bene added.

Vapbres, the father in law to Salomon, and Sefac, the afflicter of Rehoboam; leade vs againe into faire way, but not laire. The name of Vapbres is not found in the Scriptures; but wee are beholding to Clemens Alexandrinus and Eusebius for it.

These giue vs not the length of his raigne; but we know, that he liued in the times of Dauid and of Salomon. He came into Palestina with an Armie, tooke Gezar from the Cananites, and gaue it to his daughter, Salomons wife: though for her sake perhaps it was, that in time following either he, or (as I rather take it) Sefac his sonne did fauour the enemies of Salomon, who kept so many Wiues and Concubines, besides this Egyptian Princeesse. In the life of Rehoboam all hath bene written that I finde of Sefac, excepting the length of his raigne, which must haue bene fixe and twentie yeeres, if he were that Smenais with whom Eusebius beginnes the one and twentieth Dynastie.

Now forasmuch as it would serue to no great purpose, that wee knew the length of Sefac his raigne, and of others that followed him, vnlesse therewithall we knew the beginning of Sefac, vpon which the rest haue dependance; this course I take. From the fourth yeere of Iehosikim, King of Iuda, in which Phraao Neco was slaine, I reckon vpwards the yeeres of the same Neco, and of his predecessors, vnto the beginning of Sefac: by which accompt, the first yeere of Sefac is found, concurrent with with the twentieth of Salamons raigne, and the twentieth sixt of Sesac with the fift of Rehobam: wherein Sesac spoyled the Temple, and died, enjoying the fruits of his Sacriledge no longer, then Iosab the Israelite and Craſſus the Romane did; who, after him, spoyled the Temple of Ierusalem.

To fill vp the time betwene Sesac and Neſo, I haue rather taken those Kings that I find in the Greece Historians, than them which are in Ensebius his Catalogue. For of these that are deliuered by Ensebius, wee finde no Name nor Act recorded elsewhere, save onely of Bocchoris, who is remembered by Diodore, Plutarch, and others, much being spoken of him, that makes him appeare to haue bene a King. Herunto I may adde, that the ſucceſſion is often interrupted in Ensebius by Aethiopians, which got the Kingdome often, and held it long: whereas contrariwise it appeares by the Prophet Eſay, that the Councillors of Pharao did vaunt of the long and flourishing continuance of that house, inſomuch, that they said of Pharao, I am the Sonne of the Wiſe, I am the Sonne of the ancient King. But that which overthrowes the reckoning of Ensebius, is, the good agreement of it with his mistaken times of the Kings of Juda. For though it please him well to ſee how the raignes of Iosias and Neſo meete by his computation, yet this indeede marres all; the raigne of Iosias being misplaced. This error growes from his omitting, to compare the raignes of the Kings of Juda with theirs of Israel: by which occasion, Ioram, King of Israel, is made to raigne three yeeres after Ahazias of Juda; Samaritis is taken by Salmanaſſar before Hezekias was King: and in a word, all, or most of the Kings, haue their beginnings placed in ſome other yeere of their collaterals than the Scriptures haue determined.

§. VI.

Of CHEMMIS, CHEOPS, CEPHEAENE, and other Kings recited by HERODOTUS and DIDORUS SICVLVS, which raigned betwene the times of REHOAM and EZEKIA.

Following therefore the Greece Historians, I place Chemmis, or (according to Diodore) Chembis, first in the ranke of those that were Kings after Sesac. Hee raigned fiftie yeeres, and built the greatest of the three Pyramides, which was accounted one of this worlds Wonders. The Pyramis hath his name from the shape, in that it resembleth a flame of fire, growing from the bottom vpwards narrower and narrower to the topp. This of Chemmis being foure-square, had a Base of ſeuenaers every way, and was aboue fixe akers high. It was of a very hard and durable Stone, which had lasted, when Diodore saw it, about a thousand yeeres, without complaining of any iniurie that it had ſuffered by weather in so long ſpace. From the raigne of Chemmis, vnto the age of Augustus Caesar, wherein Diodore lived, are indeede a thousand yeeres; which giues the better likelihood vnto this time wherein Chemmis is placed. As for this and other Pyramides, late Writers tell us, that they haue ſcene them yet ſtanding.

After Chemmis, Diodore placeth Cephreus his brother; but doubtfully, and inclining rather to the opinion, that his ſonne Chabreus ſucceeded. Herodotus hath Cheops (who might bee Chabreus) and Cephreus after him. These are said to haue bene brethren; but the length of their raignes may argue the later to haue bene ſonne to the former: for Cheops raigned fiftie yeeres; Cephreus fiftie fixe. These were, as Chemmis had bene, builders of Pyramides, whereby they purchaſed great hatred of their people, who already had over-laboured themselves in erecting the first. These Pyramides were ordained to be Tombs, for those that raised them; but the malice of the Aegyptians is said to haue caſt out their bodies; and to haue called their Monuments by the name of an Heardſman, that kept his Beasts thereabouts. It may be, that the robbing them of their honour, and entitling a poore fellow to their workes, was held to be the calling out of their bodies; otherwise, it is hard to conceiue, how it might bee, that they, who had not power to auoid the like ſlauerie, laid vpon them by the younger brother, or ſonne, should haue power or leisure to take ſuch reuenge vpon his Predecessor. To the like malice may be ascribed the tale deuifed againſt Cheops his Daughter; That her Father, wanting money, did prostitute her, and that ſhee, getting of euery man that accompanied her, one ſtone, did build with them a fourth Pyramis, that stood in the middle of the other three. Belike ſhee was an insolent Lady, and made them follow their drudgery, for her ſake, longer a while than they thought to haue done, in raising a Monument, with the ſuperfluitie of her Fathers prouisions.

Myserinus, the ſonne of Cephreus, raigned after his Father fixe yeeres. He would haue built as his foregoers did, but preuented by death, finiſhed not what hee had begunne. The people thought him a good King, for that he did ſet open the Temples, which Cheops and Cephreus had kept ſhut. But an Oracle threatened him with a ſhort life of fixe yeeres only, becauſe of this his deuotion; For (ſaid the Oracle) Aegypt should haue bene afflicted an hundred and fiftie yeeres, which thy Predecessors knew and performed for their parts, but thou haſt releaſed it, therefore ſhalt thou live but fixe yeeres. It is very ſtrange, that the Gods should be offended with a King for his peticie; or that they should decree to make a Countreie impious, when the people were deſirous to ſerue them; or that they hauing ſo decreed, it should lie in the power of a King, to alter deſtinie, and make the ordinance of the Gods to faile in taking full effect. But these were Aegyptian Gods. The true God was, doubtleſſe, more offended with the reſtitution of ſuch Idolatrie, than with the interruption. And who knowes, whether Chemmis did not learne ſomewhat at Ierusalem, in the laſt yeere of his Father Sesac, that made him perceiue, and deliuer to those that followed him, the vanitie of his Aegyptian ſuperſtition? Sure it is that his raigne, and the raignes of Cheops, and Cephreus, were more long and more happie, than that of Myserinus, who, to delude the Oracle, reuelled away both daies and nights, as if by keeping candles lighted, hee had changed his nights into daies, and ſo doubled the time appointed: a ſeruiſe more pleaſing to the Deuill, than the reſtitution of Idolatrie durſt then ſeeme, when it could ſpeede no better. I finde in Reineccius fiftie yeeres assigned to this King; which I verily beleeue to haue bene ſome error of the print, though I finde it not corrected among other ſuch over-ſights: for I know no Author that giues him ſo many yeeres, and Reineccius himſelfe takes notice of the Oracle, that threatened Myserinus with a ſhort life, as is before ſhewed.

Bocchoris is placed next vnto Myserinus, by Diodore, who ſpeakes no more of him than this, that he was a ſtrong man of body, and excelling his Predecessors in wit. He is ſpoken of by diuers Authors, as one that loved iuſtice; and may be taken for that Banchyrus, whom Suidas commendeth in that kinde; Ensebius reckons foure and fortie yeeres of his raigne.

After Bocchoris, one Sabacus an Aethiopian followes, in the Catalogue of Diodore; but certaine ages after him. Herodotus, quite omitting Bocchoris, hath Aſchis; who made a ſharpe law (as it was then held) againſt bad debtors, that their dead bodies should be in the creditors diſpoſition, till the debt were paid. This Aſchis made a Pyramis of brick, more coſtly and faire, in his owne judgement, than any of those that the former Kings had raised. Beſides this Aſchis, Herodotus placeth one Anſis, a blinde man, before the Aethiopian. The raignes of these two are perhaps thoſe many ages, which the Aegyptians, to magnifie their antiquities, accounted betwene Bocchoris and him that followed them. But all this could make but fixe yeeres; and ſo long doth Funſius, ſo long doth Reineccius hold, that theſe two Kings, betwene them both, did gouerne. If any man would lengthen this time, holding it vnprobable, that the reignes of two Kings should have bene so loone spent; he may doe it by taking some yeeres from Setbon or Plammeticus, and adding them to either of these. To adde vnto these, without subtracting from some other, would breed a manifest inconuenience: forasmuch as part of Sesac his reigne, multi haue bene in the first of REIIOBONAN; as also the last of Pharao Neco was the fourth of Iehoiakim, and the first of Nebuchadnezzar. For mine owne part I like it better to allow fixe yeeres only to these two Kings, than to looke the witnesse of Herodotus, who, concurring herein with the Scriptures, doth speake of Sennacherib his warre: at which time Setbon was King of Aegypt. I will not therefore adde yeeres vnto these obscure names; for by adding vnto these men three yeeres, wee shall thrust the beginning of Setbon out of place, and make it later than the death of Sennacherib. In regard of this agreement of Herodotus with the Scriptures, I am the more willing to hold with him, in his Aegyptian Kings. Otherwise it were a matter of no great enuie, to leave both Aycheus and Amyris out of the roll; which were easily done, by placing Sesac lower, and extending his life yet fixe yeeres further, or more, (if the like abridgement shall be required of Plammeticus his reigne) into the yeeres of Rehoboam.

Of Sabacus the Aethiopian, who tooke the Kingdome from Amyris, it is agreed by the most, that he reigned fittie yeeres. He was a mercifull Prince, not punishing all capitall offences with death, but imposing bondage and bodily labour vpon malefactors; by whose toyle he both got much wealth into his owne hands, letting out to their seruice to hire, and performed many workes, of more vse than pompe, to the singular benefit of the Countrey. Zonaras calls this King Sua; the Scriptures call him So. Hosea, the last King of Israel, made a League with him against Salmanassar, little to his good: for the Aegyptian was more rich than warlike, and therefore his friendship could not preserue the Israelite from destruction.

It seemes, that the encroaching power of the Assyrian, grew terrible to Aegypt about these times; the victories of Tiglati Pileassar, and Salmanassar, haue eaten so farre into Syria, in the reignes of this one King So or Sabacus. Yea, perhaps it was in his daies (for his reigne beganne in the fourth of Menahem) that Phul himselfe did make the first entrance into Palestina. This caused So to animate the halfe subdued 30 people, against their Conquerours; but the helpe which he and his Successor gaue them was so faint, that Sennacherib Embassador compared the Aegyptian succour to a broken staffe of Reede. Such indeede had Hosea found it, and such Ezekie might haue found it, had hee not bene supported by the stronger staffe of Him, that rules all Nations with a rod of yron. It appeares by the words of Rabshake, that the opinion was great in Iuda, of the Aegyptian forces, for Charets and Horse-men; but this power, whatsoeuer it was, grew needtull, within a little while, for the defence of Aegypt it selfe, which So left vnto Setbon his successor, hauing now fulfilled the fittie yeeres of his reigne. Herodotus and Diodorus haue both one tale, from the relation of Aegyptian Priests, concerning the departure of this King, saying, that he 40 left the Countrey, and willingly retired into Ethiopia, because it was often signified vnto him in his dreames, by the God which was worshipped at Thebes, that his reigne should be neither long nor prosperous, vnlesse he flew all the Priests in Aegypt; which rather than to doe, he resigned his Kingdome. Surely, these Aegyptian gods were of a strange qualitie, that so ill rewarded their Seruants, and invited Kings to doe them wrong. Well might the Aegyptians (as they likewise did) worship Dogs as gods, when their chiefe gods had the propertie of Dogs, which loue their Masters the better for beating them. Yet to what end the Priests should haue faimed this tale, I cannot tell; and therefore I thinke that it might be some deuice of the fearefull old man, who seeing his Realme in danger of an inuasion, sought an honest excuse for his departure out of it, and with drawing himselfe into Ethiopia, where he had bene bred in his youth. What if one should say, that the Ethiopia into which he went, was none other than Arabia, whereof Tirhakah the King (perhaps at the instigation of this man) raised an Armie against Sennacherib, when hee meant meant to inuade Aegypt, within two or three yeeres after? But I will not trouble my selfe with such enquire. This I hold, that So, or Sabacus, was not indeede an Ethiopian (for in his time liued the Prophet Esay, who mentioneth the antiquitie of Pharaohs house) but onely so surnamed for his education, and because issuing from thence, he got the Kingdome from Amyris, who was his oppolite. The quiet and milde forme of his Gouvernement; his holding the Kingdome so long without an Armie; and many other circumstances argue no lesse. But whether finally hee betooke to a priuate life, or whether hee fore-went his Life and Kingdome at once, being now very old, it is time that we leaue him, and speake of Setbon his next Successor, who is omitted by Ezodorus, but remembered by Herodotus, by a sure token of his hauing bene King.

¶ VII.

Of Setbon who reigned with Ezekia, and sided with him against Sennacherib.

The first yeere of Setbons reigne falls into the twelfth of Ezekia, which was the fift of Sennacherib. It was a troublesome age, and full of danger; the two great Kingdomes of Assyria and Aegypt, being then engaged in a Warre, the issue whereof was to determine, whether of them should rule or serue. The Assyrian had the better men of warre; the Aegyptian better prouision of necessaries: the Assyrian, more Subjects; the Aegyptian, more Friends; and among the new conquered halfe Subjects of Assur, many that were Aegyptian in heart, though Assyrian in outward shew.

Of this last sort were Ezekias, and his people; who, knowing how much it concerned Pharao, to protect them against his owne great Enemy, preferred the friendship of so neere and mightie a Neighbour, before the seruice of a terrible, yet farre removed King. But herein was great difference, betweene Ezekias and his Subjects: For the good King, fixing his especial confidence in God, held that course of policie, which hee thought most likely to turne to the benefit of his Countrey: the multitude of Iuda, looking into the faire hopes which this Aegyptian league promised, were puffed vp with vaine conceits, thinking that all was safe, and that now they should not neede to feare any more of those iniuries, which they had suffered by the Assyrians; and so became forgetfull of God, taking counsaile but not of him. The Prophet Esay complained much of this presumption; giuing the people of Iuda to vnderstand, That the Aegyptians were men, and not God, and their Horses flesh, and not 40 Spirit; that God himselfe should defend Israel vpon repentance, and that Assyria should fall by the sword, but not of man. As for the Aegyptians (saide the Prophet) they are vaine, and they shall helpe in vaine, their strength is to sit still.

According to the Prophets words it came to passe. For in the treatie of Confederacie that was held at Zaan, all manner of contentment and assurance was giuen to the Iewes, by Setbon, or his Agents, who filled them with such reports, of Horses and Charets, that they did not looke (as Esay saith) vnto the holy one of Israel, nor seeke vnto the Lord. But he yet is wise.

After a while came Sennacherib with his Armie, and awakened them out of these dreames; for Setbon their good Neighbour, as neere as hee was, did seeme farre off, so being vnreadie, when his helpe was most needfull. It may seeme that he purposed, rather to make Palestina than Aegypt the stage, whereon this great Warre should be acted, and was not without hope, that the Assyrians and Iewes, weakening one another, should yeeld vnto him a faire aduantage ouer both. Yet he fought with mortie; for he sent Horses and Camels laden with treasure, to hire the Arabians, whom

E/gy calleth a people that cannot profit. These Arabians did not profit indeede; for (besides that it seemes by the same place of E/gy, that the rich treasures miscarried, and fell into the enemies hands before any helpe appeared from Tibacca,) all the strong Cities of Iuda were taken by Sennacherib, except Libna, Lachis, and Ierusalem it selfe, which were in sore distresse, till the sword of God, and not of Man, defeated the Assyrian, who did goe, for feare, to his Tower, that is, he fled to Ninene, where he was slaine.

Concerning this expedition of Sennacherib, Herodotus takes this notice of it: That it was purposed against Egypt, where the men of warre, being offended with Seton their King, who had taken away their allowance, refused to beare armes in defence of him and their Country; that Seton being Vulcan Priest, bemoaned himselfe to his god, who by dreame promised to send him helpers; that hereupon Seton, with such as would follow him, which were crafts-men, shop-keepers; and the like) marched towards Pelafum, and that a great multitude of field-mice entering the Campe of Sennacherib by night, did so gnaw the bowes quivers, and straps of his mens armour, that they were faine the next day to flie away in all haste, finding themselves disarmed. In memorie hereof (saith Herodotus) the statue of this King is set up in the Temple of Vulcan, holding a Moule in his hand, with this inscription: Let him, that b. bois me, serve Go. l. Such was the relation of the Egyptian Priests, wherein how firre they swarued from the truth, being desirous to magnifie their owne King, it may easily be perceived. It seemes that this Image of Seton was fallen downe, an I the tale forgotten in Diodorus his time, or else perhaps, the Priests did forbear to tell it him (which caused him to omit it) for that the Nation of the Jewes was then well knowne to the world, whereof euery child could haue told, how much falshood had beene mingled with the truth.

We finde this historie agreeable to the Scriptures, thus farre forth; That Sennacherib King of the Assyrians, and Arabians, (so Herodotus calleth him: the Syrian or peraduenture some borderers vpon Syria, being meant by the name of Arabians) liued in this age, made Warre vpon Egypt, and was miraculously driuen home. As for that exploit of the Mice, and the great pleasure that Vulcan did vnto his Priest; happy it was (if Seton were a Priest) that he took his god now in so good a mood. For within three or foure yeeres before this, all the Priests in Egypt should haue beene slaine, if a merciful King had not spared their liues, as it were halfe against the gods will. Therefore this last good turne was not enough to serue as an example, that might stirre vp the Egyptians to pietie, seeing that their deuotion, which had lasted so long before, did bring all the Priests into danger of such a bad reward. Rather I thinke, that this Image did represent Sennacherib himselfe, and that the Moule in his hand, signified Hieroglyphically (as was the Egyptian manner of expresseing things) the shamefull issue of his terrible expedition, or the destruction of his Armie, by meanes which came no man knew from whence. For the vengeance of God, shewed vpon this vngodly King, was indeede a very good motiue to pietie. But the clemencie, together with the Temple of Vulcan (being perhaps the chiefe Temple in that Towne where this Image was erected) might giue occasion to such a fable; the Deuill helping to change the truth into a lie, that God might be robbed of his honour. Yet that we may not belie the Deuill, I hold it very likely, that Seton, finding himselfe in danger, did call vpon his gods; that is, vpon Vulcan, Serapis, or any to whom hee had most deuotion. But so had other of his Predecessors done in the like neede: yet which of them had obtained succour by the like miracle? Surely the Jewes (euen such of them as most were giuen to Idolatrie) would haue beene alarmed of the confidence which they reposed, in the Charets of Egypt, because they were many, and in the Horse-men, because they were very strong; had it bene told them, that Seton, in stead of sending those Horse-men and Charets, was beseeching Vulcan, to send him and them good luck, or else (for these also were Egyptian gods) addressing his praiers to some Onyon or Cat. Howsoeuer it was, doubtlesse the prophetic of E/gy tooke effect, which said, They shall be all ashamed of the people that cannot profit them, nor helpe, nor doe them good, but shall bee a shame and also a reproch. Such is commonly the issue of humane wilddome, when resting secure vpon prouision that it selfe hath made, it will no longer seeme to stand in need of God.

Some there are who take Seton to haue beene set downe by Eusebius, vnder the name of Tarachus the Ethiopian; and therefore the twentie yeeres which are giuen to Tarachus, they allow to the Raigne of Seton. These haue well obserued, that Tarachus the Ethiopian is mentioned in the Scriptures, not as a King of Egypt, but as a friend to that Countrey, or at least an enemy to Sennacherib, in the war last spoken of the Ethiopians (as they are englished) ouer which hee reigned, being indeede Chusites or Arabians. Hereupon they suppose aright, that Eusebius hath mistaken one King for another. But whereas they thinke, that this Tarachus or Tirhaka, is placed in the roome of Seton, and therefore giue to Seton the twentie yeeres of Tarachus, I hold them to haue erred on the other hand. For this Ethiopian (as he is called) began his Raigne ouer Egypt, by Eusebius his accompt, after the death of Sennacherib and of Ezekia, in the first yeere of Manasses King of Iuda. Therefore he, or his yeeres, haue no reference to Seton.

Herodotus forgets to tell how long Seton reigned; Eusebius peremptorily, citing no Author, nor alleging reason for it, sets him downe thirtie three yeeres; many omit him quite; and they that name him, are not carefull to examine his continuance. In this case, I follow that rule which I propounded vnto my selfe at the first, for measuring the Raignes of these Egyptian Kings. The yeeres which passed from the first of Rehoboam, vnto the fourth of Iehoiakim, I so diuide among the Egyptians, that giuing to euery one the proportion allowed vnto him by the Author in whom hee is found, the rest is to be conferred vpon him whose length of Raigne is vncertaine; that is, vpon this Seton. By this accompt I find the thirtie three yeeres, that are set downe by Eusebius, to agree very neerely, if not precisely, with the time of Seton's Raigne; therefore I conformance my owne reckoning to his, though I could be content to haue it one yeere lesse. The reason of this computation I shall render more at large, when I arrive at the time of Pasamiticus, whereupon it hath much dependance, and whereinto the course of this Historie will shortly bring me, the Egyptian affaires growing now to be interlaced with the matters of Iuda, to which is meete that I returne.

CHAP. XXVII.

Of MANASSE and his Contemporaries.

p. I.

The wickednesse of MANASSES. His imprisonment, Repentance, and Death.

MANASSE, the Sonne of Ezekias, forgetting the pietie of his Father, and the prosperitie which followed him, serup, repaired, adorned, and furnished, all the Altars, Temples, and high Places, in which the Deuill was by the Heathen worshipped. Besides, hee himselfe esteemed the Sunne, the Moone, and the Starres, with all the hoste of Heauen, as gods, and worshipped them: and of all his acts the most abominable was, that he burnt his Sonnes for a Sacrifice to the Deuill Moloch, or Melchor, in the Valley of Hinnon, or Benhennon: wherein was kindled the fire of Sacrifice to the Deuills.

He also gaue himselfe to all kinde of Witchcraft and Sorcerie, accompanied and maintained those that had familiar Spirits, and all sorts of Enchanters: besides, he shed so much innocent blood, as Ierusalem was replenished therewith, from corner to corner. For all his vices and abominations, when he was reprehended by that aged and reuerent Prophet Eiaj (who was also of the Kings race, and as the Iewes affirm, the Father in-law of the King) he caused the Prophet neere vnto the Fountaine of Siloe to be sawne in sunder, with a wooden saw, in the eightieih yere of his life: a cruelty more barbarous and monstrous then hath been heard of. The Scriptures indeede are silent hercof yet the same is confirmed by Euphrasius, Isidore, Eusebius, and others, too many to rehearse, and too good to be suspected. Therefore the Lord brought vpon them the Captiuitie of the Host of the Kings of ASHUR, which tooke MANASSE, and put him in fetters, and bound him in chaines, and carried him to Babel: Whereafter he had lien twentie yere as a captiue, and dispoiled of all honour and hope; yet to his heartie repentance and continuall praiere, the God of infinite mercie had respect, and moued the Assyrians heart to deliuer him.

It is also likely that Merodach, because he loued his father Ezechias, was the easilier perswaded to restore Manasse to his libertie and estate. After which, and when hee was againe established, remembering the miseries which followed his wickednesse, and Gods great mercies toward him, he changed forme, detested his former foolish and deuillish Idolatry, and cast downe the Idols of his owne erection, prepared the Altar of God, and sacrificed thereon. He repaired a great part of Ierusalem: and dyed after the long raigne of fiftie five yeeares. Glycas and Suidas report, that Manasse was held in a cace of yron by the Assyrians: and therein fedde with bread of branne and water, which men may belecue as it shall please their fancies.

Of troubles in Egypt following the death of SETHON. Theraigne of PSAMMETICVS.

That the wickednesse of King Manasse was the cause of the euill, which fell vpon his Kingdome and Person, any Christian must needs beleue: for it is affirmed in the Scriptures. Yet was the state of things, in those parts of the World, such, at that time, as would haue inuited any Prince (and did perhaps inuite Merodach, who fulfilled Gods pleasure, vpon respect borne to his owne ends) delirious of enlarging his Empire, to make attempt vpon Iuda. For the Kingdome of Egypt, which was become the pillar, whercon the state of Iuda leaned, about these times was miserably distracted with ciuill disension, and after two yeeres, ill amended by a diuision of the gouernment betweene twelue Princes. After some good agreement betweene these, eleven of them fell out with the twelfth of their colleagues, and were all finally subdued by him, who made himselfe absolute King of all. This Inter-regnum, or meere Anarchie, that was in Egypt, with the diuision of the Kingdome following it, is placed by Diodore, who omitteth Sethon, betweene the raignes of Sabacus, and Psammeticus: but Herodotus doth set the Aristocratie, or twelue Gouernours, immediately before Psammeticus, who was one of them, and after Sethon.

The occasion of this disension seemes to haue bene the vncertaintie of title to that Kingdome (for that the Crowne of Egypt passed by succession of blood, I haue often shewed) which ended, for a while, by the partition of all among twelue, though things were not settled, vntill one had obtained the Souerainetie.

These twelue Rulers gouerned fiftene yeeres, in good seeming agreement, which to preserve, they made strait couenants and alliances one with another, being jealous of their estate, because an Oracle had foretold, that one of them should depose all the rest, noting him by this token, that he should make a drinke offering, in Vulcanus Temple, out of a Copper goblet. Whilest this vnite lasted, they joyned together in raising a Monument of their Dominion, which was a Labyrinth, built neere vnto the Lake of Maris, a worke so admirable, that (as Herodotus, who beheld it, affirms) no words could giue it commendation, answerable to the stateliness of the worke it selfe. I will not here set downe that vnperfect description, which Herodotus makes of it, but thinke enough to say, that he prefers it farre before the Pyramides, one of which (as he saith) excelled the Temple of Diana at Ephesus, or any of the fairest workes in Greece. Diodorus reports this Labyrinth to haue bene the worke of Maris, or Menides, a King which liued five generations before Proteus, that is, before the Warre of Troy, and from this Labyrinth (saith hee) Dedalus tooke the pattern of that which hee made for Minos in Crete. Who this Maris, or Menides was, I cannot tell. Reineccius takes him to haue bene Annemenes, which raigned immediately before Thuris. But this agrees not with Diodore: for Dedalus and Minos were both dead long before Annemenes was King. Belike Reineccius, desiring to accommodate the fabulous relations of Amethon, Chareman, and others, that are found in Iosephus, touching Amemphis and his children, to the storie of Amasis, &c. Alcifanes the Ethiopian, mentioned by Diodore, held it consequent, after he had conjectured Manethon Amemphis, to be Diodorus his Amasis; that Sethon should be Alcifanes, and that Annemenes should be Maris. If in this case I might intrude offendors; so likewise was Sabacus; Marus the next King after Achises built this Labyrinth; and the next (sauiing Sethon, whom Diodore omits, as hauiing not heard of him) that ruled after Sabacus, performed the same worke, according to Herodotus, who was more likely to heare the truth, as liuing neerer to the Age wherein it was performed. The varietie of names, and difference of times, wherein Diodore beleueed the Priests, might bee a part of the Aegyptian vanitie, which was familiar with them, in multiplying their Kings, and boasting of their antiquities. Here I might adde, that the twelue great Halls, Parlours, and other circumstances remembered by Herodotus, in speaking of this Temple, doe helpe to proue, that it was the worke of these twelue Princes. But I hasten to their end.

30 a conjecture; the times which wee now handle, are those, about which Reineccius hath erred in making search; Amasis was Amasis, Alcifanes was Sabacus; and Maris was one of these twelue Princes, to whom Herodotus giues the honour of building this famous Labyrinth. For Alcifanes the Ethiopian deposed Amasis; Sabacus the Ethiopian deposed Amasis; Alcifanes gouerned well, and was milde in punishing offenders;

At a solemne feast in Falens Temple, when they were to make their drinke-offerings, the Priest, forgetting himselfe, brought forth no more than eleuen Cups. Hereupon Psammetichus, who standing last, had not a Cup, tooke off his brazen Helmet, and therewith supplied the want. This caused all the rest to remember the Oracle, and to suspect him as a Traitor; yet, when they found that it was not done by him vpon set purpose, or ill intent, they forbore to kill him, but, being jealous of their estate, they banished him into the marish Countries by the Sea side. This Oracle, and the euent, is held by Diodore as a fable, which I beleue to haue beene none other: In the rest Herodotus and Diodore agree, saying, that Psammetichus hyed Souldiers out of Caria and Ionia, by whose aide he vanquished his Companions, and made himselfe sole King.

The yeeres of his raigne, according to Herodotus, were fiftie foure; according to Eusebius, fortie foure; Mercator, to reconcile these two, giues fortie foure yeeres to his single raigne, and ten to his rulings, joyntly with the Princes before spoken of. Indeede, he that was admitted, being a man growne (for hee cannot in reason be supposed to haue beene then a yong fellow) into the number of the twelue Gouernours, must be thought to haue liued vnto extreme old age, if he ruled partly with others, partly alone, threecore and nine yeeres. I therefore yeeld rather to Eusebius; but will not aduenture to cut five yeeres from the Ariftoerati, though peraduenture Psammetichus was not at first one of the twelue, but succeeded (either by election, or as next of blood) into the place of some Prince that dyed, and was ten yeeres companion in that gouernement.

Another scruple there is, though not great, which troubles this reckoning. The yeeres of these Aegyptians, as we finde them set downe, are more by one, than serue to fill vp the time, betwene the fift of Rehoboam, and the fourth of Iehoiakim. This may not be. Wherefore either we must abate one yeere from Sethon's raigne; that was of vncertaine length; or else (which I had rather doe; because Eusebius may haue followed better authority than I know, or than himselfe altogether, ingiuing to Sethon a time so neerely agreeing with the truth) we must confound the last yeere of one raigne, with the first of another. Such a supposition were not insolent. For no man can suppose, that all the Kings, or any great part of them, which are set downe in Chronological tables, raigned precisely so many yeeres as are ascribed vnto them, without any fractions: it is enough to thinke, that the surplussage of one mans time, supplied the defect of anothers. Wherefore I confound the last yeere of those fiftene, wherein the twelue Princes ruled, with the first of Psammetichus; who surely did not fall out with his Companions, fight with them, and make himselfe Lord alone, all in one day.

Concerning this King, it is recorded, that he was the first in Aegypt, who entertained any strait amitie with the Greekes; that hee retained in pay his Mercenaries of Caria, Ionia, and Arabia, to whom hee gaue large rewards and possessions; and that he greatly offended his Aegyptian Souldiers, by bestowing them in the left wing of his Armie, whilst his Mercenaries held the right wing (which was the more honorable place) in an expedition that he made into Syria. Vpon this disgrace it is said, that his Souldiers, to the number of two hundred thousand, forsooke their naturall Countrie

Countrie of Aegypt, and went into Ethiopia, to dwell there: neither could they be reuoked by kinde Mellages, nor by the King himselfe, who ouer-tooke them on the way; but when hee told them of their Countrie, their Wines, and Children, they answered, that their weapons should get them a Countrie, and that nature had enabled them to get other wines and children.

It is also reported of him, That he caused two Infants to be brought vp in such sort, as they might not heare any word spoken; by which meanes, he hoped to find out, what Nation or Language was most ancient; so far as much as it seemed likely, that nature would reach the children to speake that language, which men spake at the first. The issue hereof was, that the children cried, Becous, Becus, which word being found to signifie Bread in the Phrygian tongue, serued greatly to magnifie the Phrygian antiquitie. Goropius Becanus makes no small matter of this, for the honour of his Low-Lutch; in which the word Becker, signifies (as Baker in English) a maker of bread. He that will turne ouer any part of Goropius his works, may finde enough of this kinde, to perswade a willing man, that Adam and all the Patriarchs spake none other tongue than the Low-Lutch, before the confusion of languages at Babel; the name it selfe of Babel, being also Dutch and giuen by occasion of this confusion; for that there they beganne to babble, and talke, one knew not what.

But I will not inuill vpon all that is written of Psammetichus. The most regardable of his acts was the siege of Azotus in Palästina, about which he spent nine and twentie yeeres. Neuer haue wee heard (saith Herodotus) that any Citie endured so long a siege as this; yet Psammetichus carried it at the last. This Towne of Azotus had become worne by Tartan, a Captaine of Senacherib, and was now, as it seemeth, reiceued, but in vaine, by the Babylonians, which made it hold out so well.

¶ III.

What reference these Aegyptian matters might haue to the imprisonment and enlargement of MANASSES. In what part of his raigne MANASSES was taken prisoner.

Were it certainly knowne, in what yeere of his raigne Manasse was taken prisoner, and how long it was before hee obtained libertie; I thinke wee should finde these Aegyptian troubles to haue beene no small occasion, both of his captiuitie and enlargement: God so disposing of humane actions, that euen they, who intended only their owne businesse, fulfilled onely his high pleasure. For either the ciuill warres in Aegypt that followed vpon the death of Sethon; or the renting of the Kingdome, as it were, into twelue peeces; or the warre betwene Psammetichus and his Colleagues; or the expedition of Psammetichus into Syria, and the siege of Azotus, might minister vnto the Babylonians, either such cause of hope, to enlarge his Dominion in the South parts; or such necessitie of sending an Armie into those parts, to defend his owne, as would greatly tempt him, to make sure worke with the King of Juda. The same occasions sufficed also, to procure the deliuerie of Manasse, after he was taken. For hee was taken (as Ieseph hath it) by subtiltie, not by open force, neither did they that apprehended him, winne his Countrie, but only waite it. So that the Iewes, hauing learned wit, by the ill successe of their folly, in redeeming Achanaz, were like to be more circumspect, in making their bargain vpon such another accident: and the Babylonians (to whom the Aegyptian matters presented more weighty arguments of hope and feare, than the little Kingdome of Juda could afford, had no reason, to spend his forces, in pursuing a small conquest, but as full of difficultie as a greater, whereby hee should compell his mightiest enemies to come to some good agreement;

ment; when by quitting his present advantage over the Jews, hee might make his way the fairer into Aegypt.

Now concerning the yeere of Manasses his raigne, wherein hee was taken prisoner; or concerning his captiuitie it selfe, how long it lasted, the Scriptures are silent, and Iosephus giues no information. Yet I finde cited by Tornellus three opinions, the one of Bellarmino, who thinks that Manasses was taken in the fifteenth yeere of his raigne; the other of the Author of the greater Hebrew Chronologie, who affirms, that it was in his twentie seuenth yeere; the third, of Rabbi Kimbi vpon Ezekiel, who saith, that he was fortie yeeres an Idolater, and liued fifteene yeeres after his repentance. The first of these conjectures is vpheld by Tornellus, who rejects the second, as more vnprobable, and condemnes the third as most false. Yet the reasons alleged by Tornellus in defence of the first, and refutation of the last opinion, are such as may rather proue him to fauour the Cardinall, as farre as he may, (for where need requires, hee doth freely dissent from him) than to haue vsed his accustomed diligence in examining the matter, before hee gaue his judgement. Two arguments he brings to maintaine the opinion of Bellarmino: the one, that Ammon the Sonne of Manasses, is said by Iosephus, to haue followed the workes of his Fathers youth; the other, that had Manasses growne old in his finnes, it is not like that he should haue continued, as hee did, in his amendment vnto the end of his life. Touching the former of these arguments, I see no reason, why the finnes of Manasses might not be distinguished from his repentance in his old age, by calling them workes of his youth, which appeared when he was twelue yeeres old; though it were granted that hee continued in them (according to that of Rabbi Kimbi) vntill he was but fifteene yeeres from death. Touching the second; howsoeuer it be a fearefull thing, to cast off vnto the last those good motions vnto repentance, which we know not whether euer God will offer vnto vs againe; yet were it a terrible hearing, That the finnes, which are not forsaken before the age of two and fiftie yeeres, shall bee punished with finall impenitencie. But against these two collections of Tornellus, I will lay two places of Scripture, whence it may be inferred, as not vnlike, That Manasses continued longer in this wickednesse, than Bellarmino hath intimated, if not as long as Rabbi Kimbi hath affirmed. In the second Booke of Kings, the euill which Manasses did, is remembred at large, and his repentance vtterly omitted; so that his amendment may seeme to haue taken vp no great part of his life, the storie of him being thus concluded, in the one and twentieth Chapter. Concerning the rest of the acts of MANASSES, and all that hee did, and his sinne that hee sinned, are they not written in the booke of the Chronicles of the Kings of Iuda? The other place is in the foure and twentieth Chapter of the same Booke, where in rehearsing the calamities with which that Nation was punished in the time of Iehoiakim, the great Grand-child of this Manasse, it is said; Surely by the commandment of the Lord came this vpon Iuda, that hee might put them out of his sight, for the finnes of MANASSE, according to all that hee did, and for the innocent blood that hee shed (for hee filled Ierusalem with innocent blood) therefore the Lord would not pardon it. Who so considers well these places, may finde small cause to pronounce it most false, That the repentance and amendment of Manasses was no earlier then fifteene yeeres before his death; or most probable, That when he was twenty seuen yeeres old, he repented, and becoming a new man, liued in the feare of God fortie yeeres after. I will no longer dispute about this matter, seeing that the truth can not be discouered. It sufficeth to say, that two yeeres of ciuill dissension in Aegypt, fourteen or fifteene yeeres following, wherein that Kingdome was weakened, by partition of the Soueraignetie: the warre of Psammis against his Associates: and foure and twentie yeeres, of the nine and twentie, wherein the siege of Azotus continued, being all within the time of Manasses, did leaue no one part of his raigne (after the first fiftie yeeres) free from the danger of being oppressed by the Babylonian, whose men of warre had continuall occasions of visiting his Countre. All which I will adde hereto is this; that the fifteenth of Manasses

Manasses, was the last yeere of Setben in Aegypt, and the one and thirtieth of Merodach his raigne, or (accounting from the death of Asorhaddon) the twentieth: The feuen and twentieth of Manasses was the tenth of the twelue Princes, and the three and fortieth of Merodach: his fortieth, was the twentie third of Psammis, and the fift of Nabulassar, the sonne of Merodach in Babylon: but which of these was the yeere of his imprisonment, or whether any other, I forbear to shew mine opinion, lett I should thereby seeme to draw all matters ouer violently to mine owne computation.

This was the last great maistrice that the Babylonians had of the Kingdome of Iuda. For though Achaz promised Tribute to Sennacherib, yet Ezechias neuer payed it. True it is, that hee hoped to stay *Sennacherib*s enterprise against him, by presenting him with three hundred talents of silver, and thirtie of gold, besides the plate which couered the doores and pillars of the Temple.

But Manasses being pressed with greater necessitie, could refuse no tolerable conditions, that the Babylonian would impose vpon him; among which it seemes, that this was one, (which was indeede a point of seruitude) that hee might not hold peace with the Aegyptians, whilst they were enemies to Babylon. This appears not only by his fortifying with men of warre all the strong Cities of Iuda after his returne (which was rather against Psammis, whose partie hee had forsaken, than against the Babylonian, with whom hee had thenceforth no more controuersie) but likewise by that opposition, which Iosias made afterwards to Pharao Neco, in fauour of Nabulassar, which had bene against all reason and policie, if it had not bene his dutie by covenant. Of this I will speake more in conuenient place.

†. IIII.

Of the first and second Messenian Warres, which were in the reignes of EZEKIA, and MANASSES Kings of Iuda.

Now concerning such actions as were performed abroad in the world, about these times of Manasses, the most remarkable were the Messenian Warres; which happening in this age, and being the greatest action performed in Greece, betweene the Troian and Perisian Warres, deserue not to be passed ouer with silence.

The first Messenian Warre beganne and ended in the daies of Ezekias the second in the raigne of Manasses: but to auoide the trouble of interrupting our Historie, I haue thought it best, to rehearse them both in this place. Other introduction is needlesse, than to say, that the posteritie of Heracles, diuing the issue of Pelops, and the *Achaean*s, out of their seats, diuided their lands betweene themselves, and erected the Kingdomes of Lacedaemon, Argos, Messene, and Corinth; all which agreeing well together a while, did afterwards forget the bond of Kindred, and fought one anothers ruine with bloudie Warres; whereof these Messenian were the greatest.

The pretended grounds of the Messenian Warre, are scarce worth remembrance; they were so sleight. Ambition was the true cause of it; wherewith the Lacedaemonians were so transported, that any thing serued them as a colour, to accomplish their greedie desires. Yet other matter was alleged; namely, that one Polycharis a Messenian had slaine many Lacedaemonians, for which the Magistrates of Sparta desiring to haue him yielded into their hands, could not obtaine it. The Messenians on the other side, excused Polycharis, for that he was growne frantick, through injuries receiued from Eusepius a Lacedaemonian. This Eusepius had bargained to giue pasture to the Cattell of Polycharis, and was therefore to receiue part of the increase: but but not contented with the gaine appointed, hee sold the Cattaille, and Slaues that kept them, to Merchants, which done, he came with a faire tale to his friend, saying, that they were stolen. Whilst the lye was yet scarce out of his mouth, one of the slaues that had escaped from the Merchants, came in with a true report of all. The Lacedemonians being thus deprehended, confessed all, and promised large amends; which to recieve, he carried the Sonne of Polypheus home with him; but hauing him at home, hee villanously slew him. Wherefore, the Lacedemonians hauing refused, after long sute made by the wretched Father, to doe him right against this Theefe and Murderer, ought not to pick matter of quarrell, out of those things, which hee did in that madnesse, whereinto they themselves had cast him. So said the Messinians 10 253, & further offered to put the matter to compromise, or to stand vnto the judgement of the Amphictyones, who were as the generall Counsaile of Greece, or to any other faire course. But the Lacedemonians, who had a great desire to occupy the faire Countrie of Messene, that lay close by them, were not content with such allegations. They thought it enough, to haue come shew for their doings, which the better to colour, they reckoned vp many old injuries, and so without sending any defiance, secretly tooke an oath, to hold warre with Messene, till they had maitered it: which done, they seized vpon Amphias, a frontier Towne of that Prouince, wherein they put all to the Sword without mercie, very few escaping.

Hereupon the Messinians tooke Armes, and were met by the Enemy. A furious 20 battaile was fought betwene them, which ended not vntill darke night, with vncertaine victorie. The Messinians did strongly encampe themselves; The Lacedemonians, vnable to force their Campe, returned home. This Warre beganne in the second yere of the ninth Olympiad, and ended in the first of the fourteenth Olympiad, hauing lasted twentie yeeres. The two enemy Nations tried the matter, for a while, with their proper forces; the Lacedemonians waisting the inland parts of Messene; and the Messinians, the Sea-coast of Laconia. But it was not long ere friends, on both sides, were called in to helpe. The Arcadians, Argines, and Sicyonians, tooke part with Messene; the Spartans had, besides many Subjects of their owne, aide from Corinth, and hired Souldiers out of Crete. So a second, third, and fourth battaile 30 were fought, with as great obstinacie as the first; saying that, in the fourth battaile, the Lacedemonians were enforced to turne their backs; in the other fights, the victorie was stil vncertaine, though in one of them the Messinians lost Enphias their King, in whose stead they chose Ariflodemus.

Many yeeres were spent ere all this bloud was shed; for pestilent diseases, and want of monie to entertaine Souldiers, caused the Warre to linger. And for the same reasons, did the Messinians forsake all their inland Townes, excepting Ithome, which was a mountaine with a Towne vpon it, able to endure more, than the enemies were likely to doe. But, as some Authors tell vs, the Lacedemonians were so obstinate, in this Warre, because of their vow, that hauing absented themselves ten 40
 yeeres from Sparta, their wives sent them word, that their Citie would grow vnpopled, by reason that no children had bene borne them in all that time: Whereupon they sent back all their ablest yong men, promiscuously to accompanie the yong women, who got so many of them with child, as they became a great part of their Nation, and were called Parthenians. Diodorus refers the begetting of these Parthenians to a former time. But in proceffe of this Messinian Warre, when the Deuill in an Oracle had aduised the Messinians to sacrifice a Virgin of the stock of 50
 * Aegyptus, that so they might be victorious against the Lacedemonians; the lot falling vpon the Daughter of one Lyciscus, Epibolus the Priest, willing to saue her, said, there was only a fostered child, and not borne of the wife of Lyciscus: which answer giuing delay to the execution of the Maide, Lyciscus secretly fled away with her into Sparta. Then Ariflodemus, which afterwards was King, voluntarily offered his owne Daughter: but a yong Noble man, being in loue with the Maide, when otherwise he could not preuaile, said openly that shee was no Virgin, but that he had defloured her, and got her with child: whereupon the Father in a rage ripped vp his innocent Daughters belly, to disproue the Louers slander: at the graue of which Daughter of his, afterward falling, by other superstitions, into despaire of preuailing against the Lacedemonians, he slew himselfe, to the great hurt of his Countrey, which hee loued most dearly. For after his death the Messinians lost their courage, and finding themselves distressed by many wants, especially of victuals, they craued peace; which they obtained vnder most rigorous conditions. Halfe the yeerely fruits of their Land they were bound to lend vnto Sparta; and they, with their Wiues, to make solemne lamentations, at the death of euery Spartan King; they 10 were also sworne to liue in true subiection to the Lacedemonians; and part of their Territorie was taken from them, which was giuen to the Aginers; and such as had followed the Spartans in this Warre.

This peace being made vpon so vncuen termes, was not like to hold long. Yet nine and thirtie yeeres it continued (the Messinians not finding how to help themselves) and then brake out into a new and more furious Warre, than the former. The able yong men, that were growne vp in the roome of those Messinians, whom the former Warre had consumed, beganne to consider their owne strength and multitude, thinking themselves equall to the Lacedemonians, and therefore scorning to serue such Masters, as had against all right, oppressed their Fathers. The chiefe 20 of these was Ariflomenes, a noble Gentleman, of the house of Aegyptus; who perceiving the vniforme desires of his Countrey-men, aduentured to become their Leader. Hetherefore founding the affections of the Argines, and Arcadians, which hee found thoroughly answerable to his purpose, began open warre vpon the State of Lacedamon. This was in the fourth yere of the three and twentieth Olympiad; when the Lacedemonians, hasted to quench the fire before it should grow too hot, with such forces as they could raise of their own, without troubling their friends, meaning to deale with their Enemies, ere any succour were lent them. So a strong battaile was fought betwene them, and a doubtfull; sane that the Messinians were pleased with the issue, forasmuch as they had thereby taught their late proud Lords, 30 to thinke them their equals. Particularly, the valour of Ariflomenes appeared such in this fight, that his people would haue made him their King: but he, refusing the honour of that name, accepted of the burthen, and became their Generall. Within one yeere another battaile was fought, whereunto each part came better provided. The Lacedemonians brought with them the Corinthians, and some other friends to helpe: the Messinians had the Argines, Arcadians, and Sicyonians. This also was a long and bloudie fight; but Ariflomenes did so behaue himselfe, that finally hee made the Enemies runne for their liues. Of such importance was this victory, that the Lacedemonians beganne to bethinke themselves, of making some good agreement. But one Tyrtas an Athenian Poet, whom by appointment of an Oracle they had gotten to direct them, reenforced their Spirits with his Verses. After this, Ariflomenes tooke by surpris a Towne in Laconia and vanquished in fight Anaxander King of Sparta, who did set vpon him, in hope to haue recovered the bootie.

But all these victories of Ariflomenes perished, in the losse of one battaile, whereof the honour (if it were honour) or surely the profit, fell vnto the Lacedemonians, through the treason of Ariflorates, King of Arcadia, who being corrupted by the enemies with money, fled away, and left the Messinians exposed to a cruell butcherie. The losse was so great, that together with Andania their principal Citie, all the towns in Messene, standing too farr from the Sea, were abandoned, for lack of men to defend them, and the Mount Era fortified, whither the multitude, that could not bee 50 safe abroad, was conueied, into a place of safety. Here the Lacedemonians found a tedious worke, that held them eleuen yeeres. For besides that Era it selfe was a strong peece, Ariflomenes with three hundred stout Souldiers, did many incredible exploits, that wearied them, and hindered their attendance on the siege. Hee wasted all the fields of Messene, that were in the enemies power, and brake into Laconia, taking king away Corne, Wine, Catraile, and all provisions, necessarie for his owne people; the Slaues and houthold stuffe he changed into monie, suffering the owners to redeeme them. To remedie this mischiefe the Lacedemonians made an Edict, that neither Messene, nor the adjoyning parts of their owne Countrie, should be tilld or husbanded; which bred a great tumult among priuate men, that were almost vndone by it. Yet the Poet Tyrtaeus appeased this vproare with pleasing Songs. But Arifomenes grew so bold, that he not only ranged ouer all the fields, but aduentured vpon the Townes, surpris'd, and sackt Amphylæ, and finally caus'd the enemies to encrease and strengthen their Companies; which done, there yet appeared no likelihood of taking Era.

In performing these and other seruices, thrice Arifomenes was taken prisoner; yet still hee escaped. One escape of his deferues to bee remembered, as a thing very strange and maruailous. Hee had with too much courage aduentured to set vpon both the Kings of Sparta; and being in that fight wounded, and felled to the ground, was taken vp senselesse, and carried away prisoner, with fiftie of his Companions. There was a deepe naturall Caeinto which the Spartans vled to cast head-long, such as were condemned to die for the greatest offences. To this punishment were Arifomenes and his companions adjudged. All the rest of these poore men dyed with their falls; Arifomenes (howtoeuer it came to passe) tooke no harme. Yet was it harme enough to be imprisond in a deepe Dungeon, among dead carcasses, where he was like to perill through hunger and stench. But after a while hee perceiued by some small glimmering of light (which perhaps came in at the toppe) a Foxe that was gnawing vpon a dead bodie. Hereupon hee be thought himselfe, that this beast must needs know some way, to enter the place and get out. For which cause he made shift to lay hold vpon it, and catching it by the taile with one hand, saued himselfe from biting with the other hand, by thrusting his coate into the mouth of it. So letting it creepe whither it would, hee followed, holding it as his guide, vntill the way was too strait for him; and then dismissed it. The Foxe being loose, ranne through an hole, at which came in a little light; and there did Arifomenes delue so long with his nailes, that at last he clawed out his passage. When some fugitiues of Messene brought word to Sparta, that Arifomenes was returned home, their tale sounded alike, as if they had said, that a dead man was reuiued. But when the Corinthian forces, that came to helpe the Lacedemonians in the siege of Era, were cut in peeces, their Captaines slaine, and their Campe taken; then was it easily beleued, that Arifomenes was aliue indeede.

Thus eleuen yeeres passed whilst the enemies houering about Era, saw no likelihood of getting it; and Arifomenes with small forces did them greater hurt than they knew how to requite. But at the last, a slaue, that had fled from Sparta, betraied the place. This fellow had enticed to lewdnesse the wife of a Messenian, and was entertained by her, when her husband went forth to watch. It happened in a rainie-winter-night, that the husband came home vnlooked for, whilst the Adulterer was within. The Woman hidde her Paramour, and made good countenance to her husband, asking him, by what good fortune he was returned so soone. He told her, that the storme of foule weather was such, as had made all his fellowes leaue their Stations, and that himselfe had done as the rest did; as for Arifomenes, he was wounded of late in fight, and could not looke abroad; neither was it to be feared, that the enemies would stirre, in such a darke-rainie-night, as this was. The slaue that heard these tidings, rose vp secretly out of his lurking hole, and got him to the Lacedemonian Campe with the newes. There hee found Emperamus his Master, commanding in the Kings absence. To him hee vttered all; and obtaining pardon for his running away, guided the Armie into the Towne. Little or nothing was done that night. For the Allarme was presently taken; and the extreme darke-nesse, together with the noise of winde and raine, hindred all directions. All the next day was spent in most cruell fight; one part being incited, by neere hope of ending ending a long worke; the other enraged by meere desperation. The great aduantage that the Spartans had in numbers, was recompensed partly by the assistance, which women and children (to whom the hatred of seruitude had taught contempt of death) gaue to their husbands and fathers; partly by the narrownesse of the streets and other passages, which admitted not many hands to fight at once. But the Messenians were in continuall toile; their enemies fought in course, refreshing themselves with meat and sleepe, and then returning supplied the places of their wearie fellowes, with fresh Companies. Arifomenes therefore, perceiving that his men for want of reliefe were no longer able to hold out, (as hauing bene three daies, and three nights, vexed with all miseries, of labour, watchings, fighting, hunger, and thirst, besides continuall raine and cold) gathered together all the weaker sort, whom he compassed round with armed men, and so attempted to breake out through the midst of the enemies. Emperamus Generall of the Lacedemonians was glad of this; and to further their departure, caus'd his Souldiers to giue an open way, leauing a faire passage to these desperate madmen. So they issued forth, and arrived safe in Acadia, where they were most louingly entertained.

Vpon the first bruit of the taking of Era, the Acadians had prepared themselves to the rescue: but Arifocrates their false hearted King, said it was too late, for that all was already lost. When Arifomenes had plac'd his followers in safetie, he chose out five hundred the lustiest of his men, with whom hee resolu'd to march in all secret haile vnto Sparta, hoping to find the Towne secure, and ill manured, the people being runne forth to the spoile of Messene. In this enterprise, if he sped well, it was not doubted, that the Lacedemonians would be glad to recouer their owne, by restitution of that which they had taken from others; if all failed, an honourable death was the worst that could happen. There were three hundred Acadians that offer'd to ioyne with him; but Arifocrates marred all, by sending speedie aduertisement hereof, to Anaxander King of Sparta. The Epistle which Anaxander sent backe to Arifocrates, was intercepted, by some that mistrusted him to whom it was directed. Therein was found all his falsehood, which being published in open assembly, the Acadians stoned him to death, and casting forth his body vnburied, erected a monument of his treacherie, with a note: That the Periurer cannot deceiue God.

Of Arifomenes no more is remaining to be said, than that committing his people to the charge of his sonne Gorgus and other sufficient Governours, who should plant them in some new seat abroad, hee resolu'd himselfe to make abode in those parts, hoping to finde the Lacedemonians worke at home. His daughters hee bestowed honourably in marriage. One of them Demagetus, who raiged in the Ile of Rhodes, tooke to wife, being willed by an Oracle, to marrie the daughter of the best man in Greece. Finally Arifomenes went with his daughters to Rhodes, whence hee purposed to haue traualled vnto Ardis the Son of Gyges King of Lydia, and to Phraortes King of Media: but death preuented him at Rhodes, where hee was honourably buried.

The Messenians were inuited by Anaxilas (whose great Grandfather was a Messenian and went into Italy after the former war) being Lord of the Rhegiens in Italy, to take his part against the *Zanclean*s in Sicilie, on the other side of the Straights. They did so; and winning the Towne of Zancle, called it Messene, which name it keeps to this day.

This second Messenian warre ended in the first yeere of the twentie eight Olympiade. Long after which time, the rest of that Nation, who staying at home seru'd the Lacedemonians, found means to rebel; but were soone vanquished, and being driuen to forsake Peloponnesus, they went into Acarnania; whence likewise, after few ages they were expelled by the Lacedemonians, and then followed their ancient Countymen into Italy and Sicilie; some of them went into Africa, where they chose vnto themselves a seat.

It is verie strange, that during two hundred and foure score yeeres, this banished Nation retained their name, their ancient culmomes, language, hatred of Sparta, and loue of their forsaken Countrey, with a desire to returne vnto it. In the third yeere of the hundred and second Olympiad, that great Eparinondas, hauing tamed the pride of the Lacedamonians, reuoked the Messenians home, who came flocking out of all quarters, where they dwelt abroad, into Peloponnesus. There did Eparinondas restore vnto them their old possession, and helpe them in building a faire Citie; which, by the name of the Prouince, was called Messene, and was held by them euer after, in despite of the Lacedamonians, of whom they neuer from thenceforth flood in feare.

p. V.

Of the Kings that were in Lydia and Media, while MANASSES reigned, whether DEIOCES the Mede were that ARPHAXAD which is mentioned in the Booke of IUDITH. Of the historie of IUDITH.

ARDIS King of Lydia, and Phraortes of the Medes, are spoken of by Pausanias, as reigning shortly after the Messenian warre, Ardis succeeding vnto his father Gyger, beganne his raigne of nine and fortie yeeres, in the second of the fine and twentieth Olympiad. He followed the steppes of his father, who encroaching vpon the Ionians in Asia, had taken Colophon by force, and attempted Miletus and Smyrna. In like manner Ardis wanne Priene, and assailed Miletus; but went away without it. In his raigne, the Chimmerians, being expelled out of their owne Countrey by the Scythians, ouerranne a great part of Asia, which was not freed from them before the time of Alyattes this mans Grand-child, by whom they were driuen out. They had not onely broken into Lydia, but wanne the Citie of Sardes; though the Cattle or Citadell thereof was defended against them, and held still for King Ardis; whose long raigne was vnabie, by reason of this great storme, to effect much.

Phraortes was not King vntill the third yeere of the nine and twentieth Olympiad, which was fixe yeeres after the Messenian warre ended; the same being the last yeere of Manasses his raigne ouer Juda.

Deioces the father of this Phraortes, was King of Media, three and fiftie of these fixe and fiftie yeeres in which Manasses reigned. This Deioces was the first that ruled the Medes in a strict forme, commanding more absolutely than his predecessors had done. For they, following the example of Arbaces, had giuen to the people so much licence, as caused euery one to desire the wholesome securitie of a more Lordly King. Herein Deioces answered their desires to the full. For he caused them to build for him a stately Palace; he tooke vnto him a Guard for defence of his person; he seldom gaue presence, which also when he did, it was with such austerity, that no man durst presume to spit or cough in his sight. By these and the like ceremonies he bred in the people an awfull regard, and highly vpheld the Maieitie, which his Predecessours had almost letten fall, through neglect of due comportments. In execution of his Royall Office, he did vprightly and seuerely administer iustice, keeping secret spies to informe him of all that was done in the Kingdome. He cared not to enlarge the bounds of his Dominion, by encroaching vpon others; but studied how to gouerne wel his own. The difference found between this King, and such as were before him, seemes to haue bred that opinion which Herodotus deliueris, that Deioces was the first who reigned in Media.

Herod. lib. 1.

This

This was he that built the great City of Ecbatane, which now is called Tauris; and therefore he should be that King Arphaxad, mentioned in the storie of Iudith, as also Ben Merodach, by the same account, should bee Nabuchodonosor the Assyrian, by whom Arphaxad was slaine, and Holophernes sent to worke wonders, vpon Phudad and Lad, and I know not what other Countreies. For I reckon the last yeere of Deioces to haue bene the nineteenth of Ben Merodach; though others place it otherwise, some earlier in the time of Merodach Baladan, some later, in the raigne of Nabulassar, who is also called Nabuchodonosor.

In fitting this Booke of Iudith to a certaine time, there hath much labour bene spent with ill successe. The raignes of Cambyses, Darius, Hystaspis, Xerxes, and Ochus, haue bene sought into; but afford no great matter of likelihood: and now of late, the times, foregoing the destruction of Ierusalem, haue bene thought vpon, and this age that we haue in hand, chosen by Bellarmine, as agreeing best with the storie; though others herein cannot (I speake of such as faine would) agree with him. Whilst Cambyses reigned, the Temple was not rebuilt, which in the storie of Iudith, is found standing and dedicated. The other two Persian Kings, Darius and Xerxes are acknowledged to haue been very fauourable to the Jewes; therefore neither of them could be Nabuchodonosor, whose part they refused to take, and who sent to destroy them. Yet the time of Xerxes hath some conueniences, aptly fitting this Historie; & aboue all, the opinion of a few Ancient writers (without whose iudgement the authoritie of this Booke were of no value) haue placed this argument in the Persian Monarchie, inclines the matter to the Raigne of this vaine-glorious King. As for Ochus, very few, and they faintly, entitle him to the businesse. Manifest it is, and granted, that in the time of this Historie, there must be a returne from captiuitie lately foregoing; the Temple rebuilt; Iosaim High Priest; and a long peace, of threescore and ten yeeres or thereabout, ensuing. All these were to bee among the Jewes. Likewise on the other side, we must finde a King that reigned in Ninisie, eightene yeeres at the least; that vanquished and slew a King of the Medes; one whom the Jewes refused to assist; one that fought to bee generally adored as God; and that therefore commanded, all temples, of such as were accounted gods, to be destroyed; one whose Viceroy or Captaine Generall knew not the Jewish Nation; but was faine to learne what they were of the bordering people.

Of all these circumstances, the Priesthood of Iosaim, with a returne from Captiuitie, are found concurring, with either the time of Manasses before the destruction of Ierusalem, or of Xerxes afterward: the rebuilding of the Temple a while before, and the long peace following, agree with the raigne of Xerxes; the rest of circumstances requisite, are to be found all together, neither before, nor after the Captiuitie of the Jewes, and desolation of the Citie. Wherefore the briefe decision of this controuersie is, That the Booke of Iudith is not Canonical. Yet hath Tornielius done as much, in fitting all to the time of Xerxes, as was possible in so desperate a case. For he supposeth, that vnder Xerxes there were other Kings, among which Arphaxad might be one (who perhaps restored and redified the Citie of Ecbatane, that had formerly bene built by Deioces) and Nabuchodonosor might be another. This granted, he adds, that from the twelfth yeere to the eighteenth of Nabuchodonosor, that is fixe or fixe yeeres, the absence and ill fortune of Xerxes, in his Græcian expedition (which he supposeth to haue bene so long) might giue occasion vnto Arphaxad, of rebelling: and that Nabuchodonosor hauing vanquished and slaine Arphaxad, might then seek to make himselfe Lord of all, by the Armie which he sent forth vnder Holophernes. So should the Jewes haue done their dutie, in adhering to Xerxes their Soueraigne Lord, and resisting one that rebelled against him; as also the other circumstances rehearsed before, be well applied to the argument. For in these times, the affaires of Iuris were agreeable to the Historie of Iudith, and such a King as this supposed Nabuchodonosor, might well enough bee ignorant of the Jewes, and as proud as we shall need to thinke him. But the silence of all Histories, takes away

believe, from this coniecture: and the supposition it selfe is very hard, that a rebell, whose King was abroad, with an Armie consisting of seuentene hundred thousand men, should presume so farre, vpon the strength of twelue hundred thousand foot, and twelue thousand Archers on horsebacke, as to thinke that hee might doe what he list, yea that there was none other God then himselfe. It is indeede easie to find enough that might be said against this deuice of Tornilius: yet if there were any necessitie, of holding the booke of Iudith, to bee Canonically, I would rather chooſe to lay aside all regard of prophane Histories, and build some defence vpon this ground; than, by following the opinion of any other, to violate, as they all doe, the text it selfe. That Iudith liued vnder none of the Persian Kings, Bellarmino (whose workes I haue not read, but finde him cited by Tornilius) hath proued by many arguments. That shee liued not in the Raigne of Manasses, Tornilius hath proued very substantially, shewing how the Cardinal is driuen, as it were to breake through a wall, in saying that the text was corrupted, where it spake of the destruction of the Temple foregoing her time. That the Kings Arphaxad and Nabuchodonosor, found out by Tornilius, are the children of mere fantasie, it is so plaine that it needs no prooue at all. Wherefore we may truly say, that they, which haue contended about the time of this Historie, being well furnished of matter, wherewith to confute each other, but wanting wherewith to defend themselves (like naked men in a stony field) haue chased Holofernes out of all parts of time, and left him and his great expedition, Extra anni solique uias, in an age that neuer was, and in places that were neuer knowne.

23. & 25.

Surely, to find out the borders of APHETH, which were towards the South, and ouer against Arabia; or the Countries of Phud and Lud, that lay in Holofernes his way; I thinke it would as much trouble Cosmographers, as the former question hath done Chronologers. But I will not buse my selfe herewith; having already so farre digressed, in shewing who liued not with Manasses, that I thinke it high time, to returne vnto mine owne worke, and rehearse what others I finde, to haue had their part, in the long time of his Raigne.

§. VI.

Of other Princes and actions that were in these times.

THE first yeere of Manasses was the last of Romulus, after whose death, one yeere the Romans wanted a King. Then was Numa Pompilius a *Sabyn*e chosen; a peaceable man and seeming verie religious in his kinde. He brought the rude people, which Romulus had employed only in warres, to some good ciuillitie, and a more orderly fashion of life. This he effected by filling their heads with superstition; as perswading them, that he had familiarite with a Nymph called Egeria, who taught him a many of Ceremonies, which hee deliuered vnto the Romans as things of great importance. But all these deuices of Numa were, in his owne iudgement, no better then mere delusions that serued onely as rudiments to bring the Savage multitude of theues and out-lawes, gathered into one bodie by Romulus, to some forme of milder discipline, then their boysterous and wilde natures was otherwise apt to entertaine. This appeared by the Bookes that were found in his graue, almost fixe hundred yeeres after his death, wherein the Superstition taught by himselfe was condemned as vaine. His graue was opened by chance, in digging a piece of ground that belonged to one L. Petilius a Scribe. Two Coffines or Chests of bone were in it, with an inscription in Grecke and Latine letters, which said, That Numa Pompilius the sonne of Pompe, King of the Romans lay there. In the one Coffin was nothing found; his bodie being vtterly consumed. In the other were his Bookes, wrapped

vp in two bundels of wax; of his owne constitutions seuē, and other seuē of Philosophy. They were not onely vncorrupted, but in a manner fresh and new. The Pretour of the Citie desiring to haue a sight of these Bookes, when hee perceived wherunto they tended, refused to deliuer them back to the owner, and offered to take a solemne oath that they were against the Religion then in vse. Hereupon the Senate, without more adoe, commanded them to bee openly burnt. It seemes that Numa did meane to acquite himselfe vnto wiser ages, which he thought would follow, as one that had not bene so foolish as to beleue the Doctrine wherein he instructed his owne barbarous times. But the poyson wherewith hee had infected Rome, when hee sat in his Throne, had not left working, when hee ministred the Antidote out of his graue. Had these Bookes not come to light, vntill the dayes of Tully and Cæsar, when the mist of ignorance was somewhat better discuffed, likely it is that they had not onely escaped the fire, but wrought some good (and peraduenture generally) effect. Being as it was, they serued as a confutation, without remedie, of Idolatrie that was inueterate.

Numa reigned three and fortie yeeres in continuall peace. After him Tullus Hostilius the third King was chosen, in the six and fortieth of Manasses, and reigned two and thirtie yeeres, busied, for the most part in warre. Hee quarrelled with the Albanes, who met him in the field; but in regard of the danger, which both parts had to cause to feare, that might grow vnto them from the Thyrsenians, caused them to thinke themselves of a course, whereby without effusion of so much blood, as might make them too weake for a common enemy, it might bee decided, who should command, and who obey.

There were in each Campe three Brethren, Twinnes borne at one birth (Dionysius sayes that they were Cosen Germans) of equall yeeres and strength, who were appointed to fight for their severall Countries. The end was, that the Horatij, Champions for the Romans, got the victory, though two of them first lost their liues. The three Curatij that fought for Alba (as Lucretius tels it) were all aliue, and able to fight, yet wounded, when two of their opposites were slaine; but the third Horatius, pretending feare, did runne away, and thereby drew the others, who by reason of their hurts, could not follow him with equall speede, to follow him at such distance one from another, that returning vpon them, hee slue them, as it had bene in single fight, man after man, ere they could ioyne together and set vpon him all at once. Dionysius reports it somewhat otherwise, telling verie particularly, what wounds were giuen and taken, and saying, that first one of the Horatij was slaine, then one of the Curatij, then a second Horatius, and lastly the two Curatij, whom the third Horatius did cunningly seuer one from the other as is shewed before.

This is one of the most memorable things in the old Roman Historie, both in regard of the action it selfe, wherein Rome was laid, as it were in wager, against Alba, and in respect of the great increase which thereby the Roman State obtained. For the Citie of Alba did immediately become subiect vnto her owne Colonie, and was shortly after, vpon some treacherous dealing of their Gouernour, vtterly razed, the people being remoued vnto Rome, where they were made Citizens. The strong Nation of the Latines, whereof Alba, as the mother Citie, had bene chiefe, became ere long dependant vpon Rome, though not subiect vnto it, and diuers petty States adiacent, were by little and little taken in: which additions, that were small, yet many, I will forbear to rehearse (as being the works of fundrie ages, and few of them remarkable considered apart by themselves) vntill such time as this fourth Empire, that is now in the infancie, shall grow to bee the maine subiect of this Historie.

The seauenth yeere of Thippomenes in Athens, was current with the first of Manasse. Also the three last Gouernours for tenne yeeres, who followed Thippomenes, were in the same Kings time. Of these I find only names, Leocrates, Epander, and Erixias. After Erixias yeerely Rulers were elected.

These Gouvernours for tenne yeeres, were also of the race of Medon and Codrus, but their time of rule was shortened, and from tearme of life reduced vnto tenne yeeres; it being thought likely that they would gouerne the better, when they knew that they were afterwards to liue priuate men vnder the command of others. I follow Dionysius of Halicarnassus, in applying their times vnto those yeeres of the Olympiads, wherein the Chronological table; following this worke, doth set them. For he not onely professeth himselfe to haue taken great care in ordering the reckoning of times; but hath noted alwaies the yeeres of the Greeks, how they did answer vnto the things of Rome, throughout all the continuance of this Historie. Whereas therefore he placeth the building of Rome, in the first yere of the seuenth Olympiad, and affirmes, that the same was the first yere of Charops his gouernment in Athens; I hope I shall not need excuse, for varying from Pausanias, who sets the beginning of these Athenians somewhat sooner.

In the Raigne of Manasse it was, that Midas, whom the Poets fained to haue had Asse eares, held the Kingdome of Phrygia. Many fables were deuised of him, especially that he obtained of Bacchus, as a great gift, that all things which he should touch, might immediately be changed into Gold: by which meanes he had like to haue bene starued (his meat and drinke being subiect to the same transformation) had not Bacchus deliuered him from his miserable facultie, by causing him to walk himselfe in the Riuer Pactolus, the streame whereof hath euer since, forsooth, abounded in that precious Metall. Finally, it is said hee died by drinking Bulls bloud; being inuaded by the Scythians.

In this age flourished that Antimachus, who (saith Plutarch in the life of Romulus) obserued the Moones Eclipse at the foundation of Rome.

The Milesiens, or, (as Eusebius hath it) the Athenians hauing obtayned some power by Sea, founded Mastiratis a Citie on the East of Egypt. Pammilius herein seemes to haue assisted them, who vied all meanes of drawing the Greekes into Egypt, accounting them his surest strength. For neither Miletus nor Athens were now of power sufficient to plant a Colonie in Egypt by force.

About this time Archias with his companion Miscellus, and other Corinthians, founded Syracusa in Sicily, a Citie in after-times exceeding famous.

The Citie of Nicomedia sometime Asacus, was enlarged and beautified in this age by Zipartes native of Thrace. Sylla of Samius according to Pausanias liued about this time.

About these times also was Craton founded vpon the Bay of Tarentum by Miscellus, the companion of Archias that built Syracusa. Strabo makes it somewhat more ancient: and so doth Pausanias.

About the same time the Parthenians being of age and banished Lacedemon, were conducted by Phalantus into Italie: where it is said they founded Tarentum: but Iustinus and Pausanias find it built before, and by them conquered and amplified: and about the same time Manasse yet liuing, the Citie Phaselis was founded in Pamphylia, Gela in Sicily, Interamne in the Region of the Vmbri, now Vimin in Italie. About which time also Chaleadon in Asia, ouer against Byzantium (now Constantinople) was founded by the Megarcenes: who therefore were vpbraided as blind, because they chose not the other side of Bosphorus. It were a long worke to rehearse all that is said to haue bene done in the five and fiftie yeeres of Manasse: that which hath already bene told is enough: the rest being not greatly worth remembrance, may well be omitted, referring onely Ben Merodach, and Nabulassar, to the businesse that will shortly require more mention of them.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Of the times from the death of MANASSES to the destruction of Ierusalem.

§. I.

Of ANMON and IOSIAS.

AMON the sonne of Manasse, a man no lesse wicked then was his Father before his conuersion, restored the exercise of all sorts of Idolatrie: for which God hardened the hearts of his owne seruants against him: who slew him after he had reigned two yeeres: Philo, Eusebius and Nicephorus giue him tenne yeeres, following the Septuagint.

Iosias succeeded vnto Anmon, being but a childe of eight yeeres old. Hee beganne to seeke after the God of Dauid his Father; and in his twelfth yere he purged Iuda and Ierusalem from the high places, and the groves, and the carued and molten Images: and they brake downe in his sight the Altar of Baalim: He caused all the Images as well those which were grauen, as molten, to be stamp to powder, and strewed on their graves that had erected them, and this he commanded to be done throughout all his Dominions. Hee also slew those that sacrificed to the Sunne and Moone, and caused the Chariots and Horses of the Sunne to be burnt. Of Iosias it was prophesied in the time of Iereboam the first, when he erected the Golden Calfe at Bethel, that a child should be borne vnto the house of Dauid, Iosias by name, and vpon thee (saith the Prophet speaking to the Altar) shall he sacrifice the Priests of the high places, that burne incenses vpon thee: a prophetic very remarkable.

In the eighteenth yere of his raigne, hee rebuilt and repaired the Temple, at which time Helkiah the Priest found the Booke of Moses, called Deuteronomie, or, of the Law, which hee sent to the King: which when hee had caused to be read before him, and considered of the seuerer commandments therein written, the prosperitie promised to those that obserue them, and the sorrow and extirpation to the rest, he rent his garments, and commaunded Helkiah, and others, to aske counsell of the Prophetesse Huldah, or, Olda, concerning the Booke, who answered the messengers in these words. Thus saith the Lord, Behold, I will bring euil vpon this place, and vpon the inhabitants thereof, even all the curses that are written in the Booke, which they haue read before the King of Iuda, because they haue forsaken mee, and burnt incense to other Gods. Onely for the King himselfe, because he was a lover of God and of his Lawes, it was promised that this euil should not fall on Iuda and Ierusalem in his dayes, but that hee himselfe should inherit his graue in peace.

Iosias assembled the Elders, caused the Booke to be read vnto them, made a covenant with the Lord, and caused all that were found in Ierusalem and Beniamin to doe the like, promising thereby to obserue the Lawes and commandments in the Booke contained.

The execution done by Iosias vpon the Altar, idols, monuments, and bones of the false Prophets, at Bethel, argueth his Dominion to haue extended vnto those Countries, Countries, that had bene part of the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes. Yet I doe not thinke, that any victorie of Iosias in warre got possession of these places; but rather that Ezekias, after the flight and death of Senacherib, when Merodach opposed himselfe against Asarhaddon, did vnto the advantage which the faction in the North presented vnto him, and laid hold vpon so much of the Kingdome of Israel, as hee was able to people. Otherwise also it is not improbable, that the Babylonian finding himselfe vnable to deale with Pasamiticus in Syria (as wanting power to raise the siege of Azotus, though the Towne held out nine and twentie yeeres) did giue vnto Manasses, together with his libertie, as much in Israel as himselfe could not easily defend. This was a good way to breake the amitie that the Kings of Juda had so long held with those of Egypt, by calling a bone betwene them, and withall by this benefit of enlarging their Territorie with addition of more than they could challenge, to redeeme the friendship of the Jewes, which had bene lost by iniuries done, in seeking to bereaue them of their owne. When it is said, that Manasses did after his deliuerance from imprisonment, put Captaines of warre in all the strong Cities of Juda; it may be that some such businesse is intimated, as the taking possession, and fortifying of places deliuered into his hands. For though it be manifest that he rooke much paines, in making Ierusalem it selfe more defensible; yet I should rather beleue, that he, having already compounded with the Babylonian, did fortifie himselfe against the Egyptians, whose side hee had forsaken, than that hee trauailed in making such prouisions, only for his minds sake. The earnestnesse of Iosias in the King of Babel his quarrell, doth argue, that the composition which Manasses had made, with that King or his Ancestor, was vpon such friendly termes, as required not only a faithfull obseruation, but a thankfull requital. For no perswasions could suffice to make Iosias sit still, and hold himselfe quiet in good neutralitie, when Pharao Neco King of Egypt passed along by him, to warre vpon the Countries about the River of Euphrates.

The last yeere of Iosias his raigne it was, when as Neco the sonne of Pasamiticus, came with a powerfull Armie towards the border of Juda, determining to passe that way being the neerest toward Euphrates, either to strengthen the passages of that Riuer, about Carchemish or Cerussium, for the defence of Syria (as long after this; Diolestan is said by Ammianus Marcellinus to haue done) or perhaps to invade Syria it selfe. For it seemeth that the trauaile of Pasamiticus had not bene idlye consumed about that one Towne of Azotus, but had put the Egyptians in possession of no small part of Syria, especially in those quarters, that had formerly belonged vnto the Adades Kings of Damascus.

Neither was the induritie of Neco lesse than his Fathers had bene, in pursuing the warre against Babel. In which warre, two things may greatly haue auailed the Egyptians, and aduanced their affaires and hopes: the extraordinary valour of the mercenarie Greekes, that were farre better Souldiers than Egypt could of it selfe afford; and the danger wherein Assyria stood, by the force of the Medes, which vnder the command of more absolute Princes, began to feele it selfe better; and to shew what it could doe. These were great helpes, but of shorter endurance than was the warre; as in place more conuenient shall be noted. At the present it seemes, that either some preparation of the Chaldeans to reconquer, did enforce, or some disability of theirs to make resistance, did inuite the King of Egypt, into the Countries bordering vpon Euphrates; whither Pharao Neco ascended with a mighty Armie.

These two great Monarchs, hauing their swords drawne, and contending for the Empire of that part of the World, Iosias aduised with himselfe to which of these he might adhere, hauing his Territorie set in the mid way betwene both, so as the one could not invade the other, but that they must of necessitie tread vpon the very face and body of his Countrey; Now though it were so that Neco himselfe desired by his Embassadors, leaue to passe along by Juda, professing that hee

directed himselfe against the Assyrians onely, without all harmefull purpose against Iosias; yet all sufficed not, but the King of Israel would needs fight with him.

Many examples there were, which taught, what little good the friendship of Egypt could bring to those that had affiance therein: as that of Ioseph the last King of Israel, who when he fell from the dependance of the Assyrian, and wholly trusted to Sabacus or Sons King of Egypt, was utterly disappointed of his hopes, and in conclusion lost both his life and estate, which the Assyrian, so rooted vp and tare in pieces, as it could neuer after be gathered together or replanted. The calamities also that fell vpon Juda in the thirteenth and foureteenth yeeres of Ezekia, whilst that good King and his people relied vpon Sethon; and more lately, the imprisonment of Manasses, were documents of sufficient prooffe, to shew the ill assurance, that was in the helpe of the Egyptians, who (neere neighbours though they were) were alwayes vnready; when the necessities of their friends required their assistance. The remembrance hereof might be the reason why Neco did not seeke, to haue the Jewes renew their ancient league with him, but onely craued that they would be contented to sit still, and behold the pastime betwene him and the Assyrians. This was an easie thing to grant; seeing that the countenance of such an Armie, as did, soone after this, out-face Nabulassar, vpon his owne borders, left vnto the Jewes, a lawfull excuse of feare, had they forborne to giue it any checke vpon that way. Wherefore I beleue, that this religious and vertuous Prince Iosias, was not stirred vp onely by politike respects, to stop the way of Neco; but thought himselfe bound in faith & honour, to doe his best in defence of the Babylonian Crowne; wherunto his Kingdome was obliged, either by couenant made at the enlargement of Manasses, or by the gift of such part as hee held in the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes. As for the Princes and people of Juda, they had now a good occasion to shew, both vnto the Babylonians, of what importance their friendship was, and to the Egyptians: what a valiant Nation they had abandoned, and thereby made their enemy.

Some thinke, that this action of Iosias, was contrarie to the aduice of Jeremie the Prophet; which I doe not finde in the Prophecie of Jeremie, nor can finde reason to beleue. Others hold opinion, that he forgot to aske the counsell of God: and this is very likely; seeing hee might beleue that an enterprise grounded vpon fidelitie and thankfulness due to the King of Babel, could not but be displeasing vnto the Lord. But the wickednesse of the people (in whom the corruptions of former times had taken such roote, as all the care of Iosias in reforming the Land, could not plucke vp) was questionlesse farre from harkning how the matter would stand with Gods pleasure, and much farther from enquiring into his secret will, wherein it was determined, that their good King, whose life stood betwene them and their punishment, should now be taken from among them, and that in such sort, as his death should giue entrance to the miseries ensuing. So Iosias leauing all the strength hee could make, neere vnto Megiddo, in the halfe Tribe of Manasses, encountered Neco: and there hee received the stroke of death, which lingring about him till hee came to Ierusalem, brought him to the Sepulchers of his Ancestors. His losse was greatly bewailed of all the people and Princes of Juda, especially of Jeremie the Prophet: who inserted a sorrowfull remembrance thereof into his booke of Lamentations.

§. II.

OF PHARAO NECO that fought with IOSIAS: OF ΙΕΡΟΟΑΖ and ΙΕΡΟΙΑΚΙΜ Kings of Iuda.

F these warres, and particularly of this victorie, Herodotus hath mention, among the acts of Neco. He tels vs of this King, that hee went about to make a channell, whereby Ships might passe, out of Nilus into the Red sea. It should haue reached aboue a hundred miles in length, and beene wide enough for two Gallies to row in front. But in the middelt of the worke, an Oracle foretold that the Barbarians should haue the benefit of it, which caused Neco to desist when halfe was done. There were consumed in this toile some businesse twelue hundred thousand Egyptians; a losse great enough to make the King forsake his enterprife, without troubling the Oracle for admonition. How foueuer it were, he was not a man to be idle; therefore hee built a Fleet, and leauied a great Armie, wherewith hee marched against the King of Babel. In this expedition he vsed the seruice, as well of his Nauie, as of his land-forces; but no particular exploits of his therein, are found recorded, save onely this victorie against Iosias, where Herodotus calls the place Magdulus, and the Tewes Syrians; which is a small error, seeing that Iudaea was a Province of Syria, and Magdulus or Magdala is taken to haue beene the same place (though diuersly named) in which this battaile was fought. After this, Neco tooke the Citie of Cadytis, which was perhaps Carchemish, by Euphrates, and made himselfe Lord, in a manner, of all Syria, as Iosephus witnesseth.

Ios. Ant. Iud. l. 10 cap. 7.

Particularly we finde, that the Phenicians, one of the most powerfull Nations in Syria, were his Subjects, and that by his command they surrounded all Africa, setting saile from the gulfes of Arabia, and so passing along all the Coast, whereto they both landed, as neede required, and sowed corne for their sustenance, in that long voyage which lasted three yeeres. This was the first nauigation about Africa, wherein that great Cape, now called, Of good hope, was discovered; which after was forgotten, untill Vasco de Gama the Portingall found it out, following a contrarie course to that which the Phenicians held; for they, beginning in the East, ranne the way of the Sunne, South and then Westward, after which they returned home by the pillars and streights of Hercules (as the name was then) called now the straights of Gybraltar, hauing Africke still on the right hand: but the Portingalls, beginning their voyage not farre from the same straights, leaue Africke on the Larboord, and bend their course vnto the East. That report of the Phenicians, which Herodotus durst not beleuee, how the Sunne in this iourne was on their right hand, that is, on the Northside of them, is a matter of necessarie truth; and the obseruation then made herof, makes mee the better to beleuee, that such a Voyage was indeede performed.

Ios. c. 23. v. 32.

But leauing these discourses of Neco his magnificence, let vs tell what hee did, in matters more importing his Estate. The people of Iuda, while the Egyptians were busie at Carchemish, had made Iehoahaz their King, in the roome of his father Iosias. The Prophet Jeremie calls this new King Shallum, by the name of his younger brother; alluding perhaps to the short Raigne of Shallum King of the tenne Tribes: for Shallum of Israel reigned but one moneth; Iehoahaz no more than three. Hee was not the eldest sonne of Iosias; Wherefore it may seeme that he was set vp as the best affected vnto the King of Babel; the rest of his house being more inclined to the Egyptians, as appeares by the sequell. An Idolater he was, and thrived accordingly. For when as Neco had dispatched his businesse in the North parts of Syria, then did he take order for the affaires of Iudaea. This Countrie was now so farre from making any resistance, that the King himselfe came to Riblah in the Land of Hamath, where where the matter went so ill on his side, that Neco did cast him into bonds and carry him prisoner into Egypt, giuing away his Kingdome to Eliakim his elder brother, to whom of right it did belong. This Citie of Riblah, in after times called Antiochia, was a place vnhappie to the Kings and Princes of Iuda, as may be obserued in diuers examples. Yet here Iehoiakim, together with his new name, got his Kingdome; an ill gaine, since he could no better vse it. But how euer Iehoiakim thrived by the bargain, Pharao sped well, making that Kingdome Tributarie, without any stroke stricken, which three months before was too floute to giue him peace, when he desired it. Certaine it is, that in his march toward, Neco had a greater taskelying vpon his hands, than would permit him to waite his forces vpon Iudaea: but now the reputation of his good successe at Magdalo, and Carchemish, together with the dissension of the Princes Iosias his sonnes (of whom the eldest is probably thought to haue stormed at the preferment of his yonger brother) gaue him power to doe, euen what should please himselfe. Yet hee did forbear to make a conquest of the Land; perhaps vpon the same reason, which had made him so earnest, in seeking to hold peace with it. For the Iewes had suffered much, in the Egyptians quarrell, and being left by these their friends, in time of need, vnto all extremities, were driuen to forsake thar party, and joyne with the enemies; to whom if they shewed themselves faithfull, who could blame them? It was therefore enough to reclaime them; seeing they were such a people, as would not vpon euerie occasion shift side, but endure more, than Pharao, in the pride of his victories, thought that any benefit should lay vpon them: so good a Patron did he meane to be vnto them. Nevertheless hee laid vpon them a Tribute, of an hundred Talents of silver, and one Talent of gold; that so he might both reape at the present, some fruit of his paines taken, and leaue vnto them some document in the future, of greater punishment then verball anger, due to them, if they should rebell. So hee departed, carrying along with him into Egypt the vnfortunate King Iehoahaz, who died in his Captiuitie.

The raigne of Iehoahaz was included in the end of his Fathers last yeere; or therwise it would hardly be found, that Iehoiakim, his successeour, did raigne tenne whole yeeres; whereas the Scriptures giue him eluen, that is current and incomplete. If any man will rather cast the three moneths of this short raigne, into the first yeere of the brother, than into the fathers last; the same arguments that shall maintaine his opinion, will also proue the matter to bee vnworthy of disputation; and so I leaue it.

Iehoiakim in impietie was like his brother, in faction he was altogether Egyptian, as hauing receiued his Crowne at the hand of Pharao. The wickednesse of these last Kings, being expressed in Scriptures none otherwise, than by general words, with reference to all the euill that their Fathers had done, makes it apparent, that the poison wherewith Ahas and Manasses had infected the Land, was not so expelled by the zealous goodnesse of Iosias, but that it still cleaued vnto the chiefe of the people, yea vnto the chiefe of the Priests; also; and therefore it was not strange; that the Kings had their part therein. The Royall authoritie was much abated by the dangers wherein the Countrie stood, in this troublefome age: the Princes did in a manner what they listed; neither would the Kings forbear to professe, that they could denie them nothing. Yet the beginning of Iehoiakim had the countenance of the Egyptian to grace it, which made him insolent & cruell; as we find by that example of his dealing with Vria the Prophet: though herein all the Princes doe appear to haue beene instigators. This Holy man denounced Gods judgements against the Citie and Temple, in like sort as other Prophets had formerly done, and did in the same age. The King with all the men of power, and all the Princes, hearing of this determined to put him to death. Hereupon the poore man fled into Egypt: but such regard was had vnto Iehoiakim, that Vria was deliuered vnto his Embassadour, and sent backe to the death; contrary to the custome vsed, both in those

2. Chron. cap. 36. v. 14.

those dayes, and since among all Ciuill Nations of giuing refuge vnto strangers, that are not held guiltie of such inhumane crimes, as for the generall good of mankind should be exempted from all priuiledge.

It concerned Pharao to giue all contentment possible to Scheiakim: for the Affirian Lyon, that had not stirred in many yeeres, beganne about these times, to roare so lowd vpon the bankes of Euphrates, that his voice was heard vnto Nihue, threatening to make himselfe Lord of all the Forrest. The causes that hitherto had withdrawn the houle of Merodach, from opposing the Aegyptian in his conquest of Syria, require our consideration in this place; before we proceed to commit them together at Charchemish, where shortly after this, the glory of Aegypt is to fall.

§. III.

Of the Kings of Babylon and Media. How it came to passe that the Kings of Babel could not giue attendance on their businesse in Syria; which caused them to loose that Province.

MERODACH the sonne of Baladan, who taking the aduantage that Senacherib's misaduenture and death, together with the dissenion betwene his children presented, made himselfe King of Babylon, was euen yeeres troubled with a powerfull Enemy Asarhaddon the sonne of Senacherib, rainging ouer the Affrians in Niniue; from whom whilst he could not any other way diuert his cares, he was faine to omit all businesse in Syria, and (as hath beene formerly shewed) to make ouer vnto Ezekia, some part of the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes. From this molestation, the death of Asarhaddon did not onely let him free, but gaue vnto him some part of Affria, if not (as is commonly but lesse probably thought) the whole Kingdome. How greatly this was to the liking of the Affrians, I wil not here stand to enquire: his long rainge following, and his litle entermedling in matters of Syria, make it plaine, that he had worke enough at home, either in defending or in establishing that which he had gotten. Iosephus giues him the honour of hauing wonne Niniue it selfe; which we may beleue; but surely he did not hold it long. For in the times soone following, that great Citie was free, and vanquished Phraortes the Median. Perhaps it yielded vpon some capitulation: and refused afterwards to continue subject, when the Kings being of the Chaldee race, preferred Babylon before it.

Some thinke that this was the Affrian King, whose Captaines tooke Manasse prisoner; but I rather beleue those that hold the contrarie; for which I haue giuen my reasons in due place. To say truth, I find little cause why Merodach should haue looked into those parts, as long as the Temes were his friends, and the Aegyptians, that maligned the Northerne Empire, held themselves quiet at home, which was vntill the time of Psammetichus, about the end of this Kings Rainge, or the beginning of his sonne.

Ben Merodach the sonne and succcessour of this King, is not mentioned in the Scriptures; yet is hee named by good consent of Authours, and that I speake little of his doings. The length of his Rainge is gathered by inference to haue beene one and twentie yeeres, for so much remaineth of the time that passed betwene the beginning of his Fathers and his Nephewes Rainges (which is a knowne summe) deducting the yeeres of his Father, and of his sonne Nabulassar. This (as I take it) was he that had Manasse Prisoner and released him. He sped ill in Syria; where Psammetichus, by the vertue of his Mercinarie Greekes, did much preuaile. T his may haue beene some cause that he released Manasse, and did put into his handes some part more of the Kingdome of Samaria: which is made probable by circumstances alleged before.

Nabulassar that raigne in Babylon after his Father Ben Merodach, had greater busines in his own Kingdome, than would permit him to looke abroad: in somuch as it may bee thought to haue beene a great negligence or ouer-sight of Psammetichus and Neco, that they did not occupie some good part of his Dominions beyond Euphrates. For it was in his time, that Phraortes King of the Medes inuaded Affria, and besieged Niniue; from whence he was not repelled by any force of Nabulassar, but constrained to remoue by the comming of Scythians, who in these ages did ouer-flow those parts of the World, laying hold vpon all, that they could master by strong hand. Of these Scythians, and the Lordship that they held in Asia, it is conuenient that I speake in this place; shewing briefly afore-hand, how the Medes, vpon whom they first fell, were bulied in the same times with hopes of conquering Affria.

Phraortes, the sonne of Deioeces, King of the Medes, hauing by many victories enlarged his Dominions, conceived at length a faire possibilitie of making himselfe Lord of Niniue.

T hat Citie (as Herodotus reports it) hauing beene a Soueraigne Ladie, was not forsaken of all her dependants; yet remained in such case, that of her selfe shee was well enough.

T his makes it plaine, that howsoeuer Merodach had gotten possession of this imperiall seat, and made it subiect as was the rest of the Countrie; yet it found the meanes to set it selfe at libertie: as after this againe he did, when it had beene regained by Nabulassar his Grand-child.

Sharpe warre, and the very nouelty of suddaine violence, vs to dismay any State or Countrie, not inured to the like: but custome of danger hardeneth euen those that are vnwarlike. Niniue had been the Palace of many valiant Kings lately rainging therein; it had suffered, and resisted, all the furie, wherewith either Domestick tumults betwene the sonnes of Senacherib, or forraigne warre of the Babylonians, could afflict it: and therefore it is the lesse wonderfull, that Phraortes did speed so ill in his iourney against it. He and the most of his Armie perished in that expedition: whereof I find no particular circumstances (perhaps he vnderualued their forces, and brought a lesse power than was needfull) It is enough, that we may here beleue Herodotus.

Cyaxares the sonne of Phraortes, a brauer man of warre then his Father, wanne as much of Asia the lesse, as lay Eastward, from the Riuier of *Haly*s; he sought reuenge vpon the Affrians for the death of his Father, and besieged Niniue it selfe, hauing a purpose to destroy it. I rather beleue Eusebius, that he tooke the Citie, and fulfilled his displeasure vpon it, than Herodotus, that the Scythian Armie came vpon him whilst he lay before it. For where equall authorities are contradictory (as Eusebius, though farre later then Herodotus, yet hauing scene other Authours, that are now lost, is to be valued according to his great reading) there doe I hold it best, to yeild vnto the best likelihoods.

To thinke that the Scythians came vpon Cyaxares, whilst he lay before Niniue, were to accuse him of greater improuidence, then ought to bee suspected in one commended as a good Souldier. But to suppose that hee was faine to leaue the Towne, when a warre so dangerous tell vpon his owne Countrie, doth well agree both with the condition of such businesse as that Scythian expedition brought into those parts, and with the State of the Chaldee and Affrian affaires ensuing.

The destruction of this great Citie is both foretold in the Booke of Tobit, and there set downe as happening about these times; of which Booke who soeuer was the Authour, hee was ancient enough to know the Storie of those ages, and hath committed no such error in reckoning of times, as should cause vs to distrust him in this. As for the Prophecie of Nahum, though it be not limited vnto any certaine tearme, yet it appears to haue taken effect, in the finall destruction of Ninine by Nabuchodonosor, according to the common opinion. For the Prophet hath mention of a Conquest of Egypt, foregoing this calamitie, whereof we will speake in due place. Some that ascribe more authoritie then the reformed Churches yelde, to the Booke of Tobit, are careful, as in a matter of necessitie, to affirme, that about these times Ninine was taken; but they attribute (coniecturally) the victorie ouer it, to Ben Merodach: a needlesse coniecture, if the place of Eusebius be well con- sidered. Yet I hold it probable, that Nabulassar the sonne of Ben Merodach, did seize vpon it, and place a King or Viceroi therein, about such time as the Countrie of Assyria was abandoned by Cyaxares, when the Scythian warre ouerwhelmed Media. For then was the Conquest wrought out readie to his hand; the swelling spirits of the Assyrians were allayed, and their malice to Babylon so asswaged, that it might be thought a great fauour, if Nabulassar, appointing vnto them a peculiar King, took him and them into protection: though afterwards to their confusion, this vnthank- full people and their King, rebelled againe, as shall be shewed in the Raigne of Nabuchodonosor.

The great expedition of the Scythians, who ruled in Asia eight and twentie yeeres.

¶ I.

The time of this expedition.

NOW that I haue shewed what impediment was giuen by the Assyrians and the Medes, to the Babylonians, who thereby were much dis- abled to performe any action of worth vpon the Egyptians in Syria; it is time that I speake of that great Scythian expedition, which grie- uously afflicted not only the Babylonians, but the Medes and Lydians, with the Countreys adiacent, in such wise, that part of the trouble redounded euen to the Egyptians themselves. Of the Scythian people in generall, Herodotus makes very large discourse, but interlaced, as of matter ill knowne, with many Fables; of this expedition he tels many particulars, but agreeing with consent of time. Concerning his fabulous reports, it will be needlesse to recite them, for they are farre enough distant from the businesse in hand. The computation of times which by inference out of his relations, may seeme very strange, needeth some answer in this place: lest otherwise I should either seeme to make my selfe too bold with an Au-thour, in citing him after a manner different from his owne tale; or else to bee too forgetfull of my selfe, in bringing to act vpon the Stage, those persons, which I had already buried. Eight and twentie yeeres, he saith, that the Scythians Raigned in Asia, before Cyaxares deliuered the Countrie from them: Yet he reports a warre betweene Cyaxares and Halyattes the Lydian, as foregoing the siege of Ninine; the siege of Ninine being ere the Scythians came. And further he tels, how the Scythians, hauing vanquished the Medes, did passe into Syria, and were encountered in Palestina by Psammetichus King of Egypt, who by gifts and entreatie procured them to depart from him. These narrations of Herodotus may, euery one of them, bee true; though not in such order of time, as hee hath marshalled them. For Psammetichus was dead before Cyaxares beganne to Raigne: and Cyaxares had spent halfe of his fortie yeeres, ere Halyattes was King of Lydia; so that he could not, after those Ly- dian

dian warres, Raigne eight and twentie yeeres together with the Scythians. It is true, that Eusebius doth also call Psammetichus the sonne of Pharao Nece, by name of Psammetichus; and this King Psammetichus may, by some trained coniecture, bee thought to haue bene he that met with the Scythians: for he liued with both Cyaxares and Halyattes. But Eusebius himselfe referres all that businesse of the Scythian irruption in- to Palestina, to Psammetichus the Father of Nece, whom hee leaues dead before the Raigne of Halyattes. Therefore I dare not relie vpon Herodotus, in this matter, otherwise then to beleene him, that such things were in these ages, though not in such order as he sets them downe.

It remaines, that I collect as well as I can, those memorials which I finde of this expedition scattered in diuers places: a worke necessarie, for that the greatnesse of this action was such, as ought not to bee omitted in a generall Historie; yet not easie, the consent of those that haue written thereof, being nothing neere to vn-formitie.

I haue noted before, that in the Raigne of Ardis King of Lydia, the Cimmerians ouer-ran that Kingdome, and were not expelled, vntill Halyattes the Nephew of Ardis got the vpper hand of them. In these times therefore of Ardis, Sadiattes, and Halyattes, are we to find the eight and twentie yeeres, wherein the Scythians raigned ouer Asia. Now forasmuch as Psammetichus the Egyptian had some dealings with the Scythians, euen in the height of their prosperitie, we must needs allow more then one or two of his last yeeres vnto this their Dominion. But the beginning of Halyattes his Raigne in Lydia, being three and twentie yeeres compleat after the death of Psammetichus, leaues the space very scant, either for the great victories of the Scythians, necessarily supposed before they could meet the Egyptian in Syria, or for those many losses, which they must haue recieued ere they could be driven quite away. To increase this difficultie, the victorious Raigne of Nabuchodo-nosor in Babylon, is of no small moment. For how may we thinke it possible, that he should haue aduentured the strength of his Kingdome against the Egyptians and Leues, had hee stood in daily feare of losing his owne; to a more mightie Nation, that lay vpon his necke? To speake simply as it appears to me; the victories ascribed to Cyaxares & Halyattes ouer these warlike people, were not obtained against the whole body of their Armie, but were the defeates of some troupes, that infested their severall Kingdomes; other Princes, and among these, Nabulassar hauing the like successes, when the pleasures of Asia had mollified the courages of these hardie Northerne Laddes. Wherefore wee may probably annexe the eight and twentie yeeres of the Scythians rule, to as many almost the last of Nabulassar his Raigne, in compasse whereof their power was at the greatest. This is all that I can say of the time, wherein Asia suffered the violence of these oppressors.

¶ II.

What Nations they were that brake into Asia; with the cause of their Iourne.

TOUCHING the expedition it selfe, Herodotus tels vs, that the Cimmerians being driuen out of their Countrie by the Scythians, invaded and waited some part of Asia; and that the Scythians not contented with hauing wonne the land of the Im- merians, did follow them, I know not why, into farre remooued quarters of the world, so (as it were by chance) falling vpon Media and Egypt, in this pursuit of men that were gone another way into Lydia. Hereby we may gather that the Im- merians were an odious and base people; the Scythians, as mischieuous and foolish; or else Herodotus; and some other of his Countreimen, great slanderers of those, by whom

whom their Nation had bene beaten, and Ionia, more then once, grievously ransackt. The great valour of the Cimmerians or Cimbrians is so well known, and their manie Conquests so well testified in Histories of diuers Nations, that the malice of the Greekes is insufficient to flaine them with the note of Cowards. These were the posteritie of Gomer, who peopled the greatest part of our Western World; and whose reflow did ouerwhelme no small portion of Greece and Asia, as well before and after, as in the age whereof wee doe now entreat. He that would more largely informe himselfe of their originall and actions, may peruse Goropius Becanus his Amazonica; of many things in which Booke, that may be verified, which the learned Ortelius is said to haue spoken, of all Goropius his works, that it is easie to laugh at them, but hard to confute them: There wee find it proued, by such arguments and authorities, as are not lightly to be regarded, that the Cimmerians, Scythians, and Sarmatians, were all of one Linage and Nation; how soeuer distinguished in name, by reason of their diuers Tribes, professions, or perhaps dialect of speech. Homer indecde hath mention of the Cimmerians; whose Countrey whether he place in the West, as neer vnto the Ocean and boundes of the Earth, Or in the North, as being farre from the Sunne, and couered with eternall darknesse; certaine it is that he would haue them neere neighbours to Hell: for he had the same quarrell to them, which Herodotus had, and therefore belike would haue made them seeme a kinde of Goblins. It was the manner of this great Poet (as Herodotus writing his life affirms) to insert into his workes the names of such as liued in his owne time, making such mention of them, as the good or ill done by them to himselfe deserued. And for this reason it is proued by Eusebius, that the Cimmerians were so disgraced by him, because they had wasted his Countrey. Perhaps that inuasion of Phrygia by the Amazons, whereof Homer puts a remembrance into Prætorius his discourse with Helen, was the very same, which Eusebius noteth to haue happened somewhat before the age of Homer, at what time the Cimmerians with the Amazons, together inuaded Asia.

This is certaine, that both the Amazons and the Cimmerij (who in after-times were called Cimbri) did often breake into Greece and Asia; which though it bee not in expresse rearmes written, that they did with ioynt forces, yet seeing they inuaded the selfe same places, it may well be gathered, that they were companions. One journey of the Amazons into Greece, mentioned also by Eusebius, was by the straights of the Cimmerians, as we finde in Diodore, who further telleth vs, that the Scythians therein gaue them assistance. The same Authour, before his entrie into those discourses of the Amazons, which himselfe acknowledgeth to bee fabulous, doth report them to haue bene Wiues of the Scythians, and no lesse warlike than their Husbands; alleading the example of that Queene, who is said to haue slaine the great Persian Cyrus. That it was the manner of the Cimbri to carrie their wiues along with them to the warres; and how desperate the courage was of those women, the terrible descent of them into Italia, when Marius the Roman ouerthrew them, giues proofe sufficient. I will not here enter into a discourse of the Amazons; other place will giue mee better leisure to speake of them: but seeing that they are noted by diuers Historians to haue belonged vnto the Cimmerians, to the Scythians, and to the Sarmatians, wee may the better approue Goropius his conclusion, That these three Nations were one, at least that they were neere allies.

Now concerning the expulsion of the Cimmerians by the Scythians, it appears to haue bene none other than the sending a Colonie of them forth into Asia, with an Armie of Scythians to helpe them, in purchasing a new seat, and establishing the plantation.

The Sarmatians also were companions in this iourne. For the Citie of Novograd in Russia: (which Countrey is the same, that was called Sarmatia) stood in their way homewards, as shall anon be further shewed. So that all the North was vp in Armes: and therefore it is no maruaile though many Countreies felt the weight of this great inundation. Such another voiage was that, which the same people made

sue hundred yeeres and more after this, when they were encountered by the Romans. For they issued from the parts about the Lake Maotis; they were then likewise assisted (saith Plutarch in the most likely report of them) by the Scythians their neighbours; they had in their Armie about three hundred thousand fighting men, besides a huge multitude of women & children; they wandered ouer many Countreies, beating all down before them; and finally, thinking to haue sciled themselves in Italia, they diuided their companie, for the more easie passage thither, and were consumed in three terrible battailes by the Roman Consuls. Meere necessitie enforced these poore Nations, to trouble the World, in following such hard adventures. For their Countrey, being more fruitfull of men than of sustenance, and shut vp on the North side with intolerable cold, which denied issue that way to their ouerswelling multitudes; they were compelled to discharge vpon the South, and by right or wrong to drine others out of possession, as hauing title to all that they had power to get, because they wanted all, that weaker, but more ciuill, people had. Their sturdie bodies, patient of hunger, cold and all hardnesse, gaue them great aduantage ouer such as were accustomed vnto a more delicate life, and could not be without a thousand superfluities. Wherefore commonly they preuailed very farre; their next neighbours giuing them free passage, that they might the sooner be ridde of them; others giuing them, besides passage, victuals and guides to conduct them to more wealthie places; others hiring them to depart with great presents; so as the farther they went on, the more pleasant Lands they found, and the more effeminate people.

†. III.

Of the Cimmerians warre in Lydia.

THE first Companie of these, consisting for the most part of Cimmerians, held the way of the Euxine Seas, which they had still on the right hand; leauing on the other side, and behinde them, the great Mountaines of Caucasus. These hauing passed through the Land of Cholchis, that is now called Mengrelli, entered the Countrey of Pontus, and being arriued in Paphlagonia, fortified the Promontorie whereon Sinope, a famous Haven Towne of the Greekes, was after built. Here it seems that they bestowed the weakest and most vnserviceable of their traine, together with the heauiest part of their carriages, vnder some good gard: as drawing neere to those Regions, in conquest whereof they were to trie the vmost hazard. For in like sort afterwards did the Cimbri (of whom I spake euen now) dispose of their impediments, leauing them in a place of strength, where Antwerpe now stands, when they drew neere into Gaul, vpon which they determined to adventure themselves in the purchase. From Synope, the way vnto Phrygia, Lydia, and Ionia, was faire and open to the Cimmerians, without any ledge of Mountaines or any deepe Riuers to stay their march: for Iris and Haly they had already passed.

What battailes were fought betweene these inuaders and the Lydians, and with what variable successe the one or other part wanne and lost, I finde not written nor am able to coniecture. This I find, that in the time of Ardis, the Cimmerians got possession of Sardes the Capitall Citie of Lydia; onely the Castle holding out against them. Further I obserue, that whereas Herodotus tels of the acts performed by Cyges and Ardis Kings of Lydia, before this inuasion, and by Halyattes and Cræsus in the times following; all that Ardis did against the Cimmerians, and all, saue burning the Milesians Corne fields, that was done in twelue yeeres by Sadyattes his Son (who perhaps had his hands so full of this businesse, that he could turne them to nothing else) is quite omitted: whereby it may seeme, that neither of the two did any thing worthie of remembrance in those warres, but were glad enough that they did not loose all.

Certainly, the miseries of warre are neuer so bitter and manie, as when a whole Nation, or great part of it, forsaking their owne seates, labour to roote out the established possessor of another Land, making room for themselves, their wives and children. They that fight for the matter, are pacified with tribute, or with some other seruices and acknowledgements, which had they bene yielded at the first, all had bene quiet, and no sword bloodied. But in these migrations, the assailants bring so little with them, that they need all which the defendants haue, their Lands and Cattell, their houses and their goods, euen to the cradles of the sucking infants. The merciless teardrops of this controuersie arme both sides with desperate resolution: seeing the one part must either winne, or perish by famine; the other defend their goods, or loose their liues without redemption. Most of the Countries in Europe haue felt examples thereof; and the mightie Empire of Rome was ouerthrowne by such inuasions. But our Isle of Britaine can best witness the diuersitie of Conquests; hauing by the happie victorie of the Romans, gotten the knowledge of all Ciuill arts, in exchange of libertie, that was but slenderly instructed therein before; whereas the illue of the Saxon and Danish warres, was, as were the causes, quite contrarie. For these did not seeke after the Dominion onely, but the entire possession of the Countrey, which the Saxons obtained, but with horrible cruelty, eradicating all of the British Race, and defacing all memoriall of the ancient inhabitants through the greater part of the Land. But the Danes (who are also of the Cimmerian blood) found such end of their enterprize, as it may seeme that the Cimmerians in Lydia, and Scythians in the higher Asia, did arriue vnto. So that by considering the processe of the one, we shall the better conceiue the fortune of the other. Many batailles the Danes wonne; yet none of such importance, as sufficed to make them absolute Conquerours: Manie the Saxons wonne vpon the Danes, yet not so great, as could drue them quite away, and backe from hence, after they had gotten firme footing. But in course of time, the long continuance euen of vicer enmitie, had bred such acquaintance betwene them, as bowing the natures of both these people, made the one more pliant vnto the other. So their disagreeable qualities, both ill and good, being reduced into one milde temper, no small number of the Danes became peaceable cohabitants with the Saxons, in England, where great slaughter had made large room; others returning home, found their owne Countrey wide enough to receive them, as hauing disburthened it selfe of many thousands, that were sent to seeke their graues abroad. And such (as I thinke) was the end of the Cimmerian warre in Lydia; whereunto though some victorie of Halyattes may haue hastened the conclusion, yett the wearisome length of time seemes to haue done most, in compelling them to desire of rest. I know not why I should feare to adde hereunto my further coniecture; which is, that the matter was so compounded betwene the Cimmerians and Halyattes, that the River of Halys should diuide their Territories. For Halys was henceforth the border of the Lydians, and on the Easterne side of the River was the Countrey of the Amazons, that is indeed, of the Cimmerians and other Scythian people, whose wives and daughters these warlike women are supposed to haue bene.

And hereunto the quarrell ensuing, betwene Halyattes and Cyaxares the Mede, hath very good reference. For Halyattes (as is said) fought in defence of certaine Scythians, vpon whom the Median sought reuenge. And it stands with reason, that the Lydians and Cimmerians, being much weakened with mutuall slaughters, should haue joyned in a league of mutuall defence for their common safetie: though otherwise it had bene dangerous to Halyattes, if he had permitted the Median to extend his Kingdome so farre Westward, whatsoeuer the pretences might be, of taking reuenge vpon such as had spoiled each of their Countries. As for that occasion of the warre betwene these two Kings, which Herodotus relates, I find it of little waight, waight, and lesse probability. He tels of Scythians, that being chased out of their Countrey by faction, came vnto Cyaxares; who committed vnto them certaine Boyes, to be instructed in the Scythian tongue, and feare of Archerie. Now it so fell out (saith he) that these Scythians vsing much to hunt, and commonly bringing home somewhat with them, did neuertheless otherwhiles misse of their game, and come home as they went. Hereupon the King being froward and cholerick, bitterly reuiled them; and they, as impatient as he, killed one of the Boyes that was vnder their charge, whom dressing like Venison, they presented vnto him; which done, they fled vnto Halyattes. This Herodotus deliues, as the ground of a warre that lasted sixe yeeres betwene the Medes and Scythians, the one King demanding these Fugitiues to be delivered into his hand, the other refusing to betray such men as were become his suppliants. To this I will say no more, than that I see no cause that might induce the Scythians, to betake themselves to either of these Kings, vnto whom their Nation had wrought so much displeasure. Particularly they had reason to distrust Cyaxares, for the treacherie that he shewed in the maffing of their Countrey men, that were in his Kingdome; of whom it is now meet that wee should speake.

†. IIII.

The warre of the Scythians in the higher Asia.

As the Cimmerians held their course Westerly, along the shores of the Euxine Sea: so the Scythians and Sarmatians tooke the other way, and hauing the Caspian Sea on their left hand, passed betwene it and Caucasus through Albania, Colchene, and other obscure Nations, where now are the Countries of Seruan and Georgia, and so they entered into Media. The Medes encountered them in Armes; but were beaten, and thereupon glad to come to any agreement with them. This was in the time of Phraortes, whilst Psammiticus reigned in Egypt. If it were in the sixt yeere of Nabulassars Raigne ouer Babylon (supposing him to haue reigned fise and thirtie, otherwise we must allow to Ben Merodach what we take from him) then doeth the eight and twentie yeeres of their Dominion end, one yeere before the great Nabuchodonosor was King; so giuing him good leaue to prouide securely, for the inuasion of Syria, which expedition he began while his Father yet liued, as Josephus out of Berossus relates the Historie.

Now the Medes, desirous to saue themselves as well as they might, from this terrible Nation, which when they had no lust to a second triall of the sword, refused not to vndergoe the burthen of a Tribute, but thought nothing dishonourable; that would serue to remooue these troublesome gueits into some other lodging. On the other part, the Scythians finding still the Countries pleasanter & better, the further that they marched into the South, did suffer themselves to bee perswaded, that a little more trauaile, would adde a great deale more to their content. For they relied so much vpon their owne valour, that they feared no resistance; and being the bruest men, they thought it reason that they should dwell in the best Region. That Phraortes perswaded them into Egypt, I doe not thinke: Babylon was neere enough; whither if hee could send these Locusts to graze, then should not his vnfriendly Neighbours haue cause to laugh at his misfortune. What thist Nabulassar made with them, or that at all he had any dealings with them, I doe not read. But it is well knowne, that his Dominions lay in the midst betwene Media and Egypt; as also, that they made all those parts of Asia Tributarie; wherefore we may very well beleene, that they watered their horses in his Rivers, and that hee also was content to giue them prouender.

rooke care that they might not looke vpon Egypt; lest the sight thereof should more easily detain them there, than any force or perswasion, that hee could vse, would send them going. Therefore he met them in Syria, presuming more on the great gifts which he meant to bestow vpon them, than on his Armie that should keepe them backe. Egypt was rich; and halfe the riches thereof had not bene ill spent in sauing all. Yet Psammiticus tooke the most likely course, whereby to make his part good against them by strong hand, in case they had bene so oblitinate as to refuse all indifferent composition. For hee lay close vpon the edge of the Wilderness in Gaza (as I take it) the Southermost border of Palestina: whence hee neuer advanced to meet with the Scythians; but gaue them leaue to feele as much of the scalding Sunne-beames, ill agreeing with their temper, as all the length of Syria could beat vpon them. When they were come as farre as Ascalon, the next Citie to Gaza, then did he assay them with goodly words, accompanied with gifts, which were likely to work so much the better, by how much the worse they were pleased with the beate of a Climate so farre different from their owne. Psammiticus had at his backe a vast wilderness, ouer the scorching sands whereof, the Scythians more patient of cold and wet, than the contrarie distempers, could ill haue indured to pursue him, through unknowne wayes, had they fought with him and preuailed: especially the Kingdome of Egypt being ready to entertaine him with reliefe, and them with new trouble at the end of their wearie iourne. Wherefore they were 20 content to be intreated, and taking in good part his courteous offers, returned back to visite their acquaintance in the high Countries. The Egyptian King (besids that he preferred his owne Estate from a dangerous aduenture, by hyring this great Armie to depart from him) found all his Cost well repayed in the proceesse of his wars in Syria, where the Nations beyond Euphrates had no power to molest him, being more then euer troubled themselves, with the returne of their oppressors. For the Scythians, resolving now to secke no further, beganne to demand more than the Tribute formerly imposed. And not contented to fleece the Naturals with grievous exactions, they presumed to liue at discretion vpon the Countrey, taking what they listed from the Owners; and many times (as it were to saue the labour of taking often) taking all at once. This Tyrannous Dominion they long vsed ouer the higher Asia, that is, ouer the Countrey lying betweene the Caspian and Red Seas; and betweene India and Asia the lesse. Happie it was for the poore people, that in so large a space of ground, there was roome enough for these new comers; otherwise the calamitie that fell, as it were by chance, vpon those priuate men, to whose wealth any Scythian did beare a fancie, would haue lighted in generall vpon all at one clap, leauing few aliue, and none able to relieue their fellows. Yet it seemes that the heauiest burthen lay vpon Media; for it was a fruitful Countrey not farre from their owne home, and lay vnder a Climate well agreeing with the constitution of their bodies; there also it was that they had the fatal blow, by which their insolent Rule was taken from them.

Herod. lib. 1.

Cyaxares King of the Medes, who in this extremite was no better then a Renter-gatherer for the Scythians, perceiving that his Land lay vnmanured and waste, through the negligence of his people, that were out of heart by daily oppressions, and that the matter could not be remedied by open force, resolved to proue what might be done by stratagem. The managing of the businesse is thus deliuered in briefe; That he, and his Medes, feasted the better part of the Scythians; made them drunke; and slew them; recouring hereby the possession of all that they had lost.

Such another slaughter was committed vpon the Danes in England; but it was reuenged by their Countymen, with greater cruelties than euer they had practised before. That the Scythians, which escaped this bloody feast, made any stirre in Media, I doe not find; neither doe I read that either in reuenge hereof, or vpon other pretence, the Medes were troubled by inuasion from Scythia in time following.

This

This is the more strange, for that the Armie returning home out of Media, was very strong, and encountered with opposition (as Herodotus reports it) no lesse then it had found abroad. Wherefore it may be, that the deuce of Cyaxares to free his Country, tooke good effect, with lesse blood-shed than hath bene supposed. For if hee surprised all the chiefe of them, it was no hard matter to make a good composition. Many of them doubtlesse in eight and twentie yeeres had well settled themselves, that they were desirous of rest, and might be permitted, without any danger, to remaine in the Countrey; many (of whom I shall speake anon) hauing done what they could in the businesse, for which they came forth, were willing to 10 returne home, with what they had gotten; such as were not pleased with either of the two courses, might goe ioyne with the Cimmerians in Lydia, or seeke their fortunes in other prouinces, among their owne Companions. Whereas all the Families of the North are said to haue bene with Nabuchadnezzar, it may be vnderstood, that a great part of the Scythians, vpon hope of gain, or desire to keepe what they had already gained, were content to become subject vnto Nabuchadnezzar: mens loue of their wealth being most effectually, in taming the more vnquiet loue of inordinate libertie. This is certaine, that Nabuchadnezzar, as cuer after, so in his first beginning 20 of warre, did beate the Egyptians, who in ages foregoing had bene accustomed to deale with the Babylonians after another fashion: and this new successe of that King may be imputed, in regard of humane meanes, to such addition as this of new forces.

Of the Scythian Armie returning out of Media, diuers Authours report a Storie, which confirmes mee in the opinion, that this Companie went forth to assist their kindred and friends, in acquiring a new seate, and establishing their plantation. For these had left their wiues behinde them; a good argument to proue that they meant to come againe. The Scythian women, to comfort themselves in their husbands absence, became bed fellows to their slaues. These got a lusty brood of youths, that were loth to be troubled with Fathers in Law, and therefore prepared to fight with them at their returne. If they were only the children of slaues, 30 which compounded an Armie (as Herodotus would haue it), it must needs be that they were very Boyes, or else that the Women did very little while continue chaste. Wherefore I rather beleue that tale as it is told by the Russes themselves, who agreeing in the rest with the consent of Histories, make that report of their Ancestors returning homewards, which I will set downe, as I finde it, in M^r. Doctor Fleet cher his exact discourse of the Russe Common-wealth. They vnderstood by the way, that their Cholaepes, or Bond-slaues whom they left at home, had in their absence possessed their Townes, Lands, Houses, Wiues, and all. At which neuer being somewhat amazed; and yet 40 displaying the Villanie of their seruants, they made the more speed home: and so not farre from Novograd met them in warlike manner marching against them. Whereupon aduising what was best to be done, they agreed also to set vpon them with no other sort of weapon but with their horse whips (which as their manner is, euery man rideith withall) to put them in remembrance of their seruite condition, thereby to terrifie them, and abate their courage. And so marching on, and lashing in the eares of their Villaines, and strooke such a sense into the onst. Which seemed so terrible in the eares of their Villaines, and strooke such a sense into them of the smart of the whip, which they had felt before, that they fled all together like Sheepe before the Druiers. In memorie of this victorie, the Novogradians euer since haue stamped their Coine (which they call a Dingoe Novogradskoy, enrrant through all Russia) with the figure of a Horseman shaking a whip aloft in his hand. It may seeme, that all the 50 women of that Countrey, haue sared the worse euer since, in regard of this vniuersall fault: for such a Pudkey or whip, as terrified those slaues, curiously wrought by her selfe, is the first present that the Moscouian Wife, euen in time of wooing, sends to him that shall be her husband, in token of subiection; being well assured, to seele it often on her owne loines. But this was a Document vnto the Scythians, or rather

Sarmatians.

Sarmatians (for Novograd lands in the Countrey that was called Sarmatia) to beware of absenting themselves any more so long from their Wiues; which after this, I find not that they did.

Thus much I thought good to set downe of the Scythian expedition; not only because it is the most memorable act performed abroad by that Nation, famous in Histories, and terrible to many Countreies; but for that it appears to haue bene a great cause, of the Egyptians preuailing hitherto in Syria, and about Iudaa, which continues yet a while the centre of our discourse.

p. V.

Of Princes living in diuers Countreies in these ages.

Auing thus farre digressed from the matters of Iuda, to auoide all further occasion of doing the like, I will here insert a note of such Kings and men of marke, as were betweene the death of Manasses, and the ruine of Ierusalem. Of the Egyptians, Babylonians, Medes, and Lydians, I haue spoken as much, as I thought needfull. In Rome, Tullius Hostilius held the Kingdome, vntill the one and twentieth yeere of Iosias; at which time Anus Martius succeeding, reigned foure and twentie yeeres. After him L. Tarquinius Priscus, a new-come stranger, but very rich, preuailed so farre by his graciousnesse among the people, that he got the Kingdome to himselfe, disappointing the sonnes of Anus, ouer whom he was Tutor. He began in the fourth yeere of Zedekia, and Reigned eight and thirtie yeeres. In this time it was, namely, in the second yeere of the thirtieth Olympiad, that the Lacedaemonians, be thinking them how to bee auenged of the Arcadians, who gaue succour to the Messeniens against them in the former warre, entred the Territorie, tooke the Citie of Phigalia or Phialia, from whence their Garrisons were soone after beaten out. Cypselus expelling the race of the Basida, made himselfe Lord of Corinth about these times, and gouerned it in peace thirtie yeeres; leauing for successeur his sonne Periander, one of the seven Sages, but a cruell Tyrant: who among other vile acts, slew his owne wife, and afterwards, as in her honour, stripped all the Corinthian women stark naked, burning their apparell, as an acceptable offering to her Ghost. Hereby we may perceiue, that the wisdom of the Greekes was not excellent in those dayes; when such a one as this could bee admired as excelling all the Countrey.

In these times also were Zaleucus, and Draco, famous Lawgiuers, the one among the Locrians in Italie, the other in the Citie of Athens. The Lawes of Draco were so rigorous, that he was said to haue written them with blood: for he rewarded euery small offence with death. Wherefore his constitutions were soone abrogated, and power giuen to Solon, by the Athenians, to make new in their stead. But the Lawes of Zaleucus were very milde. He forbade any Gentlewoman to walke abroad with more than one Bond-woman attending on her, vnlesse it were when shee was drunke, or to goe forth of the Towne by night, vnlesse it were to some sweet-hearts bed; or to dresse herselfe vp in immodest brauerie, vnlesse it were to inueigle a louuer. By which pleasant Ordinances, he effected his desire: for none would seeme, in breaking the Statutes, to be in such case as challenged the dispensation. It is noted in this man as a singular example of iustice, that when his owne sonne had committed adulterie, and was therefore to loose both his eyes, he did not cause him to be pardoned, but gaue one eye of his owne to saue the young man (who also lost one) from vtter blindness.

I shall not henceforth need, so farre to wander, as hitherto I often haue done; in pursuing of actions collateral to the Historie, for inserting them in their order of time.

time. The Chaldeans will soone fall vnder the Persians; the Persians, ere long, encounter with the Greekes; the Greekes, with the Romans; the Romans, with many Nations. Concerning all these, as they shall successiue present themselves, in their flourishing Estate; it will be enough to recapitulate the most memorable accidents, that befell them in their Minoritie. But in the long space of more than thirteene hundred yeeres, which passed betweene the calling of Abraham, and the destruction of Ierusalem, we finde little matter, wherein the Historie of Israel had any dealing with other Nations, than the very neereft borderers. Yet reade we of many Kingdomes, that in these many ages were erected, and throwne downe; as likewise, many memorable acts were performed in Greece and elsewhere, though not following one another at any neere distance, all which must haue bene quite omitted, or else referred vnto a very vnseasonable rehearfall, had they not bene disposed in this method, whereof he that will not allow the conueniencie, may pardon the necessitie.

The oppression of Iudaa, and destruction of Ierusalem by the Chaldeans.

OW to returne to the Iewish Storie, from whence wee haue so farre digressed. In the third yeere of Iehoiakim, Nabuchodonosor the second, his Father yet liuing, entred Iudaa with a great Armie, who besieging and forcing Ierusalem, made Iehoiakim his Vassall in despight of Neco, that had established him King, and tooke with him for pledges Daniel, being as yet a childe, with Ananias, Misael, and Azarias. Also he tooke a part of the Church treasures; but staied not to search them thoroughly; for Neco halted to the succour of Iehoiakim, hoping to finde Nabuchodonosor in Iudaa: wherein this great Babylonian had no disposition to bazard himselfe and his Armie, it being 30 this great Babylonian had no disposition to bazard himselfe and his Armie, it being a Country of an euill affection towards him, as also farre off from any succour or sure place of retreat. If he had, as may be supposed, any great strength of Scythian horsemen in his Armie; it was the more wisely done of him, to fall backe, out of the rough, mountainous, and ouer-hot Countrey, into places that were more euen and temperate. But besides all these reasons, the death of his father, happening at the same time, gaue him iust occasion to returne home, and take possession of his owne Kingdome, before he proceeded further in the second care, of adding more vnto it. This he did at reasonable good leisure: for the Egyptian was not ready to follow him so farre and to bid him battaile, vntill the new yeere came in; which was the 40 fourth of Iehoiakim, the first of Nabuchodonosor, and the last of Neco. In this yeere the Babylonian lying vpon the Banke of Euphrates (his owne Territorie bounding it on the North-side) attended the arriual of Neco. There, after a resolute contention for victorie, Neco was slaine, and his Armie remaining forced to saue it selfe, which full ill it did, by a violent retreat. This victorie Nabuchodonosor so well pursued, as he recovered all Syria, and whatsoever the Egyptians held out of their proper Territorie towards the North. The Egyptians being in this conflict beaten, and altogether for the present discouraged, Iehoiakim held him selfe quiet, as being friend 50 in heart vnto the Egyptian, yet hauing made his peace with the Chaldean the yeere before; who contented with such profit as hee could then readily make, had forborne to lay any Tribute vpon Iuda. But this coole reticence of Iehoiakim, was, on both sides, taken in ill part. The Egyptian King Psammetichus, who succeeded vnto Neco, beganne to thinke vpon restoring Iehoshaphat, taken Prisoner by his Father, and setting him vp, as a Domestical Enemie, against his vngratefull brother. Against Againſt all ſuch accidents, the Judeans had prepared the vſuall remedy, praſtised by his fore-fathers: for he had made his owne ſonne Iechonias King with him long before, in the ſecond yeere of his owne Reigne, when the Boy was but Eight yeeres olde. As for this rumour of Iehobabaz his returne, the Prophet Jeremie foretold, that it ſhould provide ill, ſaying: he ſhall not returne thither, but hee ſhall die in the place whither they haue led him captiue, and ſhall ſee this Land no more. The Egyptians indeed, hauing ſpent all their Mercinarie forces, and receiued that heaue blow at Carchemiſh, had not remaining ſuch proportion of ſharpe ſteele, as offaire gold, which without other helpe, is ſufficient effect. The valour of Neco was not in Pammiſia, as pries who raigned after Pammiſis, did once adventure to ſlew his face in Syria, but after a bigge looke, he was glad to retire, without aduenturing the hazard of a battaile. Wherefore this decaying Nation fought only with braue words, telling ſuch frivolous tales, as men, that meane to doe nothing, vſe, of their glorious acts forepaſſed, againſt Iofias and Iehobabaz. In this caſe it was ealie for Iehoiakim to giue them ſatisfaction, by letting them vnderſtand the ſinceritie of his affection towards them, which appeared in time following. But Zabuchodonosor went to worke more roundly. He ſent a peremptorie meſſage to Iehoiakim, willing him not to ſtand upon any nice points, but acknowledge himſelfe a Subject, and pay him Tribute: adding herewith ſuch fearefull threats, as made the poore Judeans lay aſide all thought of Pharaoh, and yeeld to doe, as the more mighty would haue him. So he continued in the obedience of Nabuchodonosor for three yeeres. At this time Jeremie the Prophet cried out againſt the Iewes, putting them in mind that he had now three and twentie yeeres exhorted them to repentance, but becauſe they had loſt their eares againſt him, and the reſt of the Prophets, hee now pronounced their captiuitie at hand, and that they ſhould endure the yoke of bondage full ſeuente yeeres. The ſame calamitie hee threatened to all the neighbouring Nations, to the Egyptians, Moabites, Ammonites, Idumeans, and the reſt; foretelling that they ſhould all drinke out of the Babylonian Pitcher, the wine of his Iurie, whom they had forſaken, and after the ſeuenty yeeres expired, that the Babylonians themſelues ſhould taſte of the ſame cup, and be vterly ſubuct by the Medes, & the Indians: permitted to return againe into their owne fields and Cities. The firſt impriſonment of the Prophet Jeremie ſeemes to haue bene in the fourth yeere of this Iehoiakim, at which time Baruch the Scribe wrote all his Prophecies out of his mouth, whom hee lent to reade them vnto the people, and after ward to the Princes, who offered them to the King: but fearing the Kings Iurie, they had firſt let Jeremias be libertie, and aduiſed him and Baruch to hide themſelues.

delivered from other cares, tooke notice of such as had revolted from him vnto Pharas Nees, and sent this Noble Prince, his sonne, with an Armie into Syria, to reclaim them. In this expedition was Daniel carried away, who therefore makes mention of the same yeere. The yeere next following, being the fourth of Ischiahim, was the first of Nebuchadnezazar; which Ieremie affirmeth in expresse wordes; and from this we reckon all his time and actions that follow. In his three and twentieth yeere he conquered Egypt; and then beganne to raigne as a great Monarch, finding none that durst offend him. The second from this yeere it was, wherein he saw that vision, of the Image consisting of sundrie Metals; which did prefigure the successeion of great Kingdomes, that should rule the Earth, before the coming of Christ. I will not stand to dispute about this, which is the best conclusion that I find, of long disputations: but returne vnto the siege of Tyre, which beganne in the seventh of his Raigne.

Iechonias his sonne; whom after three moneths and ten dayes, Nabuchodonosor removed, and sent Prisoner to Babylon, with Ezekiel, Mardachaus, and Iosedech, the high Priest. The mother of Iechonias, together with his seruants, Eunuchs, and all the ablest men, and best Artificers of the Land, were also then carryed away Captiues. This Iechonias, following the counsell of Ieremie the Prophet, made no resistance, but submitted himselfe to the Kings will: wherein hee both pleased God, and did that which was best for himselfe; though at the present it might seeme otherwise, to such as considered the euill that befell him, rather then the greater euill that he thereby auoided. This onely particular act of his is recorded; which was good. But it seemes that he was partaker, at least, of his Fathers faults, if not an infligator: which was the cause, that his submitting himselfe to Gods pleasure did not preferue his Estate: for so we read in generall wordes, that he did euill in the sight of the Lord, according to all that his Father had done. In his stead Nabuchodonosor established Mahania his Vncle in the Kingdome of Iuda, and called him Zedechias, which is as much to say, as the Iustice of God. For like as Neco, King of Egypt, had formerly displaced Iehoiabaz, after his Father Iosias was slaine, and set vp Iehoiakim, the sonne of another Mother; so Nabuchodonosor slue Iehoiakim, who depended on the Egyptians, and carrying his sonne Iechonias Prisoner to Babel, gaue the Kingdome to this Zedechias, that was whole Brother to that Iehoiabaz, whom Neco tooke with him into Egypt. From Zedechias hee required an oath for his faithfull obedience, which Zedechias gaue him, and called the liuing God to witnesse in the fame, that he would remaine assured to the Kings of Chaldea.

In the first yeere of Zedechias, Ieremie law and expounded the Vision of the ripe and rotten Grapes, the one signifying those Iudeans that were carried away captiue, the other those that staid, and were destroyed.

In the fourth of Zedechias, Ieremie wrote in a Booke all the euill that should fall vpon Babylon, which Book or scrole he gaue to Sheraia, when he went with the King Zedechias to Babylon, to visit Nabuchodonosor; willing him first to reade it to the Captiue Iewes, and then to bind it to a stone, and cast it into Euphrates, pronouncing these wordes: Thus shall Babel be drowned, and shall not rise from the euill that I will bring vpon her. This iourne of Zedechias to Babel is probably thought to haue bene in way of visitation, carrying home presents. But I further thinke, that hee had some suite there to make, which his Lordly Master refused to grant, and sent him away discontented. For at his returne all the bordering Princes sent Messengers to him, inciting him (as it seemes) to those vnquiet courses, from which Ieremie dehorted both him and them. The Prophet, by Gods appointment, made bonds and yokes; one of which he wore about his owne neck, others hee sent vnto the fiue Kings of Edom, Moadab, Ammon, Tyre, and Zidon, by those Messengers which came to visite Zedechias: making them know, that if they and the Kings of Iuda abode in the obedience of Babylon, they should then possesse and enioy their owne Countries; if not, they should assuredly perill by the sword, by fire, and by pestilence.

Hee also fore-told them, that those Vessells, which as yet remained in Ierusalem, should also trauaile after therst, and at length they should be restored againe.

The same yeere Ananias, the false Prophet, tooke off the wooden Chaine which Ieremie ware, in signe of the Captiuitie of the Iewes, and brake it: Vaunting, that in like manner, after two yeeres, God would breake the strength of Babel, and the yoke which he layed on all Nations; restore Iechonias, and all the Iewes, with the Vessells and riches of the Temple, and giue an end to all these troubles. But Ieremie in stead of his wooden Yoke ware a Coller of yron; and in signe that Ananias had giuen a deceitfull and false hope to the people, hee fore-told the death of this cold Prophet, which seized vpon him in the second moneth. After this, when Zedechias had wauered long enough between Faith and Passion, in the eight yeere of his Raigne he practised more seriously against Nabuchodonosor, with his Neighbours the Edomites, Ammonites, Moadabites, Tyrizans, and others that were promised great aides of the Egyptians: in confidence of whose resistance, he determined to shake off the Babylonian yoke. Hereof when Nabuchodonosor had knowledge, hee marched with his Armie in the dead Winter, toward Ierusalem, and besieged it. Ieremie perswaded Zedechias to render the Citie and himselfe: but being confident of the helpe from Egypt, and being perswaded by his Counsellors, and false Prophets, that it was vnpossible that the Kingdome of Iuda should bee extirpate, vntill the coming of Silo (according to the Prophecie of Isaiah) hee despised the wordes of Ieremie, and imprisoned him. For Ieremie had told the King, that the Citie should be taken and burnt; that the King should not escape, but bee taken Prisoner, and brought to the presence of Nabuchodonosor; that he should not perill by the sword, but being carried to Babel, die his naturall death.

Ierusalem being, the following yeere, surrounded by Nabuchodonosors Armie; the King of Egypt, Pharao Hophra, according to Ieremie (Herodotus calleth him Apries) entered the border of Iuda, with his Armie, to succour Zedechias, of whose reuolt he had bene the principall Author. But Ieremie gaue the Iewes faithfull counsell, willing them not to haue any trust in the succours of Egypt: for he assured them, that they should returne againe, and in no sort relieve them. And it fell out accordingly. For when the Chaldeans removed from Ierusalem to encounter the Egyptians, these vaunting Patrons abandoned their enterprise, and taking Gaza in their way homeward returned into Egypt, as if they had already done enough; leauing the poore people of Ierusalem to their destined miseries.

In the meane while the Iewes, who, in their first extremitie, had manumitted their Hebrew Bond-men (as Gods Law required at the yere of Iubile) and made them free, thereby the better to encourage them to fight; did now vpon the breaking vp of the Chaldean Armie, repent them of their Charitie: and thinking all had bene at an end, held them perforce to their former slavery. But the Chaldees being returned to the siege, the Prophet Ieremie, when the State of Ierusalem beganne now to grow to extremitie, counselled Zedechias to render himselfe vnto them; assuring him of his owne life, and the safetie of the Citie, if he would so doe. But his obstinate heart conducted him to that wretched end, which his neglect of God, and his infidelitie and perurie, had prouided for him.

Three and twentie Moneths (as some doe reckon it) or according to Iosephus eightene; the Babylonian Armie lay before Ierusalem, and held it exceeding straightly beleiged. For they built Forts against it round about, or (as P. Martyr hath it) extruxerunt contra eam surrent ligneam per circuitum: They surrounded the Citie with wooden Towers, so as the beleiged could neither sally out, nor receiue into the Citie any supply of men or victuals. Iosephus reports, that they ouer-topped the Walls, with high Towers raised vpon mounts; from which they did so beat vpon the Wall with their Engines, that the defendants were compelled to forsake their stations. Now although it were so that the beleiged also raised Counter-buildings, like vnto these, Yet the great King of Babel, who commanded all the Regions therabouts, and had the Woods and Riuers to obey him, found meanes to ouerthrow all the Citizens endeouours; and to beat downe as fast from without, as they raised from within; the body and foundation of his owne workes being guarded, by the Walls of Ierusalem interposed; and theirs within layed open to their enemies disturbance. Besides, both famine and pestilence (which commonly accompanie men straightly beleiged) grew on fast vpon them, whereby, when the number, strength, and courage of the Iewes failed, the Chaldeans made a breach, and forcing an entry, their Princes did feat themselves, as Lords of the Towne, in the middle gate. Zedechias beholding this vncomfortable sight, and finding no remedie of the danger present, lost both his courage and his hope at once; and lifted himselfe together with his Wiues, Children, Princes, and principall Seruants, out of the Citie, by a way vader ground; leauing his amazed & guidelesse people, to the merciles swords of their enemies. Thus he, who, when Jeremie the Prophet perswaded him to render himselfe, despised both the Counsell of God; and the force of Nabuchodonosor: vsed now that remedie, which Wolphius truly telmeth: triste, turpe, & infelix: Woe full, shamefull, and vnfortunate.

By this secret subterrane vault, Zedechias making his stealth: recouered (by the helpe of the darke night) the Plaines or Desarts of Iericho: but by reason of the traine, that followed him and his, (euery one leading with him those whom they held most deare vnto them) hee was easily traced and pursued. How great sooner the companie was that attended on him, yet, as Iosephus reports it, they on whose fidelitie hee most reposed himselfe, no sooner beheld the Chaldeans approach, but they all abandoned his defence, and shifted themselves into the Desarts as they could. For whom God had forsaken, no man followed, but the Ministers of his vengeance; by whom Zedechias being made Prisoner, with his Children, and Princes, he was conueighed to Rebla or Reblath a Citie (as some thinke) of Nephthim, where Nabuchodonosor then lay, as a place indifferent betwixt Ierusalem and Tyre, with both which at once he had to doe.

Now after Nabuchodonosor had laied before Zedechias the many graces and benefits conferred vpon him; together with the notable falsehood and periurie, wherewith he had requited them; he commanded his Children, Princes, and Friends, to be slaine before his face. This being done, to the end that so lamentable a spectacle should be the last, that euer hee should behold in the World, hee caused his eyes to be torne out of his head, and so carried him in a slauiish manner to Babel, where hee consumed the rest of his wretched life in perpetuall imprisonment. Herein this most maruailous Prophecie of Ezechiel was performed; Adum cum in Babylonem & ipsam non uiderit. I will bring him into Babylon, and he shall not see it.

Thus in the Eleuenth and last yeere of Zedechias, which was the eighteenth of Nabuchodonosor, the Chaldeans entred the Citie by force, where sparing no sexe nor age, they committed all to the sword that they therein found.

In the yeere next following, Nabuzaradan, Generall of the Armie, burnt the Kings Palace, and the rest of Ierusalem: and after this fire had lasted from the seuenth to the tenth day, he also burnt the Temple of God to the ground, when it had stood foure hundred thirtie and one yeeres.

After this vpon a second search, Nabuzaradan (not yet satiated with blood) commanded seuentie and two others to bee slaughtered, which had hidden themselves from the first fire, to wit, the chiefe and the second Priest, two Commanders of Zedechias his men of Warre, five of his House-hold seruants, and others to that number; carrying away to Babylon the ablest of the people throughout all Iudea; and leaving the poorest labouring soules, with some that followed the partie of Nabuchodonosor, to till the ground: ouer whom hee left Gouvernour, Gobolus the Nephew of that Saphan, whom Iosias had formerly employed in the reformation of the Religion, who is, for his iustice and equitie, by Iosephus highly commended. This man, a Jew by Nation, left Zedechias, as it seemeth, in the beginning of the warre: and by Jeremies desire to liue with him, it appeareth that he had embraced the same aduice, which the Prophet gaue vnto Zedechias; which was, to submit himselfe altogether to the Babylonian, who being ordaind by God to exercise his iustice, was therefore resistlesse. The Prophet Jeremie being left to his owne choice, either to liue in Chaldea, or elsewhere, he made election of Godoliah, to whom he was recommended; who not onely embraced Jeremie, but gaue comfort to all the other Jewes, that were left vnder his charge, promising them fauour and libertie, so long as they remained obedient Subjects to Nabuchodonosor, by whom hee was established

But ere that yeere was expired, a Prince of the late Kings house (who during the siege of Ierusalem, had kept himselfe out of the storme, with Baalis King of the Ammonites) being followed by ten other chosen men, while Godoliah seated them in Maspha or Mispha, the Citie of his residence, trayterously slue him, together with diuers Chaldeans and Jewes that accompanied him. This done, hee made an escape, and in his way encountering with eightie persons, repairing towards Godoliah with presents, hee slue the most of them, and spared the rest, because they promised to discouer vnto him some Treasures, hidden in the fields during the warre. Hee also tooke with him a Daughter of Zedechias, committed to the care of Godoliah by Nabuchodonosor. This practice and intent of Ismael had bene formerly discouered vnto Godoliah by Iohanan, one of the Leaders of the few remayning Jewes; but Godoliah was incredulous.

Iudea being now left without a Gouvernour (for Ismael durst not take it vpon him, but retired himselfe, or rather fled as fast as he could to the Ammonites) the residue of the Jewes, fearing the reuenge of the Chaldeans, resolved to flie away into Egypt, and besought Jeremie to aske counsell of God for them: who readily made them answer, that if they remained in Iudea, God would prouide for them, and shew them mercy; but if they sought to saue themselves in Egypt, that they should then vndoubtedly perish. Notwithstanding this aduice, the Jewes held their determination; and despising the Oracle of God, and contrayning Jeremie and Baruch to accompanie them, they trauielled into Egypt, and inhabited by the permission of Pharao, neere vnto Taphnes: where, when Jeremie often reprehended them for their Idolatrie, foretelling both the destruction of themselves, and the Egyptians also, he was by these his owne hard-hearted and vngratefull Countreymen, stoned to death; and by the Egyptians, who greatly reuerenced him, buried neere the Sepulchre of their owne Kings.

CHAP. I.

30 Of the time passing betwene the destruction of Ierusalem, and the fall of the Assyrian Empire.

§. I.

Of the connexion of Sacred and prophane Historie.

40 THE course of Time; which in prophane Histories might rather bee discerned through the greatest part of his way, hitherto passed in some out-worne foot-steps, than in any beaten path, having once in Greece by the Olympiads, and in the Easterne Countries by the account from Nabons[sar], left surer marks, and more appli-50 cable to actions concurrent, then were the warre of Troy, or any other token of former date; begins at length in the ruine of Ierusalem to discouer the connexion of antiquitie fore-spent, with the storie of succeeding ages. Manifest it is, that the originall and progresse of things could ill bee sought in those that were ignorant of the first creation: as likewise that the affaires of Kingdomes and Empire afterwards growne vp, are not to be found among those, that haue now no state nor politic remaining of their owne. Having therefore pursued the storie of the world vnto that age, from whence the memorie of succeeding accidents is with little interruption of fabulous discourse deriued vnto vs, I hold it now conuenient briefly to shew, by what meanes and circumstances the Historie of the Hebrewes, which of all other is the most ancient, may bee conioyned with the following times, wherein that Image of sundrie metalls, discovered by God vnto Nebuchadnezzar, did raigne ouer the earth, when Israel was either none, or an vtregarded Nation.

Herein I doe not hold it needfull, to insitt vpon those authorities, which giue, as it were by heare-say, a certaine yeere of some old Assyrian King vnto some action or euent, whereof the time is found expressed in Scripture: for together with the end of Ninus his line in Sardanapalus, if not before, all such computations were blotted out; the succession of Belochus and his issue that occupied that kingdome afterwards, depending vpon the vncertaine relations of such, as were neither constant in assigning the yeeres of his beginning, nor of credit enough for others to relie vpon. Let it therefore suffice, that the consent and harmonic, which some haue found in the yeeres of those ouer-worne Monarchs, doth preserue their names, which otherwise might haue bene forgotten. Now concerning the later Kings of that Nation, howsoeuer it be true that we find the names of all or mozt of them in Scriptures, which are recorded by prophane Historians: yet hereby could we onely 20 learne in what age each of them liued, but not in what yeere his raigne beganne or ended, were it not that the raigne of Nebuchadnezzar is more precisely applied to the times of Iehoiakim and Zedekia. Hence haue we the first light whereby to discover the meanes of connecting the sacred and prophane Histories. For vnder Nebuchadnezzar was the beginning of the captiuitie of Iuda, which ended when 70. yeeres were expired; and these 70. yeeres tooke end at the first of Cyrus, whose time being well knowne, affords vs meanes of looking backe into the ages past, and forwards into the race of men succeeding. The first yeere of Cyrus his raigne in Persia, by generall consent, is ioyned with the first yeere of the 55. Olympiads, where, that he reigned three and twenty yeeres before his Monarchie, and seven yeeres 30 afterwards, it is apparent, and almost out of controuersie. Giuing therefore foure hundred and eight yeeres vnto the distance betwene the fall of Troy, and the inauguration of the Olympiads by Iphitus; we may easily arriue vnto those antiquities of Greece, which were not meerey fabulous. As for Princes ruling the whilest in sundrie parts of the world, S. Augustine and others may be trusted in setting downe their times, which they had by Tradition from authors of wel-approved faith and industrie.

From Cyrus forwards, how the times are reckoned vnto Alexander, and from him to the battaile of Artium, it were (peraduenture) in this place impertinent to set downe. But seeing that the beginning and end of the Babylonian captiuitie are the markes whereby we are chiefly directed, in passing from the first vnto the latest yeeres of the world, through any storie, with least interruption, it is very expedient that wee take some paines to informe our selues truly of the 70. yeeres, during which it continued, euen from Nebuchadnezzar vnto Cyrus.

A briefe rehearſall of two opinions, touching the beginning of the captiuitie: with an answer to the caulls of Porphyrus, inmeiſing againſt S. Matthew, and Daniel, vpon whom the later of theſe opinions is founded.

Any Commentators, and other Historians, and Chronologers finde, that the captiuitie then beganne, when Iechonias was carried prisoner into Babylon, eleuen yeere before the finall destruction of Ierusalem vnder Zedekias. This they proue out of diuers places in Ezekiel, especially out of the fourteenth chapter, where he makes a plaine distinction betweene the beginning of the Captiuitie, and vtter destruction of Ierusalem by Nabuzaradan, in these wordes: In the fine and twentieth yeere of our being in captiuitie, in the beginning of the yeere, in the tenth day of the month, in the fourteenth yeere after that the Citie was smitten. In which words hee beginneth the captiuitie in plaine termes, eleuen yeeres before the Citie was destroyed. Beroaldus is of opinion that it beganne in the first of Nabuchodonosor, and the fourth of Iehoiakim, which hee endeuours to proue out of the second of Chronicles, but more especially out S. Matthew, and Daniel, whose words afford matter of long disputation, but serue notto make good so much as Beroaldus would enforce. That place of S. Matthew, and the whole booke of Daniel, haue ministred occasion of scoffing and railing at the Christian religion to that wretched man Porphyrus, who, not vnderstanding how the sonnes of King Iehus were called by diuers names, as Epiphanius hath shewed at large, thought that the Apostle had spoken hee knew not what in reckoning the sonnes, or, according to some translations, the Sonne and Nephewes of that good King, begotten about the time of the captiuitie. Vpon Daniel also the same Porphyrus doth spend the twelfth of his malicious books written against the Christians, affirming that these prophecies & visions remembered by Daniel, were written long after his death, and at, or neere the time of Antiochus Epiphanius. This fond supposition of his, Eusebius, Apollonius, and others, haue sufficiently answered. For the leuente Interpreters, who conuerted the old Testament about an hundred yeere before Epiphanius, did also turne this booke of Daniel out of Hebrew into Greece, as a part of Scripture receiued. And were there no other argument to confound Porphyrus, than that of Alexander Macedon, it were sufficient, who liued diuers yeeres before Antiochus Epiphanius. For Iaddus, the high Priest shewed that great Conqueror, when he came towards Ierusalem to haue destroyed it, this booke of Daniel, wherein he beheld his owne glorie foretold, as the same was plainly expounded vnto him; which not only staied his hand from the harme of that Citie and people, but his assurance and resolution was so confirmed and strengthened thereby, as despising all future peril and resistance, he conquered Darius, and the Easterne Empire in a shorter time than Nabuchodonosor had done one Citie, to wit, Tyre in Phœnicia.

It is true indeed that the Iewes themselves giue lesse authoritie to Daniel, than to Moses, and the Prophets, accompting his booke among those which they call Cetaphims, or Hagiographa, or holy Writings, which they say Estras and the Seniors of the Synagogue compiled after their returne from Babylon. But first, that the booke of Daniel (I meane so much as is found in the Hebrew) is Canonical: secondly, that it was written by Daniel himselfe, and not by Estras and the Seniors; we may assure our selues by testimony of Councils, and Fathers. For in the Council of Laodicea held about the yeere of our Lord 368. after the death of Iovinian the Emperour, and after the Nicene Councell three and fortie yeeres, this booke of Daniel was received.

ceived, verified and confirmed among the other Canonick Scriptures, as in the Epitomie of the same Council it may be seen, and so doth Melton the most ancient Bishop of Sarhis number it, witnesseth Eusebius in his Ecclesiastical historie, the fourth booke, and five and twentieth chapter, so doth the same Author in the Catalogue of Canonick bookes vpon Origen, so doth Hilarius in his Preface vpon the Psalmes, and Epiphanius in his booke of Waights and Measures, &c. To these I may adde S. Hierome, Gregorie Nazianzene, and others. For the Hagiographe bookes or holy Writings, the Iewes and Rabbines reckon to be these, Daniel, Psalmes, Prouerbs, Iob, Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Hester, Esra, Nehemiah, and the Chronicles. And that it was Daniel, and not Esdras, that wrote this booke, Gods commandment vnto him by his Angell, to seale vp the same to the time appointed, is an vnanswerable testimonie. Yea that which exceedeth all strength of other prooffe, our Saviour Christ who citeth no Apocryphal Scripture, in Mathew & Marke allegeth Daniel the Prophet, to wit, the last verse of his nineteenth chapter. Further, in the first of Iohn, Christ distributeth the risen from the dead, as in Daniel the twelfth verse the second. S. Paul describeth Antichrist out of Daniel, and the Revelation is wholly an interpretation of *Daniel*s visions.

§. III.

That the 70. yeeres of captiuitie are to be numbered from the destruction of Ierusalem; not from the migration of IERONIA.

Aning thus farre digressed, in maintaining that authority, which mult often be cited in the present argument, it is now conuenient, that we returne vnto the differences of opinion, concerning the beginning of these 70. yeeres. Neither will I stand to trouble my selfe and others with laying open the grounds or weaknesse of that which Eusebius and some few namelesse Authors, haue sometimes held in this point, which is lately reuiued by Beroaldus; but will forth-with enter vnto consideration of that opinion, which many both ancient and late Writers haue so earnestly maintained, that it wants not much of being common.

Fourre Kings of Iuda were carried away captiues to Babylon: First, Manasses; then Iehoiakim, and with him among others, Daniel the Prophet: thirdly, Iechonias, and with him Ezekiel: lastly, Zedekias; at which time the Citie and Temple were destroyed. To the first of these captiuities the beginning of the 70. yeeres is referred by none that I haue read; to the second by few and with weak prooffe; to the third by very many and with much confidence. For besides those places of Ezekiel already cited, there is a strong argument gathered out of Ieremie, which may seeme to make the matter plaine. For the Prophet in comforting the people that were carried away with Iechonias, vseth these words: Thus saith the Lord, after 70. yeeres be accomplished at Babel, I will visit you, and performe my good promise towards you, and cause you to returne to this place.

But it stands indeed with little reason that we should seeke the interpretation of a prophetic out of circumstances, when the prophetic is such as doth sufficiently expound it selfe. Ieremie had already, in the fourth yeere of Iehoiakim, denounced the iudgement of God against the Land, for the sinnes and impoentitie of that obdurate people, in these words: Behold, I will send and take to me all the families of the North, saith the Lord, and Nebuchadnezzar, the King of Babel, my seruants, and will bring them against this Land, and against the inhabitants thereof, and against all these Nations round about, and I will destroy them, and make them an astonishment, and an hissing, and

and a continuall desolation. Moreover, I will take from them the voice of mirth, and the voice of gladnesse, the voice of the Bridgroom, and the voice of the Bride, the noise of the mill stones, and the light of the candle, and this whole Land shall be desolate, and an astonishment, and these Nations shall serue the King of Babel 70. yeeres. And when 70. yeeres are expired, I will visit the King of Babel. Here wee see prescribed vnto the captiuitie the term of 70. yeeres, which were to commence, neither when the prophetic was uttered; nor when Iehoiakim, who then reigned, was taken by Nebuchadnezzar, nor yet in the time of Iechonias; but with the utter desolation of the Citie, whereof Ieremie did againe giue notice to those that were already in Babylon, at such time as he sent them the comfort of deliuerance before recharied. And so did the people vnderstand this prophetic, in those times when they saw it accomplished, beginning the 70. yeeres at the time of the desolation, as manifestly appears in the end of the Historie of Iuda, where it is said thus: They burnt the house of God, and brake downe the wall of Ierusalem, and burnt all the places thereof with fire, and all the precious vessels thereof to destroy all: And they that were left by the sword, carried he away to Babel, and they were seruants to him and to his sonnes, vntill the Kingdome of the Persians had rule, to fulfill the word of the Lord by the mouth of IEREMIA, vntill the Land had her fill of her Sabbaths: for all the daies that the Land was desolate, she kept Sabbath, to fulfill 70. yeeres. But in the first yeere of CYRVS King of Persia (when the word of the Lord, spoken by the mouth of IEREMIA, was finished) the Lord stirred up the spirit of CYRVS.

Chon. 3. 6. 19.

We seldom find one piece of Scripture so precisely and plainly expounded by another, as in this prophetic, to haue afterwards bene the subiect of alteration. For one can hardly deuise, how either the desolation could haue bene expressed more sensibly than it was by the Prophet, or the event of the prophetic haue bene more exactly set downe, than it was in the place now last of all cited. If it bee requisite that we bring more prooffe in so euident a case, the ninth Chapter of Daniel yeelds testimonie sufficient, vnto this exposition of Ieremie his prophetic, that Ierusalem was to lie waste 70. yeeres. For in the first yeere of Darius the Mede, which was the last of the 70, Daniel obtained of God the deliuerance that had been promised by prayer, which he made vpon consideration of the time that was expired: as he telleth vs in these words: In the first yeere of his reigne, I DANIEL vnderstood by bookes the number of the yeeres, whereof the Lord had spoken vnto IEREMIA the Prophet, that he would accomplish 70. yeeres in the desolation of Ierusalem. So that howsoever the time of Daniel his owne captiuitie bee reckoned from the taking of Iehoiakim, and that the people carried away with Iechonias, did accompt, as well they might, the yeeres of their owne captiuitie; yet with the generall desolation of the Countrey, wherein were few or none of the Israelites left remaining to inhabite, beganne in the nineteenth yeere of Nabuchodonosor the great captiuitie; which by Gods appointment continued vnto the end of 70. yeeres. This I will not further seeke to proue, by the authoritie of Iosephus and others affirming the same; for as much as that which already hath bene produced, is enough to satisfie any man that hath not fully determined to hold the contrarie.

Xenophon. Cyropag. lib. 1. c. 13

That Kings reigned in Babylon, during these 70. yeeres of the captivity, and how long each of them did weare the Diademe, it is a matter of no great importance to know, for as much as neither their acts were notable in the age wherein they liued, nor the length of their reignes, any way helpfull to the concordance of times, fore-going or succeeding. The conquests recounted by Xenophon of Syria, Arabia, (or rather some part of it) Hyrcania, Bactria, and perhaps of some other Countries, may seeme fruits of the victories obtained by Nebuchadnezzar the Great (or by some of his Ancestors) in the former part of his life, before he betooke himselfe to ease, and to the sumptuous building of his great Babel, for the house of his Kingdome, and for the honor of his Maestie, where it may seeme that he and his Heires kept a great state, and did very little. The idle behaviour of the Assyrian Souldiers, in such skirmishes as afterwards they had with the Medes, doth argue no lesse. For whereas vnder Nebuchadnezzar, they were so stout and industrious, that (to omit other proofes) they attempted, and finished, that hardie piece of worke, of winning the strong Citie of Tyre, by ioyning it vnto the continent, filling vp the deepe and broad channel of the Sea, diuiding it from the maine with a mole, or peece of earth, and other matter, the reparation whereof, when the Sea had washed it away, was the very greatest of Alexanders works in the times following, they became timorous, that they durst not approach neerer to the enemy than their bowes would carrie, but were ready to turne their backs, as soone as any, though inferiour in numbers, aduenturing with in the distance offered to charge them.

Now as their actions from the end of Nebuchadnezzars warres, till the ruine of their Empire, were not worthie to be recorded; so was the distinction of their times, and raigne of their severall Kings, unworthy of the great labour that hath so vaine been taken in that businesse. For when it is granted, that the captiuitie of Juda, ending with that Empire, lasted 70. yeeres, we may as reasonably forbear to search into the particular continuance of two or three slouthfull Kings, as we are contented to be ignorant of the ages of the Patriarchs, and their children, liuing in the Egyptian seruitude; resting satisfied in both with the generall assured summe.

Yet for as much as many haue travelled in this businesse, vpon desire (as I take it) to approue the beginning and end of the 70. yeeres, not only by the reignes of other Princes, ruling else-where, but by the times of the Assyrians themselves: I will not refuse to take a little paines in collecting their opinions, and shewing what I thinke, may best be held for likely, if the certaine truth cannot be found.

The opinions are many, and greatly repugnant, both in recounting the Kings themselves, and in setting downe the yeeres of their severall reignes. The first (as I take it) the surest, is theirs, who merely follow the authoritie of the Scriptures, without borrowing any helpe from others. These name onely three Kings, Nebuchadnezzar, Evilmerodach, and Balthasar. Neither haue they only the silence of Daniel, who names none other to be their warrant, but the prophesie of Jeremie precisely, and in a manner purposely teaching the very same. For God, by the mouth of that Prophet, shewing that he being absolute Lord of all, would dispose of all, according to his owne will, and making it knowne that he had some Countries here named, into the hands of the King of Babel, saith thus: And all Nations shall serue him, and his Sonne, and his Sonnes Sonnes, untill the very time of his Land come also; then many Nations and great Kings shall serue themselves of him. These wordes expressing the continuance of the Chaldean Empire, and number of the Kings, will hardly be qualified with any distinction. But indeede I finde no other necessitie of quaqualification to be vied herein, than such as may grow out of mens desire to reconcile the Scriptures vnto profane authors. And this desire were not vniust, if the content of all histories were on the one side, and the letter of the holy Text were single on the other side.

But contrariwise, the Authors which are cited in this case, are so repugnant one to the other, and the proofes of their different reports are so slender and unufficient, that the succession of these Princes, had it not bin thus deliuered in Scriptures, but onely set downe by some Author of equal credite with the rest, might verie well haue found and deferred as good belicfe, as any of those things which they haue deliuered in this point. For some there are, who following Iosephus, deriue that Empire, as by descent from father to sonne, through five generations; beginning with Nabuchodonosor the great, and giuing to him 43. yeeres, to Evilmerodach 18, to Nightsar the sonne of Evilmerodach 40, to Laborsardach the sonne of Nightsar 9. moneths, and lastly to Balthasar (whom Iosephus intimates to be of the race of Nabuchodonosor, without naming his father) 17. yeeres. And this opinion (saue that he forbears to reckon the yeeres, and plainly calls Balthasar the sonne of Laborsardach) Saint Hierome doth follow, alledging Berosus, and Iosephus as a sectator of Berosus for his Authors; though Berosus, as he is cited by Iosephus, report the matter farre otherwise. For he tells vs that Evilmerodach the sonne of Nabuchodonosor did raigne but 2. yeeres, being for his wickednesse and lust, slaine by his sisters husband Nightsar, who occupied the kingdome after him 4. yeeres, and left it to his owne sonne Laborsardach, who being an ill-conditioned boy, was at the end of 9. moneths slaine by such as were about him, and the kingdome giuen to one Naborsinus, who held it by the election of the Conspirators, and left it vnto Cyrus after 27. yeeres. This relation ill agrees with that of Iosephus, and both of them as bad with the Scriptures, in number either of yeeres, or of generations; yet the particularities which they handle, haue procured vnto them some authoritie, so that the names which they haue inserted, are taken as it were vpon trust. There is a third opinion, which makes the three last kings brethren, and sonnes of Evilmerodach; and this may well enough agree with the Scripture: though I had rather beleue Xenophon, who saith that the last king of Babylon was immediate successeur to his father. But whereas the Author of the Scholasticall Historie; who is founder of this opinion, placeth betwene him that tooke Ierusalem, and Evilmerodach, another Nabuchodonosor: plaine it is that he hath, out of any Historic sacred or profane, as little warrant to guide him, as we haue reason to follow him. Eusebius, Soletinus, Suerus, and Theodoret, vpon better ground, haue supposed, that Evilmerodach and Balthasar were brethren and sonnes of the great Nabuchodonosor. This is built on the fifth chapter of Daniel, wherein Balthasar (for of Evilmerodach there is none that euer doubted) is often called Nabuchodonosor his sonne. And so common grew this explication, that Saint Hierome called it the vulgar opinion. But the place of Jeremie before cited, proues that Balthasar was not the sonne indeede, but the grandchild of that great conquerour, though by the phrase very common in Scriptures; and familiar in those Eastern languages, he was called the sonne.

Amnius his Metasthenes hits very rightly the 70. yeeres of captivity, giuing to Nabuchodonosor 45. yeeres, to Evilmerodach 30. yeeres, and to the three sonnes of Evilmerodach, nephews of Nabuchodonosor 14. yeeres; that is, to Reg-Assar the eldest sonne three yeeres, to Lab-Assar the second sonne fixe yeeres, and to Balthasar the third sonne five.

To this account agreeing with the Scriptures, both in the whole summe of 70. yeeres, and in the number of generations, I haue sometime subscribed, as not daring to reject an appearance of truth, vpon no greater reason than because the Author was of Amnius his edition. Yet could I not satisfie my selfe herein; both for that none of the Ancient, and few such of the moderne Writers as deserre to be regarded, haue consented with this Metasthenes; and for that in making Balthasar succeed succede vnto his brother in the kingdome, and not vnto his father, he is wholly against Xenophon, whose Historie of the elder Cyrus in his Assyrian warre I can not lightly value in many respects, and especially because it is very agreeable to the Scriptures, in the taking of Babylon, while the king was at his drunken feast.

Seeking therefore diligently into all circumstances that might giue any light in this obfcuritie, I found manifest prooffe, that the time allotted vnto Balthazar, by Annius his Metaphyses, was farre short of the truth, which is enough to render all suspected that he hath said in distributing what part of the 70. yeeres hee pleased among the rest. For in the third yeere of Balthazar, Daniel saw a vision, after which he was sicke certaine dayes, but when hee rose vp, he did the kings businesse: from which businesse, that hee did afterwards withdraw himselfe, and liue retired, so long that he was forgotten in the Court, it appeares plainly, both by the many words which the old Queene vsed to set out his sufficiency, and by the Kings asking of him, when he came into his presence, whether he were Daniel. Now to thinke that a man of such account and place as Daniel had held, could in two yeeres haue bene worne out of remembrance, were in my iudgement a very strange conceipt, which rather than I would entertaine, I can well be contented, to thinke the whole storie (thus related) a part of Annius his impostures.

Out of these reports of Iosephus, Berosus, and others, many new opinions are framed, by coniectures of late Writers. For the endurance of the captiuitie being 70. yeeres, and these yeeres extending vnto the first of Cyrus, in which course of time Nebuchadnezzar, his sonne and grand-child, must haue reigned; it hath seemed needfull to supply the yeeres of these three descents, by inserting some, whose reignes might fill vp the whole continuance of the captiuitie, with which the time allotted by Berosus and others, to Eulmerodach and Balthazar, ioyned vnto the yeeres following the nineteene of Nebuchadnezzar, (wherein Ierusalem was laid desolate) are nothing euen.

Therefore Mercator and others following him, fashion the yeeres of Eulmerodach in this sort. They say, that the 18. yeeres giuen to him by Iosephus in the tenth of his Antiquities, should be read and numbered 28. yeeres, and the two yeeres that Berosus hath allowed to Eulmerodach should be written 23. in the first number the figure of (1) is mistaken for the figure of (2) and in the latter there should haue bin added the figure of (3) to that of (2:) this granted (to wit) that Eulmerodach reigned 28. yeeres, whereof five together with his father, and 23. after his death, and the same number of 23. added to the 25. which Nabuchodonosor liued after the destruction of Ierusalem, make 49. then 4. yeeres of Niglissar according to Berosus, 9. moneths of Labassardach his sonne, and 17. yeeres of Nabonidus or Balthazar make vp the number of 70. yeeres to the first of Cyrus. But whether by error in figures, or in words, the numbers be vterly mistaken, in all copies extant, vpon how weak a foundation doe they build, who haue nothing to helpe them, save onely the bare names of two vnkowne Kings, found in Authors manifestly corrupted, and such as if they had bene entirely extant, were not worthy, to haue that place of Ieremie called into dispute, in regard of their authoritie?

§. V.

A more particular examination of one opinion touching the number, persons, and reignes of the Babylonian Kings.

Ther suppositions, little different in substance from this of Mercator, I purposely forbear to rehearse, as falling vnder the same answer. That of Ioseph Scaliger I may not forget, as deseruing to be considered apart from the rest. He giues to Nebuchadnezzar 44. yeeres, to Eulmerodach 2, to Belsazar, 5; and to Nabonidus 27. So that from the the 19. of Nabuchadnezzar, in which Ierusalem was destroyed, vnto the time of Cyrus he accompteth onely 59. yeeres; beginning (as many doe) the captiuitie 11. yeeres sooner, from the transportation of Iechonia. But hereof enough hath bene said already. That which we are now to consider, is his distribution of the time running betweene the 19. of Nabuchadnezzar, and the fall of the Caldean Empire: wherein if he haue erred, then is all further inquisition fruitles.

Concerning the length of Nabuchadnezzars raigne, I shall hereafter vpon better occasion deliuer my opinion. The time which he giues to Eulmerodach, is very short, and more precisely agreeing with Berosus than with the Scriptures. For wee find in Ieremie, that this Eulmerodach in the first of his raigne, shewing all fauour to Iechonia, did among other things take order for him at his table; and that he did continually eate bread before him all the dayes of his life. His portion was a continuall portion giuen him of the King of Babel, euery day a certaine, all the dayes of his life vntill he died. The very sound of these words (which is more to be esteemed, than the authoritie of Berosus, were he perfectly extant) imports a farre longer time than two yeeres, wherein Iechonia, vnder this gentle Prince, enioyed the comfort sent by God, whose commandement he had obeyed in yielding himselfe to Nabuchadnezzar. Indeed how long Iechonia did liue it can not be proued; but plaine it is hereby, that all his remaining daies hee did eate bread before this King. Now that hee liued not so short a while after this as 2. yeeres, it is more than likely, for he was but 55. yeeres old when he was set at liberty, hauing bin 37. yeeres in the prison, whereinto he was cast at the age of 18. yeeres; after which time it seemes plaine that hee begat Salathiel, as well by the age of Zerobabel, who is said to haue bene but a yong man, and one of Darius his Pages three score yeeres after this, as by other circumstances of his imprisonment it selfe.

Of Belsazar, to whom Scaliger giues the next five yeeres, naming him also Labassardach, I should wonder why he calls him Nabuchadnezzars daughters sonne, were it not that herein I find him very carefull to helpe out Berosus, by shewing in his Nirgissaroor, as husband to Nabuchadnezzars daughter, and Protector of his son foure of these yeeres; by which meanes there remains about one yeere to Belsazar alone, agreeing neerely with the 9. moneths assigned by Berosus to the sonne of Niglissar. But Ieremie hath told vs that it was to Nabuchadnezzar, and to his son, and to his sonnes sonne (not to his daughters sonne) that the Empire was promised: which difficultie if Scaliger could not helpe, it was well done of him, to passe it ouer with silence.

Nabonidus the last of these (whome others, desirous to reconcile Berosus to the Scriptures) haue iudged to be all one with Balthazar, is by Scaliger thought to bee Darius of the Medes. But herein Scaliger is no firme Berosian: for Berosus makes him of the same stocke or race a Babylonian. I speake not this to disgrace the traualle of that most learned man (for it highly commends his diligence and iudgement, that he was not so wedded to any author, as affected with the loue of truth) but to shew that he himselfe hauing in some points disliked those Writers, whome in generall he approoueth, might with greater reason haue wholly reformed them by the Scriptures, wherein can be no error. Two things there are which chiefly did breed or confirme this opinion in Scaliger, that hee whome Berosus calls Nabonidus, was the same whom Daniel had called Darius of the Medes: First, the phrase of Scripture, which signifies vnto vs, that Darius tooke the kingdome, not saying that hee wanne it by force of armes; Secondly, a fragment of Metaphyses found in Eusebius, wherein this Nabonidus is called the Median. Touching the word of the Originall, 50 or of the Greeke translation, which expressing no force of armes, doth only signifie, that Darius tooke or receiued the kingdome; I see no reason why we should thereupon inferre, that the next king entred by Election: seeing Daniel relateth not the meanes and circumstances of Balthazars death, but onely the swift accomplishment of his owne prophecie. Neither could it indeede haue properly bene said (if Daniel niel had cared to vie the most expresse termes) that Darius of the Medes breaking into the citie, did win the kingdome; seeing this was performed by Cyrus in the absence of Darius, though by his forces, and to his vie. Now concerning the fragment of Megasthenes, true it is, that in Eusebius his workes printed at Basile, in the yeere 1559. I finde onely thus much of Megasthenes, cited out of Alpheus; That Nabuchodonosor was more valiant than Hercules; that hee subdued all Lybia, and the rest of Asia as farre as to the Armenians; and that as the Chaldeans report, being returned into his kingdome, and rapt with a diuine furie, he cried with a loude voice: O Babylonians, I foretell yee of a great calamitie that shall come vpon you, which neither Beel, nor any of the Gods shall avert: There will come a Persian, halfe an Asse, that shall bring slavery vpon yee: and that, this and the like when he had spoken, he vanished. Of all this I beleeue little or nothing, sauing that Nabuchodonosor knew before-hand, that his Empire should be translated, as Daniel had foretold from the golden head, to the siluer brest. But that he wan all Africa or Lybia, I hold it neither true nor probable.

If Scaliger copy of Eusebius were the more perfect, out of which Megasthenes tells vs that Nabuchodonosor wanne both Africa and Spaine, I beleeue the fragment so much the lesse: and am as little moued with the authoritie of it, where it calls a Median the pride and confidence of the Affrians, as where it tells of Nebuchadnezzar his owne vanishing away. Indeed that same title of halfe an Asse, by which he calleth Cyrus, makes me to suspect the fable as cunningly forged out of Apollo his Oracle, wherein he termeth him a Mule, becaue his parentage was more noble on the mothers side, than on the fathers; as Mules are begotten by Asses vpon Mares. And thus much in answer to the two principall foundations whereon this opinion is built. As for the concinnitie and coherence which it hath within it selfe, I easily allow it. But this proues nothing, for mere fictions haue not wanted these commendations: neither can any man beleeue that one so iudicious, industrious and deeply learned as Ioseph Scaliger, would ouer-shoote himselfe in setting downe repugnancies.

It now remaineth to examine the agreement of this with the Scriptures, from which there is no appeale. And herein it seemes that Scaliger, well knowing his owne sufficiency, hath beene little carefull to satisfie men that would frame Arguments against him. For if the prophetic of Daniel were true, that the kingdome of Babylonia was diuided, and giuen to the Medes and Persians, either wee must thinke that Darius of the Medes was not Nabonidus, or else wee must bethinke our selues what Persian it might be that shared the kingdome with him. For it is not more certaine, that Balthasar lost his life and kingdome, than that his kingdome was diuided and giuen to the Medes and Persians. Neither did the Medes and Persians fall out and fight for it, as by supposing Nabonidus to haue bene Darius, they should be thought to haue done; but these two Nations did compound the body of that Empire, and were accounted as Lords ouer all the subiect provinces, in so much that the Grecke Historians did commonly call those warres which Darius, and after him Xerxes, made vpon Greece, The warres of the Medes. Yea to cleare this point, euen Daniel himselfe remembers that King, with whom Alexander fought, vnto a Ramme with two hornes, calling him the King of the Medes and Persians. Wherefore the whole Nation of Chronologers were not to haue beene condemned by Ioseph Scaliger, for maintaining vpon such good grounds, that Darius of the Medes, was partner with Cyrus in his victories, and not a Chaldean King by him subdued. Neither was Ioseph to be the lesse regarded, for affirming that Balthasar was destroyed by Darius of the Medes, and his nephew Cyrus, though herein hee varied from Berosus, and others, whose authoritie elsewhere he gladly citeth. For Ioseph had no reason to beleeue any mans faith or knowledge of those times, halfe so well as Daniel, whom I beleeue that hee vnderstood as farre as was needfull in this case. Lawfull it was for him to allege all Authors that had any mention, though vnperfect of the same things things that were contained in the writings of the Iewes, to whose histories thereby he procured reputation in the Roman world, where they were strangers, and might seeme fabulous. Euen so doe Eusebius, and other Christian Writers, willingly embrace the testimonies of heathen bookes making for the truth in some particulars; yet will they not therefore be tried in generall by the selfe same Etimologic philosophers, but leaue them where they are against the truth; as Iosephus in this case hath left Berosus. And thus much I thought it meete to say of Scaliger opinion in this point; holding neuertheless in duer regard his learning and iudgement, which if in some things it had not failed, the miracle had bene very great.

§. VI.

What may be held as probable of the Persons and Times of Nabuchodonosor his successors.

IT now remains that I freely acknowledge mine owne weaknes, who cannot find how the 70. yeeres of captiuitie are to be diuided among them which reigned in Babylon, though I finde that the distribution made of them, in such wise as already is rehearsed, be ill agreeable to the holy Scriptures. Wherefore I may truly say with Petrus, that wee ought liberally to pardon those whose fete haue failed them in the slipperie wayes of Chronologie, wherein both learning and diligence are subiect to take a fall at one time or other, by ignorance, forgetfulness, or heedlesse reckoning. Yet will I aduenteure to deliuer my opinion, wherein the iudgement of Lyra and others (holding those onely to haue reigned ouer Chaldeans, whose Names are found in the Scriptures) appears more conformable to reason and account of time, than any of the other Sentences or Coniectures before rehearsed. Nor that I will take vpon me to defend Lyra his Coniectures, when hee supposeth by Niglisar and Laborsadach to be meant the same persons which are called in Scriptures Eulmerodach and Balthasar (for this can by no good colour be maintained) but onely to shew that the Kings by him cited, are likely to haue occupied the whole time of seuentie yeeres. First therefore let vs consider the raigne of Nebuchadnezzar, in whose eighteenth yere Ierusalem was taken and sackt, but in his nineteenth layd vtterly desolate.

Most of Writers haue giuen to him 43. yeeres of raigne, following therein Berosus. There are who haue added one yere more; and some haue made it vp 45. To dispute about the certaintie were needlesse: for in shewing by what length of time the Scriptures measure him, we shall shew the certaine truth.

Manifest it is, that the 19. yere of Nebuchadnezzar, is ioyned with the 11. of Zedekias as also that his eight yere, was the first yere of Iechonias his captiuitie; the raigne of Zedekias occupied all the meane space being of 11. yeeres. This is generally agreed vpon, so that it needes no further proofes: As for the beginning of his successor Eulmerodach, it was in the seuen and thirtieth yere of Iechonias his captiuitie; so that Nebuchadnezzar after his eight yere (which was the first of Iechonias his bondage) reigned 35. whole yeeres, and peraduenture a good part of the fixe and thirtieth, so far much as Iechonias was enlarged with so great fauour, not vntill the end of the yeere. Subtracting therefore out of these foure and forty, which Nebuchadnezzar reigned did well-neere occupie, those eighteene yeeres of his which passed away before the captiuitie of Iuda, and ruine of the citie, we haue remaining fixe and twenty yeeres of the seuentie, that were almost wholly spent, when his sonne beganne to raigne.

It is now to be considered how the remainder of the seuentie yeeres were diuided betweene the kings ruling in Babylon vntill the first of Cyrus. A question more difficult (as I said before) than greatly needfull: the whole summe being certaine, and the distinction of times affording no benefit in knowledge of their actiues, who were were slouthfull Princes. Neither can any man the more iustly suspect the beginning or end of the whole 70. yeeres, for that the distribution of some part of them is only coniectural; seeing that none who giues any other termes to their beginning or end, hath refused to follow both vnlikely and desperate coniectures in diuiding them. I will therefore be bold to doe as others haue done; knowing well before-hand, that whoeuer shall discouer my error, must doe mee the pleasure (which I could rather wish in a case more materiall) of making mee to vnderstand the truth.

Of the foure and forty yeeres remayning in accompt at Nebuchadnezzars death, we are to take away the last, which was the first of Darius the Mede, and then hauing authority good enough to warrant vs from blame of presumption, in giuing vs leuenteene yeeres to Balthasar, we finde left in our hands to bellow vpon Emimeroch fixe and twenty yeeres. Of the yere belonging to Darius the Mede, I haue already spoken what I thought sufficient, in deliuering my opinion of the beginning & continuance of this captiuitie. That Balthasar did raigne leuenteene yeeres, we haue the authority of Iosephus, before cited in expresse words; We haue also the generall consent of all, or the most late Writers, interpreting Berosus his Nabonidus, who raigned so long; and Balthasar to haue beene one. But nothing moueth me so much to beleue this Tradition, as first those euident places in Daniel, shewing that in the third yere of Balthasar he followed the Kings businesse, and yet was forgotten ere the end of his raigne, (a prooffe sufficient of no few yeeres, passing vnder this man, especially seeing it is no where found that Daniels employments tooke end either that yere or the next.) Secondly, the consideration of Cyrus his warres against the Assyrians, which beginning with the death of this mans father, and being alwaies prosperous, could hardly haue occupied any longer time, though we make large allowance to his deedes in the lower Assyria, which fell out in the mid-way: I haue already shewed, that there appears in the Scriptures likelihood enough to make it credible, that the raigne of Emimeroch was not short: and that men of great iudgement haue found it most probable, that he was King three and twenty yeeres. More, I thinke, they would haue allowed him, had not the desire of satisfying Berosus caused them to rest content with this. And surely it were greatly to be wished, that bookes of such antiquitie, as those of Berosus, were extant without corruption; a great light (no doubt) they would yeeld in many darke passages of Antiquitie. I will yet confesse, that were his workes neuer so excellent, and in all things else vnquestionably true, I would not therefore condescend vnto him in some one point, wherein the Scriptures were his open enemy. How much lesse ought I to obey a broken fragment of his, containing only seuen or eight lines, and part euen of the title corrupted, as they beleue that follow him in the rest? The Scriptures haue told vs that God gaue the Empire to Nebuchadnezzar, to his sonne, and to his sonnes sonne: How long each of them held it, we finde not expresse; yet would we gladly know it of Berosus, or of any other that would teach vs; provided alwaies, that helping vs in a particularitie, he destroy not thereby the generall truth. More words are needlesse. It is enough to say with others, that Berosus or Iosephus who cited him, hath bin wronged by the carelesnesse of Scribes; and that it was as easie for those Scribes to erre in writing two for fixe & twentie, as for three and twentie, or perhaps more easie. For the omission of the second figure, was as likely the one way as the other; and the Character 5. signifying 6. hath a neerer resemblance of 6 than stands for 2. than hath 7, which is vsed for 3. So that the numerall notes 63. expressing 26. were not safe enough from being mistaken in the true copie, and might be altered, as ill written, if some crooked hand, or other mischance not vnusall, had omitted the first stroke of the former letter, or added a dash to the latter, which might cause them to seeme not two different figures, but the one a correction of the other, which how it could be supposed in 67 standing for 23, I doe not well perceiue. As for the arithmeticall figures now in vs, they were were long after the time of Iosephus brought in by the Arabians, and therefore doe not appertaine to this businesse; vnlesse we should ghesse that his workes were corrupted in that vnlearned age, which following the Saracen conquest, was little occupied in the studies of humanitie, but in a sort wholly giuen ouer to the doctrine of Aristotle. If this will serue to make Berosus our friend, so let it be; if not, I will not purchase the fauour of his authoritie, by forsaking Jeremie and Daniel, when they seeme his opposites.

§. VII.

Of the victories which NABUCHODONOSOR obtained betwene the destruction of Ierusalem and conquest of Egypt.

What actions this time of 70. yeeres was entertained by the Babylonian Kings, few haue written, or little is remaining in record. Which may peradventure haue bin some cause that the time it selfe was, and is yet sought to be abridged, as not hauing left sufficient matter to witness the length of it. But by such an argument wee might as well deny to many people euen their being. For eury Nation (I know not whom I should except) betwene the beginning and last end of it, hath in some slouthfull age rather dreamt away the time, than spent it. It is therefore no maruell, if the posteritie of Nabuchodonosor, finding all things readie to their hand, which their hearts could haue desired, betooke themselves to their ease and pleasures, thinking perhaps, like the prodigall sonnes of greedie fathers, their owne wisedome greater, which knew how to enioy, than that of their Ancestors, which wearied away their daies in the restless trauell of purchasing: Though indeede the raigne of Nabuchodonosor was so diuided, that his youthfull and stronger yeeres haue beene exercised in victorious armes, no small part of his life was remaining to be spent in establishing what was gotten, and gathering the fruit of his worthe labours past. The nineteenth yere of his raigne it was, when destroying vtterly the great and mightie Citie of Ierusalem, hee enriched himselfe with abundance of spoyle, and terrified all that would offer to resist him, by that fearefull example. From that time forward, he, vntill his three and twentieth yere, laboured in the conquest of those adioyning Regions, which God had exposed vnto his sword, & commanded to weare his yoke; namely, the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, Tyrrians, Sidonians, and Egyptians, though some of these were already become his followers, and serued vnder him, when Ierusalem was beaten down and burnt. But the Tyrrians, whose Citie was founded on an Island, safe enough from any danger of a Land-armie, and whose fleet was so strong, that they needed not to feare any enemy at sea, were neither danted with the fall of their neighbour Cities, nor with the obblinate resolution of this mightie Prince, employing all his power to their subuersion.

That the Citie of Tyre was rather well pleased, than any way discouraged with the fall of Ierusalem (which had held the same course that Tyrus did, and endured all that might be in the same quarrell against the common enemy) it appears by the words which Ezechiel condemneth as the common voice of Tyrus: AN h, the gate of the people is broken, it is turned vnto me for seeing thee is desolate, I shall be replenished. Yet at the length, euen in the nineteenth yere of Nabuchodonosor, that great work of his, whereof we haue already spoken, began to appeare about the waters, and threaten them with ineuitable mischance.

But those prophecies of Jeremie and of Ezay, which appoint vnto this desolation of Tyre the same terme of 70. yeeres, that was prescribed vnto the raigne of the Chaldeans, doe plainly shew, that these followed Ierusalem, the same nineteenth yere of Nabuchodonosor, in the same, or a very like fortune. The particularities, which doubtlesse were memorable in the issue of so great and laborious a siege, are in a manner utterly lost. Thus much we finde, That the Citizens perceiving the Towne unable to hold out, embarked themselves, and fled into the Isle of Cyprus. Neuerthelesse it seemes that this confusion serued only the principall men, who escaping with their goods, abandoned the poorer sort vnto the enemies furie. For not only such people of Tyre as dwelt on the Continent (who are called her Daughters in the field) were put to the sword; but the like execution was done in the streets, into which, with excessive labour, the Assyrian made way for his Horses and Chariots. Thus NABUCHODONOSOR caused his Armie to serue a great service against TYRUS, wherein every head was made bald, and every shoulder was made bare, yet had he 10 no wages, nor his Armie; but was faine to rest contented with the Honor of hauing destroyed that Citie, which in all mens iudgements had bene held invincible.

The destruction of these two great and powerful Cities, hauing made the name of the Chaldeans dreadfull in the eares of all the Nations thereabout, Nabuchodonosor vsed the aduantage of that reputation which hee had obtained by victories already gotten, to the getting of more, and more profitable, with lesse paine. The Kingdome of Egypt was the mark at which he aimed; a Country so aboundant in all riches and pleasures, that it might well haue tempted any Prince, finding himselfe strong enough, to seeke occasion of quarrell against it; and so farre an enemy to the Crowne of Babylon, that had it bene poorer, yet either it must haue bene subdued, or the conquest of Syria could ill haue bene established. Neuerthelesse it was needfull, that before hee entered into this business, the Countries adiacent should be reduced into such termes, that either they should wholly stand at his deuotion, or at least bee vnable to worke him any displeasure. And herein the decree of God concurred, as in all prosperous enterprises, with reason of state. For the people of Moab, Ammon, Edom, Damasceus, Kedar, Hazor, and other adioyning Regions, whom God for their sins had condemned to fall vnder the Babylonian swords, were such, as regarding onely their owne gaine, had some of them, like Ravens, followed the Chaldean Armie, to feede vpon the carcases that fell by the cruelty thereof; others taking aduantage of their neighbours miseries, occupied the Countries which were by his victories belonging to Nabuchodonosor; all of them thinking, that when the Assyrian had satisfied his furie, he should be faine to forsake those desolate parts, and leaue the possession to those that could lay hand vpon it. Particularly the Edomites and Philistines had shewed much malice to the Iewes when their Citie was taken. What good seruice they had done to the Chaldeans, I finde not; if they did any, it is likely to haue been with reference to their own purposes, wherein they were disappointed. The Ammonites were not contented to reioyce at the fall of Ierusalem, but presently they entered vpon the Country of Gad, and took possession, as if not the Assyrians, but they, had subdued Israel. Neither can I perceiue what other ground that practice had of Basai King of the Ammonites, when he sent 40 Ishmael, a Prince of the bloud of Iuda, to murder Gedalim, whom the King of Babel had left Governour ouer those that remained in Israel, and to carry captiue into the Ammonites Countie the people that abode in Mizpah, than a desire of embroiling Nabuchodonosor with so many labours at once, as should make him retire into his owne Country, and abandon those wasted Lands to himselfe and others, for whom they lay conueniently. Such or the like policie the Moabites did exercise; whose pride and wrath were made frustrate by God, and their dissimulation condemned, as not doing right.

All these Nations had the art of rauening, which is familiar to such as liue or border vpon desarts; and now the time afforded them occasion to shew the vttermost cunning of their theuifish wits. But Nabuchodonosor did cut asunder all their deuices by sharpe and suddaine war, ouerwhelming them with vnexpected ruine, as it were in one night; according to the prophecies of Esay, Ieremie, and Ezechiel, who fore-told, with little difference of words, the greatnesse and swiftnesse of the miserie erie that should come vpon them. With which of them he first began, I finde not; it seemes that Moab was the last which felt his hand: for so doe many good Authors interpret the prophetic of Esay, threatening Moab with destruction after three yeeres, as hauing reference to the third yeere following the ruine of Ierusalem; the next yeere after it being spent in the Egyptian expedition. This is manifest, that all the principall Townes in these Regions were burnt, and the people slaine, or made slaues, few excepted, who being persued by flight, had not the courage to returne to their habitations ouer-hastily, much lesse to attempt any thing against Nabuchodonosor, but liued as miserable out-lawes, or at least, oppressed wretches, vntill the end of the seauente yeeres, which God had prescribed vnto the desolation of their Countries, as well as of the Land of Iuda.

§. VIII.

That Egypt was conquered, and the King therein reigning slaine by NABUCHODONOSOR, contrarie to the opinion of most Authors: who following HERODOTUS and DIODORUS, relate it otherwise.

10 When by a long course of victorie Nabuchodonosor had brought into subiection all the Nations of Syria, & the bordering Arabians, in such wise, that no enemy to himselfe, nor friend of the Egyptian, was left at his back, that might giue impediment vnto his proceeding, or take aduantage of any misfortune; then did hee forthwith take in hand the conquest of Egypt himselfe, vpon which those other Nations had formerly bene depending. Of this expedition, and the victorious issue thereof, the three great Prophets, Esay, Ieremie, and Ezechiel, haue written so plainly, that I hold it altogether needlesse to looke after more authoritie, or to cite for proofe balle of that which may be alleaged out of these. Neuerthelesse, we finde many and good Authors, who following Herodotus, and Diodorus Siculus, are well contented to straine these prophecies with vnreasonable diligence vnto such a sense, as giues to Nabuchodonosor little more than the honour of hauing done some spoile in Egypt, omitting the conquest of that Land by the Babylonian, and referring the death of Apries or Hophra to a chance long after following, which had no coherence with these times or affaires. So preposterous is the delight which many men take in the meane and second helps conducing to their purpose, that often-times they preferre the Commentator before the Author; and to vp-hold a sentence, giuing testimonie to one clause, doe carelesly ouerthrow the historie it selfe, which thereby they sought to haue maintained. The reports of Herodotus and Diodorus, concerning the Kings of Egypt, which reigned about these times, are already rehearsed in the former book: but that which they haue spoken of Apries, was purposely referred vnto this place. Herodotus affirms, that he was a very fortunate King, but wherein he telleth not; (vnlesse we should vnderstand that he was victorious in the Warre, which he is said to haue made vpon Tyrrus and Sidon) that hee reigned five and twentie yeeres, and was finally taken and put to death by his owne subiects; who did set vp Amasis, as King, which preuailed against him. The rebellion of the Egyptians hee imputeth to a great losse which they receiued in an expedition against the Cyrenians, by whom almost their whole Armie was destroyed. This calamitie the people of Egypt thought to be well pleasing to their King, who had sent them on this dangerous expedition, with a purpose to haue them consumed, that so he might with greater securitie reigne ouer such as staid at home. So they who escaped, and the friends of such as were slaine, rebelled against Apries, who sent Amasis to appease the tumult; but Amasis became Captaine of the rebells, and was by them chosen King. Finally, the whole Land consented vnto this new Election; whereby Apries was driven to trust vnto his forraigne Mercenaries, the Ionians and Carians, of whom hee kept in readinesse thirte thousand good Souldiers that fought valiantly for him, but were vanquished by the great numbers of the Egyptian forces, amounting vnto two hundred and fittie thousand, which were all by birth and education, men of warre. Apries himselfe being taken prisoner, was gently intreated by Amasis for a while, vntill the Egyptians, exclaiming vpon him, as an extreme enemy to the Land, got him deliuered into their hands, and strangled him, yet gaue him honourable buriall. Such is the report of Heredotus, with whome Diodorus Siculus necerly agrees, telling vs that Apries did vanquish the Cyprians and Phoenicians in battell at Sea, tooke by force and demolished Sidon, wan the other townes of Phoenicia, and the Isle of Cyprus, and finally, perilled as is before rehearfed, when he had reigned two and twentie yeeres. This authoritie were enough (yet not more than enough) to informe vs of Apries his historie, if greater authoritie did not contradict it. But the destruction of Egypt by the Babylonian, fore-told by the Prophets, which hath no coherence with these relations, hath greater force to compell our belief, than haue the traditions of Egyptian Priests (which the Greeke Historians followed) and greater probabilities to perswade those that looke onely into humane reasons. For Esaie prophesied long before of the shameful captiuitie of the Egyptians, whom the king of Assur should carry away naked, young and old, in such wise, that the Iewes, who fled vnto them for deliuerance from the Assyrian, should be ashamed of their owne vaine confidence in men so vnable to defend themselves.

But Ezekiel and Jeremie, as their prophesies were neerer to the time of execution, so they handled this Argument more precisely. For Ezekiel telleth plainly, that Egypt should begin to be destroyed, as wages for the seruice which hee had done at Tyre: Alo hee recounteth particularly all the chiefe Cities in Egypt, saying, That these by name should be destroyed, and goe into captiuitie; yea, that Pharaoh and all his armie should be slaine by the sword. Wherefore it muft needs be a violent expolition of these Prophesies, which by applying the issue of such threatnings to an insurrection and rebellion, concludes all, without any other alteration in Egypt, than change of the Kings person, wherein Amasis did succed vnto Apries, by force indeede, but by the vniforme consent of all the people. Certainly, if that notable place of Jeremie, wherein hee foretelleth how the Iewes in Egypt should see Pharaoh Hophra deliuered into the hand of his enemies, as Zedekia had bene, were to be referred vnto the time of that rebellion, whereof Heredotus hath spoken, as the generall opinion hath ouer-ruled it, then was it vainely done of the same Prophet (which God forbid that any Christian should thinke, seeing hee did it by the appointment of God himselfe) to hide in the clay of a Brick-hill, those very stones, vpon which the throne of Nabuchodonosor should be set, and his pavilion spread. Yea then was that prophesie no other than false, which exprest the end of Pharaoh thus: Behold, I will visite the common people of No, & Pharaoh, and Egypt, with their gods and their kings, even Pharaoh, and all that trust in him: and I will deliuer them into the hands of those that seeke their liues, and into the hand of Nabuchadnezzar, King of Babel, and into the hands of his seruants. The clearnes of this prophesie being such as could not but refute that interpretation of many other places, which referred all to the rebellion of Amasis, it caused me to wonder what those Commentators would say to it, who are elsewhere so diligent in fitting all to the Greeke Historians. Wherefore looking vpon Iulius, who had in another place taken the enemies of Pharaoh Hophra to be Amasis, and his followers, I found him heere acknowledging that the Egyptian Priests had notably deluded Heredotus with lies, coined vpon a vaine-glorious purpose of hiding their owne disgrace and bondage. And surely it may well be thought, that the historie of Nabuchadnezzar, was better knowne to the Iewes, whom it concerned, than to the Greekes, that scarcely at any time heard of his name. Therefore I see no cause why we should not rather ther beleeue Iosephus, reporting that Nabuchodonosor in the three & twentieth yeere of his reigne, and the fift yeere of the destruction of Ierusalem, did conquer Egypt, kill the King thereof, and appoint another in his stead, than Heredotus or Diodore; who being meere strangers to this businesse, had no great reason to labor in searching out the truth, but might rest contented with any thing that the Priests would tell them. Now if setting aside all aduantage of authoritie, we should only consider the relations of Iosephus, and of the Greeke Historians, as either of them might be verified of it selfe by apparant circumstances, without reflecting vpon the Hebrew Prophets, or Egyptian Priests; me thinks the death of Apries can no way be approued as hauing bene wrought by consent of the people, but affords great matter of suspition; yea, though no man had opposed the reports of Heredotus and Diodore. For the great loue and honour which the Egyptians did beare vnto their Kings, is notorious by the vniforme testimony of al others that haue handled the matters of that Countrey, as well as by the report of Diodore himselfe. How then can we thinke it probable, that Apries hauing wonne great victories, did for one only losse fall into the hatred of all his people, or which may seeme to perswade, that a King of Egypt would seeke, or so demean himselfe, that he might be thought to seeke the destruction of his naturall subiects? As for that armie of thirte thousand souldiers, Carians and Ionians, which the King of Egypt, whom Amasis tooke prisoner, is said to haue kept for his defence: doth it not argue that hee was a forraigner, and one that armed himselfe against the Egyptians, wishing them few and weak; rather than any of the Pharaohs, who accounted the force of the Countrey, as assuredly their owne, as the strength of their owne bodies? It were more tedious than any way needfull, to vse all Arguments that might be alleadged in this case. The very death of this supposed Apries, which the clamours of the people obtained of Amasis, who sought to haue kept him aliue, doth intimate that he was some forren Governour, not a naturall Prince; otherwise the people would haue desired to saue his life, and Amasis to take it quickly from him. I will not labour any further to disprove that opinion, whereunto I should not haue yeelded, though it had stood vpon great apparance of truth, considering that the voice of Truth it selfe cries out against it; but leaue the circumstances, prouing the Conquest of Egypt by Nabuchodonosor to be obserued, where due occasion in course of the storie following shall present them.

How Egypt was subdued and held by Nabuchadnezzar.

IT is a great losse, that the generall Historie of the World hath suffered, by the spoile and waste which Time hath made of those Monuments, that should haue preferred the memorie of such famous actions as were accomplished by this mightie Prince Nabuchodonosor; wherein, whether his Vertue, or Fortune were greater, it is now vnertaine. That his victories following the Conquest of Syria, and the Neighbour-Prouinces, were such as did more enlarge his dominion, than all his former warres had done, it may easily be gathered out of Ezekiel, who reckons vp in his thirtieth chapter (besides the whole Countrey of Egypt) Phut and Lud, with other Nations that may seeme to haue reached out into Mauritania, as people subdued by this great Babylonian. The circumstances of these warres are in a manner vtterly lost; but that the victorie was easie and swift, any man shall find, who will take the pains to confere the places, wherein the three great Prophets touch this Argument. Thus much I thinke worthy of more particular obseruation; that Pharaoh, who (as is already noted in the former Booke) thought himselfe safe in Egypt by the well defended situation of his Countrey, did very vnwisely in suffering his enemies to sweepe the way cleane vnto his owne doores, by consuming all his friends and adherents in Syria. For as the labour of this businesse did more harden then wearie the Chaldean army, so the confidence and vaine securitie of the Egyptians, relying vpon the difficult passages which the enemy was to make thorow the Arabian deserts, and the much advantage which the great river of Nilus would afford vnto themselves, did little auail them in prouision for the war, and much astonish them (as may iustly be thought) in the time of execution: it being vially scene, that the hearts of men faile, when those helps faile, in which they had reposed more confidence than in their owne vertue. Hitherto the Kingdome of Egypt had flourished vnder the rule of the Pharaons, and then at length it began to recover by little & litle the former greatnes, yet so, that it was neuer dreadful vnto others, God hauing said of that people, I will diminish them, that they shall no more rule the Nations. For whereas it hath bene said of Pharaoh: I am the sonne of the wife, I am the sonne of the ancient Kings: and whereas he had vaunted, The River is mine, and I haue made it; the Princes of Egypt now became fooles, the river failed them, the King himselfe was taken and slaine, and that ancient linage quite extinguished. This came to passe in the first yeere after the destruction of Ierusalem, and the three and twentieth of Nebuchadnezzar, at which time (saith Iosephus) He slew the King then reigning, placed another in his roome, and carried captiues thence to Babylon, the Iewes whome he found in that Countie. Now concerning the time which Iosephus giues vnto this businesse, and the businesse it selfe, I haue already shewed, that it is warranted by all the prophecies which insinuate the same. As likewise the last destruction of Ierusalem, and carrying away those vnto Babel, who inhabited the miserable ruines of that great city, which was in the same three & twentieth yeere of NEBUCHADNEZZAR, is not vnprobably thought by good authors to haue bene at the returne from this Egyptian expedition. But whereas Iosephus tels vs, that there was another King put in the roome of Apries by Nebuchadnezzar, wee must vnderstand, that hee was onely a Viceroy, and not (as some haue mistaken it) thinke that this was Amasis. For to place the beginning of Amasis his raigne in the three and twentieth of Nebuchadnezzar, were as well repugnant vnto the prophecies before alledged, as to all Chronologie and historie. Some there are, which to helpe this inconuenience, imagine that there were two successiue bearing the name of Amasis; others, that there were two Apries, the one slaine by Nebuchadnezzar, the other by Amasis: a question of small importance, because the difference is onely about a name, it being once granted that the person mentioned in Scriptures, was deprived of life and kingdome by the Affrians. Yet for any thing that I can perceiue, that Apries, of whom the Greeke Historians wrote, could not be the Deputie of Nebuchadnezzar, seeing that hee was the Grand-child of Pharaoh Necho, and made warre (as they report) vpon the Phenicians, who were, before the Egyptians, become subiect vnto the Crowne of Babylon. I might adde, perhaps, that he whom Nebuchadnezzar left as Governour of Egypt, was more likely to haue had some Chaldean or Affrian, than an Egyptian name; vnlesse we should thinke that hee had bene a traitor to his naturall Prince, and so rewarded by the Conquerour with Lieutenantship of the Countie: about which it were but fruitles to dispute. This much in briefe we ought to beleue, that Nebuchadnezzar made an absolute Conquest of Egypt; that he was not so foolish as to giue it away, any man may guesse, that he appointed one to rule the Countie, it is consequent vnto the former, and hath authoritie of Iosephus; that this Governour (or some successour of his) was afterwards taken and slaine by Amasis, I see probability enough to perswade my selfe, and yet can well bee content, that others vse their libertie, and beleue what they list. As for the armie which this Egyptian King Apries is supposed to haue kept of Ionians and Carians, I hold them to be none other than the garisons of mercenarie souldiers which were left by the Affrian for the guard of his Viceroy, and custodie of the new subdued Province: as likewise the company returning from Cyrene and Berenice, who together with the friends of such as were slaine in that expedition, remembered before out of the Greeke Historians, depoled and slew Apries, I take them to haue bene the Egyptian fugitives, which then recovered their owne Countie. Sure it is that this Prophecie of Ezekiel was verified, At the end of fortie yeeres will I gather the Egyptians from the people where they were scattered, and I will bring againe the captiuitie of Egypt, and will cause them to returne into the land of Pathros, into the land of their habitation, and they shall be there a small kingdome. If the Egyptian Priests alluded hereunto in the tale which they made of Amasis his obtaining the Kingdome, then are they to be helped with this or the like interpretation; if they deuised matter that had no shadow of truth, onely to keepe the Greekes from knowledge of their Countie's disgrace; then are they little to be regarded, since we know the truth with them.

Of the sundry accounts drawne from sundry acts of NEBUCHADNEZZAR, and of the destruction of Niniaue, by him; the time of which action is vncertaine.

These victories brought the greatnes of the Affrian Empire to the full, and from them was reckoned the time of Nebuchadnezzar's raigne in sundry places of Scripture. To speake any more of the questions arising about the supputation of Nebuchadnezzar his times, might seeme to be the ouer-handling of one Argument: Yet thus much I will note; that whereas Daniel was carried captiue in the third yeere of Iehoiakims (which ranne along with some part of Nebuchadnezzar's first yeere) and was kept in diet three yeeres more, before he was brought into the Kings presence; it could not be the second of Nebuchadnezzar's kingdome, wherein he interpreted the forgotten dreame of the great Image, foretelling the succession of Monarchies, but the second of his Empire. The same or the like may be said of diuers places which referre sundry matters vnto their set yeeres; as that of Ezekiel before cited, where he fore-tells, that Egypt should be giuen in reward for the seruice done before Tyrus, dating his prophecie in the seuen and twentieth yeere; and that of Daniel, placing the erection of the golden Image in the eighteenth yeere: for these yeeres held no dependance vpon either the beginning of Nebuchadnezzar's kingdome, or of his Empire, nor yet vpon any of the captiuities, but had reference to some memorabile action, omitted in Scripture, and therefore not easie to be found, nor worth the labour of vncertaine search.

Of any warre made by Nebuchadnezzar, after such time as he returned from the Conquest of Egypt, I doe not read: excepting that against Niniaue, the destruction whereof was fore-told by the Prophet Nam. Niniaue had long before bene taken by Merodach (as in due place hath bene shewed) and together with the rest of Affria made subiect to Babylon. Yet was it left vnder a peculiar King, who rebelling against the Chaldean, as Iehoiakim & Zedekias tributary Kings of Inda, had done, raised likewise of the same fortune. That the destruction of Niniaue followed the Conquest of Egypt, it appeareth by the comparison which Nabum the Prophet made betwene this Citie, that was to fall, and the Citie of Noin in Egypt, that was fallen already. But how long after this came to passe, it is (me thinks) vnpossible to finde out. For whereas it is found in an Hebrew Chronologie, that it was in the first of Nebuchadnezzar's raigne; the place of Nabum last cited is enough to disprove it. Whereas it is referred by some vnto the first of his Monarchie, which began at the end of the Egyptian warres; the whole Prophecie of Nabum which went betwene the one and the other, argueth strongly, that there was a longer space of time intercurrent.

current. So that to enquire into the very yeere of this destruction, or other circumstances of the Warre, whether managed by Nabuchodonosor in person, or by his Lieutenants, were somewhat like vnto the vaine curiositie of Tyberius Caesar, enquiring who was the Mother of Hebeus; or to the like idle paines which he should take, who would seeke to learne what woman that Hazzab Queen of Ninivie was, whose wofull captiuitie the same Prophet Naum likewise did fore-tell.

§. XI.

Of the later time of Nebuchadnezzar; his buildings, madnesse, and death.

Dan. 4. 27.

At the time which this great Monarch spent in quiet, I thinke there are no Monuments extant, save those which we finde among the prophecies of Daniel. Among these we may reckon his great works at Babylon, wherewith he pleased himselfe so well, that he brake out into these glorious words: Is not this great Babel that I have built for the house of the Kingdom, by the might of my power, and for the honour of my Madnesse? Surely if those things bee true that are by Iosephus rehearsed of him out of Berosus and Megasthenes, he might well delight himselfe with the contemplation of such goodly and magnificent buildings. For it is said, That he fortified Babylon with a triple wall; that besides other rarely works, he raised those huge arches wherewith were borne vp the high Orchards, hanging as it were in the ayre, and equalling the tops of Mountaines; which most sumptuous frame, that out-lasted all the remainder of the Assyrian, and all the Persian Empire, is said to haue bene reared, and finished in fiftene daies.

But of all this, and other his magnificence, we finde little else recorded, than that (which indeede is most profitable for vs to consider) his ouer-valuing of his owne greatnesse abased him vnto a condition, inferior to the poorest of men. And not vnderstandedly tell these iudgements of God vpon him. For whereas God had honoured him, not onely with many victories, and much happinesse in his owne life, but with a discouerie of things to come after him, yea and had approoued the certaintie of his dreame, by the miraculous reducing of it into his memorie, and interpretation thereof by Daniel the Prophet: he neuertheless became so forgetfull of God, whose wonderfull power he had scene and acknowledged, that hee caused a golden Image to be set vp and worshipped: ordaining a cruell death as reward vnto them that should dare to disobey his Kingly will and pleasure, which was vterly repugnant to the law of him that is the King of Kings. Hereof S. Hierome hath well noted; *Relax obliuio veritatis, ut qui dum seruum Dei quasi Deum adorauerat, nunc statum sibi fieri inbeant, ut ipse quasi Deus in statu adoraretur: A haste forgetfulness of the truth, that hee who so lately had worshipped (DANIEL) the seruant of God, as if he had bene God himselfe, should now command a Statua to be erected vnto himselfe, wherein himselfe might be worshipped as God. From this impietie it pleased God to reclaim him, by the strange and wonderfull deliuerie of those blessed Saints out of the fierie furnaces; who being throwne into it bound, forrefusing to commit Idolatrie, were assisted by an Angell; preferred from all harme of the fire; loosened from their bands; and finally called out with gracious words, and restored to their former honour, by the King: who amazed at the miracle, made a decree tending to the honour of God, which by erection of his Image he had violated. Yet this deuotion of Nebuchadnezzar was not so rooted in him, that it could bring forth fruit answerable to his haultie zeale. Therefore was he forewarned by God in a dreame of the terrible iudgement hanging ouer his head, which Daniel expounding, aduised him to breake off his (sine by righteousnesse, and his iniquitie by mercy towards the poore, that there might be an healing of his error. Hereby it seems that* that iniustice and crueltie were the faults, for which he was threatned, but this threatning sufficed not vnto his reformation. For that fo great a Monarch should be driuen from among men, (according to the tenor of the dreame and interpretation) yea, compelled to dwell with the beaulls of the field, and made to cate grasse as the Oxen, was a thing so incredible in mans iudgement, that easily it might be thought an idle dreame, and much more easily be forgotten at the yeeres end. One whole yeeres leisure to repent was giuen to this haughtie Prince: which respite of the execution may seeme to haue bred in him a forgetfulness of Gods sentence. For at the end of twelue moneths, walking in the royall Palace of Babel, he was fo ouer-joyed and transported with a vaine contemplation of his owne seeming happinesse, that without all feare of Gods heauie iudgement pronounced against him, hee vttered those loftie words before rehearsed, in vaunting of the Maiefticall works which he had reared, as well becomming his maiefticall person. But his high speeches were not fully ended, when a voice from heauen, telling him that his Kingdome was departed from him, rehearsed ouer vnto him the sentence againe, which was fulfilled vpon him the very same houre.

That Salomon, and many other Princes, and great ones, haue taken delight in their owne buildings, it cannot any way be doubted; yet I doe not remember that euer I haue read of any, that were punished for reioicing in works of this kinde, (though it is hard in ioy, or any passion of the minde, to keepe a iust measure) excepting onely this Nebuchadnezzar.

The like may be said of Dauid: for other (and some very godly) Kings haue mistred all their forces to the very last man; but few or none haue been known to haue bene punished as Dauid was. Surely I not onely hold it lawfull to reioyce in those good things, wherewith God hath blessed vs, but a note of much vnthankfulness to entertaine them with a fullen and vnfeeling disposition. Yet as all humane affections, wherein due reference to God is wanting, are no better than obscure cloudes, hindring the influence of that blessed light, which clarifies the soule of man, and predisposeth it vnto the brightnesse of eternal felicitie; so that insolent ioy, which man in the pride of his vaine imagination conceiuet of his owne worth, doth aboue all other passions blatt our minde, as it were with lightning, and makes vs to reflect our thoughts vpon our seeming inherent greatnesse, forgetting the whilest him, to whom wee are indebted for our very being. Wherefore these mala mentis gaudia; The euill ioyes of the minde, were not vnaptly, by the Prince of Latine Poets, bestowed in the entrance of Hell, and placed further inward than sorrowes, cares, and teares; not farre from the yron Cabbins of the Furies. And certainly it is no vnlikely token of vengeance neere at hand, when these vnreasonable flushes of proud and vaine ioy, doe rage in a minde, that should haue bene humbled with a iust repentance and acknowledgement of ill deservings.

This was verified vpon Nebuchadnezzar, whose punishment was singular and vnexempld. For he ranne among beaulls in the fields and woods, where for seuen yeeres hee liued, not onely as a saluage man, but as a saluage beaull, for a beaull hee thought him selfe secundum suam imaginationem, as Thomas noteth, and therefore fed himselfe in the same manner, and with the same food that beaulls doe: Not that he was changed in figure external, according to Mediana, in so much as he appeared a beaull to other mens eyes, as S. Hierome in the life of Hilarius (how true God knows) speaks of a woman that appeared to all other mens sight a Cow, but to Hilarius onely a woman; neither was he changed as Ipigenia the Daughter of Agamemnon was said to be, into a Hinde, nor made a Monlie, as Dorotheus and Epiphanius dreamed: but according to S. Ieromes exposition of these words: *At the same time was my vnderstanding restored vnto me. Ergo. Quando dixit (saith S. Ierome) sensum sibi redditum, ostendit non formam se amisisse, sed mentem; when he saith that his sense was restored vnto him, he sheweth that he had not lost his humane shape, but his vnderstanding. Seuen yeeres expired, it pleased God to restore Nabuchodonosor, both to his vnderstanding,* ding, and his estate, for which he acknowledged and praised God all the rest of his life, confessing his power, and everlasting being; that he was the Lord of heaven and earth, and wrought without resistance what he pleased in both; that his works were all truth, and his waies righteous. Which gaue argument to many of the Fathers, and others, not to doubt of his saluation; namely, S. Augustine, Theodorēt, Lysa, Caribolamus, and others. And for that place of Ezay, the fourteenth, out of which his perdition may be gathered, the aforementioned Authors apply the same to Balthasar, because Ezay, both in the thirteenth and fourteenth Chapter, speaketh of the King, and the destruction of Babylon ioyntly.

§. XII.
Of EVILMERODACH.

Having already spoken what I could of the succession and yeeres of Nebuchadnezzar posteritie; the most that may be said of him, is said of Evilmerodach, which I will not here againe rehearse.

He lost some part of that which his Father had gotten, and left his Kingdome burning in a warre that consumed it to ashes. He lost Egypt by rebellion of the people, in the nineteenth yere of his raigne, which was fortie yeeres after his Father had conquered it: But this agrees neither with the account of Herodotus, who allows to Amasis foure and fortie yeeres of raigne; nor with that of Diodorus, who gives him five and fiftie, saying that he died in the third yere of the threecore and third Olympiad, when Cambyses did conquer Egypt. There were indeed but seven and thirtie yeeres, which passed betwene the second yere of the foure and fiftieth Olympiad, (which was the nineteenth of Evilmerodach, and the first of Amasis) and the fift of Cambyses his raigne, wherein hee wanne Egypt; of which seven and thirtie yeeres it is credibly held, that Pamennitus, the sonne of Amasis, rained three: so that Amasis could be no longer King than foure and thirtie yeeres. But seeing that these two Greeke Historians haue bene abused by Aegyptian Priests, in the substance of that which was spoken of Amasis, it is no marvell though they were also deceived in the length of his raigne. This is the plaine answer to this objection. For to say either that the numbers were miswritten, and foure and fortie set downe in stead of foure and thirtie, or that Amasis did temporise awhile with the Affrians, and not beare himselfe as absolute King of Egypt, untill the nineteenth of Evilmerodach (at which time, and not before, it hath bene proued out of Ezechiel, that Egypt became againe a Kingdome) I hold it a superfluous excuse.

Whether these Aegyptian troubles did animate the King of the Medes to deale with Evilmerodach, as with a Prince greater in fame, and reputation, gotten by the decayed valour of his people, than in present forces; or whether (as I rather thinke) some foile receiued by the Affrian invading Media, emboldned the Aegyptian to rebell against him: I will neither vndertake, nor seeke to define. Xenophon tels, that the first serice of young Cyrus in warre, was vnder Astages King of the Medes, his Grand-father, in a prosperous fight against the Affrian Prince, who did set upon him at which time Cyrus was fifteen or sixteen yeeres old. If therefore Cyrus liued threecore & three yeeres (as he is said to haue died well stricken in yeeres) which is held to be the ordinarie terme of no short life, then was this encounter in the third yere of Evilmerodach his raigne. Yet by the same reckoning it should follow, that the warre began more early betwene these Nations, for as much as the manner of their fight in former times, with other circumstances insinuating as much, are found in the same place of Xenophon. And it may well be, that the death or destruction of Nebuchadnezzar gaue courage vnto those that had felt him a troublesome neighbour, to stand vpon prouder termes with the Affrians, than in his flourishing estate estate they durst haue vied. Howloer the quarrell beganne, wee finde that it ended not before the last ruine of the Affrian Monarchie. For the Babylonian, being too proud to digest the losses which hee receiued by the Medes and their Allies the Perfians, drew vnto his partie the Lydiens, and all the people of the lesser Asia, with gifts and strong persuasions, hoping to ouer-whelme his enemies with a strong inuasion, whome in vaine hee had sought to weare out with a lingring Warre.

This happened after the death of Astages, who left the World in the nineteenth yere of Evilmerodach, at which time Amasis tooke possession of Egypt. So that the Affrian hauing his hands already full of businesse, which more earnestly did affect him, fernes thereby to haue given the better means vnto the Aegyptians, of new erecting their Kingdome, which by long distance of place did sundry times finde occasion to rebell in after-ages, and set vp a King within it selfe, against the far more mightie Persian.

The issue of these great preparations made by Evilmerodach against the Medes, was such as opened the way vnto the fulfilling of those prophesies, which were many yeeres before vttered against Babel, by Ezay and Ieremie.

For the Affrians, and their Confederates, who, trusting in their numbers, thought to haue buried the Medes and Perfians vnder their thicke shewes of arrowes and darts, were encountered with an armie of stout and well-trained men, weightily armed for close fight, by whom they were beaten in open battell, wherein Evilmerodach was slaine. So that great frame of Empire which Nabuchodonosor had rayfed and vp-held, being shaken and grievously crackt vnder his vnfortunate Sonne, was left to bee sustained by his vnworthy Nephew: a man more likely to haue ouerthrowne it, when it was greatest and strongest, than to repaire it, when it was in way of falling.

§. XIII.

Appropriate coniecture of the Author; serving to make good those things, which are cited out of BEROSVS, concerning the Successors of EVILMERODACH, without wrong to the truth, the qualitie, and death of BALTHASAR.

Hough I haue already (as it seemes to mee) sufficiently proued that Balthasar was the Sonne, and immediate Successour to Evilmerodach, yet considering earnestly the coniectures of those Writers, which following Berosus, insert Ziglar, or Nirigissoroor, and his sonne Labfardach betwene them: as also that which I finde in Herodotus of Nitocris, a famous Queene of Babylon, who greatly adorned and fortified that Citie; I haue thought it not superfluous here in this place to shew, by what means it was possible that some error might haue crept into the Historie of those times, and thereby haue brought vs to a needlesse trouble of searching out the truth: as it were by candle-light, in the vncertaine fragments of lost Authors, which we might haue found by day-light, had we adhered onely to the Scriptures. First, therefore I observe, that the time which Berosus dinides betwixt Evilmerodach, and the two next Kings, agrees with the yeeres in which Nebuchadnezzar liued wilde among brute beasts in the open field: Secondly, that the suddainenesse of this accident, which came in one houre, could not but worke much perturbation in that state, wherein doublet the honour of so noble a Prince was highly regarded, his calamitie pitied, and his restitution hoped; the prediction of Daniel finding reputation in that clause clause which promised his recouerie, as being verified in that which had bin more incredible. Now if we doe in common reason iudge, what course was like to be taken by the great ones of the Kingdome, for settling the government, whilst the King was thus distracted, we shall finde it most likely, that his Sonne and Heire did occupie the royall Throne, with condition to restore it vnto his Father, when God should enable him to repossesse it. In this his rule Eutimerodach being to supplie the vicer want of vnderstanding in his Father, as Proteectors doe the vnpericelle of it in young, but reasonable Kings, might easily commit the infolencies, or fall into the troubles, incident to such an office. That hee had in him very small abilitie of government, it appears by his ill maintaining the Empire, when hee held it in his owne right. That his Sister Nitocris (if Nitocris were his sister) was a woman of an high spirit, it appears by that which Herodotus reports of her, saying that shee was more cunning than Semiramis, as appeared in her magnificent and vifull works about the Riuer of Euphrates, and her fortification of Babylon against the Medes, who had gotten many Townes from the Assyrians, & amongst them Ninive. Wherefore it were not vnreasonable to think, that such a woman, seeing how the Empire went to decay through her brothers misgovernment, vsed practices to get the rule into her owne hands, and afterwards, as a mother, to leaue it vnto her vngracious sonne. Other time than this, wherein Nitocris could haue reigned, we doe not finde; but we finde in Berosus (as Iosephus hath cited him) that Niglissar, who got the Kingdome from Eutimerodach, was his sisters husband; which argues this to haue bene the same woman. As for Labassardach the sonne of Niglissar, if at the end of nine Moneths raigne hee were for his lewd commissions flaine by the Nobilitie, as the same Berosus reporteth, it seems that God p hereby the way for Nebuchadnessars restitution (whose terme of punishment was then expired) by raising such troubles as should make him the more desired, both of the Princes and the people. I will not here vfe many words to confute that which Berosus hath further set downe of Eutimerodach, telling vs that hee was flaine by his sisters husband: for the plain words of Scripture, naming the yeere wherein he gaue libertie to Techonias, do plainly tellifie that he out-liued the three or foureand fortieth yeere of his Fathers 30 raigne, which was the last of his life.

This may suffice to shew, that they who are said to haue succeeded Eutimerodach in the Kingdome, might indeede haue so done, though not when hee held it in his owne right. Of Balthasar, who was his Sonne and Heire, we finde, that he had such conditions, as God permitteth to be in a King for the ruine of the people. He was from his young yeeres of a mischievous nature, hauing in his Fathers time flaine a Noble yong man that should haue married his sister, onely for spight and enuie to see him kill two wild beafts in hunting, at which him selfe hauing throwne his laue-line had misfed them. Another great Lord he had gelded, because a Gentlewoman commending his beutie, said it were a happie woman that should be his wife. Such 40 barbarous viliaries caused many which had loued his Father (as a good and gracious, though vnfortunate Prince) to reuolt from him vnto the enemie as soone as he was King. Neither doe I finde that hee performed any thing worthy of record, but as a Coward and a Foole hee lost all; sitting still, and not once daring to giue battell to them that daily tooke somewhat from him: Yet carelesly feasting when danger had hemmed him in on euery side, and when death arrested him by the hands of those whom hee had wronged in his Fathers life. So the end of him was base and miserable; for he died as a foole taken in vnexcusable securitie, yet had not that happinesse, such as it is, of a death free from apprehension of feare, but was terrified with a dreadful vision; which had shewed his ruine not many houres before, 50 euen whilst hee was drinking in that wine, which the swords of his insulting enemies drew out of him, together with his latest blood. It is therefore in this place enough to say of him, That after a dishonourable raigne of seuentene yeeres, he perished rished like a beaft, and was flaine as he deserved. The rest that concerneth him in question of his time, hath bene spoken heretofore; in matter of his affaires, shall be handled among the acts of Cyrus, to whose storie that of Balthasar is but an appendix.

§. I.

That the Medes were chiefe actors in the subuersion of the Babylonian Empire.

Line of Belochus being now extinguished in Balthasar, the Empire of Babylon, and of Assyria, was ioyned first to that of Media, which then was gouerned by Cyaxares or Darius Medus, after whom Cyrus became Lord and Monarch, both of Assyria and of Media it selfe.

Of the race of Phul Belochus there were ten Kings besides him selfe, and of Arbaces as many are found by Metasthenes. These two Prouinciall Gouernours hauing cut downe the last branch of Ninus in Sardapalus, diuided betweene them the Easterne Empire.

Cyaxares (whom the Scriptures call Darius Medus) the last of the race of Arbaces, dying about two yeeres after that the line of Belochus was ended in Balthasar; the Dominions as well of the Conquerour, as of the conquered, fell to a third Familie, namely, to Cyrus of the house of Achamenes, the Princes of which blood raigning in Persia, had formerly bene dependants on the Medes, and were of as little power at home, as of fame abroad in the World.

Of the Family of the Achamenes, and Line of the Persian Kings, we shal hereafter finde occasion in due place to intreat.

The Nation of the Medes descended from Madai the third sonne of Isabert; that they had Kings soone after the flood, Lactantius and Diodorus haue found record; For Lactantius remembreth an ancient King of the Medes called Hydaspes, and Diodor speaketh of Pharnus with his seuen Sonnes, flaine by the Assyrian in the beginning of their Empire.

But of these who succeeded Arbaces the first, that freed his Nation from the Assyrians. I take the list and number from Eusebius, adding Darius Medus: of whom I haue spoken in their proper places heretofore; and they are these.

And though the Greekes ascribe the conquest of Babylon to Cyrus alone, yet the Scriptures teach vs that Darius was not onely King of Media, and had the Persians his followers, but that the Armie victorious ouer Babylazar was his; as the Assyrian and Babylonian Empire also was during his owne life. For wee finde in Daniel, that Darius of the Medes tooke the Kingdome being threecore and two yeres old: And further, what Officers it pleased him to set ouer the Kingdome. And so was it prophesied by Isay long before: Behold, I will stirre up the Medes against them, &c. And by IEREMIE, The Lord hath raised up the Spirit of the King of the Medes: for his purpose is against Babel to de destroy it; and in the eighth and twentieth Verse, prepare against her the Nations, with the King of the Medes, the Dukes thereof, the Princes thereof, and all the Land of his Dominion. These Scriptures Iulius Affricanus doth well open, who taking authoritie from Diodor, Caflor, Thallus, and others, deliuereth that Babylon was taken before Cyrus beganne to raigne, which also agreeth with Strabo, where he saith, That as the Medes were subuigated by the Persians, so before that, both the Babylonians and Assyrians were mastered by the Medes. And therefore the reports of Iustine, and Herodotus, are not to be receiued, who attribute the taking of Babylon to Cyrus alone.

By what meanes the Empire was translated from the Medes to the Persians.

Ow the Kingdome of the Medes fell into the hands of Cyrus, it is a doubt not sufficiently cleared by Historians, but rather their different relations of his beginnings haue bred the former opinion of those who giue the conquest of Babel to the Persian only. For some there are who denie that Astyages had any other Successour than Cyrus his Grand-child by Mandane. Whereas Ctesias on the contrary side affirmeth, that Cyrus was no way descended from Astyages (whom hee calleth Astigas or Apinia) but onely that hauing vanquished him in battaile, and confined him to Bactria, hee married his Daughter Amysis. But I finde the relations of Ctesias often cited and seldome followed, and himselie sometimes very iustly reproofed of willfull vntruth.

Viginius a diligent and learned Historian of this age, produceth many probable reasons that Astyages had no such sonne as Cyaxares, or Darius Medus; and to confirme his opinion, the more he citeth Diodore, Iustine, Strabo, Plato, Aristotle, Isocrates, and before them Caflor, Thallus, and Phlegon, who doe not finde any such Successour. Neither doe Tatianus, Theophilus, Antiochennus, Iulius Affricanus, Clemens Alexandrinus, Iustine Martyr, Lactantius, Eusebius, S. Hierome, or S. Augustine, make report out of any faithfull Author by them read, that hath giuen other Son or Successour to Astyages than Cyrus.

Yet seeing that this manner of argument ab authoritate negatiue, doth neuer inforce force consent; we may bee the bolder (all this great list of noble Writers by him alikewised notwithstanding) to affirme that either Astyages himselie mult haue been Darius of the Medes, which cannot agree with his place in the course of time; Or elle to giue him some other Successour, according to Isophus, and Xenophon, the same whom Daniel calleth Darius. For it is manifest, and without dispute, that the King of the Medes commanded in chiefe, and was absolute Lord of that Conquest, Cyrus during his life, being no other then the Lieutenant of his Armie, and subiect to his authoritie; The strength of both Nations, to wit, the Medes and Persians, with other the Vassalls of Darius, being ioyned together to com-10 pound it.

But it is very certaine that the honour of that great victorie ouer Babylon was wholly giuen to Cyrus, who was the instrument preordained and forenamed by God himselie, not onely for his action, but for the deliuerie of his Church; a greater worke in the eyes of God, than the subuersion of any State or Monarchie, how powerfull soeuer.

And it may well be thought, that the Souldiers employed in that seruice did rather ascribe the glorie to him that was the best man of Warre, than to the Median, who was greatest in riches and power. All which also falling vpon Cyrus by succession, and continuing in his posteritie, did much augment the fame of his vertue, which among prophane Historians ouergrew altogether the honour due to Cyaxares, both becaufe he was old, and did nothing in person; as also becaufe hee soon after quitted the world, and left all to Cyrus, who was possessor of whatsoever belonged to Darius, before the fame of any such King or Conquerour was carried farre off.

And for the Greeke Historians, they tooke all things from the relations of the Persians, who gaue to Cyrus all the praise of a most excellent Prince, making none his equall. Only Daniel in the first, fift, and sixt Chapters of his prophecies, makes it plaine, that himselie not onely liued a great Officer vnder King Darius, but that hee continued in that estate to the first of Cyrus; which being the yeere of Daniels death, could not haue bene distinguished from the raigne of Darius, if they had begunne together and reigned ioynly; Neither can it bee imagined that Darius held the Kingdome by Cyrus permission, considering that Cyrus beganne after him.

XENOPHONS relation of the Warre with the Medes and Persians, made with ioynnt forces vpon the Assyrians, and others.

These Testimonies of the Scriptures, which neede no other confirmation, yet made more open to our vnderstanding, by that which Xenophon hath written of these warres: The cause whereof, according to his report, was this.

When the Assyrian had enlarged his Empire with victories, and was become Lord of all Syria, and many other Countries, hee beganne to hope that if the Medes could be brought vnder his subiection, there should not then be left any Nation adioyning able to make head against him. For the King of the Medes was able to bring into the field threecore thousand foote, and about tenne thousand horse, to which the forces of Persia being ioyned, made an exceeding strong Armie.

The Assyrian considering the strength of such a Neighbour, inuited Craesus King of Lydia, a Prince very mightie both in men and treasure, and with him other
Cccc a Lords

Lords of Asia the lesse to his assistance, alleging that those Easterne Nations were very powerfull, and so firmly conioyned by league and many alliances, that it would not bee easie, no nor possible, for any one Nation to resist them. With these incitements strengthened with great presents, he drew to himselfe so many adherents as he compounded an Armie of two hundred thousand foot, and threescore thousand horse, of which, ten thousand horse, and fortie thousand foote were led by Crasus, who had great cause of enmitie with the Medes, in regard of the Warre made by them against his Father Alyattes; But this great Armie was by Cyaxares King of the Medes, and by Cyrus generall of the Persian forces, utterly broken; Vpon which defeat the Assyrian King being also slaine, so many of the Assyrians revolted, as Babylon it selfe could not longer be assured without the succours of Mercenaries, waged with great summes of money out of Asia the lesse, Egypt, and elsewhere. Which new gathered forces were also scattered by Cyrus, who following his advantage, posselt himselfe of a great part of the lesse Asia, at which time it was, as I take it, that Crasus himselfe was also made prisoner.

The attempt of Babylon following soone after, the Armie lying before it being paid by Darius, whom Xenophon calleth Cyaxares, and led by Cyrus his sisters sonne, prevailed against Balthazar, as in due time shall be set downe.

Those Persians which followed Cyrus, and by him leuied, are numbred thirtie thousand foot-men, of which a thousand were armed Gentlemen, the rest of the 20 common sort were Archers, or such as vsed the Dart and the Sling. So farre Xenophon. Of whom in this argument, as it is true, that he described in Cyrus the paternie of a most Heroicall Prince, with much Poeticall addition: So it cannot be denyed, but that the bulke and grosse of his Narration was founded vpon mere Historiicall truth.

Neither can it indeed bee affirmed of any the like Writer, that in every speech and circumstance he hath precisely tyed himselfe to the phrase of the speaker, or nature of the occasion, but borrowed in each out of his owne inuention, appropriating the same to the times and persons of whom he treated. Putting therefore apart the Morall and Politique discourse, and examining but the Historie of things 30 done, it will easily appeare, that Xenophon hath handled his vnder-taken subiect in such sort, that by beautifying the face thereof, hee hath not in any sort corrupted the bodie.

§. III.

The estate of the Medes and Persians in times fore-going this great Warre.

Or it is commonly agreed vpon, that Achamenes the sonne of Perfes 40 being Governour of Persia, did associate himselfe with Arbaces, who commanded in Media in that rebellion against Sardanapalus, and that each of them after the victorie obtained, held for himselfe the Dominion of those Countries, which he had formerly ruled for the Assyrians; as also that they conueyed ouer the same honor and power to their posteritie; which in Media was not absolutely Regall, but with some restraint limited, vntill such time as Deioces tooke vpon him the full authoritie and maiestie of a King. From the death of Sardanapalus to the raigne of Deioces, are vsually accounted about an hundred and forty yeeres, in the last fixtie whereof there reigned in Assyria mightie Princes, namely Salmanasser and his Successours, whose great atchieuements in Syria 50 and elsewhere witnesseth, that the Medes and Persians found it not for their aduantage to vnder-take any offensive warre against those victorious Kings, it being also probable that the league continued as yet betweene these the successours of Belochus, and Arbaces, who had formerly shared the Empire.

Now

Now from the beginning of Deioces to the first of Alyattes, there past about ninetie yeeres, in which if Herodotus haue written truly, that Phraortes conquered Persia, and how he and other the Kings of Media by many victories greatly enlarged their dominions, and commanded many parts of Asia, it had bene but an vnadvised enterprize of the Assyrians and Babylonians, to haue wasted themselves against the Syrians and Egyptians, leauing so able and victorious a Nation on their backs. But that the Medes had done nothing vpon the South parts of Persia, and that the Persians themselves were not masters of Susiana in Nabuchodonosors time, it is manifest in Daniel, who was then Governour for the Babylonian in Susa or Susan, the chiefe Citie thereof. It is true indeed, that the Medians, either vnder Cyaxares or Alyattes, or both, had quarrell with Habylates the father of Crasus, which after some fixe yeeres dispute was compounded.

How the affaires of Persia stood in so many ages, I doe not find any memorie. It seemeth that the roughnesse of the mountainous Countrey which they then posselt, with the confederacie which they continued with the Medes, gaue them more securitie than fame: For if their Kings, being the posteritie of Achamenes, had done any memorable acts, the greatnesse which they afterward obtained would not haue suffered any forgetfulness thereof. But as we find all Xenophons reports, both of these Warres and the state of those Countreies to be very consonant and agreeable to the relation of many other good Authors, so it appeares, 20 that the race of Achamenes held the Principalltie of Persia from father to sonne for many descents. And therefore we may better giue credit to Xenophon, who affirmeth, That Cambyes the father of Cyrus was King of Persia: than to those that make him a meane man, and say, that Alyattes gaue him his daughter Mandane in marriage, to the end that her sonne (whose naturitie he feared) might be disabled from any great vnder-taking by his fathers ignobilitie.

For what cause of griefe could it be to Alyattes, that the sonne of his daughter should become Lord of the best part of Asia? No; it was more likely, that vpon such a Prophecie his loue to his grand-child should haue encreased, and his care 30 bene the greater to haue married her to some Prince of strength and eminent vertue.

Yea, the same Herodotus, who is the first Author, and as I thinke the deuiler of the mischief intended against Cyrus by his grandfather, doth confesse, That the line of the Achamenides was foreknown, that the great King Xerxes in the height of his prosperitie did thence deriue himselfe, and vaunt of it: which he would neuer haue done, had they bene ignoble, nor had they been the vassalls of any other King or Monarch.

50 Of the Achamenides there were two races: of the first was Cyrus the great, whose issue male fayled in his two sonnes, Cambyes and Smerdis. This royall familie is thus set downe by the learned Reinccius.

Cyrus, the first of that name, had Cambyfes and Atossa, who, married to Pharnaces, King of Cappadocia, had Artysena and other daughters.

Cambyfes had

Cyrus the Great, Cyrus had

Cambyfes, who succeeded him, and Smerdis slaine by his brother Cambyfes.

Of the second were those seven great Princes of Persia, who hauing ouerthrowne the vsurped royaltie of the Magi, chose from among themselves Darius the sonne of Hystaspes King.

This Kingdome of Persia was first knowne by the name of Elam, so called after Elam the sonne of Sem, and the people therein inhabiting, Elamites; by Elianus, Elymae; by Iosephus, Elymi.

Suidas deriues this Nation sometimes from Assur, sometime from Magog, of whom they were called Magusai; which Magusai, according to Eusebius, are not to be taken for the Nation in generall, but for those who were afterward called the Magi or Wise men. So doe the Greekes, among many other their sayings of them, 20 affirme, That the Persians were anciently written Artai, and that they called themselves Cephenes. But that they were Elamites, Moses and the Prophets, Esaie, Ieremie, Ezechiel, Daniel, and *Esdra*s in many places confirme: Which also S. Hierome vpon Ieremie the five and twentieth, vpon Daniel the eight and twentieth, and in his Hebrew questions approueth, saying: Elam à quo Elamites Principes Persidis; ELAM, of whom were the Elamites Princes of Persia.

And that Citie which the Author of the second booke of the Maccabees calleth Persepolis, is by the Author of the first called Elimais, but is now called Siras, being the same which Antiochus, for the great riches thereof, twice attempted in vaine, and to his great dishonour. And yet this Citie, now called Siras, was not the 30 old Persepolis; for Alexander, at the request of Thais the Harlot, burnt it.

The first King of Persia to vs knowne, if wee follow the current of Authors interpreting the foureteenth chapter of Genesis, was Chedorlaomer, who liued with Amraphel or Ninias, and ioyned with him in the warre against those Arabians, who was afterward extinguished by the forces of Abraham.

CHAP. III.

OF CYRVS.

§. I.

Of CYRVS his name and first actions.

Stouching the name of Cyrus, Strabo sayth, That the same was taken from a Riuer which watereth Persia, this great Prince hauing Agradatus for his proper name. But the great Cyrus was not the first of that name. Herodotus other wife; and that Cyrus signifieth 10 a father in the Persian Tongue, and therefore so intituled by the people.

It is true that for his Iustice and other excellent vertues he was indeed called a Father; but that the name of Cyrus had any such signification, I thinke it be mistaken.

Plutarch hath a third opinion, affirming, That Cyrus is as much to say as the 20 Sunne, in the same Language. Howsoever it be, yet the Prophet Esaie, almost two hundred yeeres before Cyrus was borne, giues him that name, Thus saith the Lord vnto CYRVS his Anointed, &c.

Before the Conquest of Babylon, the victories which Cyrus obtained were many and great: among which, the Conquest of Lydia, and other Prouinces thereto subiect, together with the taking of Croesus himselfe, are not recounted by Eusebius, Orosius, and others, but placed among his latter achievements, whose opinion for 30 this difference of time is founded vpon two reasons; namely, That of the Median there is no mention in that last warre against Croesus: and that the obtaining of Sardis is referred to the eight and fiftieth Olympiad, and the glorious victory which Cyrus had ouer Babylon, to the five and fiftieth Olympiad.

The former of which might haue bene vsed (and was by the Greekes) to exclude the Medes from the honour of hauing wonne Babylon it selfe, which in due place I haue answered. The latter seemes to haue reference to the second Warre which Cyrus made vpon Lydia, when it rebelled; at which time hee so established his former Conquest, as after that time those Nations neuer offered to revolt. Wherefore I like better in this particular to beleue with Herodotus, whome the 40 most of Chronologers follow, and finde the enterprise of Sardis to preceede that of Babylon.

§. II.

Of CROESVS the King of Lydia, who made warre vpon CYRVS.

Haue in the last Booke spoken somewhat of Croesus, of his race and predecessors, as also of those Kings which gouerned Lydia in more ancient times: of which the first (to prophane Authors knowne) was Lydius the sonne of Alys: Which familie extinguished the Kingdome was by an Oracle conferred vpon Argon, descended from Hercules, wherof there were two and twentie generations, Candaules being the last, who by shewing his faire wife naked to Gyges his fauorite, he was by the same Gyges 50 (thereto (thereto vrged vpon perill of his owne life by the Queene) the next day slaine. Which done, Gyges enioyed both the Queene and the Kingdome of Lydia, and left the same to Atys his sonne, who was father to Sadyattes, the father of Halyattes (who thrust the Cimerians out of Asia) and Halyattes begat Craesus: Which five Kings, of a third race, enioyed that Kingdome an hundred and seuentie yeeres. Halyattes the father of Craesus was an vndertaking Prince, and after hee had continued a warre against Cyaxares the Median, a Prince very powerfull, and maintained it six yeeres: a peace was concluded vpon equall conditions betweene them.

Atyages, the sonne of Cyaxares, and grandfather to Cyrus, thought himselfe greatly honoured by obtaining Arenis, Craesus sister, whom he married. 10

But Craesus so farre enlarged his dominions after his fathers death, as he was nothing inferior in territorie to any King or Monarch of that age: Of which, about that time there were foure in effect of equall strength; to wit, the Median, the Babylonian, the Egyptian and the Lydian: onely Nabuchodonosor, after he had ioyned Phoenicia, Palestina, and Egypt to his Empire, had thence-forward no competitor during his owne life.

But Craesus, notwithstanding the men and treasure spent in the quarrel of the Babylonians, he yet mastered Aolis, Doris, and Ionia, Provinces posselt by the Greekes in Asia the lesse, adioyning to Lydia; gaue law to the Phrygians, Bituminians, Carians, Mysians, Paphlagonians, and other Nations. And that he also inforst the Ephesians to acknowledge him, notwithstanding they compassed their Citie with Dianes girde, Herodotus witnesseth. Moreover, Athenes out of Berosus (which also Strabo confirmeth) makes report of a Signall victorie which Craesus obtained against the Sacians, a Nation of the Scythians, in memorie whereof the Babylonians his allies did ycerely celebrate a Feast, which they called Sacae: All which hee performed in foureteene yeere.

And being now confident in the continuance of his good fortune, and enuious of Cyrus fame, doubting also, that his prosperous vndertakings might in the ende grow perillous to himselfe, he consulted with the Oracle of Apollon, whom he presented with marvellous rich gifts, what successe he might hope for against Cyrus, if 30 he vnderooke him: from whom he receiued this riddle; Craesus passing ouer the Riuer Halys, shall dissolve a great dominion. For the diuell being doubtfull of the successe, payed him with marchandize of both sides like, and might be inuerted either way to the ruine of Persia, or of his owne Lydia.

§ III.

Craesus his Expedition against CYRVS.

Ereupon Craesus being resolved to stop the course of Cyrus fortunes, 40 if he could, despite all the arguments vled by Sandanes to the contrary, who desired him to fore-thinke, That he vrged a Nation inhabiting a barren and mountainous Region, a people not covered with the soft filke of wormes, but with the hard skinnies of beasls; not fed with such meat as they fancied, but content with what they found; drinkers of water, not of wine: and in a word, a Nation warlike, enduring, valiant and prosperous; ouer whom if he became victorious, he could thereby enrich himselfe in nothing but fame, in which he alreadie excelled: and if by them beaten, and subiect, so great would his losse appeare of all things which the world hath in account, as the same could neither hastily be told, nor readily conceived. 50

Notwithstanding this solide Counsaile, Craesus hauing prepared a powerfull armie, he led the same towards Media, but in his passage, he was arrested at Pterium, a Citie of great strength in Cappadocia; which while he sought by all meanes to surpriue or to force, Cyrus came on, and found the Lydians encamped before it. That each each was inferior to other in strength or opinion, I doe not finde: for out of doubt, Craesus as he excelled any Prince of that age in riches and abilitie, so was hee not vnder any in territorie and fame that then liued.

But as Cratippus of Mitylene answered Pompey when he complained against the gods, because they fauoured a disturber and vlturper of the Commonweale against him who fought for the Romane libertie, That Kingdomes and Commonweales had their encrease and period from diuine Ordinance: so at this time was the Winter of Craesus prosperitie at hand, the leaues of his flourishing fortune ready to fall, and that of Cyrus but in the flower and first spring. The God of all power, and not 10 Admetis Herdman, Apollo, had giuen date to the one, and a beginning of glory to the other.

When these two Armies were in view of each other, after the entertainment of diuers skirmishes, the Persians and Lydians beganne to ioine in grosse troupes: supplies from both Kings thrust vpon vpon the falling off, and aduancement of either Nation: and as the Persians had somewhat the better of the day, so when the darke vaile of night had hidden each armie from the others view, Craesus doubting what successe the rising Sunne would bring with it, quitted the field to Cyrus, and with all speede possible rettyred, and taking the next way into Lydia, recovered Sardis his first Citie and Regall Seat, without any pursuite made by Cyrus to retard 20 him. Where being arriued, and nothing suspeting Cyrus approach, or any other warre for that Winter, he dismissed the souldiers, and sent the troupes of his sundry Nations to their owne Prouinces, appointing them to reassemble at the end of five moneths, acquainting his Commanders with his intents for the renewing of the warre at the time appointed.

§. IIII.

The Conquest of Lydia by CYRVS.

30 CYRVS in the following morning finding the Lydians departed, put his armie in order to pursue them, yet not so hastily, and at their heeles, as to bediscouered. But hauing good intelligence of Craesus his proceeding, hee so measured his Marches, as he presented not himselfe before Sardis, till such time as Craesus had disposed his armie to their Wintering garrisons: when being altogether vnlooked for, and vnfeared, he surrounded Sardis with his Armie: Wherein Craesus hauing no other Companies than his Citizens and ordinary Gards, after foureteene dayes sicge the same was entred by assault, and all executed that resisted. Craesus hauing now neither armes to fight, nor wings to flye, Sardis being on all parts strongly encompassed, 40 thrust himselfe into the heape and miserable multitude of his vassals, and had vndergone the common fortune of common persons vanquished, had not a sonne of his, who had beene dumbe all his life (by extremitie of passion and feare enabled) cried out to the souldiers to spare Craesus. Who thereupon being taken and imprisoned, depoyled of all things but the expectation of death, he was forthwith tied in fetters, and set on the top of a great and high heape of wood, to be consumed to ashes thereon. To which when the fire was set and kindled, remembering the discourse which he had with the Athenian Law-giuer, he thrice cryed out on his name, Solon, Solon, Solon: and being demanded what he meant by that inuocation he first vled silence: but vrged againe, he told them, That he now found it true. 50 Solon had long since told him, That many men in the race and courses of their liues might well be accounted fortunate, but no man could discern himselfe for happy in deede, till his end.

Of which answer Cyrus being speedily informed, remembering the changes of fortune and his owne mortalitie, he commanded his ministers of Iustice to withdraw draw the fire with all diligence to saue Craesus, and to conduct him to his presence; Which done, Cyrus demanded of him, Who it was that had perswaded him? Or what selfe reason had conducted him to invade his territorie, and to make him of a friend an enemy? To whom he thus answered, It was thy prosperous and my vnprosperous destinie (the Græcian God flattering therewithall my ambition) that were the inueters and conductors of Craesus warre against Cyrus.

Cyrus being pierst with Craesus answere, and bewailing his estate, though victorious ouer it, did not onely spare his life, but entertained him euier after as a King and his companion, shewing therein a true effect of mercy indeed, Quæ non causam sed fortunam spectat.

And herein is the reall difference discerned betwene that behavior which wee call Beneficium latronis, & gratiam Principis: A theefe sometime sparing the life of him which is in his power, but vnusually: A King that giueth breath, and a continuance of being, to him that was the cause and author of his owne euill.

The report made by Xenophon is, That Cyrus did friendly entertaine Craesus at the first sight, not mentioning that which Herodotus deliuereth, and is here already set downe, that hee should haue bene burnt aliue. It may well bee, that Xenophon portraying (in Cyrus) an heroicall Prince, thought an intent so cruell fitter to be forgotten than rehearsed, as too much misbecoming a generous nature. And it is very likely, that neere esse of alliance might with-hold Cyrus (had he bene other-²⁰ wise vicious) from so cruell a purpose against his grandmothers brother. Howsoeuer it was, the Morall part of the storie hath giuen credit and reputation to the report of Herodotus (as to many the like it often doth) and made it passe for currant, though the trust reposed in Craesus afterwards may seeme to argue, that Cyrus did not vse him inhumanely at the first.

For as Herodotus himselfe telleth vs, when Cyrus past with his armie ouer Araxes into Sythia, he left Craesus to accompanie and aduise his sonne Cambyses, Governour of the Empire in his absence, with whom he liued all the time of Cyrus, and did after ward follow Cambyses into Egypt, where he hardly escaped his tyrannous hand. What his end was I doe not finde.

But in this time the races of three of the greatest Kings in that part of the world tooke end; to wit, of the Babylonians, Medians, and Lydians; in Balthasar, Cyxares, and Craesus.

How CYRUS wonne Babylon.

After this Lydian warre ensued the great Conquest of Babylon, which ⁴⁰ gaue vnto Cyrus an Empire so large and mighty, that he was iustly reputed the greatest Monarch then liuing vpon earth. How long time the preparations for this great action tooke vp, it is vncertaine; onely it seemes, that tenne whole yeeres did passe betwene his taking those two Cities of Sardes & Babylon, which neuertheless I doe not thinke to haue bene wholly occupied in prouision for the Assyrian warre, but rather to haue bene spent in settling the Estate which hee had already purchased. And hereunto perhaps may be referred that which Ctesias hath in his fragments of a warre made by Cyrus vpon the Sythians, though related as foregoing the victory obtained against Craesus. He telleth vs, That Cyrus invaded Sythia, and being victorious ouer that Nation, tooke Amorges their King prisoner: but being in a second battaile ouerthrowne by the wife of Amorges, Sparetha, and therein taken, the one King was deliuered for the other.

Likewise it may be thought, that no small part of those troubles which arose in the

the lower Asia, grew loone after the departure of the victorious armie, before the Conquest was fully established.

For after Cyrus was returned out of Asia the lesse, many Nations, conquered formerly by Craesus, and now by Cyrus, reuolted from him; against whom he employed Pactias, and then Harpagus, who first reduced the Phœnicians vnder their former obedience: and then the rest of the Greekes inhabiting Asia the lesse, as the Ionians, Carians, Eolians, and Lycians, who resolutely (according to the strength they had) defended themselves. But in the attempt vpon Babylon it selfe it is not to be doubted, that Cyrus employed all his forces, hauing taken order before-hand, that nothing should be able to diuert him, or to raise that sieg, and make frustrate the worke vpon which he did set all his rest. And great reason there was, that he should bend all his care and strength vnto the taking of that Citie, which befide the fame and reputation that it held, as being head of an Empire thereon depending, was so strongly fenced with a treble wall of great height, and surrounded with waters vntoodable, so plentifully vntoaled for many yeeres, that the inhabitants were not onely free from all doubt and feare of their estate, but despised and derided all purposes and power of their besiegers.

The onely hope of the Medes and Persians, who despaired of carrying by assault a Citie so well fortified and manned, was in cutting off all supplies of victuals and other necessities; whereof though the Towne was said to be stored sufficiently for more than twentie yeeres, yet might it well be deemed, that in such a world of people as dwelt within those gates, one great want or other would sooner appeare, and vanquish the resolution of that vnwarlike multitude. In expecting the successe of this course, the besiegers were likely to endure much traualle, and all in vaine, if they did not keepe straight watch and strong guards vpon all quarters.

This was hard to doe, in regard of the vast circuit of those walls which they were to gird in, with numbers neither great enough, nor of men sufficiently assured vnto their Commander: The consideration whereof mislited vnto the Babylonians matter of good pastime, when they saw the Lydians, Phrygians, Cappadocians, and others, quartered about their Towne to keepe them in, who hauing bene their ancient friends and allies, were more likely to ioyne with them, if occasion were offered, than to vse much diligence on the behalfe of Cyrus, who had, as it were, yesterday laid vpon their neckes the galling yoke of seruitude. Whilest the besieged were pleasing themselves in this deceitfull gladnesse, that is the ordinarie fore-runner of suddaine calamitie; Cyrus, whom the Ordinance of God made strong, constant, and inuentiue, deuised by so many channels and trenches as were sufficient and capable of Euphrates, to draw the same from the walls of Babylon, thereby to make his approach the more facile and assured: which when by the labour of many hands hee had performed, hee flayed the time ⁴⁰ of his aduantage for the execution: for hee had left certaine banks or heads vncut, betwene the maine riuier which surrounded the Citie, and his owne Trenches.

Now Balthasar, finding neither any want or weaknesse within, nor any possibility of approach for his enemies without, prepared an exceeding sumptuous feast, publike Playes, and other Pastimes, and thereto invited a thousand of his Princes or Nobilitie, besides his wiues, curtizans, and others of that trade. This hee did either to let the besiegers know, that his provisions were sufficient, not onely for all needfull vses, but euen for iolitic and exesse: Or because hee hoped that his enemies, vnder the burthen of many distresses were well neere broken, or in honour of ⁵⁰ Bel his most reuerenced Idoll: Or that it was his birth or coronation day: Or for many or all these respects. And he was not contented with such magnificence as no Prince else could equall, but (vsing Daniels words) he lifted himselfe up against the Lord of Heauen: For hee and his Princes, wiues and concubines, made carowling cuppes of the Vessels of God, in contempt of whom hee praised his owne puppets, made made of silver and Gold, of Brasse, of Iron, Wood, and Stone, Quanta fuit stultitia in vestibus aureis bibentes lignos & lapideos Deos laudare; How great a foolishness was it (sayth S. Hierome) drinking in golden Cuppes, to praise Gods of Wood and Stone. While Balthazar was in this sort triumphing, and his braines well filled with vapors, he beheld a hand, which by diuine power wrote on the wall opposite vnto him certain words which he vnderstood not: wherewith so great a feare and amazement seized him, as the ioynts of his loynes were loosed, and his knees smote one against the other. Which passion when he had in some part recovered, he cryed out for his Chaldeans, Astrologians, and Southsayers, promising them great rewards, and the third place of honour in the Kingdome to him that could reade and expound the writing; but it exceeded their art. In this disturbance and astonishment the Queene hearing what had past, and of the Kings amazement, after reuerence done vsed this speech: There is a man in thy Kingdome, in whom is the spirit of the holy Gods, and in the dayes of thy father, light, and vnderstanding and wisdom, like the wisdom of the Gods, was found in him, whom the King NABUCHODONOSOR thy father, the King (I say) thy father made chiefe of the Incubators, Astrologians, Chaldeans, and Southsayers, because a more excellent spirit, and knowledge, and vnderstanding, &c. were found in him, then in DANIEL, &c. Now let DANIEL be called, and he will declare the interpretation.

Orip. & Theod.
in Dan. 10. 10.
Dan. 10.

This Queene, Iosephus takes for the grandmother; Origen and Theodoret for the mother of Balthazar; either of which may be true: for it appeareth, that there was 20 not any of the Kings wiues, because absent from the feast; and being past the age of dauncing and banquetting, she came in vpon the bruit of the miracle, and to comfort the King in his distraction: and whereas Daniel was forgotten and neglected by others of younger yeeres and times, this old Queene remembered well what he had done in the dayes of Nabuchodonosor, grandfather to this Balthazar, and kept in mind both his religion and diuine gifts.

When Daniel was brought to the Kings presence, who acknowledged those excellent graces wherewith God had enriched him, he prayed him, together with promises of reward and honour, to reade and interpret those words miraculously written; to whom Daniel made answer in a farre different style from that he vsed towards his grandfather: for the euill which he foretold Nabuchodonosor, he wished that the same might befall his enemies, but to this King (whose neglect of God and vice he hated) he answered in these words, Keep thy rewards to thy selfe, and giue thy gifts to another, yet will I reade the writing vnto the King, and shew him the interpretation: Which before he had performed, he gaue him first the cause of Gods iust judgement against him, and the reason of this terrible sentence; whereof the King and all his Wifemen were vnterly ignorant: Which being written at large in Daniel, bath this effect, That forgetting Gods goodnesse to his father, whom all Nations feared and obeyed, and that for his pride and neglect of those benefites, as he deprived him of his estate and vnderstanding; so vpon the acknowledgement of Gods infinite 40 power he restored him to both. This King notwithstanding lifted himselfe vp against the same God, and presumed both to abuse those vessels, dedicated to holy uses, and neglecting the Lord of all power, prayed and worshipped the dead Idols of Gold, Silver, Brasse, Iron, Stone, and Wood: and therefore those wordes, from the Oracle of a true God deliuered, (to wit) Mene Tekel, Spharism, gaue the King knowledge, that God had numbred the time of his Kingdome, and finished it: That he was weighed in the ballance of Gods justice, and found too light; and that his Empire was diuided and giuen to the Medes and Persians.

The very euening or night of this day, wherein Balthazar feasted and perished, Cyrus either by his espiall, according to Xenophon, or inspired by God himselfe, 50 wofe ensigne he followed in this warre, found the time and opportunitie to inuite him: and therefore while the Kings head, and the heads of his Nobilitie were no lesse filled with the vapours of wine, than their hearts were with the feare of Gods judgement, he cauled all the bankes and heads of his trenches to be opened and cut downe down with that diligence, as by them he drew the great Riuers of Euphrates drie for the present, by whose channell running, his armie made their entrance, finding none to disturbe them. All the Towne lay buried (as the Poet saith) in sleepe and wine: such as came in the Persians way, were put to the sword, vnlesse they saued themselves by flight, as some did, who ranne away crying, and filling the streets with an vncertaine tumult.

Such Affiryan Lords as had reuolted from Balthazar, and betaken themselves to the partie of Cyrus, did now conduct a selected companie to the Kings Palace; which hauing easily forced, they rushed into the chamber where the King with his 10 Princes were banquetting, slew both him and them without any mercie, who struggled in vaine to keepe those liues which God had newly threatened to take away. And now was the prophetic of Jeremie fulfilled, & that of Ezay, two hundred yeeres before this subuersion, who in his thirce & fortieth Chapter, and elswhere, writeth this destruction so feelingly and liuely, as if he had beene present both at the terrible slaughter committed, and had scene the great and vnfeared change and calamitie of this great Empire; yea, and had also heard the sorrowes and bewailings of every suruiuing soule thereunto subiect. His prophesie of this place he beginneth in these words: Come downe, and sit in the dust, O virgine daughter of Babel: sit on the ground, there is no throne, &c. And againe, Sit still and get thee into darkness, O daughter of the Chaldeans: for thou shalt no more be called the Lady of Kingdomes. For though it cannot be doubted, that God vsed Nabuchodonosor & the Chaldeans, to punish the idolatrie of the Iudeans, yet Ezay teacheth vs in this place, That he did not yet forget, that the execution of his iudgements was mixt with a rigorous extremite. For (saith Ezay) in the person of God, I was wrath with my people, I haue polluted mine inheritance, and giuen them into thine hand: thou shalt shew them no mercie, but thou shalt lay thy very heauie yoke vpon the ancient. I will rise vp against them, saith the Lord of Hosts, and will cut off from Babel the name and the remnant, and the sonne and the nephew. And in the thirteenth, Every one that is found, shall be stricken thorow: and whosoener ioyneth himselfe, shall fall by the sword, their children also shall be broken in pieces before their 30 eyes, their houses spoiled, and their mines ranshed. So as there is no Historian who was either present at this victorie of Cyrus, or that received the report from others truly as it was, that could better leaue the fame to posteritie after it happened, than Ezay hath done in many places of his prophesies, which were written two hundred yeeres before any thing attempted.

The greatnesse and magnificence of Babylon, were it not by diuers graue Authors set downe, might seeme altogether fabulous: for besides the reports of Saint Hierome, Salinus, and Orosius, Aristotle in the third of his Politiques, the second Chapter, receiued the report for true, That one part of the Citie knew not that the rell was taken three daies after. Which is not impossible, if the testimony of 40 Diodorus Siculus may be taken; who findes the compass thereof at three hundred and threescore Stadia or Furlongs, which makes five and fortie miles: the walls whereof had so great a breadth, as fixe chariots might passe in front thereon. And of height, according to Ctesias and Clitarcus, three hundred threescore and five foot, garnished with an hundred and fiftie Towers. Strabo in the beginning of his sixteenth Booke of Geographic giues it a greater circuit, adding five and twentie furlongs more to the former compass, reckoning the fame at three hundred fourescore and five furlongs, which makes eight and fortie mile and one furlong: but findes the wall farre vnder that which Diodor reports: and so doth Curtius measure their thicknesse but at two and thirtie foot, and their height at an hundred cubits; which is also very much: every cubite containing a foot and halfe 50 of the large measure, though to the whole circuit of the Citie hee giues the same with Siculus, and eight furlongs more. Herodotus findes a greater content than Strabo doth, namely, foure hundred and fourescore furlongs in circle; the thicknesse nesse of the wall he measures at fiftie cubits, and the height at two hundred of the same regall cubit. For entrance it had an hundred gates of Brasse, with poits and hookes to hang them on of the same metall: and therefore did the Prophet Esay rightly intitle Babylon, The Princesse and glorie of Kingdomes.

But when Cyrus had wonne her, he stript her out of her princely Robes, and made her a slave, dividing not only all her goodly houses, and her whole Territorie, with all the riches therein contained, among his souldiers: but bestowing the inhabitants themselves as bondslaves upon those that had taken possession of their goods.

Touching the raigne of Cyrus, and the time which he enjoyed in rest and pleasure, I can say no more of it, than that it is generally agreed by all Chronologers to have lasted onely seven yeeres: in which time he made such Constitutions, as differ little from the Ordinances of all wise Kings that are desirous to establish a Royal power in themselves and their posteritie.

§. VI.

His last warre, and the end of this great King Cyrus, is diversly written. Herodotus and Iustine delivier, That after the Conquest of Asia the lesse Cyrus invaded the Massagetes, a very warlike Nation of the Scythians, governed by Tomyris their Queene: and that in an encounter betwene the Persians and these Northerne Nomades, Tomyris lost her Armie, and her Sonne Spargapiser, that commanded it: In revenge whereof, this Queene making new levies of men of warre, and following the warre against Cyrus, in a second battaile beat the Persian armie, and taking Cyrus prisoner, cut off his head from his body, and cast the same into a boule of bloud, vying these wordes; Thou that hast all thy lifetime thirsted for bloud, now drinke thy fill, and satisfie thy selfe.

It should hereby seeme, that Cyrus knowing the strength and multitude of those frozen Nations, was perswaded to abate their furie by some forcible inuasion and depopulation, because in the time of Syaxares, father to Astyages, those Scythians invaded Media and Asia the lesse, and held the same in a servile subiection eight and twentie yeeres.

This warre which Metasthenes calleth Tomyrique, lasted (saith he) sixe yeeres, and tooke end at the death of Cyrus.

But in this particular I beleue with Vigener, that this Scythian warre was rather the same which Cyrus made against the Sacians, before the Conquest of Lydia, according to Ctesias before cited, who calleth Tomyris, Sparetha, though he delivier the successe of that warre otherwise then Herodotus doth: The rather (saith Vigener) because Strabo in his eleventh booke reciteth, That Cyrus surprised the Sacians by the same stratageme by which Iustine saith, he defeated the sonne of Tomyris. And the same Ctesias also reporteth, That the last warre which Cyrus made was against Amorhians, King of the Derbicians a Nation (as the rest) of Scythia; whom though he overcame, yet he then received the wound of his death, which he suffered three dayes after.

Strabo also affirmeth, That he was buried in his owne Citie of Pasagardes, which himselfe had build, and where his Epitaph was to be read in his time; which is said to have bene this: O vir quicunque es, ex undecunque advenis, neque enim te adventurum ignoravi: Ego sum CYRVS qui Persiam imperium constitui, possum hoc terra quo meum tegitur corpus mihi invidias; O thou man, who soever thou art, or whence soever thou thou comest; for I was not ignorant that thou shouldst come: I am CYRVS that founded the Persian Empire, doe not envie unto me this little earth, with which my bodie is covered.

This Tombe was opened by Alexander, as Qu. Curtius reporteth, either upon hope of treasure, supposed to have bene buried with him, or upon desire to honour his dead body with certaine ceremonies; in which there was found an olde rotten Target, two Scythian Bowes, and a Sword. The Coffin wherein his bodie lay, Alexander caused to be covered with his owne garment, and a Crowne of gold to be set vpon it. These things well considered, as they give credit to the reports of Xenophon and Zonaras, so they derogate much from Herodotus, who leaues his bodie in the hands of Tomyris.

And surely, had Cyrus lost the Armie of Persia in Scythia, it is not likely, that his sonne would so soone have transported all his remaining forces into Aegypt, so far off from that quarter: the Scythian Nation then victorious, and bordering Media; neither had Cambyses bene able in such haste to have vnderaken and performed so great a Conquest. Wherefore I rather beleue Xenophon, saying, That Cyrus died aged and in peace: and that finding in himselfe, that hee could not long enjoy the world, hee called vnto him his Nobilitie, with his two sonnes, Cambyses and Smerdis; or after Xenophon, Tauanaxares: and after a long Oration, wherein he assured himselfe, and taught others, of the immortalitie of the Soule, and of the punishments and rewards following the good and ill deservings of euerie man in this life; he exhorted his sonnes by the strongest arguments hee had, to a perpetuall concord and agreement. Many other things hee vttered, which make it probable, that hee received the knowledge of the true God from Daniel, when hee governed Susa in Persia; and that Cyrus himselfe had read the prophetic of Ezay, wherein hee was expressly named, and by God (for the delivrie of his people) praordained. Which act of delivring the Jewes from their Captiuitie, and of restoring the holy Temple and Citie of Ierusalem, was in true consideration the noblest worke that euer Cyrus performed. For in other actions he was an instrument of Gods power, vsed for the chastising of many Nations, and the establishing of a Governement in those parts of the world, which was not long to continue. But herein he had the grace to be an instrument of Gods goodnesse, and a willing advancer of his Kingdome vpon earth; which must last for euer, though heauen and earth shall perish.

§. VII.

Of CYRVS his decree for building the Temple of God in Ierusalem.

Having therefore spoken of his great victories, mentioned by sundry Historians, the glory of all which was as a reward of this his seruice done vnto him that was Author of them and of all goodnesse: I hold it meete at length to speake of the Decree made in the first of his Raigne, being perhaps the first that euer he made, after his possession of the Babylonian Empire: That the captive Jewes should returne againe into their owne Territorie, and re-build the House of God in Ierusalem, hauing now endured and finished the three score and tenne yeeres captiuitie, by the Prophets foretold. For the accomplishing whereof, hee gaue order to his Treasurers to furnish them with all things necessarie and wanting. Hee also restored vnto them fiew thousand foure hundred three score and nine Vessels of Gold and Silver, whereof Nabuchodonosor, the grandfather of Balthazar, had formerly robbed the Temple.

The number of the Jewes which returned out of Chaldea vnder their leader Zorobabel, the sonne of Salathiel, and nephew to King Iecanias, and Iefus or Iofua the sonne of Iofadab, were about fiftie thousand; where, as soone as they arrived, they built an Altar to the living God, and sacrificed thereon, according to their owne Law, and afterward bethought themselves how to prepare materials for the rebuilding of the Temple.

But no sooner did the Jewes begin to lay any one stone, than the Samaritanes and other idolatrous Nations adjoining gave all the impediment they could. So did the Governours of those Provinces vnder Cyrus altogether countenance the disturbers, and in no sort favoured the Jewes, nor the labours and purposes they had in hand. And not onely those which were but Prouinciall Lieutenants and other officers of lesse place, but Cambyfes himselfe; who hauing the charge of the whole Empire, while Cyrus was busied otherwise, countermanded the building begun. And whereas some Authors make doubt, that whatsoeuer Cambyfes did when himselfe had obtained the Empire, yet during the life of Cyrus there was no such impediment or prohibition: They may herein resolute themselves out of Esdras, That by the conspiracies of the neighbouring Nations the building was hindered all the time of King Cyrus life, &c. And therefore it is true, that the Jewes themselves as firme as it written in the second of Iohn, That the Temple was fixe and fortie yeeres in setting vp, hauing receiued so many hinderances from the first foundation to the second of Darius.

And if wee seeke the naturall and politique causes which moued Cambyfes to withstand his fathers decree, as well while he gouerned vnder him, as when himselfe became sole and oueraigne Monarch, we shall finde them in that Epistle remembered by Esdras, written by Seleucus, Mithridates, and the rest, Presidents and Counsellors in Phoenicia, wherein they complaine, that the Jewes were euermore rebellious & troublers of Kings; that their Citie being once built, they would then refuse to pay Tribute, and fall from the obedience of the Empire, as they had formerly done in the times of other Kings.

But that which for that present seemed the most forcible impediment was, that Cambyfes, hauing it in his resolution to invade Egypt, and that it was a common opinion, That the Jewes were descended of those Nations, because they issued thence vnder Moses, when they conquered Iudaa; their Citie being once repaired and fortified, they might returne to their old vomit, and giue the same disturbance to Cambyfes Conquest, which they did to Senacherib, Nabuchodonosor, and other Kings of Babylon. For as it is written in Ezekiel, Egypt was the confidence of the house of Israel.

But it is to be vnderstood, as Codoman and others haue obserued, that Artaxerxes, to whom the Counsellors & Governours of Phoenicia complained against the Jewes, did not precede, but succeed Darius Hyaspes, as in the sixt and seuenth chapters of Esdras it is made plaine: and also that those Governours (whose Epistle sheweth as much) did not withstand the building of the Temple, but the fortifying and inclosing of the Citie, as by the reasons giuen in the said Epistle, and by the Kings answer, it is euident.

Also in the sixt of Ezra, the foureteenth verse, the Kings are named in order as they gouerned, and Artaxerxes written after Darius as: And they built and finished it (to wit, the Temple) by the appointment of the God of Israel, and by the commandement of Cyrus and Darius, and Artahshaste King of Persia. Lastly, in the seuenteenth of Ezra it is written; Now after these things, in the raigne of Artahshaste King of Persia: which was as much to say as after the finishing of the Temple in Darius time. And therefore Artaxerxes in the second of Esdras is there named by anticipation, not in his owne time and place.

And thus much concerning the rebuilding of the Citie and Temple of Hiernusalem. Which action though prospered by the hand of God, was very slowly pursued by by the men whom it most concerned, but first set on foot by Cyrus. The other ordinances of Cyrus, with his forme and manner of gouernment, are to be found in Xenophon. At his death he bequeathed the Empire vnto his eldest sonne Cambyfes, appointing Smerdis or Tauanaxas his younger sonne to be Satrapa or Lieutenant of Media, Armenia, and Cadusia, and then died, after he had reigned (saith Herodotus) one and thirte yeeres, or (according to Iulius) but thirtie.

§. VIII.

Of Cyrus's his issue: and whether Atossa were his daughter, or (as some thinke) were the same with Queene Hester.

Yrvis had issue two sonnes, Cambyfes and Smerdis, with three daughters, Atossa, Meroe, and Artysiona: Ctesias addeth to these, Amysis. Atossa and Meroe their brother Cambyfes married; Artysiona, Darius Hyaspes obtained; so did he Atossa, Cambyfes being dead: who (as some Writers haue supposed) inflamed both her husbands Darius, & Xerxes after him, to invade Greece, to beaueged of the whole Nation for the cruell intent that Aman (whom the old translation calleth a Macedonian) had against the Jewes though the opinion of Iosephus be more probable, who findes Aman to be an Amalekite. But it is hard to bee vnderstood, how Atossa, the daughter of Cyrus, should haue bene Esther; whose Historie seemes rather to appertaine to the time of Artaxerxes Longimanus, than of Darius the sonne of Hyaspes, or of Xerxes. The desire of Atossa to haue Greece brought vnder the yoke of Persia, was partly grounded vpon the honour which thereby shee thought her husband might obtaine, partly vpon a feminine humor of getting many braue Dames, Corinthians, Athenians, and others of that Nation to be her bond-women. Wherefore I cannot giue assent to the opinion of Codoman, who vpon the neere sound of the two names, Atossa and Hadassa (by the latter of which Esther was also called) makes them to haue bene one person. For though it be true, that Esther concerning her parentage a while, might be taken for a great Ladie; yet Codoman's inference is nothing probable, that she should therefore, and for the great affection which the King bare vnto her, be thought the daughter of Cyrus. Certaine it is, that Esther did at length discouer her Kindred and Nation; whereby if Hyistories could not be kept free from this error, yet the people, and especially the Nobilitie, must needs haue vnderstood the truth: who neuertheless did so well know the parentage of Atossa, that for her sake, as being daughter of Cyrus, her sonne Xerxes was preferred to the Kingdome before his elder brother, against whom also he could haue pretended a very weake clayme. But of these things more hereafter in fitter place.

There is a ſecond opinion, though ridiculous, of Seder Olam, who finds but foure Persian Kings from the beginning to the end of that Empire.

Genebrard, Schubert, and Beroaldus haue alſo a differing account from the Greekes; whom neuertheleſſe Eufebius and moſt of the Latines follow, and ſo doth Xrentzheim, who hath fully answered, and as I take it, refuted all the former Authors varying from that account: For in this fort doe the Greekes marſhall the Persian Kings with the times of their raignes.

This account (as I haue ſaid) the moſt Chronologers and the beſt learned approve. Theſe Persian Princes being all warranted by the authoritie of the Scriptures, as Pencer in his hitoricall Animaduerciſions hath gathered the places; finding

firſt Cyrus in the ſecond of Chronicles, chap. 36. verſ. 22, 23. Ezra 1. chap. 1. verſ. 1. and often elſewhere.

Secondly Cambyſes in the 11th of Daniel, who may indeede be well eſteemed for one of thoſe three Kings in the ſecond verſe named, and ſo the marginall Commentor vpon the Geneſis vnderſtands that place; but, vnder correction, milakes the matter greatly, when he ſaith in the ſame note, that Darius Hyſtaſpes was an enemy to the people of God, and ſtood againſt them: his great fauour and liberalitie to the Iewes being elſewhere proued.

Thirdly, is Darius Hyſtaſpes found in Ezra the firſt, c. 4. v. 5 who in the ſixt verſe is alſo named Ahaſuerus.

Fourthly, in the eleuenth of Daniel verſe the ſecond, Xerxes is plainly foretold and deſcribed, and the great warre which hee ſhould make againſt the Greekes by Daniel remembered.

Fiftly, Artaxerxes Longimanus in Ezra the fourth, verſe ſeuen, who is alſo called Artahſeſta, c. 4. 1. lib. Ezra v. 7. and cap. 7. v. 7.

Sixty, Darius Nothus, Ezra cap. 4. verſ. 24. and cap. 5. verſ. 6. Nehem. cap. 12. verſ. 22.

Seuenthy, Artaxerxes Atanem in Nebes 2. v. 1. who was father to Artaxerxes Ochus, and Arſames: for Darius the laſt he was of another Familie, the Line of Cyrus 20
The Great ending in Ochus, who deſcended from Xerxes the ſonne of Atoſſa, Cyrus his Daughter; and the iſſue male of Cyrus failing with his owne Sonnes.

But to proceede. Eufebius with the Latines, following the Greekes, apply the beginnings and ends of euery Persian King with their Acts, to ſome certaine Olympiad; As the war of Aſtyages (Cyrus his maternall Grand-father) and Ayattes (Crefus his father) to the nine and fortieth Olympiad; The beginning of Cyrus raigne to the beginning of the five and fiftieth Olympiad; The taking of Sardis by Cyrus to the eight and fiftieth Olympiad; The inuaſion of Egypt by Cambyſes to the third yeere of the threeſcore and third Olympiad, and ſo of the reſt. Which reference with good agreement betweene ſeueral formes of computation adde the more credit vnto both.

Again, this hitoricall demonſtration is confirmed by the Aſtronomical computation of Ptolomie, who refers the death of Alexander the Great, who died the 12. of Nouember, in the beginning of the hundred and fortieth Olympiad, to the foure hundred and foure & twentieth yeere after Nabonaſſar. And the Era of Nabonaſſar beganne on the fixe and twentieth of Februarie: which conferred with the Olympiad, was in the ninth Moneth of the firſt yeere of the eighth Olympiad; So that whether we follow the account of the Olympiads, as doe the Greeke Hiſtorians, or that of Nabonaſſar with Ptolomie, we ſhall finde euery memorable accident to fall out right with each computation.

Ptol. in Alim. lib. 3. cap. 8.

40 For Ptolomie reckons the time anſwerable to two hundred and foure and twentie Italian yeeres, and an hundred and fortie daies from Nabonaſſar, to the fixteenth of Iulie in the ſeuenth yeere of Cambyſes.

The Greekes, and namely Diadorus Siculus, place the taking of Egypt by Cambyſes in the ſecond or third yeere of the threeſcore and third Olympiad, and the beginning of Cambyſes ſeuenth yeere in the firſt of the threeſcore and fourth Olympiad: which firſt of the threeſcore and fourth Olympiad runnes along with part of the two and twentieth of Nabonaſſar. The like agreement is conſequently found about the beginning and end of Cyrus.

Likewiſe the twentieth of Darius, who ſucceeded Cambyſes, is according to Ptolomie the two hundred and fixe and fortieth of Nabonaſſar, which (obſeruing the differences of Nabonaſſars Era and the Olympiad, viz. eight and twentie yeeres) it agrees with the third of the threeſcore and ninth Olympiad, wherein it is placed by the Greekes. In this Iosephus agrees with the Greekes throughout, ſaying that he ioyneth Darius Medus, whom Xenophon calleth Cyaxares, with Cyrus, in the deſtruction of

of Babylon, which is true, and not contrarie to the Greeke computation, but may very well stand with it.

Lastly, the disagreements and confused accompts of those that follow the other Catalogue of the Persian Kings formerly rehearsed, doth giue the greater credit to this of the Greekes, which being constant in it selfe, accordeth also with the computation of other Historians, and Astronomers, and likewise with the holy Scriptures.

§. II.

Of CAMBYSES, and the conquering of Aegypt by him.

E will therefore according to the truth giue the Empire of Persia to Cambyfes, the sonne of Cyrus, though degenerate in all things, sauing the desire to increase the greatness of his Empire: whereof hee was posselt in his Fathers time while Cyrus made warre in the North. Ctesias with others giue him a longer raigne than agreeth with the Grecian accompt before receiued.

Tab. x. c. a.

Her. 3. 4. 45. 83.
Eg. 85.

In the fifth yeere of his sole raigne, and in the third yeere of the threescore and third Olympiad, according to Diodor and Eusebius, hee invaded Aegypt, and hauing overthrowne the King thereof, Pammenitus, hee not only caused him to bee slaine, but also did put to death all his kindred and dependants, with the most of his children.

Herodotus and Ctesias giue for cause of this Warre (being no other indeede than the Ambition of Cambyfes) that when hee sent to Amasis King of Aegypt, to haue his daughter in marriage, Amasis presented him with Nitetis the daughter of Apries his predecessour, which Cambyfes disdained.

Howsoever it were, true it is, that Cambyfes gathered an Armie fit for such an enterprize, and caused the same to march. But before they entred Aegypt, Amasis died and left Pammenitus, whom Ctesias called Amyrtaeus, his successour; who inuoyed Aegypt after his father; (according to the best copies of Herodotus) but fixe Moneths, though other Chronologers giue him fixe yeeres.

But how long fouer he held the Crowne, in one battaile hee lost it, and was himselfe taken prisoner.

It is said that Cambyfes following therein the example of Cyrus, did not only spare life to the conquered King, but that hee also trusted him with the gouernment of Aegypt, and that vpon some reuolt, or the suspicion thereof, hee caused him to bee slaughtered. But the race of this King was not so extirpated, if wee may beleue Herodotus and Thucydides, but that hee left a Sonne called Inarus, who caused the Aegyptian to reuolt both from Xerxes and Artaxerxes.

That Pammenitus was at the first entreated gently by Cambyfes, I hold it very improbable, if it be true which is also written of him, That hee so much hated Amasis the King of Aegypt, who died before his arrival, that hee caused his body to be drawne out of the graue, and after diuers indignities vsed, commanded the same to bee burnt, contrarie to the custome both of the Aegyptians and Persians. For the Aegyptians vsed to powder their dead bodies with salt, and other drugges, to the end the wormes might not deuoure them. The Persians durst not consume them with fire, which they esteemed as a God, and therefore feared to feede it with Carrion.

* Neither did the Romanes euer consume their dead to ashes, all the time of Sylla Dictator, who caused his owne to be deuoured by that element, fearing the Law called Taliois, or like for like, because himselfe had vncombed the carcasse of Caius Marius after his death, Her. 3. 3. Plin. 1. 7. c. 54.

§. III.

§. III.

The rest of CAMBYSES his acts.

FTER this victorie obtained in Aegypt, Cambyfes sent an Armie into Cyprus, and constrained Euclebon King thereof to acknowledge him, w^{ch} he before held that Iland of the Aegyptians.

While Cambyfes yet busied himselfe in Aegypt, hee so much detested the Idolatry of that Nation, as hee caused the Images themselves, with the Temples wherein they were worshipped, to become downe and defaced. That done, hee directed a part of his Armie into Lybia, to ouer-turne the Temple of Iupiter Ammon; but the Deuill in defence of his Oratorie raised such a tempest of Sand, wherewith the greatest part of that Country is couered, as the Persians were there-with choked and ouerwhelmed.

Notwithstanding which misadventure, Herodotus and Seneca report, that disdayning to be resisted, hee prepared the rest of his Armie, which himselfe meant to conduct into those parts, but that finding a beginning of those incommodities, which his first sent troupe had tried, hee changed his purpose. For though conquering Kings haue power ouer men, yet the Elements doe not obey them, according to that old English proverbe, God, saith the King. Stay, saith the Tide.

After his returne from the attempt of Aethiopia, hee caused Apis the Aegyptian Bull, worshipped by that Nation as God, to be slaine: a deed very commendable, had it proceeded from true zeale, and beene executed as in seruice of him that only is, and liueth. But soone afterwards, when in a dreme it seemed vnto him that Smerdis did sit in the royall Throne of Persia (which apparition was verified in Smerdis the Magus) hee gaue it in charge to his fauourite Praxaspes, to murder Smerdis his brother. And hauing married his owne sisters, contrarie to the Persian Lawes, hee committed a most causelesse and most detestable murder vpon the one of them, called Meroe, then by himselfe with child, because shee bewailed the death of her brother Smerdis. I find it written of this Cambyfes, That because his Predecessors obserued religiously the ordinances of their Empire, hee assembled his Iudges and enquired of them, whether therè were any law among the Persians that did permit the brother to marry his owne sister: it being his owne intent so to doe.

The Iudges (who had alwaies either lawes or distinctions in store to satisfie Kings and times) made answer, that there was not any thing written allowing any such coniunction, but they notwithstanding found it in their cutumies, that it was alwaies left to the will of the Persian Kings to doe what best pleased themselves; and so, as Naucerus termes it, inuenerunt occasionem: That is as much to say, as the Iudges found a shift to please the King, and to secure themselves. And yet, where it concerned not the Kings private satisfaction, hee caused Sisamnis one of his Iudges, and perchance one of those which favoured his incestuous match, to be slayed a linc for an vnjust iudgement giuen, and the same his hide to bee hung vpon the iudgement seat. After which bestowing the fathers Office on his sonne, hee willed him to remember, that the same partialitie deferred the same punishment.

Among other his cruelties, that which hee exercised against the senne of his beloved Praxaspes was very strange and vngatefull. For when hee desired to bee truly informed by him what the Persians thought of his conditions, Praxaspes answered, That his vertues were followed with abundant praise from all men; only it was by many obserued, that hee tooke more than vsuall delight in the taste of Wine. With this taxation inflamed, hee vsed this replication: And are the Persians double-tongued, who also tell me that I haue in all things excelled my Father Cyrus; thou Praxaspes shalt then witness, whether in this report they haue done mee right: for if at the first shot I pierce thy sonnes heart with an arrow, then is it false that hath beene spoken; but if I misse the marke, I am then pleased that the same be accounted true, true, and my subiects beleueed. This being spoken, hee directed an arrow towards the innocent child, who falling dead with the stroke, Cambyses commanded his body to be opened, and his heart being broched on the arrow, this monstrous Tyrant greatly reioicing, shewed it to the Father with this saying, in stead of an Epitaph: Now P R A X A S T E S, thou maiest resolue thy selfe that I haue not lost my wits with Wine, but the Persians theirs, who make such report.

Many other barbarous cruelties hee exercised, till at the last, according to the phrase of our Law, he became folon de soy. For when he was informed that Pantistes, and Smerdis the Magi, (Cæcilius writeth them Sphendanes and Cimerdus) Ministers of his domestick affaires, taking aduantage of the great resemblance betweene Smerdis the Kings brother, and Smerdis the Magus, posselt themselves of the Empire, he made all haste towards Persia, and in mounting hastily on horsebacke, his sword dis-theathing pierced his owne thigh, where-with deadly wounded, falling into an ouer-late and remedilesse repentance of the slaughter which hee had executed vpon his owne brother, hee soone after gaue vp his wicked ghost, when hee had reigned eight yeeres, accounting therein thole seuen Moneths in which the Magi gouerned, while he was absent.

Pag. 117.

In Cambyses the Male line of Cyrus failed. For he had no issue either by Atossa or Meroe: yet Zonaras out of Hierome giues him a Daughter called Pantistes, and a sonne called Orontes, who being drowned in the River Ophites by Antioch, the same was afterward in memorie of the Princes death called Orontes.

He built the Citie of Babylon in Egypt, in the place where Latopolis was formerly seated, and that of Meroe in the Iland of Nilus, calling it by the name of his sister Meroe.

§. IIII.

Of the inter-regnum betweene CAMBYSSES and DARIUS.

CYRUS and his two sonnes being now dead, and the Kingdome in the possession of one of the Magi, the counterfait of Smerdis, the Princes, or Satrapes, or Prouinciall Gouvernours of the Empire (to wit, Otanes, Intaphernes, Gobrias, Magabysus, Asphatines, Hidarnes, and Darius, who were all descended from Achæmenes the first Persian King, hauing discovered the fraud of this imposture, ioynd their forces together, surpris'd and rooted out the Conspirator with his Companions, and assistants. In which action (saith Iustine) Intaphernes and Asphatines were slaine; but Herodotus o-therwise, that they were only wounded, for he auoweth, that all the seuen Princes were present at the election following.

For the Empire being now without a Gouvernour, these Princes grew into consultation how the same might be ordered from thence-forth. Otanes one of the seuen did not fancie any election of Kings, but that the Nobilitie and Cities should confederate, and by iust lawes defend their liberty in equality, giuing diuers reasons for his opinion, being as it seemed greatly terrified by the cruelties of Cambyses; As first, that it was not safe to giue all power to any one, seeing greatnesse it selfe, euen in good men, doth often infect the minde with many vices, and the libertie and freedom in all things is most apt to insult, & to commit all manner of wicked outrage. Again, that tyrants do commonly vse the seruices of wicked men, and fauour them most; they viurpe vpon the lawes of their Countrey; take other mens viues by force, and destroy whom they please without iudgement.

Magabysus was of another opinion, affirming that the tyrannie of a multitude was thrice more intolerable, than that of one. For the multitude doe all things without without iudgement runne into businesse and affaires with precipitation, like raging and ouer-bearing floods.

He therefore thought it safest to make election of a few, and those of the best, wisest, and most vertuous; because it is euer found, that excellent Counsailes are euer had from excellent men.

Darius gaue the third iudgement, who perswaded the creation of a King, because euen among few diuinitie of concord is seldom found, and in great Empires it doth euer happen that the discord of many Rulers hath inforced the election of one Supreme. It were therefore, saith Darius, farre safer to obserue the Lawes of our Countreie, by which Kingly gouernement hath bene ordained.

The other foure Princes adhered to Darius, and agreed to continue the same Imperiall gouernement by God established, and made prosperous. And to auoide partialitie, it was accorded, that the morning following these seuen Princes should mount on Horse-back, and on him the Kingdome should be conferred, whose horse after the Sunne-rising should first ney or bray. In the euening after this appointment was made, it is said that Darius consulted with the Master of his horse Oebarnus, who in the Suburbs of the Citie when the election was resolved of, caused the same Horse, whereon in the morning Darius was mounted, to couer a Mare, who as soone as he came into the same place was the first horse that brayed. Whereupon the other fixe Princes descended from their horses, and acknowledged Darius for their Lord and King.

Plato in the third of his Lawes affirmeth, that in memorie of the seuen Princes, whereof Darius himselfe was one, that deliuered the Empire from the usurpation of the Magi, hee diuided the whole into seuen gouernements; Herodotus saith into twentie Satrapies.

Of DARIUS the sonne of HYSTASPES.

§. I.

Of DARIUS his Lineage.

DARIUS was descended of the ancient Persian Kings, to wit, of the Achæmenides, of which, Cyrus the Great was the lineall Successour. For in this sort Herodotus deriues him as before.

Cyrus the first, who had Tespisus, who begat Ariararnes, who was father of Arjarnes, the father of Hystaspes, the father of Darius, surnamed Celes, the father of Xerxes.

Cris. l. 4.

Hystaspes accompanied Cyrus the Great in the warres against the Scythians, at which time Cyrus being made jealous of Darius by a dreame of his owne, caused him to be sent into Persia, others say to be imprisoned, from whence by the death of Cyrus he was deliuered, and made Gouvernor of the Persian Magi. He afterward followed Cambyses into Egypt; he then ioynd with the rest of the Princes against the Magi, and either by the nying of his horse, or, as others affirme, by strong hand he obtained the Empire, which he the more assured to himselfe by taking two of Cyrus Daughters, and as many of his Nieces for his wiues.

Hyaspes, according to * Herodotus, had besides Darius these three sonnes, who were great Commanders in the warre which Darius made in Asia the lesse, Fraxce, Macedon, and Greece; Atarnes, Artaphernes; and Artabanus, who dissuaded Xerxes from the second Grecian warre. Cambyses also had a Daughter married to Gobryas the Father of Mardonius, who commanded the Armie of Darius in Macedon; and married the Daughter of Darius, Artazofire his Cousen germaine.

Reinectus giues to Hyaspes five sonnes, Darius who succeeded Cambyses, Artabanus, Artaphernes, Otanes, and Atarnes, with two daughters.

§ II.

Of Darius his Government, and suppressing the rebellion of Babylon.

DARIS deuised equall lawes whereby all his subiects might be gouerned, the same being formerly promised by Cyrus. He gaue access to all his subiects, and behaued himselfe so mildly to all men, that many Nations desired and offered themselves to become his Vassalls: Only hee laied diuers payments and taxes on the people, which had not bene accustomed in Cyrus time, to the value of fourethene thousand five hundred and threescore talents, saith Herodotus.

The warre which Cambyses made a farre off in Egypt, and the contention betweene the Magi, and the Princes of Persia, for the Empire, gaue heart to the Babylonians to recouer their libertie, and to shake off the Persian yoke, wherof Darius being aduertised, he prepared an Armie to recouer that Citie and State reuolted. But finding the same a difficult worke, he vsed the seruice of Zopirus, who for the loue he bare Darius, did cut off his owne Eares and Nose, and with other wounds yet fresh bleeding, he seemed to shie to the Babylonians for succour, to whom he accused the cruelty of Darius: who, for hauing giuen him aduice to giue ouer the siege of their Citie, had in this sort dismembred and deformed him; wherupon the Babylonians gaue him that credit, as they trusted him with the disposition & commandement of their greatest forces; which when Zopirus had obtained, after some small colourable ouerthrowes giuen to the Persians vpon sallies, hee deliuered the Citie into Darius his hands, who had lye before it twentie Moneths.

Her. lib. 3.

§ III.

Of Darius his fauour to the Iewes in building the Temple.

IN the second yeere of Darius, he gaue order that the building of the Temple at Ierusalem should goe on, and commanded that the same should be finished at his own charge, and out of the reuenues of the Crowne. And whereas the Gouvernors of those Provinces which are situate betweene Euphrates, and the Phenician, and mid-land Sea, (whom Ezra calleth the Captaiues beyond the Riuer) had hindered the worke in Cambyses his time, Darius gaue commandement that they should not thenceforth come neere vnto Ierusalem, to giue any impediment to the building, but that they should should with-draw themselves, and get them farre off till all were finished and at an end. In the old Latine it is written, Procul recedite ab idis; With-draw your selves farre from them; In our English, Be yee farre from thence, to wit, from the Citie, and Temple, now in building.

Hee also made a decree, which concerned his owne Subiects, That whosoever should thenceforth hinder the setting vp of the Temple of God, that his house should be torne downe, and the disturber hanged on a Gallows made of the Timber thereof. He also in the same decree maketh inuocation to God, That hath caused his name to dwell there, (to) destroy all Kings and People that put their hands to alter, and to destroy this house of God which is in Ierusalem, &c. In foure yeeres after which decree (the Iewes being really furnished with money and all things necessarie from Darius) the Temple was in all finished, to wit, in the beginning of the Spring, in the sixth yeere of Darius Hyaspes, and in the two and fortieth after their first returne.

§. IIII.

Of Darius his Scythian Warre.

AFter the recouerie of Babylon he invaded the Scythians, whose King Insane calleth Luthinus; and saith, that Darius vnder-tooke this warre against him, because he refused him his Daughter in marriage. The better to conuoy his Armie into Scythia, hee built a Bridge of small Vessels ouer the Riuer Ister or Danubius, and gaue the custodie of the same in charge (among others of Asia the lesse) to the Ionians, and Æolians, among whom was Miltiades, who perswaded the Asian Grecians to breake downe the bridge, to the end Darius might not returne thereby, and if by any other way, then not without great difficultie; but the same was resisted by Histiam Prince of Milet, a Citie of Ionis, which Nation being a Colonie of the Grecians, Diodorus calleth Traitors to their Countrie, because they ioynd themselves to Darius. But the Scythians more elegantly termed them good slaues, for as much as they would not runne away from their Master, but were more mindfull of doing their duties, than of shaking off their bondage, when they were presented with as faire an occasion of libertie as could haue bene desired. For the great Armie of Darius entring the desert Countrie called Bessarabia, found in it neither people to resist them, nor any sustenance to relieue them. For the Scythians were then, as are the Chirm Tartars, their posteritie, at this day, all horse-men, vying the Bow and Sword. They were not Plough-men, but Grassers, driving their Herds from one place to another as opportunite of pasture led them. Standing Townes they had none, but vsed for Houses the Waggon wherein they carried their wiues and children. These Waggon they place at euery Station in very good order, making Streets and Lanes in the manner of a great Towne, remouable at their pleasure. Neither hath the Emperour himselfe, called now the great Chrim, any other Citie than such an Agora, (as they name it) or Towne of Carts. When as therefore Darius had wearied himselfe, and wasted his prouision in those desolate Regions, wherein he found neither waies to direct him, victuals to refresh him, nor any houses, fruitfull trees, or liuing creatures, nor any thing at all, which either hee himselfe might make vse of, or by destroying it might grieue his enemies; he beganne to percieve his owne folly, and the danger into which he had brought him. Yet setting a good face vpon a badde game, he sent braue messages to the Scythian, bidding him to cease his flight, and cieth to make trial of his valour and fortune in plaine battaile, Or if he acknowledged himselfe the weaker, then to yeeld by faire means, and become his Subiect, giuing him Earth and Water, which the Persians vsed to demand as a signe, that all was yeelded vnto them. To this challenge the Scythian returned an Heroicall answer; sending a Bird, a Frog, a Mouse, and five Arrows: which dumbe thew

Darius interpreting by his owne will, thought that hee did yeeld all the Elements wherein those creatures live, and his weapons withall into his hands. But Gobryas, one of the seven Princes, who had slaine the Magi, confuted their meaning a-right, which was thus; O yee Persians, get yee wings like Birds, or dine under the water, or creepe into holes in the earth, for else yee shall not escape our arrows. And this interpretation was soone verified by the Seythians themselves, who assailed the Persian camp, draue the horse-men into the trenches, and vexing the Armie with continuall Alarums day and night, were so fearelesse of this great Monarch, and so little regarded him, that within his hearing, and even in his sight, they did not forbear the pastime of coursing a Hare, which they had started by chance. By this boldnesse of 10 the pastime, Darius was so discouraged, that he forsook his Camp by night, making many fires, and leaving all that were sicke and weake behinde him, and so with all speede marched away towards the River Ister. He was pursued hardly by the Seythians who mist him, yet arriving at the Bridge before him, perswaded the Ionians to depart, assuring them that the Persian King should neuer more be able to doe them either good or harme. Which words had certainly bene proued true, had not Hystien the Milesian prevailed with his people, to attend the coming of Darius, whom the Seythians did likewise faile to meete, when they returned from Ister to seeke him out.

§. V.

DARIUS hauing thus escaped out of Seythia, determined the inuasion of Thrace and Macedon, in which Warre hee employed Megabates, who mastered the Peonians, and transplanted them, & possesse Perinthus, Chalcedon, Bizantium, and other places, being also soone after subiects, and added to the Persian Empire by Otanes, the sonne of 30 Syftannes, whom Cambyses had exoriated for false iudgement. So were the Cities of Selybria and Cardia likewise taken in for the Persian, who hauing now reduced vnder his obeyfance the best part of Thrace, did send his Embassadours to Amintas King of Macedon adioyning, demanding of him by the Earth & Water, the Soueraignetic ouer that Kingdome. Amintas doubting his owne strength, entertained the Embassadours with gentle wordes, and afterward inuited them to a solemne and magnificent feast, the Persians greatly desired that the Macedonian Ladies might be present: which being granted, the Embassadours who were well filled with wine, and presumed vpon their greatnesse, and many victories, beganne to vse such imbracings, and other lasciuious behauiour towards those Noble Ladies, as Alexander the Kings Sonne, great Grand-father to Alexander the Great, disdaining the Persians barbarous presumption, besought his father to withdraw himselfe from the assembly, continuing notwithstanding all honourable respect towards the Embassadours, whom withall hee entreated that the Ladies might refresh themselves for a while; promising their speedy returne. This being obtained, Alexander caused the like number of well-fauoured young-men to clothe themselves in the same garments, & to vse the same attires which the Ladies had worn at the feast, giuing them in charge, That when the Persians offered to abuse them, they should forthwith transpiree them with their long knives, of which they were provided for that purpose, which was accordingly performed. Charge was soone after giuen by Darius for a seuerer reuenge of this murder. But Alexander, somewhat before the death of Amintas, gaue his sister Gygis in marriage to Eubaris, a principall Commander of Darius forces on that side, who perswading her husband how helpfull the Alliance of Macedon would proue for the inuasion of Attica intended, so prevailed, as Alexander der escaped that tempest, which threatened to fall vpon him very suddenly; the warre of Asia the lesse, called Ionick, falling out at the same time.

§. VI.

The first occasion of the warre which DARIUS made vpon Greece, with archaical fall of the government in Athens, whence the quarrell grew.

NOW the better to vnderstand the reason and motives of that great Warre, which followed soone after, betwene the Persians and Grecians, it is necessarie to make a short repetition of the state of Athens, which Citie indured the hardest and worst blis of Darius inuasion on that side the Sea with admirable successe. Neither doe I hold it any impertinencie, to be large in unfolding euery circumstance of so great a businesse as gaue fire to those warres, which neuer could be thoroughly quenched, vntill the ruine of this great Persian Monarchie, Persepolis the capitall Citie of the Empire, was at the request of an Athenian Harlot consumed with a flame, as dreadfull as in the pride of their greatnesse, the Persians had raised in Athens.

Now therefore as out of the former bookes it may be gathered, how Athens, and other parts of Greece, were anciently gouerned, the same being already set downe, though scatteringly, and in seuerall times, among other the Contemporarie occurrences of the Easterne Emperors, and the Kings of India; so I thought it very pertinent in this place to remember againe the two last changes in the State of Athens. As for the Lacedemonians, they maintained still their ancient policie vnder Kings, though these also after some nineteene descentes bridled by the Ephori.

Cadmus King of the Athenians in the former bookes remembered, who willingly died for the saietie of his people, was therefore so honored by them, as (thinking none worthy to succede him) they changed their former government from Monarchical to Princes for terme of life, of which Medon the sonne of Cadmus was the first, after whom they were called Medontidae; and of these there were twelue Generations besides Medon, to wit.

Solon, and others, who are the lesse to bee regarded, by reason of the ycerely change.

This Solon being a man of excellent wisdom, gave lawes to the Athenians, which were published according to Gellius, in the three and thirtieth yere of Tarquinus Priscus, and were in after-ages deriued vnto the Romans, and by the Decemviri (Magistrates in Rome created for that purpose) reduced into twelue Tables, 20 which were the ground of the Romane lawes. But these goodly ordinances of Solon, were in his owne daies violated, and for a while almost quite extinguished. For whereas they were framed vnto the practice and maintenance of a popular gouernement; the estate of Athens was very soone changed into a Monarchie by Pisistratus the son of Hippocrates: who finding the Citizens distracted into two factions, wherof Megacles and Lycargus two Citizens of noble Families were become the heads, tooke occasion by their contention and insolencie to raise a third faction more powerfull than the other two, and more plausible, for that he seemed a Protector of the Citizens in general. Having by this meanes obtained loue and credit, he wounded himselfe, and faining that by malice of his enemies he had like to haue 30 beene slaine for his loue to the good Citizens, he procured a guard for his defence, and with that band of men surprisling the State-houfe, or Cittadell of Athens, hee made himselfe Lord of the Towne; Hegesistratus being then Gouvernour. But the Citizens, who in euery change of gouernement had fought to remove themselves further and further from the forme of a Monarchie, could so ill brooke this usurpation of Pisistratus, that he was drinen for lack of helpe to flie the Towne, as soone as Megacles and Lycargus ioyning their forces attempted his expulsion. Yet as the building of his tyranny founded vpon the dissension of the Citizens, was ruined by their good agreement; so was it soone after well reedified by the new breaking out 40 of the old factions. For when Megacles found the power of Lycargus to grow greater than his owne, he did (as is the vsuall practice of the weaker side) call in the common enemy Pisistratus, to whom he gaue his Daughter in marriage, by which alliance the Familie of the Alcmaeonides, wherof Megacles was chiefe, became very powerfull, yet so that Pisistratus by their power was made Master both of them and all the rest. But this agreement held not long; the Alcmaeonides, and especially Megacles being incensed against Pisistratus for his misdemeanour towards his Wife. Wherefore they practised with the Souldiers of the Towne, proceeding in their treason so secretly, and so farre, that Pisistratus vpon the first discouerie of their intent, perceived no other remedie for his affaires, than to with-draw himselfe to Eretria, where he remained eleuen yceres. Which time being expired, hauing hired 50 Souldiers out of many parts of Greece, hee againe recovered the principallitie of Athens: after which third obtaining his estate, hee gouerned Athens seuentene yceres, according to Aristotle, and raigned in all thirte and three yceres, saith Elianus; but as Iustine hath it, foure and thirte, accounting the time belike as well before before as after his feuerall expulsions. Herodotus giues the father and the Sonne fixe and thirte yceres; Aristotle fixe and thirte. But Thucydides affirmeth, that hee died very old, leauing for his Succesflours his two Sonnes Hippias and Hipparchus, who gouerned the Athenians with such moderation, as they rather seemed the Lineall succcessors of a naturall Prince than of a Tyrant. But in the end, and some three yceres before Hippias was expelled out of Athens, his brother Hipparchus was murdered by Harmodius and Aristogiton. The cause why, and the manner how performed, Thucydides hath written at large. And though Hipparchus were charged with vnaturall lust after Harmodius, yet Plato in his Dialogue, intituled 10 Hipparchus, doth greatly magnifie him, affirming that hee was a Prince of as many eminent vertues as that Age had any, altogether condemning the murderers and authors of that scandall. Hippias fearing that this enterprife vpon his brother had more and deeper rootes than were apparent, first sought to discouer the further intents of Harmodius and Aristogiton, by a Harlot of theirs called Lemnia: who because shee would not reueale her Companions, did cut out her owne tongue. Then did Hippias, the better to strengthen himselfe, enter into a strait amitie with Aantides, Tyrant of the Citie Lampiscus, whom he knew to bee greatly fauoured by Darius, to whose sonne Hypochus hee gaue one of his Daughters in marriage. But some three yceres after the death of his brother, doubting 20 I know not what strong practice against himselfe, hee beganne to vse the Citizens with great seueritie, which neither Pisistratus the Father, nor Hippias himselfe had euer exercised during their usurpations till this time. And therefore the Athenians fearing lest that this dislike might rather increase, than diminish in Hippias, they stirred vp Clisthenes one of the noblest and best able of their Citie, to practise their deliuerie: who calling to his assistance the banished Alcmaeonides, together with an Armie of the Lacedaemonians, ledde by Cleomenes their King, so affrighted Hippias, as by compulsion he gaue ouer his estate, and the possession of Athens, and from thence imbarcking himselfe tooke land at * Sigeum, whence hee went to Lampiscus in Asyagouerned by Aantides, who presented him to Darius. Hee was de- 30 prived of his estate; as Herodotus and Thucydides agree, twentie yceres before the battell of Marathon: all which time he continued, partly with Aantides, at other times with Artaphernes Lieutenant for Darius in Sardis, the Metropolis of Lydia; and perswading and practising the enterprife vpon Athens, which Darius in the ende to his great dishonour vnder-tooke, twentie yceres after Hippias had resigned his estate.

Thus farre I haue digressed from Darius, to the ende the Reader may conceiue the better the causes and motives of this warre: wherof the hope that Hippias had to be restored to Athens by the helpe of Darius, which made him solicite and perswade the Persians to conquer Greece, was one; but not the most 40 vident.

Of the Ionian Rebellion, which was the principall cause of the warres ensuing betwene Greece and Persia.

Another, and a strong motive to this expedition, was the Ionick warre; breaking out in Asia about the same time. The Colonies transported out of Greece into Asia, which occupied the greatest part of the Sea-coast, hauing enioyed their libertie about 500. yceres, euen from the Ionick migration, to the time of Cresus, were by this Lydian King made Tributaries, and afterwards as parcel of his Dominions, were taken in by 50

But as it is the custome of Nations halfe conquered (witness Ireland) to rebell againe vpon every aduantage and opportunitie: so did the Ionians, and other Gracians, both in Cyrus his life, and after him, seeke by all meanes possible to free themselves.

At this time they found such men readie to spurre them into Rebellion, as had by the Perſian been giuen unto them for bridles to hold them in subiection. Every one of those Townes had a Lord to rule it, whom they (abhorring the government of one man) called their Tyrants. These Lords were very true to the Perſian, by whose onely might they held the people in subiection. And this their dutifull affection they had well declared, when Darius being in great extremitie, they vsed all meanes to deliuer him and his Armie (that other wise had bene lost) out of the Scythians hand. Of this great piece of seruice Hystian the tyrant of Miletus expected the chiefe thanks, as hauing bene chiefe Author of their expecting Darius, when the rest, either perswaded by the Scythians, or carried away with their owne desires, were readie to haue abandoned him. But it came so to passe, that Darius being more fearefull of the harme that Hystian (being powerfull and craftie) might doe to him in the future, than mindfull of the good which he had already receiued at his hand, found meanes to carry him a-long to Susa, where he detained him with all kind vſage of a friend, yet kept such good espiall vpon him, as an enemy, he could not ſtate away. Hystian had subtiltie enough to discover the Kings purpose, which ill agreed with his owne desires. For he thought it more pleasant, and more honourable to rule as Prince in one faire Citie, hauing a ſmal Tyrannie, than to sit and leaſt at the great Kings table, and heare the counsailes by which a large Empire was managed; being himſelfe an idle beholder, and enjoying with much restraint of libertie, none other pleasures than a priuate man might bestow vpon himſelfe.

Wherefore he bethought himſelfe of raising of some tumults in the lower Asia, to pacifie which if he might be sent, as one that had great experience and authoritie in those quarters, it would afterwards be in his power to stay at home, and either satifie the King with excuses, or deale as occasion shall require. Resolving vpon this course, he sent very ſecret instructions to Arſtagoras his kinsman, whom he had left his Deputie at Miletus, aduiling him to stirre vp some Rebellion. These directions came seasonably to Arſtagoras, who hauing failed in an enterpriſe vpon the Isle of Naxos, through the false dealing of a Perſian his Associate, stood in feare of disgrace, if not of some further ill that might befall him, as one that that had wasted the Kings treasures to no good purpose.

Therefore he readily embraced the counsaile: and the better to draw the whole Countie of Ionian into the same course which he determined to runne, hee abandoned his tyrannie, and did ſet Miletus at libertie. This plausible beginning wanne vnto him the hearts of the Mileſians; and his proceeding with other Ionian Tyrants (of whom some he tooke and sold as ſlaues to their citizens, others he chased away) caused the whole Nation to be at his command. The Perſian fleet, whereof hee lately had bene Admirall in the enterpriſe of Naxos, hee had ſurprised in his first breaking out, together with the principall Officers, and Captaines, so that now hee thought himſelfe able to deale with the great Kings forces, lying thereabout, either by Land or Sea. But likely it was that the power of all Asia would ſhortly be vpon his neck, and cruſh both him and his assistants to pieces, vniſſe that he were able to raise an Armie that might hold the field, which the Ionians alone were insufficient to performe. Therefore he tooke a journey to Sparta, where hauing ſtayed in vaine with many arguments, and the offer of ſilke talents, to win to his partie Cleomenes King of the Lacedaemonians; hee went from thence to Athens, and with better ſucceſſe beſought the people to led him their assistance. The Athenian Embassadors which had bene sent to the Perſian Kings Lieutenants in the lower Asia, deſiring them them not to giue countenance to Hippias, now a baniſhed man, and lately their Tyrant, were a while before this returned with ill answers, hauing found very churlish entertainment. So that the euill which they were to expect in all likelihood from the Perſian, made them willing to begin with him. To which purpose, their conſanguinitie with the Ionians, and the perswaſions of Arſtagoras, drew them on apace, it perhaps his treasure were not helping. Twentie ſhippes the Athenians furnished for this voyage; to which the Eratrians added ſiue more, in regard of ancient kindneſſe that had paſſed betweene the Ionians and them. With these and their owne forces joynd, the Ionians entred the Riuier Caſſius, which ſalleth into the Sea by Ephesus: by which aduantage they ſurprised Sardis when no enemy was heard of or ſuſpected; inſomuch, as Artaphernes, who ruled as Vice-roy in those partes, had no other hope of ſafetie, than by retreating himſelfe into the Caſtle, which the Gracians could not force: from whence he beheld the ſlaughter of the Citizens, and the Citie flaming.

The Perſians at length, mixt with the Burgers, began to encourage them to defence, and recovered the Market place, ſtrengthened by the Riuier Pactolus, which ran through it, and borrowing courage from deſperation, they both defended themſelves, and charged their enemies; who well aduiling themſelves, made all the haſte they could toward the Sea ſide. But Artaphernes hauing gathered all the strength he could, purſued the Gracians, and found them neere Ephesus; where letting reſolutely vpon them, he ſlaughtered a great part of their Armie; the rest ſauing themſelves in Ephesus. In this fight Eualetes, Captaine of the Eratrians, perished: but his ſame and memorie was by that excellent Poet Simonides preferred. After this overthrow, the Athenians, which were ſent to Arſtagoras and to the Ionians, could by no arguments of theirs, no not by their teares, be perswaded to make any ſecond trial of their fortunes, on that ſide the Sea.

Yet the burning of Sardis made a greater noyſe in the world, than the good ſucceſſe which the Perſians had in one or two ſkimmiſhes, could rayſe. Wherefore the Ionians brauely proceeding, wone a great part of Caria; and ſending their Fleet into the Helleſpont, got Bizantium and other Townes into their hands. Yea, the Cyprians, lately ſubdued by Cambyſes, beganne hereupon to take heart, and entering into confederacie with the Ionians, who were able to giue them aide by ſea, rebelled againſt the Perſians.

Theſe newes coming to the eare of Darius, filled him with great indignation, and with an extreme hatred of the Athenians, vpon whom hee vowed to take ſharpe reuenge. As for the Ionians, his contempt of them, and their knowledge of his power, made him to thinke, that they would not haue dared to attempt ſuch things, but by the inſtigat[i]on of thoſe, to whom their ignorance of his great might had afforded the courage to prouoke him. This was the maine ground of the Warre commenced by Darius, and purſued by Xerxes againſt Athens: To which, the ſolicitation of Hippias, before remembred, gaue onely ſome forme and aſſiſtance: the buſineſſe, when once it was thus farre on foot, being like ynough to haue proceeded, though he had perished ere it were aduanced any further.

Some other occurrents in this Ionian commotion extended the quarrell of Darius againſt many of the Hlanders, if not againſt the whole Nation of the Greekes; for all of them gaue to his Rebels free harbour: the Hlanders moreover did helpe to furniſh out a Nauie of three hundred and ſixtie ſaile againſt him. Theſe prouocations did rather breede in him a deſire to abate their pride, than any feare of harme that they were like to doe him. For what they had done at Sardis, was but by ſurpriſe. In euery fight they were beaten by the Perſians, who had not yett loſt the fruits of their diſcipline, wherein Cyrus had trained them, nor all their ancient Captaines. In one ſea-fight by the Ile of Cyprus, the Ionians indeed had the vpper hand; but they were Phenicians, Egyptians, and Cilicians, whom they vanquiſhed; neither was that victorie of any vſe to them; the Cyprians, in whole aid they came, being being utterly beaten by the Persian Armie at Land, and reduced into their old subjection. So had the Persians likewise by open warre and faire force ouerthrowne the Carians in two battailes, and reclaimed that Nation; as also they had recovered the Townes vpon Hellepont, with some Eolian & Ionian Cities: when Aristagoras with his friends quitting Miletus, fled into Thrace, desirous to seat himselfe in Amphipolis, a Colonie of the Athenians. But the Edonians, on whose Territorie belike he landed, ouerthrew him, and cut his troups in pieces.

About the same time, Hippias the first mouer of this insurrection came downe into those quarters; who hauing vndertaken the performance of great matters to Darius, was glad to flye from his Lieutenants, by whome his double-dealing was detected.

But this euasion preserued him not long. For after many vaine attempts that he made, hee was taken in fight by the Persians, and hastily beheaded, lest the King should pardon him vpon remembrance of old good turnes; as it seemes that hee would haue done, by the buriall which he commanded to be giuen to his dead body that was crucified, and by his heauie taking of his death.

Hippias had fought to put himselfe into Miletus; but the Citizens doubting his condition, chose rather to keepe him out, and make shift for themselves, without his helpe. The strength of their Citie by land, which had in old time withstood the Lydian Kings, and their good Fleet which promised vnto them the libertie of so open a sea, emboldened them to trie the vttermost, when very few friends were left vpon that Continent to take their part. But their Nauie was broken as much by threatnings as by force; many of their companions and fellow-rebels forsaking them vpon hope of pardon, and many being daunted with the causelesse flight of those that should haue assisted them. Neither was it long before the Towne it selfe being assaulted both by Land and Sea, was taken by force, the Citizens slaine, their wiues and children made slaues, and their goods a bootie to the Persians, whome for fixe yeeres space they had put to so much trouble.

His warre with good successe finished by the Persians, and some attempts made on Europe side with variable successe; Darius obtinate in the enterprize and conquest of Greece (though at first he pretended to make the warre but against the Athenians and Eretrians, who jointly assisted the Ionians against him, and burnt Sardis in Lydia) did now by his embassadours demand an acknowledgement from them all: among whome, some of them not so well resolu'd as the rest, submitted themselves, as the Aginets and others. Against these, the Athenians being inflamed (by the assistance of the Lacedaemonians) alter diuers encounters forth them to giue pledges, and to relinquish the partie of the Persians. Cleomenes led the Lacedaemonians in this warre, and caused his companion King Damantius to be deposed: who thereupon fled to Darius, farre the more confident of victorie, by reason of these discords, alienations, and ciuill warres among the Greekes. He therefore gaue order to Hippagoras to prepare a Fleet of shippes fit to transport his Armie ouer the Hellepont: the same consisting of an hundred thousand foot, and tenne thousand horse. The charge in chiefe of his Armie he committed to Datis, accompanied and assisted by Hippias, the sonne of Pisistratus, expelled out of Athens twentie yeeres before, and by Aristophernes his brother, Governour of Sardis, and the Sea-coast of Asia the lesse. These Commanders baring their Companies brought downe to the Sea-side, imbarked themselves in fixe hun-hundred Gallies and other Vessels; and first of all attempted the Islands called Cyclades, which lay in the mid-way betwene Asia the lesse, and Greece. For (obtaining those places) the Persians had then nothing to hinder the transportation of their forces ouer the Aegean Sea; but on the contrary they might alwayes both relieue themselves in their passage, and throwd themselves from all suddaine tempests and outrage.

To this end they first possessed themselves of Samos, secondly, they attempted Naxos: Which Island, the inhabitants despairing of their owne forces, abandoned. So did the people of Delos, of which Apollo was natue: Whose Island Darius did not onely forbear to sacke, but recalling the inhabitants, he gaue order to beautifie the places and Altars of Sacrifice, to Apollo erected. And hauing recovered these and other Islands, the Persians directed their course for Eretria in Euboea: for that Citie (as already hath bene shewed) had assisted the Ionians at the taking and firing of Sardis. In this Island the Persians tooke ground, and besieged Eretria very straitly, and after fixe dayes assault, partly by force, and in part by the treason of Euphratus and Philagius; they tooke it, sackt it, and burnt it to the ground. Thus faire the winds of prosperous fortune filled their sayles. From Euboea the Persians paist their Armie into Attica, conducted and guided by Hippias, late Prince of Athens, and marching towards it, they encamped at Marathon, in the way from the Sea, where they landed, towards Athens.

The Athenians finding the time arriued, wherein they were to dispute with their owne vertue against Fortune, and to call lots for their libertie, for their wiues, their children, and their liues, put themselves in the best order they could to make resistance, and withall sent away with speed to the Lacedaemonians for succour, employing in that Negotiation one Phidippides; who passing through Arcadia, encountered in the way a familiar Diuell, which he supposed to be Pan, who willed him to assure the Athenians of victorie, promising that some one of the Gods should be present at the battaile to assist them and defend them against the multitude of their enemies. Phidippides at his returne seeing he could not bring with him any present succours from Sparta, yet he thought it greatly auailing to bring newes from the Gods, and promise of assistance from Heaven, which no doubt (though the device was likely to be his owne) yet it greatly encouraged the multitude and common people, who in all ages haue bene more stirred vp with fond Prophecies and other like superstitious fooleries, than by any iust cause or solid reason. The Athenians being now left to themselves, with one thousand onely of the Platams (who hauing bene formerly defended by the Athenians against the Thebans, did in this extremite witness their thankfulness and gratefull disposition) began to dispute, Whether it were most for their aduantage to defend the wals of Athens, or to put themselves into the field with such forces as they had, the same consisting of tenne thousand Athenians, and one thousand of the Platams. In the end, and after great diuersitie of opinions, Miltiades, who perswaded the triall by battaile, prevailed. The Armies being now in view, and within a myle of each other, the Athenians disposed themselves into three troups: two wings or hornes, as they tearmed them, and the body of a battaile. The Persians, when they perceived so small a Troope aduancing towards them, thought the Athenians rather dispossessed of their vnderstanding, than possessed with the resolution whereof they made use. So inuincible and resistlesse the Persians esteemed their owne numbers to be, and that small troupe of their enemies then in view, rather to be despised than to be fought withall: But in conclusion, the victory being doubtfully ballanced for a while, sometime the vertue of the Graecians, and sometimes the number of the Persians prevailing, the Graecians fighting for all that they had, the Persians for that they needed not, the great forces of Darius were disordered and put in rout; the Athenians following their victorie cun to the Sea-shore, where the Persians, so many of them as lost not their wits with their courage, saved themselves in their shippes.

The

The Persian Armie consisted of an hundred thousand foot and tenne thousand horse; of which there were slaine in the place fixe thousand three hundred, and of the Graecians an hundred fourescore and twelue. For howsoeuer it came to passe, either by strange visions, which were afterward called Panici terrores, or by some other affright, it seemeth, that the invading Armie, after the first encounter, fought with their backs towards their enemy, and lost that number, by Herodotus set downe, in their disorderly retreat, or rather in their flat running away. As for Iustines report, That two hundred thousand of the Persian Armie were slaine, the same hath no appearance nor possibilitie of truth. In this fight Themiſticles the elder was slaine, sayth Iustine and Cicero; but Suidas tells vs, that he escaped and died most miserably in Lemnos.

The greatest honour of this victory was cast vpon Miltiades, who both perswaded the trial by battaile, and behaued himselfe therein answerably to the counsell which he gaue. Themiſticles had his first reputation in this fight, being both young and of the first beard. Those of the Graecians, of marke and commandement, that fell in the first encounter, were Callimachus and Stefleus. It is also said, That Cynegyrus following the Persians to their embarking, layd hands on one of their Gallies, to haue held it from putting off the shore, and hauing his right hand cut off, he yet offered to arrest it with his left; of which being also deprived, he tooke hold of it with his teeth. This encounter happened in the first yeere of the threecore and twelfth Olympiad, about the time of the Warre made by Coriolanus against his fellow-Romane: Alexander the sonne of Amintas being then King of Macedon, and Phinippus then Gouvernour of Athens, according to Plutarch; or Hybilides, after Italycarneſſus.

This great fray thus parted, and the Persians returned backe into the lesser Asia, Miltiades fought and obtained an employment against the Islanders of Paros, one of the Cyclades, and passing ouer his Companies in threecore and tenne Gallies, after fixe and twentie dayes assault he brake his thigh, in seeking to enter it by the Temple of Ceres, wherewith himselfe being made vnable, and his companies discouraged, he returned to Athens, where those vngratefull Citizens forgetting all his seruices past, and that of all other the most renowned at the battaile of Marathon, did by the perswasion of Xanippus, the father of Pericles (who enuied his fame) cast him into prison, and set on him a fine of fiftie Talents; where his weak and wounded body being not able to endure the one, nor his estate to pay the other, he after a few dayes ended his life.

Which enuie of the better sort to each other, with their priuate Factions, assisted by the vnthankfull and witlesse people, brought them, not many yeeres after, from a victorious and famous Nation, to base subiection and slaueerie. Miltiades left behind him one sonne called Cymon, begotten on Hegisſpila, daughter of Olorus King of Thrace, who (saith Plutarch) was neither inferior to his father in valour, nor to Themistocles in vnderstanding, but exceeded them both in iustice and good gouernment.

Now Darius taking greater care how to recover his honour, than sorrow for the losse recieued in Greece, gaue order for new leuies of men, and all other warlike provisions. But the Aegyptians reuolting from his obedience (a Kingdome of great strength and reuenue) greatly distracted his resolution for the reuinuation of Greece. The dissension also among his sonnes; of whom, the yonger being borne after he was King, and by so great a mother as Atossa, disdained to give place to his elder brother, borne before Darius obtained the Empire, greatly vexed him. And lastly, death, who hath no respect of any mans affaires, gaue end to all his consultations and enterprises, and joynd him to the earth of his auncetors, about a yeere after the battaile of Marathon, and after that he had reigned fixe and thirty yeeres. He left behind him five sonnes, namely Artabanus, born before he obtained the kingdome, Xerxes who succeeded him, Achemenes gouernor of Aegypt, Masties and Anabignes.

Of XERXES.

§. I.

The preparation of XERXES against Greece.

XERXES received from his father, as hereditarie, a double Warre; one to be made against the Aegyptians, which he finished so speedily, that there is nothing remaining in writing how the same was performed: the other against the Graecians; of which it is hard to judge, whether the preparations were more terrible, or the successe ridiculous. In the consultation for the prosecution of this Warre, which was chiefly bent against the Athenians, the Princes of Persia were diuided in opinion. Mardanius, who had formerly commaunded in Thrace and Macedon, vnder Darius, and had also Hyaspes for his grandfather, as Xerxes had, and married Xerxes his sister Artocostres, perswaded by many arguments the European warre. But Artabanus, brother to the late Darius, and vncle to Xerxes, maintained the contrarie counsell, laying before Xerxes the lamentable and ridiculous successe of the two late inuasions, which Darius had made contrarie to his counsell: The one in person vpon the Scythians, the other by his Lientenants vpon the Greekes; in each of which Darius left to his enemies both his Armie and his honour.

He therefore besought Xerxes to be right well aduised before he did too farre imbarke himselfe in this businesse. For whatsoeuer vnder-taking hath deliberate and sound counsell for conductor, though the successe doe not alwayes answer the probability, yet hath Fortune nothing else thereof to vaunt, than the variableness of her owne nature, which only the diuine Providence, and not any humane power, can conſtraine.

But so obſtinate was the resolution of Xerxes in prosecution of his former intent, that Artabanus, whether terrified by Visions (as it is written of him) or fearing the Kings hatred, which hee made knowne to all those that opposed his desire to this Warre (changing opinion & counsell) assisted the Graecian Expedition with all the power he had.

After the Warre of Aegypt was ended, foure yeeres were consumed in describing and gathering an Armie for this inuasion: which being compounded of all Nations subiect to the Persian Empire, consisted of ſeuenteene hundred thousand foot, and eightie thousand horsemen, besides Chariots, Camels, and other Beasts for Carriage, if we may beleene Herodotus: for of this multitude, Trogus findes the number lesse by ſeuene hundred thousand footmen.

The Commaunders of the ſeuerrall Nations were the Princes of the bloud of Persia, either by marriage in the Kings house, or otherwise: for to these were all commaundements of this nature giuen, some few people excepted, who had of their owne leaders.

The charge of the whole Armie was bestowed on Mardanius, the sonne of Gabryas by a sister of Darius, to whom were joynd some others of Xerxes his neereſt kindred, as Generals ouer all; sauing that the charge of tenne thousand ſeleſt Persians called the immortal Regiment (because if any one of the whole number died or were slaine, there was another presently chosen in his stead) was giuen to Hydarnes; the eighty thousand horsemen were led by the sonnes of Darius, who commanded the late Armie of Darius in Greece.

The Fleet of Gallies were two thousand two hundred and eight, furnished by the Phenicians, who had Commanders of their owne Nation, and by the Cypriotes, Cilicians, Pamphilians, Lycians, Dorians, Carians, Ionians, Aeolians, and Hellepontines; who were trusted with the furnishing of their owne Vessels, though commanded by the Princes of Persia, as by Artabanes the sonne of Darius, and others. The rest of the Vessels for transportation were three thousand. There were also certaine Gallies furnished by Artemisia, the daughter of Lygdamis, Prince of Sadyrnassus, and the Islands adjoining, which her selfe commanded. These Gallies by her prepared and furnished, exceeded all the rest of the Fleet, excepting those of Zidon, in which Xerxes himselfe was imbarcked.

§. II.

XERXES Armie entertained by PYTHIUS: His cutting off Mount Athos from the Continent: his bridge of Boates over the Hellespont: and the discourse betwene him and ARTABANVS upon the view of his Armie.

hen this world of an Armie was thoroughly furnished, he caused all the Nations of which it was compounded, to make their Rendez-vous and repair at Sardis in Lydia. And when hee had assembled to the number of seuentene hundred thousand foot, as he entred the body of Chelone, he was by one Pythius the Lydian entertained, who out of his Flocks and Herds of Cattell gaue food to Xerxes and his whole Armie. The Feast ended, hee also presented him with two thousand Talents of siluer, and in Gold foure Millions, wanting seuen thousand of the Persian Darius, which make so many of our markes.

The King overcome with the exceeding liberalitie of Pythius, did not only refuse his treasure offered, but commanded that seuen thousand Dariis should be giuen him to make vp his foure Millions; of which, so many thousands were wanting when he made the present. But soone after, when Pythius belought him to spare one of his five sonnes from his attendance into Greece (because himselfe was old, and had none whom he could so well trust as his owne sonne) Xerxes most barbarously caused the young man, for whom his father sought exemption, to be sundred into two parts, commanding, that the one halfe of his carcase should be layd on the right, and the other halfe on the left hand of the common way by which the Armie marched.

Two things he commanded to be done before he came to the Sea side. The one was a passage for Gallies to be cut behind Mount Athos, making the same (which the halfe Island or Headland, whereon it stood) to be an entire Island, fundering thereby from the Continent of Thrace five Cities, besides the Mountaine and the Chersonesus or Necke of Land it selfe a worke of more ostentation than of vyle, and yet an enterprise of no great wonder, the Valley which held it to the Continent hauing but twelue furlongs (which make about a mile and halfe) to cut through, and the ditch being broad enough onely for two Gallies to passe in front. The Cities so seuered from the maine, were Dion, Olophyxus, Acrothoon, Thylus, and Cleone.

He also gaue order, that a Bridge vpon Boats should be made over the Hellespont betwene Abidos and Sestos, the Sea there hauing a yle of breadth, wanting an eight part; which after the finishing, was by a Tempest torne asunder and disfigured: where with Xerxes being more enraged than discouraged, commanded those to be slaine that were masters of the worke, and caused fixe hundred three score and foure score foure score Gallies to be coupled together, thereon to frame a new Bridge; which by the art and indultry of the Phenicians was so well anchored to resist both winds blowing into and from the Euxine Sea, as the same being well boorded and rayled, the whole Armie of seuentene hundred thousand foot, and foure score thousand Horse, with all the Moyles and Carriages, pass ouer it into Europe in seuen daies and seuen nights, without intermission. This transportation of Armies did Caesar afterward vse. And Caligula that mad Emperour, in imitation of Xerxes his Bridge, did build the like.

The Bridge finished, and the Armie brought neere to the Sea side, Xerxes tooke a view of all his Troupes, assembled in the Plains of Abidos, being carried vp, and seated on a place ouer-topping the Land round about it, and the Sea adjoining: and after he had gloried in his owne happinesse, to behold and command so many Nations, and so powerfull an Armie and Fleet, he suddenly (notwithstanding) burst out into teares, moued with this contemplation, That in one hundred yeeres there should not any one suruive of that marvellous multitude: the cause of which sudden change of passion when he vttered to Artabanus his vncle, Artabanus spake to the King to this effect: That which is more lamentable than the dissolution of this great Troupe within that number of yeeres by the King remembered is, That the life it selfe which we enioy is yet more miserable than the end thereof: for in those few daies giuen vs in the world, there is no man among all these, nor elsewhere, that euer found himselfe to accompany with happinesse, but that he oftentimes pleased himselfe better with the desire and hope of death, than of liuing; the incident calamities, diseases, and sorowes whereto mankind is subiect, being so many and inuitable, that the shortest life doth oftentimes appeare vnto vs ouerlong; to auoide all which, there is neither refuge nor rest but in desired death alone.

With this melancholy discourse, Xerxes being not much pleased, prayed Artabanus not to ouer-cast those ioyes which they had now in pursuit with sad remembrances. And holding til a doubtful conceit, that Artabanus utterly condemned the inuasion of Greece, against which he had formerly giuen many strong reasons, desired him to deale freely with him, Whether he were returned to his first resolution, that the enterprise of Greece could not be prosperous? Or whether, according to the change of mind put into him by his late Vision, he was confident of good success? Artabanus, notwithstanding that he assured himselfe of the Kings resolution to go on, and dared not by any new Arguments to batter the great purpose it selfe, yet he told the King, That there were two things which marvellously affrighted him, and which the King should finde, as he feared, to be most aduers; to wit, the Sea and the Land. The Sea, because it had no where in that part of the world any Port capable of so great a Fleet: in so much, as if any tempest should arise, all the Continent of Greece could hardly receive them, nor all the Hauens thereof afford them any shelter: and therefore when such shelter shall bee wanting vnto them, he prayed him to vnderstand, that in such a case of extremity, men are left to the will and disposition of Fortune, and not Fortune to the will and disposition of men. The Land, besides other incommodities, will be found by so much the more an enemy, by how much the vnsatiate desire of man to obtaine more and more thereof, doth leade him forward: for were there no man found to giue resistance, yet the want of meates to feede such an Army, and the Famine, which cannot be prevented, will without any other violence offered disfigure and consume it. By these Arguments Artabanus hoped to haue diuerted Xerxes, not daring perchance to vtter what indeed he most feared; to wit, the ouerthrow of the Armie it selfe both by Sea and Land, which soone after followed. These Cautions were exceedingly weightie, if Xerxes his obstinacie had not misperfed them. For to inuade by Sea vpon a perillous Coast, being neither in possession of any Port, nor secured by any party, may better fit a Prince presuming on his fortune, than enriched with vnderstanding.

derilanding. Such was the enterprife of Philip the second, vpon England in the yeere 1588. who had belike neuer heard of this Counsell of Artabanus to Xerxes, or forgotten it.

Now concerning the second point, it was veric likely, that Xerxes his Armie, which could not haue lesse in it than two millions of Soules, besides his beastes for Seruice and Carriage, should after a few dayes suffer famine, and vsing Macchabeus words, Mourire sans coustee; die without a knife. For it was impossible for Greece, being a ragged, strait and mountainous Countrey, to yeeld food (besides what serued themselves) for twenty hundred thousand strangers, whom they neuer meant to entertaine but with the sharpened points of their weapons, destroying withall whatsoeuer they could not well inclose and defend. Nay, if we may belecue Herodotus, the Armie of Xerxes, being reviewed at Thermopylae, consisted of fife millions, two hundred eightie three thousand, two hundred twentie men, besides Laundresses, Harlots and Horses, and was therefore likely to endure a speedy famine.

The effect of Xerxes his answer was, That it was impossible to provide for all things; and that whofoeuer should enterprife any great matter, if he gaue the hearing to all that could be objected of accidental inconueniences, hee should neuer pursue the same farther, than the dispute and consultation: which if his Predecessors, the Persian Kings, had done, they had neuer growne to that greatnesse, or possessed so many Kingdomes and Nations as now they did, and therefore concluded, That great enterprises were neuer undertaken without great perils. Which resolution of Xerxes was not to be condemned, if any necessity had enforced him to that warre. But seeing the many Nations newly conquered, which hee already commanded, were more than could be constrained to obedience any longer than the powerfull prosperity of the Persians endured, and that Greece was separated by the Sea from the rest of Xerxes Dominions (of whose resolution his father Darius had made a deare experience) the fruit of this warre was answerable to the plantation, and the successfull and endurable to the weake counsell whereon it was grounded. Furthermore, those millions of men which he transported, and yet in his owne judgement not sufficient (for he gathered in marching on, all the strength of Thrace and Macedon) were an argument, that he rather hoped to feare the Greekes by the fame of his numbers, than that he had any confidence in their valour and resolution, whom he conducted. For it is wisely said of those vncountable multitudes: Non vires habent sed pondus, & impedimenta potius sunt quam auxilium; They are great in bulke, but weake in force, and rather a luggage than an aide.

Besides, as it was impossible to marshal such a world of men in one Armie, so the diuers Nations, speaking diuers languages, bred the same confusion among the Persian commanders when they came to fight, as it did to the builders of Babel, when they came to towne. Whereas if Xerxes had of his fife millions compounded tenne Armies of fiftie thousand chosen souldiers in each, and sent them yeerely into Greece well victualled and furnished, he had eyther prepayled by the sword, or forced them to forsake their territory, or brought them in obedience by necessity and famine, which cannot be resisted. But while Xerxes, resolved to cut down the banks of Greece, and to let in a sea of men vpon them, he was deceived both in his owne hopes, and in their hearts whom he employed, and beaten by the Greekes, both by Land and Sea; yea, he himselfe, conducted by his feare, fled shamefully into Asia. A great part of his Armie was buried in Greece: the remainder whereof, which wintered in Thessalie, and led by Mardonius, who perswaded the Enterprife, was in the Summer following vterly defeated, and himselfe slaine.

§. III.

§. III.

Of the fights at Thermopylae and Artemisium.

After such time as Xerxes had transported his Armie ouer the Helle-spont, and landed in Thrace, (leaving the description of his passage as long as that Coast, and how the River of Lissus was drunke drie by his multitudes, and the Lake nere to Pissyrus by his cattell, with other accidents in his marches towards Greece) I will speake of the encounters he had, and the shamefull and incredible ouerthrowes which he receiued: As first at Thermopylae, a narrow passage of halfe an acre of ground, lying between the Mountains which diuide Thessalie from Greece, where sometime the Phocians had rayled a wall with gates, which was then for the most part ruined. At this entrance Leonidas, one of the Kings of Sparta, with three hundred Lacedemonians, assisted with one thousand Tegeates and Mantheans, one thousand Aradians, and other Peloponnesians, to the number of three thousand one hundred in the whole, besides one thousand Phocians, four hundred Thebans, seven hundred Thepians, and all the forces (such as they were) of the bordering Locrians, defended the passage two whole daies together against that huge Armie of the Persians. The valour of the Greekes appeared so excellent in this defence, that in the first dayes fight, Xerxes is said to haue three times leaped out of his Throne, fearing the destruction of his Armie by one handfull of those men, whom not long before he had vterly despised: and when the second dayes attempt vpon the Greekes had prooued vaine, hee was altogether ignorant how to proceede further, and so might haue continued, had not a run-agate Grecian taught him a secret way, by which part of his Armie might ascend the ledge of Mountains, and set vpon the backs of those who kept the Straits. But when the most valiant of the Persian Armie had almost inclosed the small forces of the Greekes, then did Leonidas, King of the Lacedemonians, with his three hundred, and seven hundred Thepians, which were all that abode by him, refuse to quit the place which they had undertaken to make good, and with admirable courage not onely resist that world of men which charged them on all sides; but issuing out of their strength, made so great a slaughter of their enemies, that they might well bee called vanquishers, though all of them were slaine vpon the place. Xerxes hauing lost in this last fight, together with twentie thousand other Souldiers and Captaines, two of his owne brethren, began to doubt what inconuenience might befall him by the vertue of such as had not bene present at these batailles, with whome hee knew that hee shortly was to deale. Especially of the Spartans he stood in great feare, whose manhood had appeared singular in this trial, which caused him very carefully to enquire what numbers they could bring into the field. It is reported of Dioneces the Spartan, that when one thought to haue terrified him by saying, That the flight of the Persian arrows was so thicke as would hide the Sunne: he answered thus; It is very good news: for then shall we fight in the coole shade.

Such notable resolution hauing as freely bene expressed in deedes, as it was uttered in words, caused the Persian to stand in great doubt, when he heard that the Citie of Sparta could arme well-nigh eight thousand men of the like temper, and that the other Lacedemonians, though inferior to those, were very valiant men. Wherefore he asked counsell of Demaratus, a banished King of the Spartans, who had alwaies well aduised and instructed him in the things of Greece, what course were fittest to bee taken in his further proceedings. The opinion of Demaratus was, That all the Land-forces would assemble together to defend the isthmus, that straight necke of ground which joyneth Peloponnesus to the Continent. For which cause he aduised, That three hundred shippes well manned should be sent vnto the Coast of Laconia, to spoyle the Countrey, and to hold the Lacedemonians and neigh-

neighbours bulied at home; whilst Xerxes at his leasure having subdued the reit, might afterward bring his whole power vpon them, who remaining destitute of succour, would be too weak alone to make resistance. To this purpose also the same Demaratus further aduised, that the said fleet of three hundred ships should seize vpon the Island then called Cythera, now Cerigo, which lying neere to the Coast of Laconia, might serue as a fit place of Rendezvous vpon all occasions either of their own defence or endamaging the enemy: whereby that ancient speech of Chilon the Lacedemonian should be verified, that it were better for his Countre-men to haue that Ile drowned in the sea, than stand so inconveniently as for them it did. What effect this counsell might haue taken had it been followed it is not easie to guesse. But a contrarie opinion of Achamenes brother to King Xerxes was preferred as the safer. For the Persian fleet had bin sorely vexed with a grieuous tempest which continued three whole dayes together, wherein were lost vpon the coast of Magnesia foure hundred ships of war, besides other vessels innumerable, accordingly as Artabanus had foretold, that if any such calamity should ouertake them, there would not be found any Harbor wide enough to giue them succour. Therefore Achamenes perswaded his brother not to disperse his fleet; for if (said he) after the losse of foure hundred shippes we shall send away other three hundred to seeke adventures, then will the Greekes be strong enough by sea to encounter the rest of the Naue, which holding altogether is invincible. To this counsell Xerxes yielded, hoping that his Land-armie and fleet should each of them stand the other good stead, whilst both held one course, and lay not farre asunder. But herein he was farre deceived; for about the same time that his armie had felt the valour of the Greekes by Land, his Naue likewise made a sorrowfull prooue of their skill and courage at Sea. The Grecian fleet lay at that time at Artemisium in the straits of Euboea, where the Persians thinking to incompass them, sent two hundred sayle about the Island to fall vpon them behind, wing a like stratagem to that which their King did practise against Leonidas in a case not vnlike, but with far different successe. For that narrow channell of the sea which diuideth Euboea from the maine, was in the same sort held by a Nauy of two hundred threecore and eleuen sayle against the huge Persian Armada, as the straits of Thermopylae had formerly been maintained by Leonidas; till he was so circumvented as this Naue might haue been, but was not. The departure of those two hundred ships that were sent about the Island, and the cause of their voiage, was too well knowne in the Persian fleet, and soone enough disclosed to the Greekes, who setting saile by night, met them with a counter-surprise, taking and sinking thirtie vessels, inforcing the rest to take the Sea, where being ouertaken with foule weather, they were driven vpon the rocks & cast alway. Contrariwise, the Naue of the Greekes was increased by the arrivall of fiftie three Athenian ships, and one Leonian, which came to their partie in the last fight. As these new forces encouraged the one side: so the feare of Xerxes his displeasure stirred vp the other to redeme their losse with some notable exploit. Wherefore setting aside their vnfortunate policie, they resolved in plaine fight to repaire their honour, and casting themselves into the forme of a Crescent, thought so to inclose the Greekes, who readily did present them battell at Artemisium.

The fight endured from noone till night, and ended with equall losse to both parts. For though more of the Persians ships were sunke and taken, yet the lesser losse fell altogether as heauie vpon the Greekish fleet, which being small could worfe beare it. Herein onely the Barbarians may seeme to haue had the worke, that they forooke the place of fight, leauing the wracke and spoiles to the enemy, who neuertheless were faine to abandon presently even the passage which they had vnderaken to defend, both for that many of their ships were sorely crulst in the battail, and especially because they had receiued aduertisement of the death of Leonidas at Thermopylae. Before they waied anchors, Themistocles general of the Athenians engraued vpon stone at the watering place an exhortation to the Ionians, that either they should reuolt vnto the Greekes or stand neutrall; which perswasion, he hoped would either take some place with them, or at the least make them suspected by the Persians.

§. IIII.

The attempt of Xerxes vpon APOLLOE's temple: and his taking of Athens.

When Xerxes had passed the straits of Thermopylae, he wasted the country of the Phocians, and the regions adioyning: as for the inhabitants, they chose rather to flie, and referre themselves to a day of battell, than to aduerture their liues into his hands, vpon hope of sauing their wealth by making proffer vnto him of their seruice. Part of his armie he sent to spoile the temple of Delphi; which was exceeding rich by means of many offerings that had there bene made by diuers Kings and great personages; Of all which riches it was thought that Xerxes had a better Inuentorie than of the goods left in his owne Palace. To make relation of a great astonishment that fell vpon the companies which arriued at the Temple to haue sacked it, and of two Rocks, that breaking from the mount Parnassus, ouerwhelmed many of the Barbarians, it were peradventure somewhat superstitious. Yet Herodotus, who liued not long after, saith, That the broken Rocks remained euen to his memorie in the Temple of Minerva, whither they rowled in their fall. And surely this attempt of Xerxes was impious; for seeing hee beleued that Apello was a god, hee should not haue dared to entertaine a couetous desire of enriching himselfe by committing sacriledge vpon his Temple. Wherefore it may possibly be true, that licence to chastise his impietie, in such manner as is reported, was granted vnto the Diuel, by that Holy one, who saith, Will a man spoile his gods? and elsewhere, Haue any nation changed their gods, which yet are no gods? Go to the Iles of Kittim, and behold, and send to Ke-

Malac. c. 23. v. 24. Ierem. c. 2. v. 9, 10.

der, and take diligent heed, and see whether there be any such things. Now this impietie of Xerxes was the more inexcusable, for that the Persians alledged the burning of Cybeles Temple by the Athenians, when they set fire on the Citie of Sardis in Asia, to be the ground and cause of the waite which they made in burnings of Cities and Temples in Greece. Whereas indeed, in the enterprize against Delphos, this Vizzor of holy and zealous reuenge falling off, discovered the face of couetousnesse so much the more vglie, by how much the more themselves had professed a detestation of the offence which the Athenians had committed in that kind by mere mischance.

The remainder of that which Xerxes did, may be expressed briefly thus: He came to Athens, which finding forsaken, he took & burnt the Cittadel & temple which was therein. The Cittadel indeed was defended a while by some of more courage than wisdom, who literally interpreting Apello's Oracle; that Athens should be safe in wooden walls, had fortified that place with boords and Palisades: too weake to hold out long, though by their desperate valour so well maintained at the first assault, that they might haue yielded it vpon tolerable conditions, had they not vainely relied vpon the prophetic: whereof (being somewhat obscure) it was wisely done of Themistocles, to make discretion the interpreter, applying rather the words to the present neede, than fashioning the businesse to words.

¶ V.

How THEMISTOCLES the Athenian drew the Greekes to fight at Salamis.

THe Athenians had, before the coming of Xerxes, remooued their wiues and children into Twazene, Agina, & Salamis, not so highly prizing their houses and lands, as they should doe, and the common libertie of Greece. Neuertheless, this great zeale, which the Athenians did shew for the generall good of their Countrey, was ill requited by the other Greekes, who with much labour were hardly intreated to stay for them at Salamis, whilst they remooued their wiues and children out of the Citie. But when the Citie of Athen was taken, it was presently resolved vpon, that they should forsake the Ile of Salamis, and with-draw the fleet to Isthmus: which neck of land they did purpose to fortifie against the Persians, and so to defend Peloponnesus by Land, and Sea, leaving the rest of Greece, as indefensible, to the furie of the enimie. So should the Ilands of Salamis and Agina haue bene abandoned, and the Families of the Athenians (which were there bestowed as in places of securitie) haue bene giuen ouer to mercilesse bondage. Against this resolution Themistocles, Admirall of the Athenian fleet, very strongly made opposition; but in vaine. For the Peloponnesians were so possessed with feare of losing their owne, which they would not hazard, that no persuasions could obtaine of them, to regard the estate of their distressed friends and Allies. Many remonstrances Themistocles made vnto them, to allure them to abide the enimie at Salamis; As first in priuate vnto Eurybiades the Lacedemonian, Admirall of the whole fleet; That the selfe same feare which made them forsake those coasts of Greece, vpon which they then anchored, would afterward (if it found no check at the first) cause them also to disseuer the fleet, and euerie one of the Confederates to with-draw himselfe to the defence of his owne Citie and estate: Then to the Councell of Warre which Eurybiades vpon this motion did call together (forbearing to object what want of courage might worke in them hereafter) he shewed that the fight at Isthmus would be in an open Sea, whereas it was more expedient for them, hauing the fewer ships, to determine the matter in the Straights; and that, besides the safeguard of Agina, Megara, and Salamis, they should by abiding, where they then were, sufficiently defend Isthmus, which the Barbarians should not so much as once looke vpon, if the Greekes obtained victorie by sea; which they could not so well hope for else where, as in that present place which gaue them so good advantage. All this would not serue to retaine the Peloponnesians, of whom one, vnworthe of memorie, ybraided Themistocles with the losse of Athen, blaming Eurybiades for suffering one to speake in the Councell, that had no Countrey of his owne to inhabit. A base and shamefull obiection it was, to lay as a reproch that losse, which being voluntarily sustained for the common good, was in true estimation by so much the more honourable, by how much it was the greater. But this indignitie did exasperate Themistocles, and put into his mouth a reply so sharpe, as auailed more than all his former persuasions. Hee told them all plainly, That the Athenians wanted not a fairer Citie, than any Nation of Greece could boast of; hauing well-neere two hundred good ships of Warre, the better part of the Grecian fleet, with which it was easie for them to transport their Families and substance into any part of the World, and settle themselves in a more secure habitation, leaving those to shift as well as they might, who in their extremitie had refused to stand by them. Herewithall he mentioned a towne in Italie belonging of old to the State of Athen, of which towne hee said an Oracle had fore-told, That the Athenians in proceesse of time should build it a-new, and there (quoth he) will we plant our selues, leauing vnto you a sorrowful remembrance of my words, and

and of your owne vnthankfulness. The Peloponnesians hearing thus much, began to enter into better consideration of the Athenians, whose affaires depended not, as they well perceiued, vpon so weak terms, that they should bee driuen to crouch to others; but rather were such, as might inforce the rest to yeeld to them, and defende euen to the vttermost of their owne demands.

For the Athenians, when they first embraced that Heroical resolution of leaving their grounds and houses to fire and ruine, if necessarie should inforce them so far, for the preservation of their libertie; did imploy the most of their priuate wealth, and all the common treasure, in building a great Nauie. By these means they hoped (which accordingly fell out) that no such calamitie should befall them by land, as might not well be counterpoised by great advantages at sea: Knowing well, that a strong fleet would either procure victorie at home, or a secure passage to any other Countreys. The other States of Greece held it sufficient, if building a few new ships, they did somewhat amend their Nauie. Whereby it came to passe, that, had they been vanquished, they could not haue expected any other fortune than either present death, or perpetuall slavery; neither could they hope to be victorious without the assistance of the Athenians, whose forces by sea did equall all theirs together; the whole consisting of more than three hundred and fourescore bottomes. Wherefore these Peloponnesians beginning to suspect their owne condition, which would haue stood vpon desperate points, if the fleet of Athen had forsaken them; were some perswaded, by the greater feare of such a bad euent, to forget the lesse, which they had conceiued of the Persians; and laying aside their former brauerie, they yeelded to that most profitable counsaile of abiding at Salamis.

¶ VI.

How the Persians consulted about giuing battaile: and how THEMISTOCLES by policy held the Greekes to their resolution; with the victorie at Salamis thereupon ensuing.

IN the meane season the Persians had entred into consultation, whether it were conuenient to offer battell to the Greekes, or no. The rest of the Captains giuing such aduice as they thought would best please the King their Master, had soon agreed vpon the fight; but Artemisia Queene of Halicarnassus, who followed Xerxes to this war in person, was of contrarie opinion. Her Counsell was, that the King himselfe directly should march toward Peloponnesus, whereby it would come to passe, that the Greeke Nauie (vnable otherwise to continue long at Salamis for want of prouision) should presently be disseuered, and euerie one seeking to preserve his owne Citie and goods, they should, being diuided, proue vnable to resist him, who had wonne so far vpon them when they held together. And as the profit will bee great in forbearing to giue battell; so on the other side, the danger will bee more (said shee) which we shall vnder-goe, than any need requireth vs to adventure vpon; and the losse in case it fall vpon vs, greater than the profit of the victory which we desire. For if we compell the enemies to flee, it is more than they would haue done, we sitting still: but if they, as better Sea-men than ours, put vs to the worst, the iourney to Peloponnesus is utterly dashed, and many that now declare for vs, will soone resolue vnto the Greekes. Mardonius, whom Xerxes had sent for that purpose to the fleet, related vnto his Master the common consent of the other Captaines, & withall this disagreeing opinion of Artemisia. The King well pleased with her aduice, yet resolved vpon following the more generall, but farre-worse counsaile of the rest; which would questionlesse haue bene the same which Artemisia gaue, had not feare and flatterie made all the Captaines vtter that, as out of their owne iudgement, which they

they thought most conformable to their Princes determination. So it was indeede that Xerxes had entertained a vaine persuasion of much good, that his owne presence vpon the shore to behold the conflict, would worke among the Souldiers. Therefore he incamped vpon the Sea-side, pitching his owne Tent on the mount Ægaleus, which is opposit vnto the Ile of Salamis, whence at ease hee might safely view all which might happen in that action, hauing Scribes about him to write downe the acts and behaviour of euery Capitaine. The neere approach of the Barbarians, together with the newes of that timorous diligence, which their Countreymen shewed in fortifying the Isthmus, and of a Persian Armie, marching apace thither, did now againe so terrifie and amaze the Peloponnesians, that no intreatie, nor contellation would suffice to hold them together. For they thought it meere madness to fight for a Countrey already lost, when they rather should endeavour to saue that which remained vnconquered; propounding chiefly to themselves what miserie would befall them, if losing the victorie, they should be driuen into Salamis, there to be shut vp, and besieged round in a poore desolate land.

Hereupon they resolu'd forth-with to set saile for Isthmus: which had presently bene done, if the wisdome of Themistocles had not prevented it. For he perceiving what a violent feare had ropt vp their eares against all good counsaile, did practise another course, & forth-with labour to prevent the execution of this vnwholsome decree; not suffering the very houre of performance to find him busie in wrangling alteration. As soone as the Councell brake vp, hee dispatched secretly a trustie Gentleman to the Persian Capitaines, informing them truly of the intended flight, and exhorting them to send part of their Naue about the Island, which incompassing the Greekes, might prevent their escape, giuing them withall a false hope of his assistance. The Persians no sooner heard than belueued these good newes, well knowing that the victorie was their owne assured, if the Athenian fleet ioyned with them; which they might easily hope, considering what abilitie their Master had to recompence for so doing, both the Capitaines with rich rewards, and the People with restitution of their Citie, and Territories. By these means it fell out, that when the Greekes very early in the morning were about to waigh Anchor, they found themselves inclosed round with Persians, who had laboured hard all night, sending many of their ships about the Ile of Salamis, to charge the enemy in reare, and landing many of their men in the Ile of Psittalea, which lyeth ouer-against Salamis, to saue such of their owne, and kill such of the Græcian partie, as by any misfortune should be cast vpon the shore. Thus did meere necessitie enforce the Greekes to vndertake the battaile in the Straights of Salamis, where they obtained a memorable victorie, stemming the foremost of their enemies, and chasing the rest, who falling foule one vpon another, could neither conveniently fight nor flee. I do not finde any particular occurrences in this great battaile to be much remarkable. Sure it is that the Scribes of Xerxes had a wearisome taske of writing downe many disasters that befell the Persian fleet, which ill acquitted it selfe that day, doing no one peece of seruice worthe the presence of their King, or the registering of his Notaries. As for the Greekes, they might wel seeme to haue wrought out that victorie with equall courage, were it not that the principall honour of that day was ascribed to those of Ægina, and to the Athenians, of whom it is recorded, That when the Barbarians did flee towards Phalerus, where the Land-armie of Xerxes lay, the ships of Ægina hauing possessed the Straights, did sink or take them, whilst the Athenians did valiantly giue charge vpon those that kept the Sea, and made any countenance of resisting.

Of things following after the battaile of Salamis: and of the flight of XERXES.

After this victorie, the Greekes intending, by way of securitie, to determine which of the Capitaines had bene merited of them, in all this great seruice; euery Capitaine, being ambitious of that honour, did in the first place write downe his owne name, but in the second place as best deseruing next vnto himselfe, almost euery Suffrage did concur vpon Themistocles. His priuate affection yielded vnto vertue, as soon as her own turne was serued. The Persian King, as not amazed with this calamitie, began to make new preparation for continuance of warre; but in such fashion, that they which were best acquainted with his temper, might easily discern his faint heart, through his painted looks. Especially Mardonius, Author of the warre, began to cast a wari' eye vpon his Master, fearing lest his counsell should be rewarded according to the euent. Wherefore purposing rather to aduenture his life in pursuit of the victorie, than to cast it away by vnder-going his Princes indignation; he aduised the King to leaue vnto him three hundred thousand men, with which forces he promised to reduce all Greece vnder the subiection of the Persian Scepter. Herewithall he forgot not to sooth Xerxes with many faire words; telling him, that the cowardise of those Egyptians, Phenicians, and Cilicians, with others of the like metall, nothing better than slaues, who had so ill bebaued themselves in the late Sea-seruice, did not concerne his honour, who had alwaies been victorious, and had already subdued the better part of Greece, yea taken Athens it selfe, against which the Warre was principally intended. These words found very good acceptance in the Kings eare, who presently betooke himselfe to his journey homewards, making the more haste, for that he vnderstood, how the Greekes had a purpose to saile to Hellepont, and therto to breake downe his bridge, and intercept his passage. True it was that the Greekes had no such intent, but rather wished his hastie departure, knowing that hee would leaue his Armie not so strong, as it should haue bene, had he in person remained with it. And for this cause did Eurybiades giue counsel, that by no means they should attempt the breaking of that bridge, lest necessitie should enforce the Persians to take courage, and rather to fight like men, than die like beasts. Wherefore Themistocles did, vnder pretence of friendship, send a false aduertisement to this timorous Prince, aduising him to conuay himselfe into Asia with all speed, before his bridge were discolued: which counsell Xerxes tooke verie kindly, and hastily followed, as before is shewed. Whether it were so that hee found the bridge whole, and thereby repassed into Asia; or whether it were in sunder by tempests, and he thereby driuen to imbarke himselfe in some obscure vessel, it is not greatly materiall; though the Greekes did most willingly embrace the later of these reports. Howsoeuer it were, this flight of his did well ease the Countrey; that was thereby disburdened of that huge throng of people, which, as Locusts, had before ouerwhelmed it.

§. VIII.

The negotiations betwene Mardonius and the Athenians, as also betwene the Athenians and Lacedæmonians, after the flight of XERXES.

*M*ARDONIUS with his three hundred thousand had withdrawn himselfe into Thessalie, whence he sent Alexander, the sonne of Amintas King of Macedonia, as Embassadour to the Athenians, with promise of large amends for all their losses receiued; and of extending their Territories as farre as their owne desires; allowing them to retaine the their libertie and lawes, if they would make peace with Xerxes, and assist him in that Warre.

The Athenians had now reentred their Citie, but not as yet brought backe their wives and children; for as much as they well perceived that the place could not be secure, till the Armie of Mardonius were broken and defeated. Wherefore the Lacedemonians, vnderstanding what faire conditions this Embassadour would propound, were perplexed with very great feare, lest hee should finde good and ready acceptance. Hereupon, they likewise very speedily dispatched their Embassadours for Athens, who arriving, before the Macedonian had audience, vsed the best of their perswasion to retaine the Athenians firme. They alleadged, that neither Xerxes 10 nor Darius had any pretence of Warre against the rest of Greece, but had onely threatned the subuersion of Athens, till they and all their Confederates arming themselves in defence of that Citie, were drawne into the quarrell, wherein the Athenians without much crueltie of iniustice could not leaue them. Wee know, said they, that yee haue endured great calamities, losing the fruit of the grounds, and being driuen to forsake the Towne, the houses whereof bee ruined, and vnfit for your habitation; in regard whereof, we vnderstand to maintaine as our owne, your wives and children amongst vs, as long as the war shall continue, hoping that yee, who haue alwaies procured libertie to others, will not now goe about to bring all Greece into slaue and bondage. As for the Barbarians, their promises are large, but their words and oathes are of no assurance. It was needlesse to vse many argu- 20 ments to the Athenians, who gaue answer to Alexander in presence of the Spartan Embassadours; That whilest the Sunne continued his course, they would be enemies to Xerxes, regarding neither gold nor any riches, with which he might seek to make purchase of their libertie. Concerning the maintenance of their wives and children, it was a burden which they promised to sustaine themselves, only desiring the Lacedemonians; that with all speede they would cause their Armie to march, for as much as it was not likely, that Mardonius would long sit still in Thessalie, hauing once receiued such a peremptorie answer. In this their opinion of Mardonius his readinesse to invade Attica, they found themselves nothing deceived. For hee, as 30 soone as Alexander had returned their obstinate purpose of resistance, did forthwith leade his Armie towards them, and their Citie: they hauing now the second time quitted it, and conveyed themselves into places of more securitie abroad in the Countrie, where they expected the arriuall of their Confederates.

From Athens he sent his Agent vnto them with instructions, not only to perswade them to acceptance of the conditions before to them propounded, but with great promises to allure the principall of them to his partie. His hope was that either the people, wearied with forsaking their houses so often, would be desirous to preserve them from fire, and to haue those which were already laid waste, reedified at the Kings charges: Or if this affection took no place with them, but that needes they 40 would relie vpon their old Confederates, whose succours did very slowly aduance forwards, yet perhaps the Leaders might bee wonne with great rewards, to draw them to this purpose; all which projects if they should faile, the destruction of Athens would be a good meane to please his Master, King Xerxes, who must thereby needes vnderstand, that Mardonius kept his ground, and feared not to confront the whole power of Greece, in the strongest part of their owne Countrie. But his expectation was beguiled in all these. For the Athenians so little regarded his offers, that when one Lycidas, or (as Demosthenes calls him) Cyreus, aduised the Senate to accept the conditions, and propound them to the people; all the Senators, and as many as abiding without the Counsaile-house heard what he had said, immediately set vpon him, and stoned him to death; not examining whether it were feare or money, that had moued him to utter such a vile sentence. Yea, the women of Athens, in the Ile of Salamis, hearing of his bad counsaile, and bad end, assembling together, did enter his house there, & put his wife and children to the like execution. All

All this brauerie notwithstanding, when they perceyued the slacknesse of the Peloponnesians in giuing them aide, they were faine to betake themselves to Salamis againe, the old place of their securitie. Remaining there, and seeing little forwardnesse in those whom it most concerned to assist them, they sent verie seuerie messengers to Sparta, complaining of their slacknesse, & threatening withal, to take such course as might stand best with their owne good, seeing that the common estate of all was so little regarded. These messengers were at the first entertained with dilatorie answers, which every day grew colder, when as the Peloponnesian Wall, builded a- 10 thwart the Isthmus, was almost finished. But as the Lacedemonians waxed carelesse and dull, so the Athenians hotely pressed them to a quick resolution, giuing them plainly to vnderstand, that if they should hold on in those dilatorie courses, it would not be long ere the Citie of Athens tooke a new course, that should little please them. All this while the Persian fleet lay vpon the coast of Asia, not daring to draw neerer vnto Greece, as being now too weak at Sea. Likewise the Greekish Nauie contained it selfe within the Harbours vpon Europe side; both to doe seruice where neede should require at home; and withall to thinne the danger which might haue befallen any part of it, that being distracted from the rest, had aduentured ouer far. So mutual feare preferred in quiet the Islands lying in the middle of the Aegean Seas. But it was well and seasonably obserued by a Councilsman of 20 Sparta, that the wall vpon Isthmus would serue to little purpose for the defence of Peloponnesus, if once the Athenians gaue care to Mardonius: considering that many dores would be opened into that Demic-land, as soone as the Enemy should by winning the friendship of Athens, become the Master of the Seas about it. The Lacedemonians vpon this admonition, making better perfall of their owne dangers, were very careful to giue satisfaction to the Athenian Embassadours, who not brooking their delaies, were vpon point of taking leaue, yea as it seemed, of renouncing their alliance. Wherefore dispatching away five thousand Spartans in the evening, vnder conduct of Pausanias, they gaue audience the next day to the Embassadours, whose complaints they answered with vehement protestations of their readinesse; 30 deeply swearing that the Armie of Sparta was already farre vpon the iourney; and giuing them leaue to take vp other five thousand Lacedemonians, out of the Region adioyning, to follow after them.

The Athenians, though distastful such want of grauitie, in a matter so important, were neuertheless contented with the final conclusion; and leuying the number appointed of Lacedemonian Souldiers, made what haste they could to incampe in Attica. The other Graecians were nothing slacke in sending forth Companies, whose neere approach caused Mardonius to forsake Attica as a rough Countrie, and therefore of much disadvantage to Horse, wherein consisted the best of his power. Before his departure he burnt the Citie of Athens, beating downe the wals of it, and rui- 40 ning all that had formerly escaped the fury of Warre.

The great battaile of Plataea.

IT were too long a rehearse to shew all that hapned in many skirmishes betwene the Greekes and him, in the Countrie of Beotia, which Mardonius had chosen to be the place of that Warre. Much time was spent before the quarrell was decided by trial of one maine 50 battaile: for both parties did stand vpon their guard, each expecting when the other should assaile them.

The Armie of Mardonius contained about three hundred thousand, which were by him chosen out of Xerxes his Armie; to whom were adioyned the forces of Thessalies, Macedonie, Thessalie, and other parts of Greece, that now siding with the Persians, furnished furnished his Campe with fiftie thousand men. Against these the Lacedæmonians, Athenians, and their Confederates, had leauied an Armie of one hundred and ten thousand, of which fortie thousand were waightily armed, the rest were only assistants to these fortie thousand, being armed more slightly, as rather to make excursions and giue chase, than to sustaine any strong charges.

These two Armies hauing eleuen daies confronted one the other, without performing any memorable piece of seruice; Mardonius, whose victuals beganne to faile, resolved to begin the fray. The Greekes were promised victorie by an Oracle, if they fought in the Land of the Athenians, and in the plaine of Ceres & Proserpina, making prayers vnto certain gods, Demi-gods, and Nymphs. But it was hard to finde the certaine place which the Oracle deligned. For the plaine of Ceres was indeede in the Territorie of Athens; but there was also an old Temple of Ceres and Proserpina, neere vnto the place where they lay at that time encamped, as likewise the memorials of those Nymphs, and Demi-gods, were in the same place, vpon Mount Cithæron, and the ground serued well for foot-men against horie; onely the Land belonged vnto the Plataens, and not vnto the Athenians.

Whilest the Greekes were perplexed about the interpretation of this doubtful Oracle; the Plataens, to make all cleere, did freely bestow their land on that side the Towne vpon the Athenians.

This magnificence of the Plataens caused Alexander the Great, many ages after, to reedifie their Citie, which was ruined in the Peloponnesian warres.

All things being readie for battaile; the Lacedæmonian Generall thought it most meete, that the Athenians should stand opposite that day to the Medes and Persians, whom they had formerly vanquished at Marathon; and that he, with his Spartans, should entertaine the Thebans and other Greekes which followed Mardonius, as better acquainted with their fight, and hauing beaten them often-times before. This being agreed vpon, the Athenians changed place with the Lacedæmonians; which Mardonius vnderstanding (whether fearing the Athenians, of whose valour the Medes and Persians had felt heauie proofe, or desiring to encounter the Spartans, as thinking them the bravest Souldiers of Greece) hee did also change the order of his battaile, and oppose himselfe to Pausanias. All the Greekes might well perceiue how the Enemy did shift his wings, and Pausanias thereupon returned to his former Station; which Mardonius noting, did also the like. So one whole day was spent in changing to and fro. Some attempt the Persians made that day with their Archers on horse-back, who did so molest the Greekes at their watering place, that they were faine to enter into consultation of retiring; because they could not without much losse to themselves, and none to the enemy, lie neere to that Fountaine which did serue all the Camp. Hauing therefore concluded among themselves to dislodge; and part of the Armie being sent away before day-light: Mardonius perceiued their departure in the morning, and thereupon being encouraged by their flight, (which to him seemed to proceede out of mere cowardise) he charged them in reare with great violence. It may well be recorded as a notable example of patient valor, That the Lacedæmonians being ouer-taken by the Enemies horie, and ouerwhelmed with great flights of Arrowes, did quietly sit stil, not making any resistance or defence, till the Sacrifices for victory were happily ended, though many of them were hurt and slaine, and some of especiall marke lost, before any signe of good successe appeared in the entrailes.

But as soone as Pausanias had found in the Sacrifice those tokens, which the superstition of that Age and Countrey accounted fortunate; hee gaue the Signall of battaile: and therevpon the Souldiers, who till then did sit vpon the ground, as was of their manner, arose altogether, and with excellent courage received the charge of the Barbarians, that came thronging vpon them without any feare of such notable resistance. The rest of the Greece Armie that was in march, being renoked by Pausanias, came in a-pace to succour the Lacedæmonians: onely that part of the Armie

which was led by the Athenians, could not arrive vnto the place of the great battaile, because the Thebans, and other Greekes confederate with the Persians, gaue them checke by the way. Neuerthelesse, the Spartans with other their Assistants, did so well acquite themselves, that the Persians were vanquished, and Mardonius with many thousands more slaine in the field; the rest fledde into the Campe, which they had fortified with wooden walls, and there defended themselves with such courage as desperate necessitie inforced them vnto, holding out the longer, because the Lacedæmonians were not acquainted with the manner of assaulting Fortresses, and Walls. In the meane season, the Athenians hauing found strong opposition of the Thebans and Thessalians, did with much labour and courage obtaine victorie, which hauing not long pursued, they came to helpe the Lacedæmonians, whom they found wearily busied in assaulting the Campe, with more valour than skill. Wherefore they themselves vnder-tooke it, and in short space forced a passage through the Wall, at which breach first, and then on all sides, the Greekes entred with such furie, and iust desire of vengeance, that of three hundred thousand they are said not to haue left three thousand aliuie, excepting those who fled away with Artabazus, when the Persian Armie first fell to rout.

If the execution were so great, as is reported, an especiall cause of it was the foolish retreat, or rather flight into the Campe. For though it were so, that the place was well fortified, and the number of those who calt themselves into it, greater than of the Assailants; yet they being of severall Nations and Languages, and hauing lost their Generall with other principall Commanders, it was vnpossible that they in such a terror and astonishment should make good that piece of ground, lying in the heart of an Enemy Countrey, against an Armie of men, farre more valiant then themselves, and enslaved with present victorie. Therefore the same wall which for a few houres had preserved their liues, by holding out the Enemy, did now impale them, and leave them to the slaughtering furie of vnpitefull Victors. Artabazus fled into Thrace, telling the people of Thessalie, and other Countries in his way, that hee was sent by Mardonius vpon some piece of seruice:
 For hee well knew, that had they vnderstood any thing of that great discomfiture, all places would haue been hostile vnto him, and fought with his ruine to purchase fauour of the vanquishers. Therefore making so large marches, that many of his Souldiers being feeble were left behinde and lost, hee came to Byzantium, whence hee shipped his men ouer into Asia. Such was the end of the vaine-glorious expedition, vnder-taken by Xerxes against the Greekes, vpon hope of honour, and great Conquest, though sorting otherwise, accordingly as Artabazus had fore-seene, and rather worse, for as much as it began the quarrell, which neuer ended, before the ruine of the Persian Empire was effected by that Nation of the Greekes, despised and sought to haue bene brought into slavery. Hereby it may seme, that the vision appearing to Xerxes, was from God himselfe, who had formerly disposed of those things, ordaining the subuersion of the Persian Monarchie by the Greekes, who, thus prouoked, entred into greater consideration of their owne strength, and the weakenesse of their Enemies.

The battaile of Mycale, with a strange accident that fell out in the beginning of it: and examples of the like.

THe same day on which the battaile was fought at Platae, there was another battaile fought at Mycale, a Promontorie, or Head-land in Asia, where the Persian fleet rode.

Leutyches the Spartan, with Xantippus the Athenian, Admiralls of 10 the Greece Naue, at the request of some Ilanders and Ionians, did faile into those parts, to deliuer the Samians, and procure the Ionians to revolt from the Persian. Xerxes himselfe at this time lay at Sardis, a Citie in Lydia, not farre from the Sea-side, hauing left threecore thousand vnder the command of Tigranes for defence of Ionia and the Sea-coast. Therefore when Artyntes and Libramites, Admiralls of the Persian fleet, vnderstood that the Greekes bent their course towards them; they did forth-with draw their ships a-ground, fortifying with Palissades and otherwise, as much ground as did seem needfull for the encamping of al their Land and Sea-forces. Leutyches at his arriual, perceiuing that they meant to keepe 20 within their strength, and refusing to force them out of it, rowed with his Gallie close aboard the shore, and called vpon the Ionians (who more for feare then good wil were encamped among the Persians) exhorting them in the Greece tongue to remember libertie, and vnto the faire occasion which they now had to recouer it. Here- in he did imitate Themistocles, who had done the like at Euboea; trulling that either these persuasions would preuaile, or if the Persians did happen to vnderstand them, that it would breed some ielousie in them, causing them to fight in feare of their owne Companions. It neede not seeme strange, that this very same stratageme, which little or nothing auailed Themistocles, did now very happily succcede. For Xerxes being in his full strength, it was a matter of much difficultie, to perswade those Inhabitants of Asia to revolt; who now, in his declining estate, gaue a willing 30 eare to the sweet sound of libertie. The Persians likewise, who in their former brauerie, little regarded and lesse feared any treason, to be contriued by their Subiects, were now so warie, that from the Samians which were amongst them, they tooke away their armes; the Milesians, whom they did suspect, but would not seeme to mistrust, they placed farre from them, as it were for defence of the straight passages of Mycale; pretending that these Milesians did best of all others know those places. But these deuices little auailed them. For the Samians perceiuing that they were held as Traitors, tooke courage in the heate of the fight, and laying hold vpon such weapons as came to hand, assailed the Persians manfully within the Campe; 40 which example the Ionians presently followed, being very glad to haue found some that durst beginne. It is said that while the Greekes were yet in a march towards the Enemies campe, a rumour suddenly ranne in the Armie, that Mardonius was overthrowne in Greece, which (though perhaps it was giuen out by the Captaines to encourage the Souldiers) was very true. For the battaile of Platae was fought in the morning, and this of Mycale in the euening of the same day.

The like report of that great battaile, wherein Paulus Emilius overthrew Perseus the last king of Macedon, was brought to Rome in foure daies, as Liuius with others doe record. And Plutarch hath many other examples of this kinde. As that of the battaile by the River Sagra in Italie, which was heard of the same day in Peloponnesus: That of the battaile against the Tarquinius and the Latines, presently 50 noised at Rome: And (which is most remarkable) the victorie obtained against Lucius Antonius, who was Rebelle to Domitian the Emperour. This Lucius Antonius being Lieutenant of the higher Germanie, had corrupted his Armie with gifts and promises, promises, drawing the barbarous people to follow him, with great hope to make himselfe Emperour; which newes much troubling the Citie of Rome, with feare of a dangerous Warre; it was suddainly reported that Antonius was slaine, and his Armie defeated.

Hereupon many did offer sacrifice to the gods, and shew all manner of publike ioy, as in such cases was accustomed. But when better inquirie was made, and the Author of these tidings could not be found; the Emperour Domitian betooke himselfe to his journey against the Rebelle; and being with his Armie in march, hee received aduertisement by Post, of the Victorie obtained, and the death of Antonius: whereupon remembering the rumour noised before in Rome, of the selfe-same victorie, hee found that the report and victorie were borne vpon one day, though twentie thousand furlongs (which make about fife and twenty hundred miles) a-funder. It is truly said of Plutarch, that this last example giues credit vnto many the like. And indeede it were very strange, if among so many rumours, begotten by forgerie or mistakings, and fostered by credulous imagination; there should not be found (as happens in dreames among many thousand vaine and frivolous) a fewe precisely true. Howbeit wee may finde, that God himselfe doth sometimes vnto terrifie those who presume vpon their owne strength, by these light meanes of tumultuous noises; as hee raised the siege of Samarita, by causing a 20 sound of Horses and Chariots to affright the Assyrites; and as hee threatened Sennacherib, saying: Behold, I will send a blast vpon him, and hee shall heare a noise, and retorne to his owne Land. Wherefore it may well haue bene true, that God was pleased by such a meane as this, to animate the Greekes; who (as Herodotus notes) went towards the Enemies with heauie hearts, being in great feare, left their owne adventure should by no meanes fall out well; considering in what danger they had left their Countrie of Greece, which was ready to be subdued by Mardonius, whilest they went wandering to seeke out enemies a-far-off, vpon the coast of Asia. But the same of the battaile fought at Platae being noised among them; euery man desired that his owne valour in the present fight, might be some helpe to worke out the 30 full deliuerance of Greece. In this alacritie of spirit, they diuided themselves into two Battalions, whereof the Athenians led the one, by the way of the plaine, directly towards the enemies campe; the Lacedemonians conducted the other, by the Mountaines and straight passages, to winne the higher ground. The Athenians did first set vpon the Campe (ere the Lacedemonians could arriue on the other part) and being desirous to get all the honour of the day to themselves, did so forcibly assault it, that they brake way through the Palissades and Gabions, and made themselves Masters of the place, slaying all that could not saue themselves by flight. In this fight the Samians did good seruice, as is formerly mentioned.

But the Milesians, who vpon the like ielousie, were placed by the Persians on 40 the tops of Mycale, to defend the passages; did now (as if they had bene set of purpose to keepe them from running away) put as many to the sword as fell into their hands, letting none escape, except a very few, that fled through by-patches. The Lacedemonians that day did little seruice, for the businesse was dispatched ere they came in: Only they broke such companies as rettyred in whole troups; making them flee disperfed in very much disorder, whereby the Milesians were enabled to doe the greater execution vpon them. This was the last fight of that huge Armie leauied against Greece, which was now vtterly broken, and had no meanes left to make offensive Warre.

§. XI.

Of the barbarous qualitie of XERXES: with a transition from the Persian affaires to matters of Greece, which from this time grew more wortheie regard.

XERXES lay at Sardis, not farre from the place of this battaile; but little minde had hee to reuenge either this or other his great losses, 10 being wholly giuen ouer to the loue of his Brothers Wife: with whom when he could not preuaile by intreatie, nor would obtaine his desire by force, because he respected much his Brother her husband, hee thought it best to make a match betwene his owne Sonne Darius, and the Daughter of this Woman; hoping by that meanes to finde occasion of such familiaritie as might worke out his desire. But whether it were so, that the chastitie of the Mother did still reiect him, or the beauty of her Daughter allure him; hee soone after fell in loue with his owne Sonnes wife, being a vicious Prince, and as ill able to gouerne himselfe in peace, as to guide his Armie in Warre. This yong Ladie hauing once desired the King to giue her the Garment which hee 20 then wore, being wrought by his owne Wife; caused the Queene thereby to perceiue her husbands conseruation with her, which shee imputed not so much to the beautie of her Daughter-in-law, as to the cunning of the Mother, against whom thereupon shee conceiued extreme hatred. Therefore at a Royall feast, wherein the custome was that the King should grant their request, shee craued that the Wife of Masistes, her husbands Brother, the yong Ladies Mother, might bee giuen into her disposition. The barbarous King, who might either haue reformed the abuse of such a custome, or haue deluded the importunate crueltie of his Wife, by threatening her selfe with the like, to whatsoever shee should inliet vpon the innocent Ladie, granted the request; and sending for 30 his brother, perswaded him to put away the Wife which he had, and take one of his Daughters in her stead. Hereby it seemes, that hee vnderstood how villainously that poore Ladie should be intreated, whom hee knew to bee vertuous, and whom himselfe had loued. Masistes refused to put her away; alleging his owne loue, her deseruing, and their common Children, one of which was married to the Kings Sonne, as reasons important to moue him to keepe her. But in most wicked manner Xerxes reuiled him; saying, That hee now should neither keepe the Wife which hee had, nor haue his Daughter whom hee had promised vnto him. Masistes was much grieued with these wordes, but much more, when returning home, hee found his Wife most butcherly mangled by 40 the Queene Amestris, who had caused her Nose, Lippes, Eares, and Tongue to be cut off, and her Breasts in like manner, which were cast vnto Dogges. Masistes enraged with this villanie, tooke his way with his children, and some Friends, towards Bactria, of which Prouince hee was Gouvernour, intending to rebell and auenge himselfe. But Xerxes vnderstanding his purpose, caused an Armie to be leauied, which cut him off by the way, putting him and all his Company to the sword. Such was the Tyrannicall condition of the Persian Governement; and such are generally the effects of Luxurie, when it is ioyned with absolute power.

Yet of Xerxes it is noted, that hee was a Prince of much vertue. And therefore 50 Alexander the Great, finding an Image of his ouerthrowne, and lying vpon the ground, said, That hee doubted, whether in regard of his vertue, hee should againe erect it, or, for the mischief done by him to Greece, should let it lie.

But surely whatsoever his other good qualities were, hee was foolish, and was a coward, and consequently mercelless.

Therefore wee may firmly beleue, that the vertue of Cyrus was very great, vpon which the foundation of the Persian Empire was so surely laid, that all the wickednesse and vanities of Xerxes, and other worse Princes, could not ouerthrow it, vntill it was broken by a vertue almost equall to that which did establish it. In warres against the Egyptians, the fortune of Xerxes did continue, as at the first it had bene very good; but against the generall estate of Greece, neither hee, nor any of his posteritie, did euer make offensiu warre, but receiued many losses in Asia, to which the last at Myale serued but as an introduction; teaching the 10 Greekes, and especially the Athenians, that the Persian was no better Souldier at his owne doores, than in a forraigne Countrey: whereof good triall was made forth with, and much better proofe as soone as the affaires of Athens were quietly settled and assured.

From this time forward I will therefore pursue the Historie of Greece, taking in the matters of Persia, as also the estate of other Countreies, collaterally, when the order of time shall present them. True it is, that the Persian estate continued in her greatnesse, many Ages following, in such wise that the knowne parts of the World had no other Kingdome, representing the Maiestie of a great Empire.

20 But this greatnesse depended only vpon the riches and power that had formerly bene acquired, yielding few actions or none that were worthy of remembrance, excepting some Tragedies of the Court, and examples of that excessive Luxurie, where-with both it, and all, or the most of Empires that euer were, haue bene enuironed, made vnweldie, and (as it were) fattened for the hungrie swords of poore and hardie Enemies. Hereby it came to passe, that Xerxes and his successours were faine to defend their Crownes with money and base policies; very seldome or neuer (vnlesse it were with great aduantage) daring to aduenture the triall of plaine battaile with that little Nation of Greece, which would soone haue ruined the foundations laid by Cyrus, had not priuate malice and ielousie vrged euery

30 Citie to enuie the height of her Neighbours walls, and thereby diuerted the swords of the Greekes into their owne bowels, which after the departure of Xerxes beganne verry well, and might better haue continued, to hew out the way of conquest, on the side of Asia.

THAT the Medes and Persians had received their last blow, and were utterly beaten at Mycale: Leotychides, who then commanded the Grecian Armie, leaving the pursuit of the warre to the Athenians, assisted by the revolted Iones, returned with the Lacedemonians and other Peloponnesians to Sparta and other places, out of which they had been leauied. The Athenians in the meane while besieged Sestos, a Citie on the strait of the Hellespont, betweene which and Abydos, Xerxes had lately fastned his Bridge of Boats: where the inhabitants, desperate of succour, did not long dispute the defence thereof, but quitted it to the Greekes, who entertained themselves the Winter following on that side the Hellespont. In the Spring they drew homeward, and hauing left their wiues and children, since the inuasion of Attica, and the abandoning of Athens, in diuers Islands, and at Troezen, they now found them out, and returned with them to their owne places.

And though the most part of all their houses in Athens were burnt and broken downe, and the walls of the Citie ouer-turned, yet they resolved first on their common defence, and to fortifie their Citie, before they cared to couer themselves, their wiues and children, with any priuate buildings: Whereof the Lacedemonians being aduertised, and misliking the fortifying of Athens, both in respect that their owne Citie of Sparta was vnwalled, as also because the Athenians were growne more powerful by Sea, than either themselves, or any other State of Greece, they dispatched messengers to the Athenians to dissuade them; not acknowledging any priuate mislike or ielousie, but pretending, that if the Persians should returne to inuade Greece a third time, the Athenians being in no better state to defend themselves than heretofore, the same would serue to recciue their enemies, and to be made a Seate for the Warre, as Thebes had lately bene. To this the Athenians promised to giue them satisfaction by their owne Embassadors very speedily. But being resolved to goe on with their workes by the aduice of Themistocles, they held the Lacedemonians in hope of the contrarie, till they had rayfed their walls to that height, as they cared not for their milikes, nor doubted their disturbance; and therefore (to gaine time) they dispatched Themistocles towards Lacedemon, giuing him for excuse, that he could not deliuer the Athenians resolutions, till the arrivall of his fellow-Commissioners, who were of purpose retarded. But after a while, the Lacedemonians expectation being conuerted into ielousie (for by the arrivall of diuers persons out of Attica, they were told for certaine, That the walls of Athens were speedily growne vp beyond expectation) Themistocles prayed them not to beleue reports and vaine rumors, but that they would be pleased to send some of their own trustie Citizens to Athens, from whose relation they might resolue themselves, and determine accordingly. Which request being graunted, and Commissioners sent, Themistocles dispatched one of his owne, by whome hee aduised the Athenians, first to entertaine the Lacedemonians with some such discourse as might retaine them a few dayes, and in conclusion to hold them among them, till himselfe and the other Athenian Embassadors, then at Sparta, had their libertie also to returne. Which done, and being also assured by his associates and Arifides, that Athens was already defensible on all parts, Themistocles demanding audience, made the Lacedemonians know, That it was true that the walls of Athens were now rayfed to that height, as the Athenians doubted not the defence of their Citie; praying the Lacedemonians to beleue, That whensoever it pleased them to treat with the Athenians, they would know them for such, as right well vnderstood what appertained to a Commonweale and their owne safetie, without direction and aduice from any other: That they had in the warre of Xerxes abandoned their Citie, and committed themselves to the wooden walls of their shippes, from the resolution of their owne counsels and courage, and not thereto taught or perswaded by others; and finally, in all that perillous warre against the Persians they found their owne judgements and the execution thereof in nothing inferior, or lesse fortunate, than that of any other Nation, State, or Commonweale among the Greekes; And therefore concluded, that they determined to be Masters and Iudges of their owne Affairs, and thought it good reason, that either all the Cities confedered within Greece should be left open, or else that the walls of Athens should be finished and maintained.

The Lacedemonians finding the time vnfit for quarrell, dissembled their millike, both of the fortifying of Athens, and of the diuision, and so suffered the Athenians to depart, and received backe from them their owne Embassadors.

The walls of Athens finished, they also fortified the Port Pyreus, by which they might vnder couert imbarke themselves upon all occasions.

§. II.

The beginning of the Athenian greatnesse, and prosperous warres made by that State upon the Persian.

THE Athenians hauing settled things in good order at home, prepared thirtie Gallies for the pursuit of the warre against the Persians, to which the Lacedemonians added other twentie; and with this Fleet, strengthened by the rest of the Cities of Greece confederated, they set sayle for Cyprus, vnder the conduct of Pausanias the Lacedemonian; where after their landing hauing possesed themselves of many principall places, they imbarked the Armie againe, and tooke land in Thracie, recouering from the Persians by force the Citie Bizantium, now Constantinople: from whence Pausanias, behauing himselfe more like a Tyrant than a Captaine, especially towards the Ionians lately revolted from Xerxes, was called backe by the counsell of Lacedemon, and not onely accused of many insolent behaviors, but of intelligence with the Medes, and Treason against his Countrey. In his stead they employed Dacres, who either gaue the same cause of offence; or else the Athenians, who affected the first commaundement in that warre, practised the souldiours to complaine, though indeed the wife and vertuous behavior of Arifides, General of the Athenian forces, a man of rare and intonsurable sincerity, had bene able to make a good Commandeur seeme ill in comparison of himselfe; and therefore was much more available, in rendering those detested, whose viues afforded little matter of excuse. Howsoever it were, the Lacedemonians being no lesse wearie of the warre, than the Athenians were eage to pursue it, the one obtained their ease, and the other the execution and honor which they desired: for all the Greekes (those of Peloponnesus excepted) willingly subjected themselves to the commandement of the Athenians, which was both the beginning of

of their greatnesse in that present age, and of their ruine in the next succeeding. For the charge of the warre being now committed vnto them, they began to rate the confederated Cities, they appointed Receiueurs and Treasurers, and beganne to leuie money, according to their discretion, for the maintenance of the generall defence of Greece, and for the recovering of those places on Europe side, in Asia the lesse, and the Islands, from the Persians. This tribute (the first that was euer payed by the Greekes) amounted to foure hundred and threescore Talents; which was rayed easily by the honest care of that iust man Aristides, to whose discretion all the confederates referred themselves, and no one man found occasion to complaine of him. But as the vertue of Aristides, and other worthy Citizens, brought vnto the Athenians great commoditie; so the desire which they conceiued of encreasing their commoditie, corrupted their vertue, and robbing them of the generall loue, which had made them powerfull, abandoned their Citie to the defence of her treasure, which with her in the next age perished. For it was not long ere these foure hundred & threescore Talents were rayed to fixe hundred, nor long, after that, ere their couetous Tyrannie had converted their followers into slaues, and extorted from them yeerely threene hundred Talents. The Isle of Elos was at the first appointed for the Treasure-house wherein these summes were layd vp; and where, at the generall assemblie, the Capitaines of those forces, sent by the confederates, were for forme sake called to consultation. But the Athenians, who were stronger by sea than all Greece besides, had lockt vp the common treasure in an Island, vnder their owne protection, from whence they might transport it at their pleasure, as afterward they did.

The generall Commander in this Warre was Cimon, the sonne of Antistides, who first tooke Etona, vpon the Riuer Strimon; then the Isle of Sciros, inhabited by the Dolopes: they maltreated the Carsij, and brought into seruitude the Naxij, contrarie to the forme of the confederacie: So did they other the inhabitants of Greece, if at any time they fayled of their contribution, or disobeyed their commandements; taking vpon them and vsurping a kind of soueraigne authority ouer the rest: which they exercised the more assuredly, because they were now become Lords of the Sea, and could not be resisted. For many of the confederated Cities and Nations, wearie of the warre in their owne persons, and giuen vp altogether to their ease, made choise rather to pay their parts in money, than either in men of warre, or in shippes; leauing the prouision of both to the Athenians. Heereby the one grew weake in all their defences, and in the exercise of the Warres; the other greatly strengthened their Nauie and their experiences, being alwayes armed and employed in honourable Seruices, at the cost of those, who hauing listd them into their Saddles, were now enforced to become their footmen. Yet was the Tribute-money, leuied vpon these their confederates, employed so well by the Athenians at the first (as ill proceedings are often founded vpon good beginnings) that no great cause of repining was giuen. For they rigged out a great Fleet of Gallies, very well manned, wherewith Cimon the Admirall scouring the Asiaticke Seas, tooke in the Citie of Phaselis; which hauing formerly pretended neutralitie, and refused to relieue, or any way assist the Greekes, were enforced to pay tenne Talents for a fine, and so to become followers of the Athenians, paying yeerely contribution.

From thence hee set sayle for the Riuer Eurymedon in Pamphylia, where the Persian Fleet rode, being of fixe hundred sayle, or (according to the most sparing report) three hundred and fiftie, and hauing a great Land-Armie, encamped vpon the shoare; all which forces hauing bene prouided for aduancing the Kings affaires in Greece, were vterly defeated in one day, and two hundred shippes taken by the Athenians, the rest being broken to pieces, or sinke, ere euer they had swomme in the Greekish Seas. Cimon hauing in one day obtained two great victories, the one by the Sea, and the other by Land, was very soone presented with a third.

third. For fourescore sayle of Phoenicians (who were the best of all Sea men, vnder the Persian command) thinking to haue joyned themselves with the Fleet before destroyed, arriued vpon the same Coast, ignorant of what had passed, and fearing nothing lesse than what ensued. Vpon the first notice of their approach, Cimon weighed anchor, & meeting them at an head-Land, called Hydra, did so amaze them, that they only sought to runne themselves on ground; by which meane preserving few of their men, they lost all their shippes. These losses did so breake the courage of the Persian, that, omitting all hope of preuailling vpon Greece, he condescended to whatsoeuer Articles it pleased the Athenians to propound, granting libertie vnto all the Greekes inhabiting Asia; and further couenanted, That none of his shippes of Warre should sayle to the Westward of the Isles, called Cyanea and Chelidonia.

This was the most honourable peace that euer the Greekes made; neither did they in effect, after this time, make any warre that redounded to the profit or glory of the whole Nation, till such time as, vnder Alexander, they ouerthrew the Empire of Persia; in which Warre few, or perhaps none of them, had any place of great command, but serued altogether vnder the Macedonians.

The death of XERXES by the treason of ARTABANVS.

BE sides these losses, which could not easily haue bene repaired, the troubles of the Empire were at this time such, as gaue iust cause to the Persian of seeking peace vpon any termes not altogether intolerable. For Artabanus, the vnckle of Xerxes, perceiuing, that the King his master did easily take small occasions to leade the bloud of such, as in kindred or place were neere vnto him, beganne to repose lesse hope of safetie in remaining faithfull, than of obtaining the Soueraignetie, by destroying a Prince that was so hated for his crueltye, and despised for his cowardise and misfortunes. Hauing conceiued this Treason, he found meanes to execute it by Mithridates an Eunuch, in such close manner, that (as if he himselfe had bene innocent) he accused Darius the sonne of Xerxes, and caused him to suffer death as a Parricide. Whether it be true, that by this great wickednesse he got the Kingdome, and held it seuen moneths; or whether intending the like euill to Artaxerxes the sonne of Xerxes, he was by him preuented and surprisid, it were hard to affirme any certaintie. But all Writers agree vpon this, That taken he was, and with his whole familie put to death by extreme torments, according to the sentence, whereof the truth is more auncient than the Verse.

§. IIII.

§. IIII.

The banishment of THEMISTOCLES: His flight to ARTAXERXES newly reigning in Persia; and his death.

AR TAXERXES being established in his Kingdome, and having so compounded with the Athenians, as the present necessity of his affaires required, began to conceiue new hopes of better fortune against the Greekes, than he or his predecessors had euer hitherto found. For the people of Athens, when the Persians were chased out of Greece, did so highly value their owne merites in that seruice, that they not onely thought it fit for themselves to become the Commanders ouer many Townes and Islands of the Greekes, but, euen within their owne wals, they would admit none other forme of Government than merely Democratia. Herein they were so insolent, that no integritie nor good desert was able to preferue the estate of any such as had borne great office, longer than, by flattering the rascall multitude, he was contented to frame all his words and deedes to their good liking.

This their intolerable demeanour much offended Themistocles; who, though in former times he had layed the foundations of his greatnesse vpon popularitie, yet now presuming vpon his good seruices done to the State, hee thought that with great reason they might graunt him the libertie to checke their inordinate proceedings. But contrariwise, they were so highly offended with his often rehearing the benefites which they had receiued from him, that they layed vpon him the punishment of Ostracisme, whereby he was banished for tenne yeeres, as a man ouer-burthen some to the Commonwealt.

Before the time of his returne was halfe expired, a new accusation was brought against him by the Lacedemonians, who charged him of consulting with Pausanias, about betraying the whole Countrey of Greece vnto Xerxes. Hereupon Themistocles finding no place of securitie against the malice of two such mightie Cities, was driuen, after many trouble some flights, and dangerous remouings, to aduenteure himselfe into Persia; where he found Artaxerxes newly settled, and was by him very honourably entertained. But the great hope which Artaxerxes had conceiued of aduancing his affaires by the counsell and assistance of Themistocles, proued altogether fruitlesse. For when the Athenians, in fauour of Inarus the Libyan, (who infected Egypt, causing it to rebell against the Persian) had sent a Fleet to Sea, landing an Armie in Egypt, and scowring those Easterne Seas, to the great hinderance of Artaxerxes, and (for ought that I can vnderstand) to the manifest breach of that peace, which to their great honour they had concluded with Xerxes; then did the King send his Letters to Themistocles, requiring him to make good the hopes which he had giuen, of assuring the Persian estate against the Greekes.

But whether Themistocles perceiued much vnlikelesse of good successe, in leading a great Armie of dastardly Persians against the warlike people of Greece; or else (as in fauour of his vertue it is more commonly reported) the loue of his Countrey would not permit him to seeke honour by the ruine of it: sure it is; that being appointed by Artaxerxes to undertake the conduct of great forces against the Athenians, hee decided the great conflict betwene thankfulness to his well-deseruing Prince, and naturall affection to his owne ill-deseruing people, by finishing his life with a cup of poyson.

§. V.

§. V.

How the Athenians, breaking the peace, which to their great honour they had made with the Persians, were shamefully beaten in Egypt.

HEN was Artaxerxes driuen to vse the seruice of his owne Captaines in the Egyptian warre, wherein it appeared well, that a just cause is a good defence against a strong enemy. An Athenian Fleet of two hundred saile strong was sent forth vnder Cimon, to take in the Isle of Cyprus: which conquest seemed easie both to make and to maintaine, the Persian being vtterly broken at Sea, and thereby vnable to relieue the Island. Now although it were so, that a peace had bene concluded, which was likely to haue bene kept sincerely by the Persian, who had made so good proofe of the Grecian valour, that he was nothing desirous to build any shippes of Warre (without which the Greekes could receiue no harme from him) whereof if any one should be found sayling towards Greece, the peace was immediately broken, and if not, his whole estate; yet all the Sea-coast (no small part of his Dominions) exposed to the walle of an enemy too farre ouer-matching him. Yet whether the Athenians were in doubt, lest the league which in his owne worser fortunes hee had made with them, he would breake in theirs; and therefore fought to get such assurance into their hands, as might vtterly disable him from attempting ought against them; or whether the increase of their revenues and power, by adding that rich and great Island to their Empire, caused them to measure honour by profit; they thought it the wisest way, to take whilst they might, whatsoeuer they were able to get and hold, and he vnable to defend.

The Ile of Cyprus lying in the bottome of the Straights betwene Cilicia, Syria and Egypt, is very fitly seated for any Prince of State, that being mighty at Sea, doth either seeke to enrich himselfe by trade with those Countreies, or to infect one or more of them when they are his enemies. And this being the purpose of the Athenians, their Ambition which had already deuoured, in conceit, this Island, was on the sodaine well-nigh choaked with a greater morcell, to smatch at which, they let Cyprus alone, which they might easily haue swallowed and digested. For Inarus King of the Lybians confining Egypt, hauing found how greatly the Countrey was exhauished by the late warres, and how weakly defended by very slender Persian garrisons, conceived rightly, that if such small forces as the Satrapa or Viceroy could make on the sodaine of his owne Gardes, or leue out of the ordinarie Garrisons, were by him defeated, the naturalls of the Countrey, not long since oppressed by Cambyses, and after a reuolt very lately subdued by Xerxes, would soone breake faith with him who had no other title to that kingdome than a good sword. Further, he perswaded himselfe that the people, vnable to defend themselves against the Persians without his assistance, would easily be drawne to accept him, the author of their deliuerance for king. Neither did this hope deceiue him. For hauing taken and cruelly slaine Achamenes the Viceroy, diuers Cities forthwith declared themselves for him, and proclayming him king, shewed the most of their endeavour for prosecution of the warre. But hee considering his owne weaknesse, and that the manes of the Egyptians his adherents were not answerable to their desires, perceiued well, that to resist the power of Artaxerxes, farre greater forces than his and theirs were to be procured, at what price soeuer he obtained them. Therefore hee hearing of the great Athenian fleet, and knowing well the vertue of the souldiers therein embarked; hee invited the Commanders to share with him the kingdome of Egypt, as a farre greater reward of their aduenteure, than such an addition as that of Cyprus could be to their estate. Whether hee orthely (if things had wholly sorted according to their expectation) would haue bene contented with an equall share, and not haue fallen out in the partition, were perhaps a diuination vnnecessarie. Hee was possessed of the peoples loue, they were of moit power. But the issue of those affaires was such as left them nothing to communicate but misfortunes, which they shared somewhat equally. Yet had the beginnings of their enterprise very good and hopefull successe: For they entred the Land as farre as to Memphis, the principall Citie; and of the Citie it selfe they tooke two parts: to the third part, which was called the White wall, they layd such hard siege, that neither those forces of the Persians, which then were in Egypt, were strong enough to repoue them; neither could Artaxerxes well deuise what meanes to vfe for the recovery of that which was lost, or for the preservation of the remainder. The best of his hope was by 10 setting the Lacedemonians vpon Athens, to enforce the Athenians to looke home-wards, to their owne defence. This was the first time that the Persian sought to procure assistance of the Greekes one against the other, by stirring them vp with gold to the entertainment of private quarrels, for the good of their common enemy. To this purpose he sent Megabazus to Sparta with much Treasure; who, after great expence, finding that the Lacedemonians were nothing forward in employing their whole force against the Athenians, whome in many conflicts of great importance they had found to be their matches, notwithstanding the absence of their Armie in Egypt; he thought it his wisest way to employ the rest of his money & meanes to their reliefe, who had now the space of sixe yeeres defended his matters right in 20 Egypt. Therefore he hastily dispatched another of his name, the sonne of Zopyrus, who arriving in Egypt, was first encountered by the revolted people; ouer whome he obtained a victorie, which made him master of the Countrey, whilst the Athenians lay busied about Memphis the great Citie. It cannot be doubted, that long abode in a strange ayre, and want of supply, had much enfeebled the Athenians: sure it is, that when Megabazus, having reduced the Countrey to obedience, attempted the Citie it selfe, whether his former successe had amended the courage of the Persians, or want of necessities made the Athenians inferior to themselves, he chased them out of Memphis, and pursued them so neere, as they were for to fortifie themselves in the Ile of Prosopites, where Megabazus, after eightene 30 moneths siege, turning away one part of the Riuer by diuers Trenches, assaulted the Athenian without impediment of waters, tooke their Gallies, and put all to the sword, saue a few that saued themselves by flight into Lybia; the same entertainment had fiftie other Gallies which they sent to the succour of the first two hundred. For those Athenians hauing heard nothing that their Fleet and Armie was consumed, entred by the branch of Nilus, called Mendesum, and fell vnawares among the Phanician Gallies and the Persian Armie; so as the Persians recovered all Egypt, but that part held by Amyrtaeus, and Inarus the King of Lybia, being by them taken and hanged. This was the end of the Athenians sixe yeeres warre in Egypt, and the reward of their vanitie and indiscretion to undertake many enterprises at 40 once.

§. VI.

Of other Warres made by the Athenians for the most part with good successe, about the same time.

Notwithstanding these ouerthrowes in Egypt, yet the Athenians in their home-warres waded through many difficulties, and held there-putation of their forces against the Lacedemonians, Corinthians, and 50 others, rather to their advantage than otherwise. For as they were beaten neere vnto Halia by the Corinthians & Epidaurians, so they obtained two great victories soone after; the one ouer the Peloponnesians, neere vnto Cecephalia; the other ouer the Eginets, neere vnto Egina; where they funke and 40 carried carried away three score and ten Gallies of their Enemies. Furthermore, they landed their forces on the suddaine, and besieged Egina, from whence they could not be moved, notwithstanding that the Corinthians, to diuert them, invaded Megara; where, after a great fight, with equall losse, the Corinthians, when they returned againe to set vp their Trophiæ, as Victors in the former battaile, were vterly broken and slaughtered by the Athenian Garrisons, and *Megara*ns, to their great losse and dishonour.

Again, as the Athenians were discomfited neere to Tanagra, by the Lacedemonians, who returned from the succour of the Dorians against the Phocians, (at which 10 time the Theban horse-men turned from their Allies the Athenians, and fought against them) so about three score daies after, the Athenians entred Boeotia vnder the conduct of Myronides, where beating that Nation, they wanne Phocis on the gulfe Ocean, and cuncted the walls of Tanagra to the ground. Finally, they enforced Egina to render vpon most base conditions; as to beat downe the walls of their Citie, and to giue them hostages for Tribute; the siege whereof they had continued, notwithstanding all their other brabbles and attempts else where. Besides these victorie they sacke and spoiled many places vpon the Sea coast of Peloponnesus, belonging to the Lacedemonians; wan vpon the Corinthians, and ouerthrow the Sicyonians that came to their succour. These were the undertakings of the Athenians, and 20 their Allies, during the time of those sixe yeeres that a part of their forces made warre in Egypt. In the end whereof they attempted Thebes, perswaded thereunto by Orestes, but were resisted by the King Pharjalus, who had chased Orestes out of his Dominions. They also landed in Asia, and had victorie ouer those that resisted, after which they made truce with the Peloponnesians for sixe yeeres, and sent Cimon into Cyprus with two hundred ships, but they were againe allured by Amyrtaeus one of the race of their former Kings, who held the Marit & Woodie parts of Egypt from the Persians, to whom they sent sixtie of their ships. The rest of their Armie failing in their enterprise of Cyprus, and their fortunate and victorious Leader Cimon dying there, as they coasted the land, encountered a fleet of the Phar- 30 nicians and Cilicians; ouer both which Nations they returned victorious into Greece: as also those returned safe which were sent into Egypt.

Of ARTAXERXES LONGIMANVS, that he was ANASHVEROSHI
the husband of QUEENE HESTER.

THe Egyptian troubles being ended, the raigne of Artaxerxes continued peaceable, wherof the length is by some restrained into twenty yeeres, but the more and better Authors giue him fortie, some allow vnto him foure and fortie. He was a Prince of much humanitie, and noted for many examples of gentleness. His fauour was exceeding great to the Jewes, as appeareth by the Histories of Esdas and Nehemias, which fell in his time.

To proue that this was the King who giue countenance and aide to that great worke of building the Temple, it were a needlesse trouble; considering that all the late Diuines haue taken very much paine, to shew that those two Prophets were licensed by him, and succoured in that building, in such sort as appears in 30 their writings.

This was likewise that King Abasuerus who married Hester. Wherof if it be needfull to giue proofe, it may suffice; That Abasuerus bliued in Susa, raigning from India to Ethiopia, and therefore must haue bene a Persian; That he liued in peace, as appears by the circumstances of the Historie, and vfed the counsaile of the seuen 40 Princes, Princes, the authoritie of which Princes beganne vnder Darius, the sonne of Hystaspes, wherefore he could be neither Cyrus nor Cambyses.

The continuall Warres which exercised King Darius the sonne of Hystaspes, together with the certainty of his marriages with sundry wives, from none of whom he was diuorced, but left his first wife Aossa, the daughter of Cyrus, aliue in great honour, thence being mother to Xerxes the succeeding King; doe manifestly proue that Hester was not his. Whereunto is added by Philo the Jew, That at the perswasion of Marдохeus, Ioiachim the high Priest the sonne of Iesua, caused the feast of Purim to be instituted in memorie of that deliuerance. Now the time of Ioiachim was in the raigne of Artaxerxes, at the comming of *Esdra*s, and Nehemias: Iesua his 10 father dying about the end of Darius.

The lame continuance of warres, with other his furiours and tragical loues, wherewith Xerxes did consume such little time, as hee had free from warre, are enough to proue, that the Glorie of Hester pertained not vnto the time of Xerxes, who liued but one and twentie yeeres, whereas the two & thirtieth of Ahasuerus or Artaxastha is expressed by Nehemias. Again, it is well knowne, that Xerxes in the sequenth yeere of his raigne (wherein this marriage must haue been celebrated) came not neere to Susa. Of the Princes that succeeded Artaxerxes Longimanus, to proue that none of them could be Ahasuerus, it is enough to say, that Marдохeus hauing bene carried from Hierusalem captiue, with Iechonia, by Nebuchadnezzar, was 20 vnlikely to haue liued vnto their times.

But of this Artaxerxes it is true, that he liued in Susa, taigned from India to Aethiopia, liued in peace, was contemporarie with Ioiachim the high Priest: and further he had happily by his Licutenants reclaimed the rebellious Egyptians in that sequenth yeere of his raigne; which good fortune might well giue occasion to such a Royall feast, as is described in the beginning of the booke of Hester. This is the summe of the arguments, brought to proue the age of Hester's Glorie by the learned and diligent Krentzheimius, who addes the authorities of Iosephus, affirming the same, and of Philo, giuing to Marдохeus eightene yeeres more than Isaac the Patriarch liued, namely, one hundred fourescore and eightene yeeres in all, which ex- 30 pires in the five and thirtieth yeere of this Artaxerxes, if we suppose him to haue bene carried away captiue, being a Boy of ten yeeres old.

§. VIII.

Of the troubles in Greece, foregoing the Peloponnesian Warre.

BVt it is fit that we now returne to the affaires of the Greekes, who from this time forward, more vehemently prosecuting their ciuill warres, suffered the Perians for many ages to rest in peace: this Egyptian ex- 40 pedition being come to nought. Soone after this, the Lacedemonians vnderooke the warre called, Sacred, recovered the Temple and Ile of Delphos, and deliuered both to the inhabitants; but the Athenians regained the same, and gaue it in charge to the Phocians. In the meane while the banished Boeotians reentred their owne Land, and maistrd two of their owne Townes posselt by the Athenians, which they soone recovered againe from them; but in their returne towards Athens, the Boeotians, Euboeans, and Locrians, (Nations opprest by the Athenians) set vpon them with such resolution, as the Athenians were in that fight allaine or taken, whereby the Boeotians recovered their former libertie, restoring to the Athenians their prisoners. The Ilanders of Euboea tooke such courage vpon this, 50 that they revolted wholly from the Athenians, whom when Pericles intended to reconquer, he was aduertised that the Megarians, (who first left the Lacedemonians, and submitted themselves to Athens) being now wearie of their yoke, had laine the Athenian Garrisons, and ioyned themselves with the Corinthians, Sicyonians, and

Epidaurians. These newes hastened Pericles homeward with all possible speede; but ere he could recouer Attica, the Peloponnesians, led by Philoanax, the sonne of Pausanias, had invaded it, pillaged, and burnt many parts thereof; after whole returne Pericles went on with his first intent and recouered Euboea. Finally, the Athenians beganne to treat of peace with the Peloponnesians, and yielded to deliuer vp all the places which they held in the Country of Peloponnesus; and this truce was made for thirtie yeeres. After fixe of these yeeres were expired, the Athenians (fauouring the Mylesians against the Samians) invaded Samos by Pericles, and after many repulses, and some great losses, both by Sea and Land, the citizens were forced to yeeld themselves vpon most lamentable conditions; Namely, to deliuer vp all their ships, to breake downe their own walls, to pay the charge of the warre, and to restore whatsoever had bene taken by themselves, or by their practice, from the Athenians. In the necke of which followed that long and cruell Peloponnesian Warre, whereof I haue gathered this bricfe following: the same contention taking beginning fiftie yeeres after the flight of Xerxes out of Greece. But because there was no Citie thereof, which either in the beginning of this warre, or in the continuance of it, was not drawne into the quarrell: I hold it conuenient now at the first to shew briefly the estate of the Countre at that time, and especially the condition of those two great Cities, Athens, and Sparta, vpon which all the rest had most dependance.

Vpon what termes the two principall Cities of Greece, Athens and Sparta, stood, at the beginning of the Peloponnesian Warre.

GREECE was neuer vniued vnder the gouernement of any one Prince or Estate, vntill Philip of Macedon, and after him Alexander, brought them rather to a Vnion and League against the Perians, whereof they were Captaines, than into any absolute subiection. For euery Estate held their owne, and were gouerned by Lawes farre different, and by their owne Magistrates, notwithstanding the power of the Macedonians, to whom they did yeld obedience no otherwise than as to such, who were (perforce) their leaders in the Perian warre (deemed the General quarrell of Greece) and tooke the profit and honor of the victorie, to their owne vse and increafe of greatnesse. But the Kings which afterwards raigned in Macedonia, did so farre enlarge their authoritie, that all Greece was by them brought vnder such obedience, as differed little from seruitude; very 50 few excepted, who could hardly, sometimes with armes, and sometimes with gifts, preserve their liberty; of whom the Lacedemonians and Athenians were chiefe: which two people deserued best the plague of tyrannie, having first giuen occasion thereunto, by their great ambition, which wearied and weakened all the Countre by perpetual Warre. For vntill these two Cities of Athens and Sparta distracted

all Greece, drawing every State into the quarrell, on the one or other side, and so gave beginning to the Peloponnesian warre (the effects whereof in true estimation ceased not, before the time that Philip had ouer-mastred all, forasmuch as euery conclusion of one warre afforded hencefoorth matter to some new distraction of the whole Countrey) the warres, commenced betweene one Citie of Greece and another, were neither great, nor of long continuance. All controuersies were soone decided, either by the authoritie of the Amphictiones, who were the generall Council of Greece; or by the power of the Lacedemonians, whose aide was commonly held as good as the assurance of victorie.

These Lacedemonians had liued about foure hundred yeeres vnder one forme of Government, when the Peloponnesian warre beganne. Their education was onely to practise leates of Armes; wherein they so excelled, that a very few of them were thought equall to very great numbers of any other people. They were poore, and cared not much for wealth; euery one had an equall portion of the common field, which sufficed to maintaine him in such manner of life as they vsed. For brauery they had none, and curious building or apparell they regarded not. Their diet was simple, their feasts and ordinarie meales being in common Halls, where all fared alike. They vsed money of yron, whereof they could not be couetous nor great hoarders. Briefly, they liued Utopian-like, saue that they vsed no other occupation than Warre, placing all their felicitie in the glory of their valour. Heereby it came to passe that in all enterprises, whereof they were partakers, the leading and high command was granted to them, and all Greece followed their conduct. But the Athenians were in all points contrarie to this. For they sought wealth, and measured the honors of their victories by the profit; they vsed mercenarie Souldiers in their warres, and exacted great tribute of their Subjects, which were for the most part Islanders, compelled to obey them, because the Athenian fleet was great.

As in forme of policy, and in course of life, so in conditions naturall, the difference betweene these two people was very much. The Athenians were eager and violent, suddaine in their conclusions, and as hastic in the execution; The Lacedemonians very slow in their deliberations, full of grauitie, but very resolute, and such as would in cold blood performe what the Athenians did vsually in flagrant. Whereby it came to passe, that the Lacedemonians had all the Estates of Greece depending vpon them, as on men firme and assured, that sought honour and not riches; whereas the Athenians were followed by such as obeyed them perforce, being held in straight subiection. But the Signorie of the Athenians was nothing large, vntill such time as the Persian Xerxes had invaded Greece, pretending onely a quarrel to Athens: For then the Citizens perceiving well, that the Towne of Athens could not be defended against his great Armie of seuentene hundred thousand men, bestowed all their wealth vpon a Naue, and (assisted by the other Grecians) ouerthrew the fleet of Xerxes, whose Land-forces were soone after discomfited by them, and the Greekes, who all serued vnder conduct of the Spartans. After these victories, the Athenians being now very mightie in fleet, reduced all the Ilands of the Greekish Seas vnder their obedience; imposing vpon them a hard tribute, for maintenance (as they pretended) of warre against the Persian; though indeede they employed their forces chiefly, to the conquest of such Ilands, and haue-Townes, of their owne Countreymen, as stood out against them. All which was easily suffered by the Lacedemonians, who were In-landers, and men that delighted not in expeditions to be made farre from home. But afterwards perceiving the power of the Athenians to grow great, they held them in much ielousie, and were very apt to quarrell with them; but much more willing to breed contention betweene them and other Estates. Wherefore at such time as the Thebans would haue oppressed the Plataeans, when they of Plataea repaired to Sparta for succour, they found there no other aide, than this aduice, That they should seeke helpe at Athens. Hereby it was thought, was thought, that the Athenians should be intangled in a long and tedious Warre, with their neighbours of Thebes. But it proued otherwise; for their force was now so great, that all such occasions did onely serue to increase their honour and puissance.

§. II.

How Sparta and Athens entred into warre.

10 Euerthelesse many Estates of Greece were very ill affected to Athens, because that Citie grew very insolent vpon suddaine prosperitie, and maintaining the weaker Townes against the stronger, incroched apace vpon their Neighboures, taking their dependants from them. Especially the Corinthians were much enraged, because the people of the Iland Corcyra, their Colonie which had rebelled against them, and giuen them a great ouerthrow by Sea, was by the Athenians (who desired to increase their fleet by adioyning that of Corcyra vnto it) taken into protection, and the Corinthians thereby impeached of that reuenge which else they would haue taken. Now how-
20 soeuer it were so, that these dealings of the Athenians were not directly against the conditions of peace agreed vpon among the Greekes, yet were the complaints made at Sparta so vehement, that (though with much ado) they concluded to redresse by warre the iniuries done to their Allies.

First therefore seeking religious pretences, they required the Athenians to expiate certaine offences committed against the gods; whereto hauing for answer, That they themselves should expiate other the like offences, committed in Sparta; they beganne to deale plainly, and required that the people of some Townes, oppressed by the Estate of Athens, should be set at libertie; and that a decree made against those of Megara, whereby they were forbidden to enter any Port of the 30 Athenians, should be reuerfed. This last point they so earnestly pressed, that if they might obtaine it, they promised to abstain from their purpose of making Warre.

This they desired, not as a matter of any great importance (for it was a trifle) but only that by seeming to haue obtained somewhat, they might preserve their reputation without entering into a warre, which threatened them with greater difficulties apparent, than they were very willing to vnder-goe.

But the Athenians would yeeld to nothing; for it was their whole desire that all Greece should take notice, how farre they were from feare of any other Citie. Hereupon they prepared on both sides verie strongly, all that was needfull to the Warre; wherein the Lacedemonians were Superiour, both in number and qualitie, 40 being assisted by most of the Cities in Greece, and hauing the generall fauour, as men that pretended to set at libertie such as were oppressed: but the Athenians did as farre exceede them in all prouisions of Money, Shipping, Engines, and absolute power of command among their Subjects; which they held; and afterward found of greater vse in such neede, than the willing readinesse of friends, who soone grow wearie, and are not easily assembled.

§. III.

§. III.

The beginning of the Peloponnesian Warre.

THe first and second yeeres expedition was very grievous to the Citie of Athens. For the fields were wasted, the Trees cut downe; the Countrey people driuen to flie, with Wiues, Children, and Cattel, into the Towne; whereby a most furious pestilence grew in the Citie, such as before they had neither felt, nor heard of. Hereunto was added the revolt of the Mytilenians, in the Ile of Lesbos, and the siege of Plataea their confederated Citie, which they durst not adventure to raise, besides some small overthrowes received. The Lacedaemonians assembling as great forces as they could raise out of Peloponnesus, did in the beginning of Summer enter the Countrey of Attica, and therein abide, vntill victuals beganne to faile, wasting and destroying all things round about: The Gouernours of the Athenians would not suffer the peoples to issue into the field against them; for they knew the valour of their Enemies; but vsed to send a fleet into Peloponnesus, which waited as fast all the Sea-coast of their Enemies, whilst they were making warre in Attica. So the Peloponnesians being the stronger by Land, wanne the Towne of Plataea, which wanted rescue; the Athenians likewise being more mightie by Sea, did subdue Mytilene which had rebelled, but could not be succoured from Sparta. By these proceedings in that warre, the Lacedaemonians beganne to perceiue how vnfit they were to deale with such enemies. For after that Attica was thoroughly wasted, it lay not greatly in their power to doe any offence equal to such harme as they themselves might, and did receive. Their Confederates beganne to set forward very slowly in their expeditions into Attica; perceiuing well that Athens was plentifully relieved with all necessities, which came by the Sea from the Ilands that were subiect vnto that Estate; and therefore these invaders tooke small pleasure in beholding the walls of that mighty Citie, or in wasting a forsaken field, which was to them a patterne of the calamities, with which their owne Territorie was the whilst afflicted. Wherefore they beganne to set their care to build a strong Naue, wherein they had little good successe, being easily vanquished by the Athenians, who both had more and better ships, and were so skilfull in Sea-fights, that a few Vessels of theirs durst undertake a great number of the Peloponnesians.

§. IIII.

Of the great losse which the Spartans received at Pylos.

AMong other losses which the Spartans had felt by Sea; they received 40 at Pylos a verie fore blow, that compelled them to sue for peace. A fleet of Athenian ships bound for Coreyra, waiting in that passage, as their manner was, the coast of Laconia, and all the halfe Ile of Peloponnesus, was by contrarie windes detained at Pylos, which is a ragged Promontorie, ioyning to the maine, by a strange necke of Land. Before it there lies a small barren Iland of lesse than two miles compasse, and within that a creeke, which is a good harbour for ships, the force of weather being borne off by the head Land and Ille. This Promontorie the Athenians fortified, as well as in haste they might; and what was wanting in their artificiall fortification, was supplied by the naturall strength and sit of the place. By holding this piece of ground, 50 and haue, they in reason expected many aduantages against their enemies. For the Countrey adioyning was inhabited by the Messenians, who in ancient time had held very strong and cruell warre with Sparta; and (though quite subdued) they were held in straight subiection, yet was not the old hatred so extinguished, that by the neere neighbourhood and affiance of the Athenians, it might not bee reuied. Furthermore it was thought, that many ill-willers to the Lacedaemonians, and as many of their bond slaues as could escape from them, would repaire to Pylos, and from thence make daily excursions into Laconia, which was not farre off: Or if other hopes failed, yet would the benefit of this haue, lying almost in the mid-way betwene them and Coreyra, make them able to sur-round all Peloponnesus, and waste it at their pleasure: The newes of these doings at Pylos, drew the Peloponnesians thither in all haile out of Attica, which they had entred a few daies before with their whole Armie: but now they brought not only their Land-forces, but all their Naue, to recouer this place, which how bad a neighbour it might prove in time, they well foresaw, little fearing the grievous losse at hand, which they there in few daies received. For when they in vaine made a generall assault on all sides, both by Sea and Land; finding that small Garrison which the Athenians had left, very resolute in the defence: they occupied the haue, placing foure hundred and twentie choise men all of them, Citizens of Sparta, in the Iland before mentioned, at each end whereof is a channell, that leads into the Port; but so narrow, that only two ships in front could enter betwene the Ille and Pylos; likewise but seven or eight ships could enter at once by the further channell, betwene the Iland and the Main. Having thus taken order to shut vp this new Towne by Sea, they sent part of their fleet to fetch wood, and other stuf, wherewith to fortifie round about, and blocke 20 the piece on all sides. But in the meane season, the Athenian fleet, hearing of their danger that were left at Pylos, returned thither, and with great courage entering the haue, did breake and sinke many of their Enemies vessels; tooke five, and enforced the residue to runne themselves a ground.

Now was the Towne secure, and the Spartans abiding in the Iland as good as lost. Wherefore the Magistrates were sent from Sparta to the camp (as was their custome in great dangers) to aduise what where best for the publike safetie; who when they did perceiue that there was no other way to rescue their Citizens out of the Ile, then by composition with their enemies, they agreed to entreat with the Athenians 30 about peace, taking truce in the meane while with the Captaines at Pylos. The conditions of the truce were, That the Lacedaemonians should deliuer vp all the ships which were in the coast, and that they should attempt nothing against the Towne, nor the Athenians against the camp: That a certaine quantitie of Bread, Wine, and Flesh, should be daily carried into the Ille, but that no ships should passe into the Iland secretly: That the Athenians should carrie the Lacedaemonian Embassadors to Athens, there to treat of peace, and should bring them backe, at whose returne the truce should end, which if in the meane time it were broken in any one point, should be held vtterly void in all: That when the truce was expired, the Athenians should restore the Peloponnesian ships, in as good case as they received them. The 40 Embassadors coming to Athens, were of opinion, that as they themselves had begunne the warre, so might they end it when they pleased. Wherefore they told the Athenians how great an honour it was that the Lacedaemonians did sue to them for peace, aduising them to make an end of warre, whilst with such reputation they might. But they found all contrarie to their expectation: For in stead of concluding vpon euen termes, or desiring of meeke recompence for losse sustained; the Athenians demanded certaine Cities to bee restored to them, which had bene taken from them by the Lacedaemonians long before this warre beganne, refusing likewise to continue the treatie of peace, vnlesse the Spartans which were in the Ile, were first rendered vnto them as prisoners. Thus were the Embassadors returned without effect; at which time the truce being ended, it was desired from the Athenian Captaines, that they should, according to their coucnant, restore the ships, which had bene put into their hands. Whereto answer was made, that the condition of the truce was, That if any one article were broken, all should be held void; now (said the Athenians) yee haue assaulted our Garrisons; and and thereby are we acquitted of our promise to restore the ships. This and the like frivolous allegations which they made, were but meer shifts; yet profit so farre our-weighed honour, that better answer none could be got. Then were the Lacedæmonians driven to vie many hard meanes, for conuiance of victuals into the Isle, which finally was taken by force, and the men that were in it carried prisoners to Athens, where it was decreed, that when the Peloponnesians next invaded Attica, these prisoners should all be slaine. Whether fearing the death of these men, or withheld by the troubles, which (according to the Athenians hope) fell vpon them; the Lacedæmonians were now so farre from waisting Attica, that they suffered their owne Countrie to be continually ouer-runne, both by the Athenians, who landed on all parts of their coast, and by those which issued out of Pylus; which became the Rendezous of all that were ill-affected vnto them.

§. V.

How the Lacedæmonians hardly, and to their great disadvantage, obtained a peace, that was not well kept.

Therefore they inducoured greatly to obtaine peace; which the Athenians would not harken vnto. For they were so puffed vp with the continuance of good successe, that hauing sent a few bands of men into Sicilie, to hold vp a faction there, and make what profit they might of the Sicilians quarrells; when afterward they heard that the differences in that Ile were taken away, and their bands returned without either gaine or losse, they banished the Captaines, as if it had beene merely through their default, that the Ile of Sicilie was not conquered; which (besides the longer distance) was in power to offend others, or defend it selfe, no whit inferior vnto Peloponnesus. Yet was this their ouer-weening much abated shortly after, by some disasters receiued, especially in Thrace, where in a battaile which they lost at Amphipolis, Cleon, and Brasidas, Generalls of the Athenian and Lacedæmonian forces, were both slaine; which two had most bene aduersaries to the peace. As the Athenians by their losses were taught moderation; so the Lacedæmonians, who not only felt the like wounds, but through the great Naue which they had receiued at Pylus, were faine to proceede lamely in the warre, against such as, through commoditie of their good fleet, had all aduantage that could be found in expedition, were feruently desirous to conclude the businesse, ere Fortune by any new fauour should reuiue the insolence, which was at this time well mortified in their Enemies. Neither was it only a consideration of their present estate, that vrged them to bring the treatie of peace to good and speedy effect; but other dangers hanging over their heads, and ready to fall on them, which vnlesse they compounded with the Athenians, they knew not how to auoide. The estate of Argos, which had ancient enmitie with them, was now, after a truce of thirtie yeeres well-nigh expired, ready to take the benefit of their present troubles, by ioyning with those who alone found them worke enough. Argos was a rich and strong Citie, which though inferior to Sparta in valour, yet was not so vnwarlike, nor held such ill correspondence with the neighbouring Estates, that the Lacedæmonians could euer farre preuaile vpon it, when they had little else to doe. This was a thing that in the beginning of this Warre had not beene regarded. For it was then thought, that by waisting the Territories of Athens with sword and fire, the quarrell should easily and in short time haue beene ended, whereby not only the Athenians should haue beene brought to good order, but the Corinthians and others, for whose sake the warre was vnder-taken, haue beene so firmly knit to the Lacedæmonians, that they should for lone of them haue abandoned the Argives to their owne fortunes. But now the vanitie of those hopes appeared, in that the Athenians abounding in ready money, and meanes to raise more, were able to secure themselves by a strong fleet, from any great harme, that the Peloponnesians wanting wherewith to maintaine a Naue, could doe vnto them, yea as Masters of the Sea, to wearie them out, as in effect already they had done. As for the Confederates of Sparta, they could now endure neither warre nor peace; their daily trauailes, and many losses had so wearied and incensed them. Wherefore the Lacedæmonians were glad to vie the occasion, which the inclination of their enemies did then afford, of making a final peace, which with much a-doe they procured, as seemed equal and ealie; but were indeede impossible to be performed, and therefore all their trauaile was little effectuell.

10 The restitution of prisoners and places taken being agreed vpon; it fell out by lot, that the Lacedæmonians should restore first. These had won more townes vpon the continent from the Athenians, than the Athenians had from them; but what they had wonne, they had not won absolutely. For they had restored some Towns to such of their Allies, from whom the State of Athens had taken them; some, and those the most, they had set at libertie (as reason required) which had opened their gates vnto them, as to their friends and deliuerers, & not compelled them to breake in as Enemies. Now concerning the Townes which were not in their owne hands, but had beene rendred vnto their Confederates, the Spartans found meanes to giue some satisfaction, by permitting the Athenians to retain others, which they had gotten in the warre; as for the rest, they promised more than afterwards they could performe. The Cities which they had taken into protection, could not endure to heare of being abandoned, neither would they by any meanes yeeld themselves into the hands of their old Lords the Athenians, whom they had offended by reuolting, notwithstanding whatsoever articles were drawne, and concluded, for their securitie, and betterance in time to come. This dull performance of conditions on the side of the Spartans, made the Athenians become as backward in doing those things which on their part were required; so that restoring only the prisoners which they had, they deferred the rest, vntill such time as they might receive the full satisfaction, according to the agreement. But before such time as these difficulties brake out into matter of open quarrell, the Lacedæmonians entred into a more straight alliance with the Athenians, making a league offensive and defensive with them. Hereunto they were moued by the backwardnesse of the Argives, who being (as they thought) likely to haue succd for peace at their hands, as soone as things were once compounded betwene Athens and Sparta; did then themselves plainly vnwilling to giue eare to any such motion. Thinking therefore, that by cutting from Argos all hope of Athenian succour, they should make sure worke, the Spartans regarded not the affections of other States, whom they had either bound vnto them by well-deserving in the late warre, or found so troublesome, that their enmitie (if perhaps they durst let it appeare) were little worse than friendship. It bred great 40 jealousy in all the Cities of Greece, to perceive such a conjunction betwene two so powerfull Signories; especially one clause threatening euery one, that was any thing apt to feare, with a secret intent that might be harboured in their proud conceits, of subduing the whole Countrie, and taking each what they could lay hold on. For besides the other articles, it was agreed, That they might by mutual consent adde new conditions, or alter the old at their owne pleasures. This impression wrought so strongly in the Corinthians, Thebans, & other ancient Confederates of Sparta, that the hate which they had borne to the Athenians their professed Enemies, was violently throwne vpon the Lacedæmonians their vnjust friends: whereby it came to passe, that they who had lately borne chiefe sway in Greece, might haue beene abandoned to the discretion of their Enemies, as already in effect they were, had the Enemies wisely vied the aduantage.

§. VI.

§. VI.

Of the negotiations, and practices, held betwene many States of Greece, by occasion of the peace that was concluded.

THe admiration wherein all Greece held the valour of Sparta as vnresistible, and able to make way through all impediments, had bene so excellenc, that when by some sinister accidents, that Citie was compelled to take and seeke peace, vpon termes not sounding very honourable, this common opinion was not only abated, but (as happens vsually in things extreme) was changed into much contempt. For it was neuer thought that any Lacedemonians would haue endured to lay downe his weapons and yeeld himselfe prisoner, nor that any misfortune could haue bene so great, as should haue drawne that Citie to relieue it selfe otherwise than by force of Armes. But when once it had appeared that many of their Citizens, among whom were some of especiall make, being ouer-laid by enemies, in the Iland before Pylus, had rather chosen to liue in captiuitie, than to die in fight; and that Pylus it selfe, sticking as a thorne in the foot of Laconia, had bred such anguish in that Estate, as vterly wearying the accustomed Spartan resolution, had made it sit downe, and seek to refresh it selfe by dishonourable ease: then did not only the Corinthians and Thebans beginne to conceiue basely of those men which were vertuous, though vnfortunate; but other lesser Citiees joyning with these in the same opinion, did cast their eyes vpon the rich and great Citie of Argos, of whose abilitie, to doe much, they conceiued a strong belief, because of long time it had done nothing. Such is the base condition, which through foolish enuie is become almost naturall in the greater part of mankind. We curiously search into their vices, in whom, had they kept some distance, we should haue discerned only the vertues; and comparing injuriously our best parts with their worst, are iustly plagued with a false opinion of that good in strangers which we know to be wanting to our selues.

The first that published their dislike of Sparta were the Corinthians, at whose vehement entreaty (though moued rather by enuie at the greatness of Athenes dayly encreasing) the Lacedemonians had entred into the present warre. But these Corinthians did only murmur at the peace, alledging as grieuances, that some townes of theirs were left in the Athenians hands. The Mantineans, who during the time of warre, had procured some part of the Arcadians to become their followers, and forsake their dependency vpon the State of Sparta, did more freely & readily discouer themselves; feare of reuenge to come working more effectually, than indignation at things already past. The Argines feeling the gale of prosperous Fortune that began to fill their sailes, prepared themselves to take as much off it as they could stand vnder; giving for that purpose vnto twelue of their citizens, a full and absolute commission to make alliance betwene them and any freecities of Greece (Athenes and Sparta excepted) without any further trouble of propounding euery particular businesse to the multitude. When the gates of Argos were set thus open to all comers; the Mantineans began to lead the way, and many Cities of Peloponnesus following them entred into this new confederacy; some incited by private respects, others thinking it the wisest way to doe as the most did. What inconuenience might arise to them by these courses, the Lacedemonians easily discerned, and therefore sent Embassadors to stoppe the matter at Corinth, where they well perceived that the mischief had bene hatched. These Embassadors found in the Corinthians a very rough disposition, with a grauity expressing the opinion which they had conceiued of their present advantage ouer Sparta. They had caused all Citiees which had not entred yet into the alliance with Argos, to send their Agents to them, in whose presence they gaue audience to the Lacedemonians; the purport of whose Embassie was this:

this: That the Corinthians, without breach of their oath, could not forsake the alliance, which they had long since made with Sparta, and that reason did as well binde them to hold themselves contented with the peace lately made, as religion enforced them to continue in their auncient confederacy, forasmuch as it had bin agreed betwene the Spartans and their associates, that the content of the greater part, (which had yielded vnto peace with Athenes) should binde the lesser number to performe what was concluded; if no Diuine impediment withstood them. Heere vnto the Corinthians made answer, that the Spartans had first begun to do them open wrong, in concluding the warre wherein they had lost many places, without prouision of restitution; & that the very clause, alledged by the Embassadors, did acquite them from any necessity of subscribing to the late peace, forasmuch as they had sworne vnto those people whom they perswaded to rebell against Athenes, that they would neuer abandon them, nor willingly suffer them to fall againe into the tyrannous hands of the Athenians. Wherefore they held themselves bound both in reason and religion to vse all meanes of vpholding those, whom by common consent they had taken into protection; for that an oath was no lesse to be accounted a Diuine impediment, than were pestilence, tempest, or any the like accident, hindring the performance of things vnderaken. As for the alliance with Argos, they said that they would doe as they should finde cause. Hauing dismissed the Embassadors with this answer, they made all halt to ioyne themselves with Argos, and caused the States to doe the like; so that Sparta and Athenes were in a manner left to themselves, the Thebans and Megarians being also vpon the point to haue entred into this new confederacie. But as the affections were diuers, which caused this hasty confluence of sudden friends to Argos, it so likewise came to passe that the friendship it selfe, such as it was, had much diuersitie both of sinceritie & of continuance. For some there were that hated or feared the Lacedemonians: as the Mantineans and Eleans: these did firmly betake themselves to the Argines, in whom they knew the same affection to be inueterate; others did only hate the peace concluded; & these would rather haue followed the Spartans than the Argines in warre, yet rather the Argines in war than the Lacedemonians in peace. Of this number were the Corinthians, who knowing that the Thebans were affected like vnto themselves, dealt with them to enter into the societie of the Argues, as they had done; but the different formes of government, vsed in Thebes and Argos, caused the Thebans to hold rather with Sparta, that was ruled by the principall men, than to incur the danger of innovation, by joyning with such as committed the whole rule to the multitude.

This businesse hauing ill succeeded, the Corinthians beganne to bethinke themselves of their owne danger, who had not so much as any truce with Athenes, and yet were vnprepared for warre. They fought therefore to come to some temporarie agreement with the Athenians, and hardly obtained it. For the Athenians, who had dealt with all Greece at one time, did not greatly care to come to any appointment, with one Citie that shewed against them more stomach than force; but gaue them to vnderstand that they might be safe enough from them, if they would claime the benefit of that alliance, which Athenes had lately made with Sparta and her dependants; yet finally they granted vnto these Corinthians (which were loth to acknowledge themselves dependants of Sparta) the truce that they desired; but into private confederacie they would not admit them, it being an article of the league betwene them and the Spartans, That the one should not make peace nor warre without the other.

Heerein, as in many other passages, may clearly be seene the great advantage which absolute Lords haue as well in peace as in warre, ouer such as are serued by voluntaries. We shall hardly finde any one Signorie, that hath bene so constantly followed as Sparta was by so many States, and some of them little inferior to it selfe, being all as free; whereas contrariwise, the Athenians had lately, and by compulsiue meanes gotten their Dominion, wherein they demeaned themselves as Tyrants.

But

But in performance of conditions agreed vpon, the Athenians were able to make their wordes good, by excluding any State out of their Confederacie, and giuing vp such places as were agreed vpon: of which the Lacedemonians could doe neither the one nor the other. For such Townes as their old Allies had gotten by their meanes in the late warre, could not bee restored without their consent, which had them in present possession; and particularly the Towne of Panaste, which the Thebans held, could by no meanes be obtained from them by the Lacedemonians (who earnestly desired it; that by restitution thereof vnto the Athenians, as earnestly demanding it, themselves might recover Pylus) vnlesse they would agree to make a priuate alliance with Thebes; which thereupon they were faine to doe, though knowing it to be contrarie to the last agreement betweene them and Athens.

The Lacedemonians having broken one article of the league made betweene them and the Athenians, that by so doing they might enable themselves to the performance of another, were shamefully disappointed of their hopes by the Thebans, who did not giue vp the Towne of Panaste, till first they had vtterly demolished it, and made it of no worth to the Athenians. This was sought to haue bene excused by the Lacedemonian Embassadors, who comming to Athens (whether they be sent home all prisoners that had bene detained at Thebes) hoped with gentle wordes to salue the matter; saying, That from henceforth noemie to Athens should nestle in Panaste, for it was destroyed. But these Embassadors had not to deale with tame foolles. For the Athenians told them in plaine termes, That of three principall conditions agreed vpon in their late League, they had not performed any one, but vtied such bale collusion as stood not with their honour: hauing made priuate alliance with the Thebans; hauing destroyed a Towne that they should haue restored; and not hauing forced their dependants by warre, to make good the covenants of the late concluded peace. Hereupon they dismissed the Embassadors with rough wordes, meaning with as rough deedes to anger those that sent them.

There were at that time, both in Athens and Sparta, many that were ill-contented with the peace: among whom were the Ephori, chosen for that yeere, in Sparta; and Alcibiades a powerfull yong Gentleman in Athens. But the Ephori, though desiring to renew the warre, yet wished that first they might get from the Athenians as much as was to be rendered to them by couenant, especially Pylus that had so sorely troubled them. Alcibiades, whose Nobilitie, riches, and fauour, with the people, made him desire warre, as the meanes, whereby himselfe might procure some honourable employment, vsed all meanes to set the quarrell on foot, whilst the Athenians had yet both aduantage enough, as not hauing rendred ought saue their prisoners, and pretence enough to vie that aduantage of breaking the peace, by reason that the Lacedemonians (though indeede against their wills) had broken all covenants with them. Now the State of Athens had fully determined to retaine Pylus, and to performe nothing that the Lacedemonians should, and might require, vntill they had first, without any longer halting, fulfilled all articles wherunto they were bound, euen to the vtmost point. This was enough to make them sweat, who hauing already done the most that they could, had as yet got nothing in recompence, except the deliuerie of their Citizens, which were prisoners. But Alcibiades wishing a speedie beginning of open warre, sent priuily to the Argines, and gaue them to vnderstand how fitly the time serued for them to associate themselves with Athens, which was enough to giue them securitie against all Enemies.

The Argines vpon the first confluence of many Estates vnto their societie, had embraced great hopes of working wonders, as if they should haue had the conduct of all Greece against the Athenians, robbing Sparta of that honour, as hauing ill vsed it, and thereby leauing their old enemies in case of much contempt and disability. But these suddaine apprehensions of vaine joy, were suddainely changed into as vaine feare; which ill agreed with the great opinion that had lately bene conceived of Argos. For when the Thebans had refused their alliance; when the Corinthians Athens had sought securitie from Athens; and when a false rumour was noised abroad, Athens, Thebes, and Sparta, were come to a full agreement vpon all points of difference; then beganne the Argines to let fall their crests, and sue for peace vnto the Lacedemonians, who needing it as much as they, or more, yet held their grauity, and were not ouer-hallie to accept it. At this time, and in this perturbation, the misse of Alcibiades came very welcome to the Argines, which were not now confusking how to become the chiefe of all others, but how to saue themselves. Wherefore they sent away presently to Athens, their owne Embassadors, accompanied with the Mantineans and Eleans, to make a league offensive, and defensive, betweene 10 the Estates and the Athenians.

Of this businesse the Lacedemonians knew not what to thinke: for well they saw, that such a combination tended to their great hurt, and therefore were desirous to preuent it; but to keepe the loue of the Athenians, the new Ephori thought that more was already done, than stood with their honour, or profit; others held it the wisest way, hauing done so much, not to stick vpon a little more, but rather by giuing full satisfaction, to retaine the friendship of that State, which was more to be valued then all the rest of Greece. This resolution preuailling, they sent away such of their Citizens as were best affected to the peace, who comming to Athens with full commission to make an end of all controuersies, did earnestly labour in the Council-house, to make the truth of things appeare, saying; that their Confederacie with the Thebans had tended to none other end than the recouerie of Panaste; concerning which Towne, or any other businesse, that it much grieved the Lacedemonians, to see things fall out in such wise as might giue to the Athenians cause of displeasure; but that all should be done which in reason might bee required for making matters euen betweene them; to which purpose they shewed that themselves had absolute commission. Wherefore they desired that Pylus might be restored vnto them, and especially for the present, that the negotiation with the Argines might be called a-side. Favourable audience was giuento this proposition, the rather because they which promised amends, had power to make their wordes good. But all 30 this faire likelihood of good agreement was dashed on the suddaine, by the practice of Alcibiades, who, secretly dealing with the Lacedemonian Embassadors, perswaded them well of his friendship towards their Citie, and aduised them to take all care that their absolute power to conclude what they pleased in the name of Sparta, might not be knowne to the Communitie of Athens, lest the insolent multitude should thereupon grow preumptorie and yeelde to nothing, vnlesse they could draw them to vnreasonable conditions. The Embassadors beleued him, and sanctioned their tale in the assembly of the people, as hee had aduised them. Hereupon the same Alcibiades taking presently the aduantage, which their double dealing afforded, inueighed openly against them, as men of no fincintie, that were 40 come to Athens for none other purpose, than to hinder the people from strengthening themselves with friends, meaning to draw the Argines and their adherents to their owne alliance, as (contrarie to their oath) already they had the Thebans. The people of Athens, whom a pleasing errand would hardly haue satisfied, or brought into a good opinion of the Lacedemonians, (whose honest meanings had so ill bene seconded with good performance) were now so incensed with the double dealing of the Embassadors, and the strong perswasions of Alcibiades, that little wanted of concluding the league with Argos. Yet for the present so farred did Nicias, an honourable Citizen, and great friend to the peace, preuaile with them, that the businesse was put off, till he himselfe with other Embassadors might fetch a 50 better answer from Sparta.

It may seeme a great wonder, how so poore a trick of Alcibiades was able to carrie a matter of such importance, when the Spartan Embassadors might haue cast the load vpon his owne shoulders, by discouering the truth:

But the grauitie which was vually found in the Lacedamonians, hindred them (perhaps) from playing their game handfomely against so nimble a wit; and they might wel haue been thought vntrusty men, had they professed themselves such as would say and vn-say for their most aduantage.

Nicias and his Companions had a fowre message to deliuer at Sparta, being emptorily to require performance of all conditions, and among the rest, that the Lacedamonians should take the paines to rebuild Panaste, and should immediately renounce their alliance made with the Thebans; letting them vnderstand that otherwise the Athenians, without further delay, would enter into confederacie with the Argines, and their Adherents. The Ephors at Sparta had no minde to forsake the Thebans, assured friends to their State; but wrought so hard, that the anger of the Athenians was suffered to breake out what way it could, which to mitigate, they would doe no more, than only (at the request of Nicias their honourable friend, who would not seeme to haue effected nothing) sweare a-new to keepe the articles of the league betweene them and Athens. Immediately therefore vpon returne of the Embassadors, a new league was made betweene the Athenians, Argines, Mantineans, & Eleans, with verie ample prouision for holding the same common friends and enemies; wherein, though the Lacedamonians were passed ouer with silence, yet was it manifest that the whole intent of this confederacy did bend it self chiefly against them, as in short while after was proued by effect.

At this time the Lacedamonians were in ill case, who hauing restored all that they could vnto the Athenians, and procured others to doe the like, had themselves recovered nothing of their owne (prisoners excepted) for default of restoring all that they should. But that which did most of all disable them, was the losse of reputation, which they had not more impaired in the late warre by misfortunes, than in fundrie passages betweene them and the Athenians: to procure and keepe whole Amicitie, they had left fundrie of their old friends to shift for themselves. Contrariwise the Athenians, by the treatie of peace, had recovered the most of that which they lost in warre; all their gettings they had retained; and were strengthened by the access of new Confederates.

How the peace betweene Athens and Sparta was ill kept, though not openly broken.

IT was not long ere the Argines and their fellowes had found busines wherewith to let the Athenians on worke, and make vse of this conjunction. For presuming vpon the strength of their side, they began to meddle with the Epidaurians, whom it concerned the State of Sparta to defend. So many acts of hostilitie were committed, wherein Athens and Sparta did (as principals) infect each the other, but came in collaterally, as to the aide of their seuerall friends.

By these occasions the Corinthians, Baotians, Phocians, Laerians, and other people of Greece, beganne a-new to range themselves vnder the Lacedamonians, and follow their ensignes. One victorie which the Lacedamonians obtained by their meere valour in a set battaile, neere to Mantineas, against the Argine side, helped well to repaire their decayed reputation, though otherwise it yielded them no great profit. The ciuill disension arising shortly after within Argos it selfe, betwene the principall Citizens and the Commons, had almost throwne downe the whole frame of so the new combination. For the chiefe Citizens getting the vpper hand, made a league with Sparta, wherein they proceeded so farre as to renounce the amity of the Athenians in expresse words, and forced the Mantineans to the like.

space of time the multitude preuailing, reuerled all this, and hauing chased away their ambitious Nobilitie, applied themselves to the Athenians as closely as before.

Beside these vprores in Peloponnesus, many assaies were made to raise vp troubles in all parts of Greece, and likewise in Macedon, to the Athenians; whose forces and readinesse for execution, preuented some things, reuenged other, and requited all with some prosperous attempts. Finally, the Athenians wanting matter of quarrell, and the Lacedamonians growing wearie, they beganne to be quiet, retaining still that enmitie in their hearts, which they had sufficiently discouered in effects, though not as yet breaking out into termes of open warre.

§. VIII.

The Athenians sending two fleets to sacke Siracuse, are put to flight and utterly discomfited.

DVING this intermission of open warre, the Athenians re-intertained their hopes of subduing Sicily, whether they sent a fleet so mighty as neuer was set forth by Greece in any Age before or after.

This fleet was very well manned, and furnished with all necessaries to so great an expedition. All which came to nought; partly by the factions in Athens, whence Alcibiades Author of that voyage, & one of the Generalls of their fleet, was driuen to banish himselfe, for feare of such iudgement, as else he was like to haue vnder-gone, among the incensed people; partly by the inuasion which the Lacedamonians made vpon Attica, whilst the forces of that State were so farre from home. Hereunto was added the aide of the King of Persia, who supplied the Peloponnesians with money.

Neither was the luccesse of things in Sicilia such, as without helpe from Athens, could giue any likelyhood of a good end in that warre. For although in the beginning the enterprize had so well succeeded, that they besieged Siracuse, the chiefe Citie of the Iland, and one of the fairest Townes which the Greekes inhabited, obtaining the better in sundry battailes by Land and Sea; yet when the Towne was relieved with strong aide from Peloponnesus, it came to passe that the Athenians were put to the worse on all sides, in such wise that their fleet was shut vp into the haven of Siracuse, and could not issue out.

As the Athenian affaires went very ill in Sicily, so did they at home stand vpon hard termes, for that the Lacedamonians, who had bene formerly accustomed to make wearisome yeerely iournies into Attica, which hauing pilld and foraged, they returned home; did now by counsell of Alcibiades, (who seeking reuenge vpon his owne Citizens was fled vnto them) fortifie the Towne of Duceia, which was neere to Athens, whence they ceased not with daily excursions to harrie all the Countrey round about, and sometimes giue alarme vnto the Citie it selfe.

In these extremities, the peruerse obstinacie of the Athenians was very strange; who leauing at their backs, and at their owne doores, an enemy little lesse mighty than themselves, did yet send forth another fleet into Sicily, to inuade a people no lesse puissant, which neuer had offended them.

It often happens, that prosperous euents makes foolish counsaile seeme wiser than it was, which came to passe many times among the Athenians, whose vaine conceits Pallas was said to turn vnto the best. But where vnfound aduice, finding bad proofe, is obstinately pursued, neither Pallas nor Fortune can be iustly blamed for a miserable issue. This second fleet of the Athenians, which better might haue serued to conuey home the former, that was defeated; after some attempts made to small purpose against the Siracusians, was finally (together with the other part of the Nauie, which was there before) quite vanquished, and bard vp into the haven of Siracuse.

use, whereby the campe of the Athenians, vtterly deprived of all benefit by Sea, either for succour or departure, was driuen to breake vp, and flie away by Land, in which flight they were ouer-taken routed, and quite ouerthrow in such wise that scarce any man escaped.

This mischiefe well deserued fell vpon the Athenians, who had wickedly condemned into exile Sophocles and Pthodorus Generalls, formerly sent into that Ile, pretending that they had taken money for making peace in Sicily, whereas indeede there was not any meanes or possibilitie to haue made warre. Hereby it came to passe, that Nicias, who had the chiefe command in this vnhappy enterprise, did rather choose to hazard the ruine of his Countrey by the losse of that Armie, wherein it consisted little lesse then all the power of Athens; then to aduenture his owne estate, his life, and his honour, vpon the tongues of shamelesse accusers, and the sentence of Iudges before his triall resolved to condemne him, by retiring from Syracuse, when wisdom and necessitie required it. For (said he) they shall giue sentence vpon vs, who know not the reason of our doings, nor would giue ear to any that would speake in our behalfe, but altogetherarken to suspicious and vaine rumours that shall be brought against vs, yea thescour Souldiers who now are so desirous to returne in safetie, will in our danger be well contented to frame their tales to the pleasure of the lewd and insolent multitude.

This resolution of Nicias, though it cannot be commended (for it is the part of an honest and valiant man to doe what reason willeth, not what opinion expecteth, and to measure honour or dishonour by the assurance of his well-informed conscience, rather than by the malicious report and censure of others) yet it may bee excused; since he had before his eyes the iniustice of his people; and had well understood that a wicked sentence is infinitely worse than a wicked fact, as being held a president and patterne, whereby oppression beginning vpon one, is extended as warrantable vpon all. Therefore his feare of wrongfull condemnation was such, as a constant man could not easily haue ouer-mastered; but when afterwards the Armie, hauing no other expectation of safetie then the faint hope of a secret flight, he was so terrified with an Eclipse of the Moone, happening when they were about to dislodge, that he would not consent to haue the camp break vp till seuen and twentie daies were past. His timorousnesse was euen as foolish and ridiculous, as the issue of it was lamentable. For he should not haue thought that the power of the Heauens, & the course of Nature, would be vnjust as his Athenians, or might pretend lesse euill to the stockfull, than to such as did their best. Neither doe I thinke that any Astrologer can allege this Eclipse, as either a cause or prognostication of that Armes destruction, other wise then as the follie of men did, by application, turne it to their owne confusion. Had C. Cæsius the Roman, he, who slew Julius Cæsar, imitated this superstition of Nicias, he had surely found the same fortune in a case very like. But when, he retrying, the broken remainder of Crassus his Armie defeated by the Parthian Archers was aduised, vpon such an accident as this, to continue where he then was, till the Sunne were past the signe of Scorpio; he made answer that he stood not in such feare of Scorpio, as of Sagittarius. So aduenturing rather to abide the frowning of the Heauens, then the neerer danger of Enemies vpon earth, hee made such a safe and honourable retreat, as did both their his noble resolution, and giue a faire example to that good rule;

Thus we see that God, who ordinarily works by a concatenation of meanes, deprives the Gouernours of vnderstanding, when he intends euill to the multitude; and that the wickednesse of vnjust men is the readie meane to weaken the vertue of those who might haue done them good.

Of the troubles where into the State of Athens fell, after the great losse of the Fleet, and Armie, in Sicilia.

19 The losse of this Armie was the ruine of the Athenian Dominion, and may bee well accompted a very little lesse calamitie to that Estate, than was the subuersion of the walls, when the Citie about seuen yeeres after was taken by Lysander. For now began the subiects of the Athenian Estate to rebell, of whom, some they reduced vnder their obedience; others held out; some for feare of greater inconuenience were set at libertie, promising only to be their good friends, as formerly they had bene their Subiects; others hauing a kind of libertie offered by the Athenians, were not therewith contented, but obtained a true and perfect libertie by force. Among the se troubles it fell out very vnseasonably, that the principall men of Athens being wearied with the peoples insolencie, tooke vpon them to change the forme of that Estate, and bring the gouernement into the hands of a few. To which purpose conspiring with the Captaines which were abroad, they caused them to set vp the forme of an Aristocratic in the Townes of their Confederates; and in the meane time, some that were most likely to withstand this inuolution, being slaine at Athens, the Commonaltie were so dismayd, that none durst speake against the Conspirators, whose number they knew not, but euerie man was afraid of his Neighbour, lest he should be a member of the league. In this generall feare the Maiestic of Athens was vltured by 400. men, who oblitering in shew the ancient forme of proceeding, did causall matters to be propounded vnto the people, and concluded vpon by the greater part of voices: but the things propounded were onely such as were first allowed in priuate among themselves; neither had the Commonaltie any other libertie, than only to approue and giue consent: for whosoever presumed any further, was quickly dispatched out of the way, and no inquirie made of the murder. By these meanes were many decrees made, all tending to the establishment of this new Authoritie, which neuertheless indured not long. For the Fleet and Armie which then was at the Ile of Samos, did altogether detest these dealings of the foure hundred vsurpers, and held them as Enemies; whereupon they reuoked Alcibiades out of banishment, & by his assistance procured that the supplies which the Persian King had promised vnto the Lacedæmonians, were by Tissaphernes his Lieutenant, made vnprofitable, through the slow and bad performance. Alcibiades had at the first bene very well entertained in Sparta, whilst his seruice done to that State was not growne to be the obiect of enuie. But when it appeared that in counsaile and good performance he so farre excelled all the Lacedæmonians, that all their good successe was ascribed to his wit and valour, then were all the principall Citizens wearie of his vertue; especially Agis one of their Kings, whose wife had so far yielded her selfe to the loue of this Athenian, that among her inward friends shee could not forbear to call her yong child by his name. Hercupon order was taken, that Alcibiades should be killed out of the way. But he discouering the Spartan trecherie, conueighed himselfe vnto Tissaphernes, whom he so bewitched with his great beautie, sweet conuersation, and found wit, that hee soone became the Master of that barbarous Vice-roys affections, who had free power to dispose the great Kings treasures and forces in those parts. T hen beganne he to aduise Tissaphernes, not so farre forth to assist the Lacedæmonians, that they should quite ouerthrow the State of Athens, but rather to helpe the weaker side, & let them one consume another, whereby all should fall at length into the hands of the Persian. By this counsaile he made way to other practices, wherein by strength of his reputation (as the only fauourite of so great a Potentate) hee played his owne game, procuring his restitution. At length his banishment being repelled by the Armie, but not by the Citizens (who then were oppressed by the foure hundred) hee laboured greatly to reconcile the Souldiers to the Gouernors; or at least to diuert their heat another way, and turne it vpon the Common Enemie. Some of the foure hundred approued his motion, as being wearie of the tyrannie wherof they were partakers, partly because they saw it could not long endure, & partly for that themselves, being lesse regarded by the rest of their companions, than stood with their good liking, sought to acquit themselves of it as honestly as they might. But the most of that Faction laboured to obtaine peace of the Lacedemonians, desiring chiefly to maintaine both their owne authority, and the greatnesse of their Citie; if they might: but if this could not be, they did rather wish to preferre their owne power, or safetie at least, then the good Estate of the Common-wealth. Therefore they made sundrie ouertures of peace to the Lacedemonians, desiring to compound in as good termes as they might, and affirming that they were fitter to be trusted than the wavering multitude; especially considering that the Citie of Sparta was governed by an Aristocratie, to which form they had now reduced Athens. All these passages betwene the foure hundred (or the most and chiefe of them) and the Lacedemonians, were kept as secret as might be. For the Citie of Athens, hoping, without any great cause, to repaire their losses, was not inclined to make composition, from which vpon iustler ground the enemie was much more averse, trusting well that the discord of the Athenians (not vnknowne abroad) might yeeld some faire opportunitie to the destruction of it selfe, which in effect (though not then presently) came to passe. And vpon this hope King Agis did sometimes bring his forces from Decelea to Athens, where doing no good, hee receiued some small losses. Likewise the Naue of Peloponnesus made shew of attempting the Citie, but seeing no likelihood of successe, they bent their course from thence to other places, where they obtained victories, which in the better Fortune of the Athenians might more lightly haue bene regarded, then in this their decayed estate. Yet it seemes, without any disparagement to their wildome, they should rather haue forborne to present vnto the Citie, or to the Countries neere adioyning any terror of the warre. For the dissension within the walls might sone haue done more good then could be receiued from the Fleet or Armie without, which indeed gaue occasion to set the Citizens at vnitie, though it lasted not very long. The foure hundred, by means of these troubles, were faine to resigne their authority, which they could not now hold, when the people hauing taken armes to repel forraigne enemies, would not lay them downe, till they had freed themselves from such as oppressed the State at home. Yet was not this alteration of government a full restitution of the soueraigne command vnto the people, or whole body of the Citie, but onely to five thousand; which company the foure hundred (when their authority beganne) had pretended to take vnto them as assistance: herein seeming to doo little wrong or none to the Commonalty, who seldome assembled in greater number. But now when the highest power was come indeede into the hands of so many, it was soone agreed that Alcibiades and his Companions should bee recalled from exile, and that the Armie at Samos should be requested to vndertake the gouernement: which was forthwith reformed according to the Souldiers desire.

§. X. 30

How ALCI BI A D E S wanne many important victories for the Athenians; was recalled from exile; made their Generall, and againe depoyed.

His establishment of things in the Citie, was accompanied with some good successe in the warres. For the Lacedemonians were about the same time ouerthrowne at Sea, in a great battaile, by the Athenian fleet, which had remained at Samos, to which Alcibiades after was joyning such forces as he could raise, obtained many victories. Before the Towne of Abydos, his arriual with eightene ships, gaue the honour of a great battaile to the Athenians; he ouerthrew and utterly destroyed the fleet of the Lacedemonians, commanded by Mindarus, tooke the Townes of Cyzicus, and Perinthus, made the Selymbrians ranforme their Citie, and fortified Crypsopolis. Hereupon letters were sent to Sparta, which the Athenians, intercepting, found to containe the distresse of the Armie in these few words: All is lost; MINDARVS is slaine; the Souldier want victuals; we know not what to doe.

Shortly after this, Alcibiades ouerthrew the Lacedemonians in fight by Land at Chalcedon, tooke Selymbria, besieged and wane Byzantium, now called Constantinople, which euen in those dayes was a goodly, rich, and very strong Citie. Hereupon he returned home with very great welcome, and was made high Admirall of all the Naue.

But this his honour continued not long; for it was taken from him, and he driuen to banish himselfe againe; only because his Lieutenant, contrary to the expresse command of Alcibiades, fighting with the enemies in his absence, had lost a great part of the fleet.

The second banishment of Alcibiades was to the Athenians more harmful than the first; and the losse which thereupon they receiued, was (though more heauie to them, yet) lesse to be pittied of others, than that which ensued vpon his former exile. For whereas at the first, he had sought reuenge vpon his owne Citie; now, as inured to aduersitie, he rather pittied their furie, who in time of such danger had cast out him that should haue repaired their weake estate, than sought by procuring or beholding the calamitie of his people, to comfort himselfe after iniurie receiued. Before they, who were instituted in the place of Alcibiades, arriued at the fleet, he presented battaile to Lyfander the Lacedemonian Admirall, who was not so confident vpon his former victorie, as to vndertake Alcibiades himselfe, bringing ships more in number (notwithstanding the former losse of fiftene) than his enemies had, and better ordered than they had bene vnder his Lieutenant. But when the decree of the people was published in the Naue, then did Alcibiades with-draw himselfe to a Towne vpon Hellefpoint, called Bizanzie, where hee had built a Castle.

§. XI.

The battaile at Arginusa, and condemnation of the victorious Athenian Captaines by the people.

After this time, the Athenians receiving many losses & difcomfitures, were driuen to flie into the Hauen of Mytelene, where they were straighly besieged both by Land and Sea. For the raising of this siege necessity inforced them to man all their Vessells, and to put the vttermost of their forces into the hazzard of one battaile. This battaile was fought at Arginusæ, where Callicratidas, Admirall of the Lacedæmonians, losing the honor of the day, preferred his owne reputation by dying valiantly in the fight. It might well haue bene expected, that the ten Capitaines, who jointly had command in chiefe ouer the Athenian fleet, should for that good daies seruice, and so happy victorie, haue receiued great honour of their Citizens. But contrariwise they were forth-with called home, and accused, as if willfully they had suffered many of the Citizens, whose ships were broken and sunke, to be cast away, when by appointing some Vessels to take them vp, they might haue saued them from being drowned. Hereto the Capitaines readily made a very iust answer; That they pursuing the victorie, had left part of the fleet, vnder sufficient men, to saue those that were wrack; which if it were not well accomplished, it was, because a tempest arising about the end of the fight, had hindred the performance of that, and other their intendments. This excuse auailed not: For a lewd fellow was brought forth, who said, That he himselfe escaping in a meale-rubbe, had bene intreated by those who were in perill of drowning, to desire of the people reuenge of their deaths vpon the Capitaines. It was very strange, that vpon such an accusation maintained with so slender euidence, men that had well deserved of their Countrey should bee overthrown. But their enemies had so incensed the rascall multitude, that no man durst abolsue them, save only Socrates the wife and vertuous Philosopher, whose voice in this judgement was not regarded. Sixe of them were put to death, of whom one 20 had hardly escaped drowning, and was with much a-doe relieued by other vessells in the storme: but the Capitaines which were absent escaped, for when the furie of the people was ouer-past, this judgement was reuerfed, and the accusers called into question for hauing deceiued and peruered the Citizens. Thus the Athenians went about to free themselves from the infamie of iniustice; but the diuine iustice was not a-sleepe, nor would be so deluded.

§. XII.

The battaile at Egos-Potamos, wherein the whole State of Athenes was ruined, with the end of the Peloponnesian Warre.

He Peloponnesian fleet vnder Lysander, the yeere next following, hauing scoured the Egean Seas, entred Hellepont, where (landing Souldiers) he besieged and tooke the Towne of Lampascus. Hereupon all the Naue of Athenes, being an hundred and fourescore saile, made thither in haste, but finding Lampascus taken before their coming, they put in at Sestos, where hauing refreshed themselves, they failed to the Riuer called, Egos-Potamos, which is (as we might name it) Gates-brooke, or the Riuer of the Gates; being on the Continent, opposite to Lampascus: and theretey cast Anchors, not one whole league off from Lysander, who rode at Lampascus in the harbour. The next day after their arriual they presented fight vnto the Peloponnesians, who refused it, whereupon the Athenians returned againe to Egos-Potamos, and thus they continued five dayes, brauing euery day the Enemy, and returning to their owne harbour when it drew towards euening.

The Cable of Alcibiades was not farre from the Naue, and his power in those places was such as might haue greatly auailed his Countreimen, if they could haue made vse of it. For he had waged Mercenaries, and making warre in his owne name 30 vpon some people of the Thracians, had gathered much wealth, and obtained much reputation among them. He perceiving the disorderly course of the Athenian Commanders, repaired vnto them, and shewed what great inconuenience might grow, if they did not soone fore-see and preuent it. For they lay in a roade subject to euery weather, neither neere enough to any Towne where they might furnish themselves with necessaries, nor so farre off as had bene more expedient. Sestos was the next Market-Towne; thither both Souldiers and Mariners resorted, flocking away from the Naue euery day, as soone as they were returned from brauing the Enemy. Therefore Alcibiades willed them either to lie at Sestos, which was not farre off, or at the least to consider better how neere their enemy was, whose feare proceeded rather from obedience to his General, than from any cowardise. This admonition was so farre despised, that some of the Commanders willed him to meddle with his owne matters, and to remember that his authoritie was out of date. Had it not bene for these opprobrious words, hee could (as hee told his familiars) haue compelled the Lacedæmonians, either to fight vpon vnequall termes, or vterly to quit their Fleet. And like enough it was that hee might so haue done by transporting the light-armed Thracians his Confederates, and others his Followers ouer the Straights, who assaulting the Peloponnesians by Land, would either haue compelled them to put to Sea, or else to leaue their ships to the mercy of the Athenians. But finding their acceptance of his good counsaile no better than hath bene rehearsed, he left them to their fortune, which how cull it would be he did prognosticate.

Lysander all this while defending himselfe by the aduantage of his Hauen, was not carelesse in looking into the demeanour of the Athenians. When they departed, his manner was to send forth some of his swiftest Vessels after them, who observing their doings, related vnto him what they had seene. Therefore vnderstanding in what carelesse fashion they romed vp and downe the Countrey; he kept all his men a-board after their departure, and the fifth day gaue especiall charge to his Scouts, That when they perceived the Athenians; disembarking, as their custome was, and walking towards Sestos, they should forth with returne, and hang vp a brazen shield in the Prow, as a token for him to weigh Anchor.

The Scouts performed their charge, and Lysander being in a readinesse; made all speed that strength of Oares could giue, to Egos-Potamos, where he found very few of his enemies a-board their Ships, not many neere them, and all in great confusion vpon the newes of his approach.

Inasmuch that the greatest indurtrie which the Athenians then shewed, was in the escape of eight or nine ships; which knowing how much that losse imported, gaue ouer Athenes as desperate, and made a long flight vnto the Ile of Cyprus, all the rest were taken, and such of the Souldiers as came in to the rescue cut in pieces. Thus was the warre which had lasted seuen and twentie yeeres, with variable successe concluded in one houre, and the glory of Athenes in such wise eclipsed, that she neuer afterward shone in her perfect light.

Immediately vpon this victorie Lysander, hauing taken such Townes as readily did yeeld vpon the first fame of his exploit, set sayle for Athenes, and ioyning his forces with those of Agis and Paulanias, Kings of Sparta, summoned the Citie, which finding too stubborne to yeeld, and too strong to bee wonne on the sudden, hee put forth againe to Sea, and rather by terror than violence, compelling all the Ilands, and such Townes of the Ionians, as had formerly held of the Athenians, to submit themselves to Sparta, hee did therewith cut off all prouision of vituals, and other necessaries, from the Citie, and enforced the people by meere famine to yeeld to these conditions: That the long walles, leading from the Towne to the Port, should bee throwne downe; That all Citie subiect to their Eilate, should be set at libertie; That the Athenians should bee Masters only of their owne Territories, and the fields adioyning to their Towne; And that they should keepe no more then twelue Ships; That they should hold as Friends or Enemies, the same, whom the Lacedæmonians did, and follow the Lacedæmonians as Leaders in the Warres.

These

These articles being agreed vpon, the walls were throwne downe with great rejoycing of those who had borne displeasure to Athen; and not without some consultation of destroying the Citie, and laying waste the Land about it. Which aduice, although it was not entertained, yet were thirtie Gouernours, or rather cruell Tyrants, appointed ouer the people, who recompensed their former insolencie and iniustice ouer their Captaines, by oppressing them with all bale and intolerable slaerie.

The only small hope then remaining to the Athenians, was, that Alcibiades might perhaps repaire what their owne folly had ruined. But the thirtie Tyrants perceiving this, aduertised the Lacedemonians thereof, who continued, and (as it now domineering in euery quarter) soone effected his suddaine death.

Such end had the Peloponnesian Warre. After which the Lacedemonians abusing the reputation, and great power, which therein they had obtained, grew very odious to all Greece, and by Combination of many Cities against them, were dispossessed of their high authoritie, euen in that very Age, in which they had subdued Athen. The greatest foile that they tooke was of the Thebans, led by Epaminondas, vnder whom Philip of Macedon, Father to Alexander the Great, had the best of his education. By these Thebans, the Citie of Sparta (besides other great losses received) was sundrie times in danger of being taken. But these haughtie attempts of the Thebans came finally to nothing; for the seuerall Estates and Signories of Greece, were growne so jealous one of anothers greatnesse, that the Lacedemonians, Athenians, Argines, and Thebans, which were the mightiest, associating themselves with the weaker partie, did so counterpoize the stronger, that no one Citie could extend the limits of her iurisdiction so farre as might make her terrible to her Neighbours. And thus all parts of the Countrey remained rather euenly balanced, than well agreeing, till such time as Philip, and after him Alexander, Kings of Macedon, (whose forefathers had become dependants, and followers, yea almost meere Vassalls to the Estates of Athen and Sparta) found meanes, by making vse of their factions, to bring them all into seruitude, from which they neuer could be free, till the Romanes presenting them with a shew of libertie, did themselves indeede become their Masters.

CHAP. IX.

Of matters concurring with the Peloponnesian Warre, or shortly following it.

§. I.

How the affaires of Persia stood in these times.

10 DURING the times of this Peloponnesian Warre, and those other lesse expeditions foregoing it, Artaxerxes Longimanus, having peaceably enjoyed a long raigne ouer the Persians, left it by his death either to Darius, who was called Darius Nothus, or the Bastard, whom the Greece Historians (lightly passing ouer Xerxes the second, and Sogdianus, as Vsurpers, and for their short raigne little to be regarded) place next vnto him, or to Xerxes the second, who, and his brother Sogdianus after him (seeming to haue bene the sonnes of Hester) held the Kingdome but one yeere betweene them, the younger succeeding his elder brother. It is not my purpose (as I haue said before) to pursue the Historie of the Persians from henceforth, by rehearfall of all the particulars, otherwise then as they shall be incident to the affaires of Greece. It may therefore suffice to say, That Xerxes the second, being a vicious Prince, did per-
 30 ther Sogdianus. Likewise of Sogdianus it is found, that being as ill as his brother, and more cruell, he slew vnjustly Bagoraxus a principall Eunuch, and would haue done as much to his brother Darius the Bastard, had not hee foreseene it, and by raising a stronger Armie than this hated King Sogdianus could leaue, seized at once vpon the King and Kingdome. Darius hauing slaine his brother, held the Empire sinetene yeeres. Amyrtam of Sais an Egyptian rebelled against him, and hauing partly slaine, partly chased out of the Land the Persian Garrisons, allied himselfe so firmly with the Greekes, that by their aide he maintained the Kingdome, and deliuered it ouer to his posteritie, who (notwithstanding the furie of their ciuill Warres) maintained it against the Persian, all the daies of this Darius, and of his sonne Artaxerxes
 40 Menemon. Likewise Amorges, a subject of his owne and of the Rollall bloud, being Lieutenant of Caria, rebelled against him; confederating himselfe with the Athenians. But the great calamitie, before spoken of, which fell vpon the Athenians in Sial, hauing put new life into the Spartians, and giuen courage to the flanders and others, subject to the State of Athen, to shake off the yoke of their long continued bondage: It fell out well for Darius, that the Lacedemonians being destitute of money, wherewith to defray the charge of a great Nauie, without which it was impossible to aduance the warre against the State of Athen, that remained powerfull by Sea, were driuen to craue his assistance, which he granted vnto them, first vpon what conditions best pleased himselfe, though afterwards the articles of the league
 50 betweene him and them were set downe in more precise termes; wherein it was concluded, That he and they should make warre joyntly vpon the Athenians, and vpon all that should rebell from either of them, and (which was highly to the Kings honour and profit) that all the Cities of Asia, which had formerly bene his, or his Predecessours, should returne to his obedience. By this Treatie, and the warre en-

saing (of which I haue already spoken) he recovered all that his Grand-father and Father had lost in Asia. Likewise by assistance of the Lacedaemonians he got Amorges a-lie into his hands, who was taken in the Citie of Iesus; the Athenians wanting either force or courage to succour him. Neuertheless Aegypt still held out against him; the cause whereof cannot bee the employment of the Persian forces on the parts of Greece, for he abounded in men, of whom he had enough for all occasions, but they wanted manhood, which caused him to fight with gold, which effected for him by Souldiers of other Nations, and his naturall enemies, what the valour of his owne Subjects was insufficient to performe. Darius had in marriage Parysatis his owne sister, who bare vnto him (besides other children) Artaxerxes called Memnon, that is to say, the Mindfull, or the Rememberer, who succeeded him in the Kingdome; and Cyrus the younger a Prince of singular vertue, and accounted by all that knew him, the most excellent man that euer Persia bred after Cyrus the Great. But the old King Darius, intending to leave vnto his elder sonne Artaxerxes the inheritance of that great Empire, did cast a jealous eye vpon the doings of young Cyrus, who being Lieutenant of the lower Asia, tooke more vpon him than befit a Subject: for which cause his father sent for him, with intent to haue taken some very sharpe course with him, had not his owne death prevented the coming of his younger sonne, and placed the elder in his Throne. Of the warre betweene these brethren, and summarily of Artaxerxes, we shall haue occasion to speake somewhat in more conuenient place.

§. II.

How the thirtie Tyrants got their Dominion in Athens.

Hold it in this place most conuenient to shew the proceedings of the Greekes, after the subuersion of the walls of Athens, which gaue end to that warre called the Peloponnesian warre, but could not free the vnhappy Countie of Greece from ciuill broiles. The thirtie Gouernours, commonly called the thirtie Tyrants of Athens, were chosen at the first by the people to compile a body of their Law, and make a collection of such ancient Statutes, as were meetest to be put in practice: the condition of the Citie standing as it did in that so sodaine alteration. To this charge was annexed the supreme authoritie, either as a recompence of their labours, or because the necessity of the times did so require it, wherein the Law being vncertaine, it was fit that such men should giue iudgement in particular causes, to whose iudgement the Lawes themselves, by which the Citie was to bee ordered, were become subiect. But these thirtie hauing got great power in their hands, were more carefull to hold it, than to deserve it, by faithfull execution of that which was committed to them in trust.

Therefore apprehending such troublesome fellowes, as were odious to the citie, though not punishable therefore by law, they condemned them to death; which proceeding was by all men highly approved, who considered their lewd conditions, but did not without thinke themselves, how easie a thing it would be vnto these thirtie men, to take away the liues of Innocents, by calling them perturbors of the peace, or what else they listed, when condemnation without due trial and proofe had bene once well allowed. Hauing thus plausibly entred into a wicked course of gouernement, they thought it best to fortifie themselves with a sure guard, ere they brake out into those disorders, which they must needs commit for the establishing of their authoritie. Wherefore dispatching two of their owne companie to Sparta, they informed the Lacedaemonians, that it was the full intent of the thirtie, to keepe the City free from all rebellious motions, to which purpose it behoued them to cut off such as were seditious; and therefore desired the Lacedaemonians to send them them a Garrison, which they promised at their owne cost to maintain. This motion was well approved, and a guard sent, the Captaine of which was so well entertained by the thirtie, that none of their misdeedes could want his high commendations at Sparta. Hereupon the Tyrants beganne to take heart, and looking no more after base and deserv'd persons, invaded the principall men of the City, knding armed men from House to House, who drew out such as were of great reputation, and likely, or able to make any head against this wicked forme of gouernement: whereby there was such effusion of blood, as to Theramenes (one of the thirtie) seemed very horrible, and vnable to escape vengeance. His dislike of their proceedings being openly discovered, caused his fellowes to berinke themselves, and provide for their owne security, and his destruction, lest he should make himselfe a Captaine of the discontented (which were almost the whole Citie) and redeme his owne peace with their ruine. Wherefore they selected three thousand of the Citizens, whom they thought meetest, and gaue vnto them some part of publicke authority; the rest they disarm'd; and hauing thus increased their owne strength, and weakened their opposites, they began a-fresh to shed the blood, not only of their priuat enemies, but of such whose money, or goods, might enrich them, and enable them for the payment of their guard. And to this purpose they concluded, that every one of them should name one man, vpon whose goods he should seize, putting the owner to death. But when Theramenes uttered his detestation of so wicked intent; then did Critias, who of all the thirtie was most tyrannicall, accuse him to the Councell, as a treacherous man, and (whereas one maine priuiledge of the three thousand was, that none of them should suffer death at the appointment of the thirtie, but haue the accustomed trial) he took vpon him to strike out of that number the name of Theramenes, and so reduced him vnder the triall and sentence of that order. It was well alleaged by Theramenes, that his name was not more easie to be blotted out of the Catalogue, than any other mans, vpon which consideration, he aduised them all to conuie no other wife of his case, than as of their owne, who were liable to the same forme of proceeding: but (every man choosing rather to preserve his owne life by silence, than presently to draw vpon himselfe the danger, which as yet concerned him little, and perhaps would neuer come neerer him) the Tyrants interpreting silence as consent, condemned him forthwith, and compelled him to drinke poison.

§. III.

The conspiracie against the thirtie Tyrants, and their depositor.

After the death of Theramenes, the thirtie began to vse such outrage, as excelled their former villanies. For hauing three thousand (as they thought) firme vnto them, they robbed all others without feare or shame, despoiling them of lands and goods, and causing them to flie into banishment, for safeguard of their liues. This flight of the Citizens procured their libertie, and the generall good of the City. For the banished Citizens, who were fled to Thebes, entred into consultation, and resolved to hazard their liues in setting free the Citie of Athens. The very thought of such a practice had bene treason at home, which had no other danger abroad, than might be found in the execution. Seuentie men, or thereabout, were the first undertakers, who with their Captaine Thrasybulus tooke Phyla, a place of strength in the Territorie of Athens. No sooner did the thirtie heare of their exploit, than secke meanes to prevent further dangers, assembling the three thousand, and their Lacedaemonian guard, with which force they attempted Phyla, but were with some losse of their men repelled. Finding the place too strong to be taken by assault, they intended to besiege it; which purpose came to nought by means of snow that fell, and other stormie weather, weather, against which they had not made provision. Retiring therefore to the Citie, which about all they were to make good, they left the most of their guard, and two companies of Horse, to wearie out them which lay in Phyla, with a flying siege. But it was not long ere the followers of Thraſybulus were increased from ſeventy to ſeven hundred, which adventured to give charge vpon theſe guards, of whom they cut off about an hundred & twenty. Theſe ſmall, but prosperous beginnings, added more to the number of thoſe in Phyla, who now with a thouſand men got entrance into Piræus, the ſuburbe of Athenes, lying on the Port. Before their coming, the thirtieth had reſolved to ſiſte the Towne of Eleuſine, to their owne uſe, whereto they might make an eaſie retreat, and ſaue themſelves from any ſudden perill. It may well ſeeme ſtrange, that whereas their barbarous manner of gouernment had brought them into ſuch danger, they were ſo farre from ſeeking to obtaine mens good wil, that contrariwiſe, to aſſure themſelves of Eleuſine, they got all of the place who could beare armes into their hands by a traine, and wickedly (though vnder forme of iuſtice) murdered them all. But, ſcleribus tutum per ſclera eſt iter, the miſchiefs which they had already done were ſuch, as left them no hope of going backward, nor any other apparant likelihood of ſafety, than by extending their crueltie vnto all, ſeeing few or none were left, whom they could truſt. When Thraſybulus and his fellows, who as yet were termed conſpirators, had taken the Piræus, then were the three thouſand armed againe by the Tyrants, and brought to aſſault it; but in this enterpriſe Thraſybulus had the better, and repelled his enemies, of whom althoough there were ſlaine to the number of ſeuentie, onely yet the victory ſeemed the greater, becauſe Critias, & one other of the thirty, periſhed in that fight. The death of Critias, and the ſtout defence of Piræus, together with ſome exhortations vſed by Thraſybulus to the Citizens, wrought ſuch effect, that the thirtieth were depoſed. Neuertheleſſe there were ſo many of the three thouſand, who hauing communicated with the thirty in their miſdeeds, feared to be called to a ſharpe account, that no peace, nor quiet forme of gouernment could be eſtabliſhed. For Embaſſadors were ſent to Sparta, who crauing aide againſt Thraſybulus, and his followers, had favourable audience, and a power ſent to their aſſiſtance, both by Land and Sea, vnder the conduct of Lyſander, and his Brother; whom Pauiſanias the Spartan King did follow, raiſing an Armie of the Cities confederate with the Lacedæmonians. And here appeared firſt the iealouſie, wherein ſome people held the State of Sparta. The Beotians, and Corinthians, who in the late warres had been the moſt bitter enemies to Athenes, reſuſed to follow Pauiſanias in this expedition; alleging that it ſtood not with their othes, to make warre againſt that people, who had not hitherto broken any one article of the league: but fearing, indeede, leſt the Lacedæmonians ſhould annexe the Territorie of Athenes to their owne Demaines. It is not to be doubted, that Pauiſanias tooke this anſwere in good part. For it was not his purpoſe to deſtroy thoſe againſt whom he went, but only to croſſe the proceedings of Lyſander, whom he enuied. Therefore hauing in ſome ſmall ſkirmiſhes againſt them of Thraſybulus his party, made a ſhew of warre, finally wrought ſuch meanes, that all things were compounded quietly: the thirtieth men, and ſuch others, as were like to giue cauſe of tumult, being ſent to Sparta. The remainder of that tyrannicall faction, hauing with-drawne themſelves to Eleuſine, were ſhortly after found to attempt ſome inuolution; wherevpon the whole Citie riſing againſt them, took their Captaines, as they were coming to Parlie, and ſlew them: which done, to auoid further inconuenience, a law was made, that all iniuries paſt ſhould be forgotten, and no man called into queſtion for wrongs committed. By which order, wiſely made, and carefully obſerued, the Citie returned to her former quietneſſe.

CHAP. X.

Of the expedition of CYRVS the younger.

§. I.

The grounds of CYRVS his attempt againſt his brother.

THE matters of Greece now ſtanding vpon ſuch termes, that no one Eſtate durſt oppoſe it ſelfe againſt that of Lacedæmon; young Cyrus brother to Artaxerxes, King of Persia, hauing in his fathers life time very carefully proteſtuted the warre againſt Athenes, did ſend his meſſengers to Sparta, requeſting that their loue might appear no leſſe to him, than that which he had ſhewed towards them in their dangerous warre againſt the Athenians. To this requeſt, being general, the Lacedæmonians gaue a ſutable anſwere, commanding their Admirall to performe vnto Cyrus all ſeruiſe that hee ſhould require of him. If Cyrus had plainly diſcovered himſelfe, and the Lacedæmonians bent their whole power to his aſſiſtance, very like it is, that either the Kingdom of Persia ſhould haue been the recompence of his deſerts, or that he periſhing in battaile, as after he did, the ſubuerſion of that Empire had forthwith enſued. But it pleaſed God, rather to ſhew vnto the Greekes the waies, which vnder the Academonian Enſignes, the victorious foot-ſteps of their poſteritie ſhould meaſure; and opening vnto them the riches, and withall the weakeneſſe of the Persians, to kindle in them both deſire and hope of that conqueſt, which he referred to another generation; than to giue into their hands that mightie Kingdom, whoſe houre was not yet come. The loue which Pariſatis, the Queene-Mother of Persia bare vnto Cyrus her yonger ſonne, being ſeconded by the earneſt fauour of the people, and ready deſires of many principall men, had moued this yong Prince, in his fathers old age, to aſpire after the ſucceſſion. But being ſent for by his Father (as hath before bene ſhewed) whoſe meaning was to curb this ambitious youth; hee found his elder brother Artaxerxes eſtabliſhed ſo ſurely by the old Kings fauour, that it were not ſafe to attempt any meanes of diſplanting him, by whoſe diſfauour, himſelf might eaſily loſe the place of a Viceroy, which he held in Aſia the leſſe, and hardly be able to maintaine his owne life. The neereſt neighbour to Cyrus of all the Kings Deputies in the lower Aſia, was Tiſſaphernes, a man compounded of cowardice, treacherie, craft, and all vices which accuſtomably branch out of theſe. This man accompanied Cyrus to his Father, vſing by the way all faire ſhewes of friendſhip, as to a Prince, for whom it might well be thought, that Queene Pariſatis had obtained the inheritance of that mightie Empire. And it was very true, that Pariſatis had vſed the beſt of her endeavour to that purpoſe, alleging that (which in former ages had bin much auailable to Xerxes, in the like diſceparation with his elder brother) Artaxerxes was borne whileſt his father was a private man, but Cyrus, when he was a crowned King. All which not ſufficing; when the moſt that could be obtained for Cyrus, was the pardon of ſome preſumptuous demeanour, and confirmation of his place in Lydia, and the parts adioyning; then did this Tiſſaphernes diſcover his nature, and accuſe his friend Cyrus to the new King Artaxerxes, of a dangerous treaſon intended againſt his perſon. Vpon this accuſation, whether true or falſe, very easily belcued, Cyrus was arrested, and by the most vehement intreatie of his Mother very hardly deliuered, and sent back into his owne Prouince.

§. II.

The preparations of Cyrus; and his first entrie into the Warre.

THe forme of gouernment which the Persian Lieutenants vsed in their seuerall Prouinces, was in many points almost Regall. For they made Warre and Peace, as they thought it meete, not onely for the Kings behoofe, but for their owne reputation; vsually indeede with the Kings enemies, yet sometimes one with another: which was the more easily tolerated, because their owne heads were held only at the Kings pleasure, which caused them to frame all their doings to his will, whatsoever it were, or they could coniecture it to be. Cyrus therefore being settled in Lydia, began to consider with himselfe, the interest that he had in the Kingdome; the small assurance of his brothers loue, held only by his Mothers intercession; the disgrace endured by his late imprisonment; and the meanes which he had by loue of his owne people, and that good neighbourhood of the Lacedemonians, whom he had bound vnto him, to obtaine the Crowne for himselfe. Neither was it expedient that he should so long sit idle, as waighting till occasion should present it selfe: but rather enterprise somewhat whilst yet his Mother liued, who could procure a good interpretation to all his actions, if they were no worse than only questionable. Hereupon he first beganne to quarrell with Tissaphernes, and seized vpon many Townes of his iurisdiction, annexing them to his owne Prouince; which displeased not Artaxerxes at all, who (besides that hee was of condition somewhat simple) being truly paid by Cyrus the accustomed Tributes out of those places, was well contented to see his brothers hot spirit exercised in priuate quarrels. But Tissaphernes, whose base conditions were hated, & cowardise despised, although he durst not adventure to take armes against Cyrus, yet perceiving that the Milesiens were about to giue vp themselves into the hands of that yong Prince, as many other townes of the Ionians had done, thought by terrour to preserve his reputation, and keepe the Towne in his owne hands. Wherefore he slew many, and many he banished, who flying to Cyrus, were gently entertained, as bringing faire occasion to take armes, which was no small part of his desire. In leuying Souldiers he vsed great policie; for he took not only the men of his owne Prouince, or of the Countreys adioyning, whose liues were readie at his will; but secretly he furnished some Gracian Captaines with money, who being very good men of warre, entertained Souldiers therewith, some of them warring in Thrace, others in Thebais, others elsewhere in Greece; but all of them ready to crosse the Seas, at the first call of Cyrus, till which time they had secret instructions to prolong their seuerall warres, that the Souldiers might be held in continuall exercise, and readie in armes vpon the sudden. Cyrus hauing sent a power of men to besiege Miletus, forthwith summoned these bands of the Greekes, who very readily came ouer to his assistance, being thirtene thousand very firme Souldiers, and able to make head (which is almost incredible) against the whole power of Artaxerxes. With this Armie, and that which he had leuied before, hee could very easily haue forced Miletus, and chased away Tissaphernes out of Asia the lesse: but his purpose was not so to lose time in small matters, that was to be imploied in the accomplishment of higher delignes. Pretending therefore that the Pisidians, a people of Asie the lesse, not subiect to the Persian, had invaded his Territory, he raised the siege of Miletus, and with all speed marched Eastward, leauing Tissaphernes much amazed, who had no leisure to reioyce that Cyrus had left him to himselfe, when he considered, that so great an Army, and so strong, was neuer leuied against the Routers of Pisidia, but rather against the great King his Master. For which cause taking a band of five hundred horse, hee posted away to carrie tidings to the Court, of this great preparation.

§. III.

How Cyrus tooke his iourney into the higher Asia, and came vp close to his Brother.

THe tumult which his coming brought was very great, and great the exclamations of the Queen Statira, against Parisatis, the Queene-Mother, whom she called the Author and occasioner of the warre. But whilst the King in great feare was arming the high Countreys in his defence, the danger hastned vpon him very fast. For Cyrus made great marches, hauing his numbers much increased, by the repaire of his Countymen, though most strengthened by the access of seue hundred Greekes, and of other foure hundred of the same Nation, who reuoluted vnto him from the King. How terrible the Greekes were to the Barbarians, he found by triall in a Muttier, which (to please the Queene of Cilicia, who had brought him aide) he made in Phrygia; where the Greekes by his direction making offer of a charge vpon the rest of his Armie, which contained a hundred thousand men, the whole Campe (not perceiving that this was but a brauerie) fled a-maine, the victuallers and baggagers forsaking their cabins, and running all away for very feare. This was to Cyrus a ioyfull spectacle, who knew very well, that his brother was followed by men of the same temper, and the more vnlily to make resistance, because they were prest to the warre against their will and dispositions, whereas his Armie was drawne a-long by meere affection and good will. Neuerthelesse he found it a very hard matter to perswade the Greekes to passe the Riuer of Euphrates. For the very length of the way which they had troden, wearied them with conceit of the tedious returne. Therefore he was driuen, being yet in Cilicia, to seeke excuses, telling them, that Abrocomas, one of the Kings principall Captaines, and his owne great enemy, lay by the Riuer, against whom he requested them to assist him. By such deuices, and excessive promise of reward, he brought them to Euphrates, where some of the Greekes considering, That who so passed the Riuer first, should haue the most thanks, and might failely returne if the rest should refuse to follow them, they entred the Foorde, whereby were all finally perswaded to doe as some had beganne, and being allured by great hopes, they resolu'd to seeke out Artaxerxes, where soeuer he was to be found. The King in the meane time hauing raised an army of nine hundred thousand men, was not so confident vpon this huge multitude, as to aduenteure them in triall of a plaine battaile. Abrocomas, who with three hundred thousand men, had vnder-taken to make good the Straights of Syria, which were very narrow, and fortified with a strong wall, and other defences of nature, and art, which made the place to seeme impregnable, had quitted the passage, and retired himself toward the Kings forces; not daring to look Cyrus in the face, who despairing to finde any way by Land, had procured the Lacedemonian fleet, by the benefit whereof to haue transported his Armie. I doe not finde that this cowardise of Abrocomas, or of his Souldiers, who arriued not at the Campe, till fuedaies were past after the battaile, receiued either punishment, or disgrace; for they, toward whom he with-drew himselfe, were all made of the same metall.

Therefore Artaxerxes was vpon the point of retiring to the vttermost bounds of his Kingdome, vntill by Teribazus, one of his Captaines, he was perswaded not to abandon so many goodly Prouinces to the Enemy, who would thereby haue gathered addition of strength, and (which in the sharpe disposition of Title to a Kingdome is most auailable) would haue growne superiour in reputation. By such aduice, the King resolu'd vpon meeting with his brother, who now began to be cure, being fully persuaded, that Artaxerxes would neuer dare to abide him in the field. For the King hauing cast vp a Trench of almost fortie miles in length, about thirtie foot broad, and eightene foote deepe, intended there to haue encamped: but his courage failing him, he abandoned that place, thinking nothing so safe, as to be farre distant from his enemies.

K k k k 3 cure,

§. IIII.

The battaile betweene Cyrus and Artaxerxes.

THe Armie of Cyrus hauing overcome many difficulties of euil waies, and scarcitie of victuals, was much encouraged by perceiuing this great feare of Artaxerxes, & being past this trench, marched carelesly in great disorder, hauing bellowed their Armes in Carts, and vpon Beasts of carriage; when on the sudden one of their Vaunt-currors, brought newes of the Kings approach. Hereupon with great tumult they armed themselues, and had ranged their battailes in good order vpon the side of the River Euphrates, where they waited for the coming of their enemies, whom they saw not till it was after-noon. But when they saw the cloud of dust raised by the feete of that huge multitude, which the King drew after him, and perceiued by their neere approach how well they were marshalled, comming on very orderly, in silence, whereas it had bene expected, that rushing violently with loude clamours, they should haue spent all their force vpon the first brunt; and when it appeared that the fronts of the two Armies were so vnequall in dissent, being all embattailed in one bodie and square, that Cyrus taking his place (as was the Persian manner) in the midst of his owne, did not with the corner, and vtmost point thereof, reach to the halfe breadth of Artaxerxes his battaile, who carried a front proportionable to his number, exceeding nine times that of Cyrus: then did the Greekes begin to distrust their owne manhood, which was not accustomed to make proofe of it self, vpon such excellent oddes. It was almost incredible, that so great an Armie should bee so easily chased. Neuerthelesse, it quickly appeared, that these Persians, hauing learned (contrary to their custome) to giue charge vpon their enemies with silence; had not learned (for it was contrary to their nature) to receiue a strong charge with courage. Vpon the very first offer of on-set, made by the Greekes, all that beastly rabble of cowards fled amaine, without abiding the stroke, or staying till they were within reach of a Dart. The Chariots armed with hookes and sithes (whereof Artaxerxes had two hundred, and Cyrus not twentie) did small hurt that day, because the drivers of them leaping downe, fled away on foot. This base demeanour of his enemies gaue so much confidence to Cyrus, and his Followers, that such as were about him forth-with adored him as King. And certainly, the Title had bene assured vnto him that day, had not he fought how to declare himselfe worthy of it, ere yet he had obtained it. For, perceiuing that Artaxerxes, who found that part of the field which lay before him void, was about to encompass the Greekes, and to set vpon them in the reare, he aduanced with fixe hundred Horse, and gaue so valiant a charge vpon a Squadron of fixe thousand, which lay before the King, that he brake it, slaying the Capitaine thereof, Artageses, with his owne hands, and putting all the rest to flight. Hereupon his whole companie of fixe hundred, very few excepted, began to follow the chase, leauing Cyrus too ill attended, who perceiuing where the King stood in troupe, vncertaine whether to fight, or leaue the field, could not containe himselfe; but said; I see the man: and presently with a small handfull of men about him ranne vpon his brother, whom he strake through the Curace, and wounded in the brest. Hauing giuen this stroke, which was his last, he receiued immediately the fatal blow, which gaue period at once to his ambition and life, being wounded vnder the eye with a dart, throwne by a base-fellow, where with astonished, he

he fell dead from his horse, or so hurt, that it was vnpossible to haue recovered him, though all which were with him, did their best for his safety; not caring afterwards for their owne liues, when once they perceiued that Cyrus their Master was slaine. Artaxerxes caufed the head and right hand of his brother to bee forthwith stricken off, and shewed to his people, who now pursuing them, fled apace, calling vpon the name of Cyrus, and desiring him to pardon them. But when this great accident had breathed new courage into the Kings troups, & vterly dismayed such Persian Capitaines, as were now, euen in their owne eyes, no better than rebels; it was not long ere the Campe of Cyrus was taken, being quite abandoned, from whence Artaxerxes, making all speede, arriued quickly at the quarter of the Greekes, which was about three miles from the place where Cyrus fell. There hee met with Tissaphernes, who hauing made way through the battaile of the Greekes, was readie now to ioyne with his Master in spoiling their Tents. Had not the newes, which Artaxerxes brought with him of his brothers death, bene sufficient to counteruaile all disaisters receiued; the exploit of Tissaphernes in breaking through the Greekes would haue yielded little comfort. For Tissaphernes had not slaine any one man of the Greekes, but contrariwise, when he gaue vpon them, they opening their battaile, draue him with great slaughter through them, in such wise, that he rather escaped as out of an hard passage, than forced his way through the Squadron of the Greekes. Hereof the King being informed by him, and that the Greekes, as Masters of the field, gaue chase to all that came in their sight; they ranged their Companies into good order, and followed after these Greekes, intending to set vpon them in reare. But these good Souldiers perceiuing the Kings approach, turned their faces, and made head against him; who not intending to seeke honour with danger of his life, wheeled about and fled, being pursued vnto a certaine Village, that lay vnder a Hill, on the top whereof he made a stand, rather in a brauerie, than with purpose to attempt vpon these bold-fellows any further. For he knew well that his brothers death had secured his estate, whom he would seeme to haue slaine with his owne hand, thinking that fast alone sufficient to giue reputation to his valour; and this reputation he thought that he might now preferre wel enough, by shewing a manly looke, halfe a mile off. On the top of this Hill therefore he aduanced his Standard, a golden Eagle displayed on the top of a Speare. This ensigne might haue encouraged his people, had not some of the Greekes espied it, who not meaning that he should abide so neere them, with all their power marched toward him. The King discouraging their approach, fled vpon the spur; so that none remained in the place of battaile, saue only the Greekes, who had lost that day not one man, nor taken any other harme, than that one of them was hurt with an arrow. Much they wondered that they heard no newes of Cyrus, but thinking that hee was pursuing the Armie, they thought it was fittest for them, hauing that day done enough, to returne to their quarter, and take their Supper, to which they had good appetite, because the expectation of the Kings comming had giuen them no leisure to dine.

§. V.

The hard estate of the Greekes after the fight; and how Artaxerxes in vaine sought to haue made them yield vnto him.

Twas now about the setting of the Sunne, and they bringing home darke night with them, found their Campe spoiled, little, or nothing being left, that might serue for food: so that wanting victuals to satisfie their hunger, they refreshed their wearie bodies with sleepe. In the meane season Artaxerxes returning to his Camp, which he entered by Torch-light, could not enjoy the pleasure of his good fortune entire, because he perceiued perceived that the baseness of his people, and weaknesse of his Empire, was now plainly discovered to the Greekes: which gaue him assurance, that if any of these who had beheld the shamefull demeanor of his Armie, should liue to carry tidings home, it would not be long, ere with greater forces they disputed with him for his whole Signorie. Wherefore hee resolved, to trie all means, whereby hee might bring them to destruction, and not let one escape to carrie tidings of that which he had scene: to which purpose hee sent them a braue message the next morning; Charging them to deliuer vp their Armes, and come to his Gate, to awaite there vpon his Mercie. It seemes that he was in good hope to haue found their high courages broken, vpon report of his brothers death: but he was greatly deceiued in that thought. For the Greekes being aduertised that morning from Arius, a principall Comander vnder Cyrus, that his Master being slaine, he had retired himselfe to the place of their last encamping, about eight miles from them, whence intending to returne into Ionia, his meaning was to dislodge the next day, awaiting for them so long if they would joyne with him, but resolving to stay no longer: they sent answer back to Arius, that hauing beaten the King out of the field, and finding none that durst resist them, they would place Arius himselfe in the Kings Throne, if he would joyne with them, and pursue the victorie. Before they received any reply to this answer, the Messengers of Artaxerxes arrived at the Campe, whose errand seemed to the Captaines very inuolent: One told them that it was not for the Vanquishers to yeeld their Weapons; another, that he would die ere hee yeelded to such a motion; at third asked, whether the King, as hauing the victorie, required their Weapons; if so, why did he not fetch them? or, whether he desired them in way of friendship; for then would they first know, with what courtesie hee meant to requite their kindnesse. To this question Phalimus a Gracian, waiting vpon Tissaphernes, answered; That the King hauing slaine Cyrus, knew no man that could pretend any Title to his Kingdome, in the midst whereof he held them fast enclosed with great Riuers, being able to bring against them such numbers of men, as they wanted strength to kill if they would hold vp their throats, for which cause he accounted them his prisoners. These words, to them, who knew themselves to be free, were nothing pleasant. Therefore, one told Phalimus, that hauing nothing left, but their Armes & Valour, whilest they kept their Armes, their Valour would be seruicable, but should they yeeld them, it was to be doubted, that their bodies would not long remaine their owne. Hereat Phalimus laughed, saying; This young man did seeme a Philosopher, and made a pretty speech; but that his deepe speculation shewed his wits to be very shallow, if he thought with his Armes, and his Valour, to preuaile against the great King. It seemes that Phalimus being a Courtier, and imploied in a businesse of importance, thought himself too profound a Statesman, to be checked in his Embassage by a bookish discoufser. But his wisdom here failed him. For whatsoever he himselfe was (of whom no more is knowne than that he brought an vn honest message to his owne Countreymen, perswading them basely to surrender their Weapons, & Liues, to the mercilesse Barbarians) this young Scholler by him despised, was that great Xenophon, who, when all the principall Commanders were surprisid by treacherie of the Persians, being a private Gentleman, and hauing neuer scene the warres before, vnder-tooke the conduct of the Armie, which he brought safe into Greece, freeing it from all those, and from greater dangers than Phalimus could propound. Some there were who promised to be faithful to the King, as they had beene to Cyrus, offering their seruice in Egypt, where they thought Artaxerxes might haue vse of them. But the final answer was, That without Weapons they could neither doe the King good as Friends, nor defend themselves from him as Enemies. Hereupon Phalimus deliuered the Kings further pleasure, which was to grant them Truce, whilest they abode where they the were, denouncing Warre if they stirred thence; Whereunto hee required their answer. Clearchus the Generall told him, they liked it. How (saith Phalimus) must I vnderstand stand you? as choosing peace if we stay, otherwise warre, said Clearchus. But whether warre or peace? quoth this politike Embassadour. To whom Clearchus (not willing to acquaint him with their purpose.) Let our doings tell you; and so dismissed him, no wiser than he came. All that day the Greekes were laine to feede vpon their Horfes, Asses, and other Beasts, which they rotted with arrowes, darts, and wooden targets, throwne away by the Enemies.

§. VI.

How the Greekes beganne to returne home-wards.

T night they tooke their way towards Arius, to whom they came at mid night; being forsaken by foure hundred foot, and forty horse, all Thracians, who fled ouer the King, by whom how they were entertained, I doe not finde. Like enough it is that they were cut in pieces, for had they been kindly vsed, it may well bee thought that some of them should haue accompanied Tissaphernes, and serued as Stales to draw in the rest. Arius being of too base a temper, and birth, to thinke vpon seeking the Kingdome for himselfe, with such assistance as might haue giuen it vnto Cyrus, was very well pleased to make covenant with them for mutual assistance vnto the last: Whereunto both parts hauing sworn, he aduised them to take another way homeward, which should bee somewhat longer, yet safer and fitter to relieue them with victuals, than that by which they came. The next day, hauing made a wearisome march, and tired the Souldiers, they found the Kings Armie which had coasted them, lodged in certaine Villages, where they purposed themselves to haue encamped: towards which Clearchus made directly, because hee would not seeme by declining them to shew feare, or weaknesse. That the Kings men were contented to remoue, and giue place to their betters, it cannot be strange to any that hath considered their former behaviour; Nor strange, that the Gracians being wearie and hungrie, and lying among enemies in an vnknown Countre, should be very fearefull: but it is almost past beliefe, that the noise which was heard of these poore men, calling one to another tumultuously, as the present condition inforced them to doe, should make the Persians flie out of their Campe, and so affright the great King, that in stead of demanding their Armes, he should craue peace of them. The next day very early, came messengers from Artaxerxes, desiring free access for Embassadours, to entreat of peace. Were it not that such particulars doe best open the qualitie of the persons, by whom things were managed, I should hold it fitter, to runne ouer the general passages of those times, than to dwell among circumstances. But surely it is a point very remarkable, That when Clearchus had willed the Messengers to bid the King prepare for battaile, because the Greekes (as he said) wanting whereupon to dine, could not endure to heare of truce till their bellies were full; Artaxerxes dissembling the indignitie, was contented sweetly to swallow downe this pill, sending them guides, who conducted them to a place where was plentie of victuals to relieue them.

Therto the Greekes, relying vpon their owne vertue, had rather aduanced their affaires, than brought theſelues into any ſtraights or termes of diſaduantage. But now came vnto them the ſubtile Fox Tiſſaphernes, who circumventing the chiefe Commanders by fine ſleights, did miſchicouſly entrappe them, to the extreme danger of the Armie. 10 He told them, that his Prouince, lying neere vnto Greece, had cauſed him greatly to deſire, that their deliuerance might be wrought by his procurement; knowing well that in time to come, both they, and their Countreimen at home, would not be vnthankfull for ſuch a benefit. Herewithall hee forgot not to rehearſe the great ſerue that he had done to his Maſter, being the firſt that aduerted him of Cyrus his intent, and hauing not only brought him a good ſtrength of men, but in the day of battaile ſhewed his face to the Greekes, when all others turned their backs: that he, together with the King, did enter their Campe, and gaue chaſe to the Barbarians that flood on the part of Cyrus. All this (quoth hee) did I alledge to the King, entreating that he would giue me leaue to conſult you ſafe into Greece; in which ſuite 20 I haue good hope to ſpeede, if you will ſend a milde anſwere to him, who hath willed me to aſke you, for what cauſe yee haue borne Armes againſt him. The Captaines hearing this, were contented to giue gentle words, which Tiſſaphernes relating to the King, procured (though very hardly as he ſaid) that peace ſhould be granted: the conditions whereof were; That they ſhould paſſe freely through all the Kings Dominions, paying for what they tooke, and committing no ſpoile: yet that it ſhould be lawfull for them to take victuals by force, in any place that reſuſed to afford them an open Market. Hereunto both parties hauing ſworne, the League was concluded, and Tiſſaphernes returning to the King to take leaue, and end all buſineſſe, came vnto them againe after twentie daies, and then they ſet forward. This 30 interim of twenty daies, which Tiſſaphernes did ſpend at the Court, miniſtered great occaſion of miſtruſt to his new Confederates. For beſides his long abſence, which alone ſufficed to breede doubt; the Brethren, and Kindred of Arius, repairing daily to him, and other Persians to his Souldiers, did work him and them ſo with aſſurance of pardon, and other allurements, that hee daily grew more ſtrange to the Greekes, than formerly he had bene. This cauſed many to aduiſe Clearchus, rather to paſſe forward as well as he might, than to relye vpon couenants, and ſit ſtill whileſt the King laied ſnares to entrap them. But he on the contrarie perſwaded them, to reſtcontented whileſt they were well, and not to caſt themſelues againe into thoſe difficulties, out of which they were newly freed by the late Treatie; reciting 40 withall their owne wants, and the Kings means, but eſpecially the Oathes mutually giuen and taken, wherewith hee ſaw no reaſon why the chemic ſhould haue clogged himſelfe if hee meant miſchicfe, hauing power enough to doe them harme by a faire and open Warre.

Tiſſaphernes was a very honourable Man (if honour may bee valued by greatneſſe and place in Court) which cauſed his Oath to bee the more eſteemed; for as much as no enforcement, or baſe reſpect, was like to haue drawne it from him. But his falſhood was ſuch, both in ſubſtance and in ſucceſſe, he may fitly expound that ſaying, which proceeded from the fountaine of Truth, I hate a rich man alway. 50 A lye may finde excuſe when it growes out of feare, for that paſſion hath his originall from weakeneſſe. But when Power, which is a Character of the Almighty, ſhall be made the ſupporter of vntuſe, the falſhood is moſt abominable; for the offender, like proud Zuſier, aduancing his owne ſtrength againſt the diuine Iuſtice, doth commit that ſinne with an high hand, which commonly producem lamentable table effects, and is followed with ſure vengeance. It was not long ere Tiſſaphernes found means to deſtroy all the Captaines, whom hee ſubtilly got into his power by a traine; making the General Clearchus himſelfe the meane to draw in all the reſt. The buſineſſe was continued thus: Hauing trauailed ſome daies together in ſuch wile, that the Persians did not encampe with the Greekes, who were very jealous of the great familiaritie, appearing betwene Tiſſaphernes, and Arius; Clearchus thought it conuenient to roote out of Tiſſaphernes his braines all cauſes of diſtruſt, whereof many had growne in that ſhort time. To which purpoſe obtaining priuate conference with him, he rehearſed the oath of Confederacie, which had paſt betwene them, ſhewing how religiously he meant to keepe it, and repeating the benefits, which the Greekes did receiue by the helpe of Tiſſaphernes, he promiſed that their loue ſhould appeare to him not vnfruitfull, if he would make vſe of their ſerue againſt the Myſians or Pſidians, who were accuſtomed to infeſt his Prouince, or againſt the Egyptians, who were then Rebels to the great King. For which cauſe he deſired him, that whereas al diuine and humane reſpects had linked them together, he would not giue place to any cloſe accuſation or ſuſpition, whereby might grow ſudden inconuenience to either of them, vpon no juſt ground. The laithleſſe Persian was very much delighted with this ſpeech, which miniſtered faire occaſion to the execution of his purpoſe. Therefore he told Clearchus, that all this was by him 20 wiſely conſidered, wiſhing him further to call to minde how many waies hee could haue vſed to bring them to conſuſion, without perill to himſelfe, eſpecially by burning the Countrey, through which they were to paſſe, whereby they muſt needs haue periſhed by meere famine. For which cauſe hee ſaid that it had bene great folly, to ſeake by perjury, odious to God and Man, the deſtruction of ſuch as were already in his hands; But the truth was, that his owne loue to them had moued him to worke their ſafetie, not only for thoſe ends which Clearchus had recounted, of pleaſures that might redound to himſelfe, and the King, by their aſſiſtance: but for that he might by their friendſhip, hope to obtaine what Cyrus had miſt. Finally, hee invited the credulous Gentleman to Supper, and ſent him away ſo well aſſured 30 of his good will, that he promiſed to bring all the Captaines with him to the ſame place, where, in preſence of them all, Tiſſaphernes likewiſe promiſed to tell openly, which of them had by ſecret information ſought to raiſe diſſenſion betwene them. Clearchus himſelfe being thus deceiued, with great importunitie drew all the chiefe Commanders, and many of the inferior Leaders, to repaire with him to the campe of Tiſſaphernes, whither followed them about two hundred of the common Souldiers as it had bene to ſome common Faire. But being there arriued, Clearchus with other the ſiue principall Coronels, were called into the Tent, the reſt ſtaying without, where they had not waited long ere a ſigne was giuen, vpon which they within were apprehended, and the reſidue ſlaine. Forthwith certaine bands of Persian Horſe-men ſcoured the field, killing as many Greekes as they met, and riding vp 40 to the very Campe of the Gracians, who wondered much at the tumult, whereof they knew not the cauſe, till one, elcaping ſorely wounded, informed them of all that had bene done. Hereupon the Greekes took Armes in haſte, thinking that the enemy would forthwith haue aſſailed their Campe. Anon they might perceiue the Embaſſadours of Tiſſaphernes, among whom were his owne brother, and Arius; followed with three hundred Horſe, who called for the principall men in the Armie, ſaying, that they brought a meſſage from the King, which Arius deliuered to this effect. That Clearchus hauing broken his faith, and the league made, was juſtly rewarded with death; that Menon and Proxenus, two other of the ſiue Coronels, for deteſting his treacherie, were highly honoured; and finally, that the King required them to ſurrender their Armes, which were due to him, as hauing 50 belonged vnto his ſeruant Cyrus. When ſome alteration had followed vpon this meſſage, Xenophon told the Embaſſadours, that if Clearchus had in ſuch ſort offended, it was well that he was in ſuch ſort puniſhed: but he willed them to ſend back

Menon

Alexon and Proxenus, whom they had so greatly honoured, that by them, as by common friends to both Nations, the Greekes might be aduised how to answer the Persian. Hereunto the Embassadors knew not how to frame any reply, and therefore departed without speaking one word more. Clarchus, and the other foure were sent to Artaxerxes, by whose commandment their heads were stricken off. I hold it not amiss to prevent the order of time, annexing to this perfidiousnesse of Tissaphernes, the reward which he afterward received. He saw his Province wasted by the Greekes, against whom receiving from his Master conuenient aide of men and money, hee did so ill manage his affaires, that neither subtiltie, nor perjurie (to which he failed not to haue recourse) auailing him; finally, the King was jealous of his cunning head, and sent a new Lieutenant into those parts, who tooke it from his shoulders. Such was the recompence of his treachery, which made him so mistrusted at home, that the seruice which he could not doe, he was thought vpon private ends to neglect, and so hated abroad, that he knew not which way to flye from the stroke, all the world being shut against him. But now let vs returne to the prosperitie, wherein hee triumphed without great cause, hauing betrayed brauer men than himselfe, and intending to bring the like mischiefe vpon the whole Armie.

§. VIII.

How Xenophon heartened the Greekes, and in despite of Tissaphernes went off safely.

GREAT was the heavinesse of the Souldiers, being now destitute of Leaders, and no lesse their feare of the euill hanging ouer their heads, which they knew not how to auoide. Among the rest, Xenophon, whose learning supplied his want of experience, finding the deepe sadnesse of the whole Armie to be such, as hindred them from taking any course of preventing the danger at hand, began to aduise the vnder-Officers of Proxenus his companies, whose familiar friend he had bene, to betinke themselves of some meane, whereby their safetie might be wrought, and the Souldiers encouraged: setting before their eyes what foucer might serue to giue them hope, and aboue all perswading them in no wise to yeeld to the mercy of their barbarous enemies.

Hereupon they desired him to take vpon him the charge of that Regiment; and so together with him, the same night calling vp such as were remaining of any account, they made choice of the fittest men to succede in the places of those who were slaine, or taken. This being done, and order set downe for disburdening the Armie of all superfluous impediments, they easily comforted themselves for the losse of Tissaphernes his assistance, hoping to take victuals by force better cheap than he had bene wont to sell them; To which purpose they intended to take vp their lodging two or three miles further, among some plentifull Villages, and so to proceede, marching towards the heads of those great Riuer, which lay in their way, and to passe them where they were foordable. Many attempts were made vpon them by Tissaphernes, whom they, scruing: on foot, were not able to requite for the harme which they receiued by the Persian Archers, who shot at a farther distance than the Greekes could reach. For this cause did Xenophon prouide slings, wherewith he ouer-reached the enemy; and finding some Horses fit for seruice, that were imployed among the carriages, he set men vpon them; training likewise his Archers to shoote compassse, who had bene accustomed to the point blanke. By these meanes did hee beare off the Persians who assailed him; and sometimes gaue them chace with that band of fittie Horses, which being well backt, with a firme bodie of footmen, and seconded with troupes of the light-armed-foot and slingers, compelled the enemy to lie a-loose. Tissaphernes not daring to come to handie grips with these these resolute men, did possess the tops of Mountaines, and places of aduantage, by which they were to passe. But finally, when their valour made way through all such difficulties, he tooke himselfe to that course, which was indeede the lastest, of burning the Countrie. With great sorrow did the Greekes behold the Villages on fire, and thereby all hope of victuals cut off. Some aduised to defend the Countrie, as granted by the enemy himselfe to be theirs; others to make more fires, if so perhaps the Persians might be alhamed to doe that which were the desire of such as made passage in hostile manner; But these wereaine comforts. The best counsaile was, that being nere vnto the Carduchi, a people enemy to the Persian, they should enter into their Countrie passing ouer some high Mountaines which lay betweene them. This course they followed, which could not haue auailed them, if Tissaphernes had begunne sooner to cut off their victuals, rather then to seeke to force, or to circumuent them by his fine wit.

The difficulties which the Greek Armie found in passing through the Land of the Carduchi.

ENTERING vpon the Land of the Carduchi, they were encountered with many difficulties of waies, but much more afflicted by the fierce Inhabitants, who, accustomed by force to defend themselves against the huge Armies of the Persian, were no way inferior to the Greekes in daring, but only in the Art of warre. They were verie light of foot, skilfull Archers; and vied the Sling well; which weapons in that mountainous Countrie were of much vse against these poore trauailers, afflicting them in seven daies which they spent in that passage, farre more than all the power of the great King had done. Betweene the Territorie of these Carduchi, and the parts of Armenia confining them, ranne Centrites a great Riuer, vpon which the Greekes refreshed themselves one day, reioicing that they had so well escaped these dangers, and hoping that the remainder would proue easie. But the next morning they saw certaine troupes of Horse, that lay to forbid their passage. These were leauied by the Kings Deputies in those parts; Tissaphernes and his Companies hauing taken their way towards Ionia. The Riuer was broad and deepe, so that it was not possible for such as would enter it, to make resistance against those which kept the opposite banks. To increase these dangers the Carduchi following vpon them, lay on the side of a Mountaine, within lesse than a mile of the water. But it was their good hap to discouer a Foord, by which the greater number of them passing ouer, did easily chafe away the Subiects of the Persian, and then sending backe the most expedite men, gaue succour to the Rearward, against which the Carduchi being slightly armed, could not on plaine ground make resistance hand to hand. These Carduchi seeme to haue inhabited the Mountaines of Niphates, which are not farre from the Spring of Tygris; though Ptolomie place them far more to the East vpon the Riuer of Cyru in Media, wherein he differs much from Xenophon, whose relation being grounded vpon his owne knowledge, doth best in this case deserue credit. Of the Riuer Centrites (as of many other Riuer, Townes, and Places, mentioned by Xenophon) I will not labour to make a coniecture, which may endure the seueritie of a Critick. For Ptolomie, and the whole Nation of Geographers, adde small light to this expedition: only of this last, I thinke it the same which falleth into Tygris, not much about Artasgaria springing out of Niphates, and running by the Towne of Sardena in Gordene, a Prouince of Armenia the Great, wherein the Greekes hauing passed Centrites did arriue.

How TERIBAZUS Governour of Armenia, seeking to entrap the Greekes with termes of fained peace, was disappointed and shamefully beaten.

THe Armie finding in Armenia good prouision, marched without any disturbance about fiftie or three score miles to the heads of the Riuer Tigris, and passing ouer them, traualled as farre further without resistance, till they were encountered by Teribazus at the Riuer Telebas, 10 which Xenophon commends as a goodly water, though small; but Ptolemy and others omit it. Teribazus gouerned that Countrie for the Perfian, and was in great fauour with Artaxerxes, whose Court may seeme to haue bene a Schoole where the Art of fallhood was taught as wisdom. He desired peace of the Greekes, which was made vpon this condition, that they should take what they pleased, but not burne downe the Townes and Villages in their way. As soone as he had made this league, he leauied an Armie, & besetting the Straights of certaine Mountaines which they were to passe, hoped wel to make such benefit of their security, as might giue him the commendation of being no lesse craftily dishonest than Tissaphernes. Yet his cunning failed of successe. For a great snow fell, which caused the Greekes 20 to make many fires, and scatter themselves abroad in the Villages. Teribazus also made many fires, and some of his men wandred about seeking reliefe. By the fires he was discovered, and by a Souldier of his that was taken prisoner, the whole plott was reuealed. Heereupon the Greekes, taking this captiue with them for a guide, sought him out; and coming vpon his Campe, did so affright him, that before the whole Armie could arriue there, the shout which was raised by the Vauncerurs, chased him away. They tooke his Pavilion, wherein (besides many slaues, that were Artificers of voluptuousnesse) verie rich furniture was left by the treacherous coward, who returned no more to challenge it. From hence the Armie went northward, and passing Euprates, not far below the springs thereof, traualled with much 30 difficulty through deepe snow, being followed aloofe by the enemy, who durst not approach them, but did cut off such as they found stragling behinde. The Inhabitants of the Countrie, through which they marched, had their wintring houfes vnder ground, wherein was found great plentie of victuals, and of cattaille, which likewise did winter in the same Cellars with the owners. Hauing refreshed themselves in those parts, and taken sufficient ease after the miserable iourney, which had consumed many of them with extreme cold; they departed, leading with them many bond-slaues, and taking away (besides other Horses and Cattaille) some Colts that were bred vp for the great King.

§. XI.

The passage of the Armie to Trabizonde, through the Countreies bordering vpon the Riuer of Phasis, and other obscure Nations.

SO without impediment they came to the Riuer Phasis, neere where-vnto the people called Phasian Taochi, and Chalybes were scated, These Nations ioyned together, and occupying the tops of a ledge of Mount-taines, which the Greekes were to passe, made countenance of warre: 10 but some companies being sent by night to seize vpon a place of equall height to that whereon the enemies lay, making good the piece of ground which they had taken, secured the ascent of the rest; which caused these people to lie, every one retrying to the defence of his owne. The first vpon whose Countrie
the

the Greekes did enter were the Taochi, who conuaying all their prouision of victuals into strong holds, brought the Armie into much want, vntill with hard labour one place was forced, wherein great store of cattaille were taken; the people, to auoide captiuitie, threw themselves head-long downe the rocks, the very women throwing downe first their owne children, and then casting themselves vpon them. Here was taken a great bootie of Cattaille, which serued to feed them, traualing through the land of the Chalybes, of whom they got nothing but strokes. The Chalybes were a very stout Nation, well armed at all points, and exceeding fierce. They encountered the Greekes hand to hand, killing as many as they tooke prisoners, and cutting 10 off their heads, which they carried away, flinging and dancing to the great griefe of their companions liuing; who were glad, when after seuen daies iourney they escaped from those continuall skirmishes, wherewith they had been vexed by these Barbarians. Hence traualing through a good corne Countrie, inhabited by an obscure Nation called the Seythini, they came to a rich Towne, the Lord wherof, and of the Region adioyning, vsed them friendly, and promised to guide them to a Mountaine, whence they might discouer the Euxine-Sea. From Gymnias (which was the name of his Towne) he led them through the Territorie of his enemies, desiring them to waste it with sword and fire. After five daies march, they came to a Mountaine called Teches, being (as I thinke) a part of the Mountaines called Ma- schici, whence their guide shewed them the Sea; towards which they bent their 20 course, and passing friendly through the Region of the Matrones, (with whom by meanes of an interpreter, found among themselves, who borne in that place had beene sold into Greece, they made a good peace) they arriued in the Land of Colchis, wherin stands the Citie of * Trabizond, called then Trapezus, a Colonie of the Greekes. The Colchi entertaining them with hostility, were requited with the like; for the Armie hauing now good leasure to repose themselves among their friends the Trapezuntians, did spoile the Countrie thirte daies together, forbearing onely the Borderers vpon Trabizonde, at the Citizens request.

§. XII.

How the Armie beganne at Trabizond to prouide a Fleet, wherewith to returne home by Sea: how it came into the Territorie of Sinope, and there prosequuted the same purpose.

HAuing now found an Hauen Towne, the Souldiers were desirous to take shipping, and change their tedious Land-iournies into an easie Navigation. To which purpose Cherifophus a Lacedemonian, one of the principall Commanders, promised by meanes of Anaxibium the 40 Lacedemonian Admirall, who was his friend, that he would prouide Vessels to embarke them. Hauing thus concluded, they likewise tooke order for the staying of such ships as should passe that way, meaning to vse them for their nauigation. Left all this prouision should be found insufficient for the transportation of the whole Armie, Xenophon perswaded the Cities adioyning to clear the waies, and make an easie passage for them by Land; whereunto the Souldiers were vterly unwilling to giue care, being desirous to returne by Sea, but the Countrie fearing what inconuenience might grow by their long stay, did readily condescend to Xe- *phon*s request. Two ships they borrowed of the Trapezuntians, which they manned and sent to Sea: the one of them sailed directly into Greece, forsaking their 50 Companions, who had put them in trust to bring ships into the Port of Trabizond:
the other tooke Merchants and passengers, whose goods were safely kept for the owners, but the Vessels were staid to increase the fleet. After long abode, when victuals beganne to faile, by reason that all the Land of the Colchi, neere vnto the Campe was alreadie quite wasted, they were faine to embarke their sickmen, with the women, children, and such of the baggage as might be spared, in those few ships which they had already provided. The rest of the Armie tooke their way by Land to Ceræsus, a Greece Towne, where the fleet likewise arrived. Here the Armie being mustered, was found to consist of eight thousand and six hundred men. From hence they passed through the Countrey of the Mosynaci, who were divided into factions. The stronger partie, despising their friendship, caused them to joyn with the weaker, whom they left Masters of all.

a Mosynaci a Nation of Pontus Ca: padociani

b Coryora a Port Towne in the same Region.

c Sinope a Port Towne in Leucosyria, a Colonie of the Sygians.

The next place of their abode was Coryora, a Greece Towne likewise, and a Colonie of the Sinopians, as Trapezus and Ceræsus were; but the entertainment which here they found was very churlish, having neither an open Market afforded to them, nor the sick-men that were among them admitted into any house. Hereupon the Souldiers entred the Towne by force, and (committing no outrage) bettowed those which were sicke in convenient lodgings, taking into their owne hands the custody of the Gates. Provision for the Armie they made by strong hand, partly out of the Territorie of the Paphlagonians, partly out of the Lands belonging to the Towne. These newes were unwelcome to Sinope, whence Embassadors were sent to the Camp, who complaining of these dealings, and threatening to joyn with the Paphlagonians, if redresse could not otherwise be had, were roundly answered by Xenophon, That mere necessity had enforced the Armie to teach those of Coryora good manners in so bad a method: letting them know, that he feared not to deal with them, and the Paphlagonians at once; though perhaps the Paphlagonians would be glad to take Sinope it selfe, to which, if cause were given, they would lend assistance. Upon this answer the Embassadors grew better advised, promising all friendship that the State of Sinope could shew, and commanding the Towne of Coryora to relieve the Souldiers as well as they might. Further, they promised to assist them with shipping, letting them understand how difficult the passage by Land would be, in regard of the many and great Rivers, as Thermodon, Iris, Halys, and Parthenius, which crossed their way. This good counsaile, and the faire promises accompanying it, were kindly accepted by the Armie, which well perceived, that the Citie of Sinope would spare for no cost, to be freed from such a neighbourhood. It was therefore decreed that they would passe the rest of the way by Sea; provided that if there should want such number of Vessels as might serve to imbarke every one man of them, then would they not put from the shore.

§. XIII.

Of diffension which arose in the Armie; and how it was imbarked.

Therto the danger of enemies, and miseries of weather & wants, had kept the companie in firme vnitie; which now beganne to dissolve and to thaw, by the neighbouring aire of Greece, warming their heads with private respects to their severall ends and purposes. Whilest they, who were sent as Agents from the Campe, remained at Sinope; Xenophon considering the strength and valour of his men, and the opportunitie of the coast wheron they lay, thought it would be an honorable worke to build a Citie in those parts, which were soone like to prove great and wealthie, in regard both of their owne puillance, and of the great repaire of the Greekes into that quarter. For this cause he made sacrifice, according to the superstition of his time and Countrey, divining of his successe by the entrailles of beastes. The Sooth-sayer whom hee employed had received a great reward of Cyrus, for conjecturing aright, that Artaxerxes would not give battaile in ten daies: hee therefore, having preferred his money carefully, was desirous to be soone at home, that he might freely enjoy his gettings. By him the purpose of Xenophon was divulged, which was interpreted according to the diversitie of mens opinions; some approuing the motion, but the greater greater part reflecting it. They of Sinope and Heraclea, being informed of this consultation, were fore afraid, lest the poutie of the Souldiers, who had not wherewith to maintaine themselves at home, should give successe to the proiect. Which to prevent, they promised to supply the Armie with a sufficient fleet, and likewise offered money to some of the Captaines, who thereupon vnder-tooke to give the Souldiers pay, if they would presently set saile for Greece. One of these Captaines being a banished man, desired them to follow him into Troas; another offered to leade them into Cherronesus. Xenophon who desired only the common good, was pleased greatly with these propositions and professed openly that hee would have them to set forward, and hold together in any case, punishing him as a Traitor that should forsake the Armie, before such time as they were arrived at their iournies end. Silanus the Sooth-sayer, who had uttered Xenophon's purpose, was hereby staied from outrunning his fellowes, and driven to abide with his wealth among poore men, longer than stood with his good liking. Also the other Captaines were much troubled and afraid, when they perceived, that ships were prepared sufficient for their Navigation, but that the money promised to them, and by them to the Souldiers, came not. For the people of Sinope, and Heraclea, knowing that the Armie was now resolved for the voiage, & that Xenophon, whom they feared, had perswaded them to this resolution; thought it the wisest way to furnish them with a Navy whilest they were in good readinesse to depart, but to keepe the money to themselves. The Captaines therefore who being disappointed by these Townes, found themselves in great danger of their men, whom they had deceived with fair hopes, repented much of their hasty offers, & signifying as much to Xenophon, praied him to make proposition to the Armie, of taking the ships, and sayling to Phasis, where they might seize upon Lands, & plant themselves in such wise as should stand best with their good liking. But finding him cold in the businesse, they began to worke the principall of their own followers, hoping by them to draw in all the rest. These newes becoming publike, bred a suspition of Xenophon, as if he had wonne the rest of the Captaine to his purpose, and meant now to carrie the Armie quite another way from their owne home. Wherefore assembling the Companies, he gaue them satisfaction, and withall complained of some disorders which he caused them to redresse. A generall inquisition was likewise made of offences committed since the death of Cyrus; which being punished, all things were in quier. Shortly after came Embassadors from Corylas, Lord of the Paphlagonians, who sending presents desired peace of the Greekes: the Embassadors were friendly entertained, and peace concluded, which needed not to have been fought, for that the Greekes having now their fleet in a readinesse, did soone weigh Anchors, and set saile for Harzene the Port of Sinope, whither Cherisophus came, bringing with him a few Gallies from the Admirall Anaxibius, who promised to give the Armie pay as loone, as they came into the parts of Greece.

§. XIII.

Another great diffension and distraction of the Armie. How the mutiners were beaten by the Barbarians, and refused by XENOPHON.

Henceforth that they approached to Greece, the greater was their desire to make provision for themselves, that they might not returne home empty-handed. Wherefore trusting well that if the charge of the Armie were absolutely committed to one sufficient man, hee might the more conveniently procure the good of them all, they determined ned to make Xenophon sole Commander of all, in whose favour as well the Captains as the common Souldiers were very earnest and violent. But he, either fearing to displease the Lacedaemonians, who were jealous of him already (being incensed by that fugitive who forsooke the Armie at Trabizond, flying with one of their two ships) or moved by some tokens appearing to him in the entrails that threatened ill successe to his government, procured with vehement contention, that this honour was laied vpon Cherisophus a Lacedaemonian. It seemes that Xenophon, considering the vexations incident to the conduct of a voluntarie Army, wanting pay, did wisely in yielding to such tokens as forbad him to accept it: especially, knowing so well their desire, which was by right or by wrong to get wealth wherefoever it might be found, without all regard of Friend or of Foe. Cherisophus had bene Generall but fixe or seven daies, when he was depofed, for having been vnwilling to robbe the Towne of Heraclea which had sent presents to the Campe, and bene very beneficiall vnto them in lending ships for their transportation. Two daies they had failed by the coast of Asia, when being past those great Riuer, which would haue giuen impediment to their iourney by Land, they touched at Heraclea, where consulting how to take their way on wards, whether by Land or Sea, one seditious man began to put them in minde of seeking to get somewhat for themselves; telling them that all their prouision would be spent in three daies, and that being now come out of the enemies Countrey, victuals and other necessaries could not bee had without money; for which cause he gaue aduice to send messengers into the Towne of Heraclea, giuing the Citizens to vnderstand what their wants were, and demanding of them three thousand pieces of money, called Cyzicens, which summe amounteth to two thousand and five hundred pound sterling, or thereabout. This motion was greatly applauded, and the summe raised to tenne thousand Cyzicens at least: which to require, they thought Cherisophus, as being Generall, the fittest man; others had more desire to send Xenophon: but in vaine, for they both refused it, and renounced the action as dishonest. Left therefore either of these should faile in managing the businesse which agreed not with his disposition, others of more impudencie and lesse discretion were sent, who in such wise deliuered their insolent message; that the Citizens taking time to deliberate vpon their request, brought what they could out of the fields into the Towne, and shutting the Gates, did forthwith man the walls. When the Souldiers perceived themselves to be disappointed of their rauinous purpose, they set to mutiny, saying, That their Leaders had betrayed them: and being for the more part of them Arcadians, and Achaens, they forsooke immediately Cherisophus and Xenophon, choosing new Leaders out of their owne number. About foure thousand and five hundred they were, all heauily armed, who electing ten Captaines, failed into the Port of Calpas, which is in the mid-way betwene Heraclea and Bizantium, with purpose to assaile the Bythinians on the Iudaine. With Cherisophus there abode two thousand and one hundred, of whom one thousand and foure hundred were armed weightily: Xenophon had two thousand foot, three hundred whereof were lightly armed, and fortie horse, which small band had done good seruice already, and could not haue bene spared now. Cherisophus had agreed with Cleander Governour of Bizantium, to meet him at the mouth of the Riuer Calpas, whither Cleander promised to bring some Gallies to conuey him ouer into Greece; for which cause he tooke his way thither by Land, leauing to Xenophon such shipping as he had, who passing some part of the way by Sea, landed vpon the Confinnes of Heraclea, and Thracia Asiatica, intending to make a cut through the mid-land Countrey to the Propont. The Mutiners, who had landed at Calpas by night, with purpose to take spoiles in Bythinia, diuided themselves into ten Companies, eury Captaine leading his owne Regiment into some Village, five or six miles from the Sea, in the greater Townes were two Regiments quartered, and so was that part of the countrey surprisid on the suddaine, & sacked all at one time.

The

The place of Rendenous was an high peece of ground, where some of them arrived, finding no disturbance; others, not without much trouble and danger; two Companies were broken and defeated, only eight men escaping, the rest were all put to the sword. For the Thracians which had slipped first out of the Souldiers hands, did raise the Countrey, and finding the Greekes laden with bootie, tooke the advantage of their disorder, cutting in pieces those two Regiments: which done, they attempted the rest, encompassing the hill whereon they encamped. One great advantage the Thracians had, that being all light armed, they could at pleasure make retreat from the Arcadians, & Achaens: who wanting the assistance of horse, and hauing neither Archers nor Slingers, were driuen to stand meere-ly vpon their defence, bearing off with great danger, and many wounds received, the Darts and Arrowes of the Barbarians, till finally they were driuen from their watering place, and enforced to craue parly. Whatsoeuer the articles of composition were, the Thracians yielded to all; but pledges for assurance they would giue none, without which the Greekes well knew, that all promises of such people, especially so incensed, were nothing worth. In the meane time Xenophon holding his way quietly through the In-land Region, did enquire of some Trauailers, whether they knew ought of any Gracian Armie, passing along those parts: and receiving by them true information of the desperate case into which these Gallants had foolishly throwne themselves, he marched directly towards the place where they lay, taking with him for guides them who gaue him the intelligence. His horse-men hee sent before to discover, and to scowre the waies; the light-armed foot-men tooke the hill-tops on either hand, all of them setting fire on whatsoever they found combustible, whereby the whole Countrey seemed to be on a light-flame, to the great terror of the enemies, who thought that some huge Armie had approached. That night hee encamped on a Hill, within five mile of the Arcadians, increasing still the number of his fires, which hee caused hastily to be quenched soone after Supper. The enemies perceiuing this, thought certainly that hee would haue fallen vpon them in the darke, which caused them in all haste to dislodge. Early the next morning Xenophon coming thither in very good order, to haue giuen battaile, found that his deuice, to affright the Thracians, had taken full effect; but hee maruailed that the Greekes were also departed, concerning whom he learned by enquire, that they removed at breake of day, and perceived by signes that they had taken the way to the Port of Calpas, in which journey hee ouertooke them. They embraced him, and His, with great joy: Confessing that they themselves had thought the same which the enemies did, looking that hee should haue come by night, wherein finding themselves deceived, they were afraid lest hee had forsaken them, and therefore hastened away, to ouertake him, and joyne with him. So they arrived at the Hauen of Calpas, where it was decreed, That whoeuer from thenceforth made any motion to disioyne the Armie, should suffer death.

§. XV.

Of diuers pieces of seruice done by XENOPHON; and how the Armie returned into Greece. The occasions of the Warre betwene the Lacedaemonians and the Persian.

He Hauen of Calpas lay vnder a goodly head-land, that was very strong, and abounding with all kinde of Graine and Fruits, except Oliues. There was also Timber for building and shipping, and a very conuenient sea for a great Citie. All which commodities, that might haue allured the Souldiers to stay there, and to plant, caused them to haile away, fearing lest Xenophon should finde some device to haue settled himselfe and them in that place. For the greater part of them had good meanes to liue at home, neither did they so much for hope of gaine follow Cyrus in that Warre, as in regard of his Honour, and the loue which they bare vnto him: the poorer sort were such as left the Parents, Wives, and Children, to whom (though failing of the riches which they had hoped to purchase) they were now desirous to returne. But whether it were so that Xenophon found advantage by their owne superstition, to make them stay, which they greatly suspected; or whether the signes appearing in the entrails, did indeede forbid their departure: so long they were inforced to abide in the place till victualls failed, neither would the Captaines leade them forth to forrage the Countrie, vntill the Sacrifices should promise good successe. Cherisophus was dead of an Ague, and his ships were gone, being returned to the Heraclians, of whom they were borrowed. His followers were joyned to the rest of the Armie, which the greater it was, the more prouision it needed, and the sooner felt want. For which cause, he that was chosen Coronell into the place of Cherisophus, would needs adventure to gratifie the Souldiers with the spoile of some Villages that stood neere at hand; in which enterprise he found ill successe, the whole Countrie lying in waite to entrap him, and an Armie of Horse being sent by Pharnabazus the Satrap, or Vice-roy of Phrygia, to the assistance of these Bythinian Thracians, which troupes falling vpon the Greekes that were scattered abroad in seeking bootie, slew five hundred of them, and chased the rest to a certaine Mountaine thereby. The newes of this ouerthrow comming to Xenophon, he led forth a part of the Armie to the rescue of those that were pursued, and brought them safe to the Campe; vpon which the Bythinians made an offer that night, and breaking a Corps d'aguerre, slew some, pursuing the rest to the very Tents. This new courage of the enemy, together with the present condition of the Armie, so disheartened and unfurnished of necessaries, caused the Greekes to remove their Campe to a place of more strength; which hauing intrenched, and committed to the defence of such as were least able to indure trauaile, Xenophon with the firmest and best able men went forth, both to burie those which were lately slaine, and to abate the pride of the Thracians, and their Assailants. In this journey his demeanour was very Honourable. For hauing giuen buriall to the dead, the Enemy was discouered, lying on the tops of the Hills adjoyning, to whom (notwithstanding that the way was very rough, and troublefome, so that some thought it a matter of too great danger, to leaue at their backs a wood scarce passable) hee marched directly, telling his men plainly, that hee had rather follow the enemy with halfe the number, than turne his back to them with twice as many, and letting them further know, that if they did not charge the Barbarian, hee would not faile with the greater resolution to pursue them; from whom if they could safely retire to the campe, yet what should they doe there, wanting victualls to sustaine 40 them in the place, and ships, to carrie them away? wherefore hee willed them rather to fight well that day, hauing eaten their dinners, than an other day fasting; and not to regard the vncertaine returne, which might serue to stay Cowards from running away, but to wish vnto the Enemy a faire and easie way, by which hee might flie from them. These perswasions were followed with so valiant execution, that both Persians and Bythinians being chased out of the field, abandoned the Countrie forthwith, removing their Families, and leauing all that could not sodainly be conueighed away, to the discretion of the Greekes, who at good leisure gathered the haruest of these bad Neighbours fields. This was the last fight which they had on the side of Asia. For they were not only suffered quietly to enjoy the spoile of the Countrie, but when the opinion grew common in those parts, that it was the intent of Xenophon to plant a Colonie on the Port of Calpas, Embassadours were sent from the Neighbour people, to desire friendship, and make make offer of their best assistance. But the Souldiers had no minde to stay. Wherefore entring further into Bythinia, they tooke a great bootie, which they carried away to Chrysopolis, a Citie neere vnto Chalcedon, where they sold it. Pharnabazus, Lieutenant in Phrygia to Artaxerxes, did greatly feare, lest their long stay in that Countrie might breed in them a desire to visite his Prouince, where they might haue found great wealth, and little power to guard it. Therefore he sent to the Lacedemonian Admirall, entreating him with much instance and large promises to waite them ouer into Euripe; to whom Anaxibius the Admirall condescending, promised to giue the Souldiers pay, as soon as they arrived at Bizantium. So were they carried out of Asia at the intreatie of the Persian, who in the height of his pride had thought them so surely imprisoned with mighty Rivers, that he not only denied to permit their quiet departure, but willed them to surrender their Armes into his hands, and so to yeeld their liues to his discretion. How discourteously they were intreated by Anaxibius, and how to requite his injurious dealings, they seized vpon Bizantium, which by Xenophon's perswasion they forbore to sacke, I hold it superfluous to relate. For the residue of their doings appertaine little to the generall course of things. But this expedition, as in all ages it was glorious, so did it both discouer the secrets of Asia, and stirre vp the Greekes to thinke vpon greater enterprises, than euer their forefathers had vndertaken. Likewise it was the only remarkable action which the time afforded. For the Roman warres did hitherto extend no further than to the next neighbouring Townes of Italie; and in Greece all things were quiet, the Lacedemonians ruling insolently, but without disturbance. True it is, that the sedes of the Warre shortly following, which the Lacedemonians made vpon Artaxerxes, were already sowne, before these companies returned out of the high Countries of Asia. For the Townes of Ionia, which had sided with yong Cyrus against Tissaphernes, if not against the great King, prepared to rebell, which they thought safer, than to fall into the hands of Tissaphernes, who was now appointed Lieutenant, both of his old Prouince, and of all that had belonged to Cyrus. Wherefore the Ionians befought the 30 Lacedemonians to send them aide, whereby to recouer their libertie; and obtained their request.

For a power was sent ouer, vnder conduct of Timbro a Spartan, who bestowed his men in such Townes as had already revolted, to secure the Cities and their Fields, but not to make any offensive Warre.

CHAP. XI.

Of the affaires of Greece, whilest they were managed by the Lacedæmonians.

§. I.

How the Lacedæmonians tooke courage by example of XENOPHONS Armie, to make Warre vpon ARTAXERXES.

T seemes that the Lacedæmonians did well perceiue in how ill part Artaxerxes tooke their fauour shewed vnto his brother, and yet were timorous in beginning an open warre against him, thinking it sufficient 20 to take all care that no aduantage might slip, which could serue to strengthen their estate, by finding the Persian worke beyond the Sea. But when Xenophons
Armie had revealed the basenesse of those effeminate Asiatiques, and rehearsed the many victories which they themselves had gotten, vpon termes of extreme disaduantage; then was all Greece filled with desire of vndertaking vpon this huge vniuersall Empire, thinking it no hard matter for the joynt-forces of that whole Nation, to hew out the way to Susa, whereof one hand-full had opened the passage to Babylon, and further, finding no power that was able to giue them resistance, in all that long journey of foure and thirty thousand two hundred and fifty five furlongs, spent in going and returning, which make of English miles about foure thousand two hundred foure score and one, a very painfull march of one yeere and three moneths. Neuerthelesse the ciuill distraction wherewith Greece was miserably torne, and especially that hot fire of the Theban Warre, which kindled with Persian gold, brake forth sodainly into a great flame, drew backe out of Asia the power of the Lacedæmonians, to the defence of their owne estate; leauing it questionable whether Agesilaus, hauing both the same, and farre greater forces, could haue wrought proportionable effects. Sure it is, that in the whole space of two yeeres, which he spent in Asia, his deedes procured more commendation of magnanimitie and faire behaviour, than of stout courage, and great or profitable achievements. For how highly so euer it pleased Xenophon, who was his friend, and follower in this, and in other warres, to extoll his vertue; his exploits being only a few incursions into the Countries lying neere the Sea, carry no proportion to Xenophons owne journey, which I know not whether any Age hath paralleled:
the famous reitrait of Conan the Briton with six thousand men from Aquileia, to his owne Countrie, through all the breadth of Italie, and length of France, in despite of the Emperor Theodosius, being rather like than equall. But of Agesilaus and his warres in Asia and Greece, we shall speake more in due place.

§. II.

§. II.

The prosperous beginnings of the warre in Asia.

HIMBRO receiving Xenophons men, beganne to take in Townes, and to entertaine all such as were willing to revolt from the Persian, who were many, and some of them such, as had bene highly beholding to the King; who seeme to haue had no other cause of discontent, than that they were to liue vnder the gouernement of Tissaphernes, 10 whom all others did as vehemently hate as the King his Master did loue him. The managing of the warre begunne by Timbro, was for his opprefions taken out of his hands, and committed to Dercyllidas a Spartan, who behaued himselfe as a good man of Warre, and a wise Commander. For whereas the rule of the low-Countries of Asia was diuided betwene Pharnabazus and Tissaphernes, who did ill agree, Pharnabazus being the worthier man, but the other by his Princes fauour the greater, and hauing the chiefe command in those warres against the Greekes; Dercyllidas who did beare a private hatred to Pharnabazus (knowing well that Tissaphernes was of a mischievous nature, and would not be sorry to see his Coriuall thoroughly beaten, though to the Kings losse) made an appointment with Tissaphernes, and forth-20 with entred Æolis, which was vnder the iurisdiction of Pharnabazus, which Province, in few daies, he brought into his owne power.

That Countrie of Æolis had about the same time suffered a violent alteration, which gaue easie successe to the attempts of Dercyllidas. Zenis a Dardanian had bene Deputie to Pharnabazus in those parts; after whose death his wife Mania procured his Office, wherein she behaued herselfe so well, that shee not only was beloued of the people vnder her gouernement, but enlarged her Territorie, by the conquest of certaine Townes adioyning, and sundry times gaue assistance to Pharnabazus in his warres against the Mylians and Persians. For shee had in pay some Companies of Greekes, whose valour by her good vlage did her great seruice. But somewhat be-30 fore the arrivall of Dercyllidas in those parts, a Sonne-in-law of hers, called Midias, whom shee trusted and loued much, being blinded with ambition, found means to sifle her, and kill her sonne of seuenteen yeeres old; which done, he seized vpon two of her principall Townes, wherein her treasure lay, hoping to haue bene admitted into possession of her whole estate. Being denied entrance by her Souldiers, that lay in Garrison, he sent Messengers with presents to Pharnabazus, desiring him to make him Gouernour in the place of Mania. His presents were not only rejected by Pharnabazus, but reuenge of his foule treason threatned, whereby the wicked villaine was driuen into termes of almost vtter desperation. In the meane time came Dercyllidas, to whom the Townes of Mania, that held against Midias, 40 did quickly open their Gates. One only Towne stood out foure daies (against the will of the Citizens, who were couetous of libertie) the Gouernour stirring in vaine to haue kept it to the vse of Pharnabazus. Now remained only two Cities Gergehe and Scepsis, which the Traitor held, who fearing all men, as being loued of none, sent Embassadors to Dercyllidas, desiring leaue to speake with him, and pledges for his securitie: vpon the deliuerie of which hee issued out of Scepsis, and coming into the Campe, made offer to ioyn with the Greekes vpon such conditions as might seeme reasonable. But he was plainly told by Dercyllidas, that other condition there was none, than to set the Citizens freely at libertie. And presently vpon these words they marched toward Scepsis. When Midias perceived that it 50 was in vaine to striue against the Armie, and the Townes-men, who were all of one minde; hee quietly went along with Dercyllidas; who remaining but a few houres in the Citie, did a sacrifice to Minerva, and then leading away the Garrison of Midias, he left the Citie free, and departed toward Gergehe. Midias did not forsake his Companie, but folloved him, earnestly intreating that hee might be suffered to retaine

taine Gerythe: but coming to the Gates, he was bidden to command his Souldiers that they should be opened, for (quoth Dercyllidas) I must here likewise doe a sacrifice to Minerva. The Traitor, not daring to make deniall, caused his Mercinaries to open the Gates, whereby Dercyllidas, taking possession of the place, rendred pay to the Garrison, who did not refuse to serue vnder his Ensignes. This done, all the goods of Mania were seized vpon, as belonging to one that had bene subject to Pharnabazus, who was enemie to the Greekes; and so the murderous wretch was sent away naked, not knowing in what part of the World hee might finde any place to hide his detested head. Dercyllidas, hauing in eight daies taken nine Cities, purposed for the ease of his Confederates to winter in Bythinia, to which end hee tooke 10 Truce with Pharnabazus, who had not any desire of Warre. That Winter, and the Sommer ensuing, the Truce being recontinued held; in which time, besides the waisting of Bythinia, the neck of Land joyning Cherronea to the Maine, was fortified, being foure or fiue miles in breadth, by which meanes eleuen Townes with much good Land belonging to them, were freed from the incursions of the wild Thracians, and made fit and able to victual the Campe. Likewise the Citie of Atarne was taken, which was of great strength, and very well stored with provision. After this, Dercyllidas had command from Sparta, to diuert the warre into Caria, where was the seat of Tissaphernes; for that hereby it was thought not vncauseth to recouer all the Townes of Ionis: Pharax the Admirall of the fleet (which was a yeerely Office) 20 being appointed to ioyne with him. Though it was manifest that Tissaphernes had neglected Pharnabazus in time of necessity, yet was he not in his owne danger requited with the like. For Pharnabazus hauing respect to the Kings seruice, came to assist his priuate enemie Tissaphernes, & so passing into Caria, they thrust Garrisons into all places of strength; which done, they marched towards Ionis, hoping to finde the Townes ill manned for resistance. As these Persians were desirous to keepe the warre from their owne dores, so was Dercyllidas willing to free his Confederates the Ionians from the spoile and danger of the warre, by transferring it into Caria. For which cause he passed the Riuer of Meander, and not looking to haue bin so soone encountered, marched carelessly through the Countrey: when on the very sodaine 30 the whole Armie of Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus was discouered, consisting of Persians, Carians, and some Mercinarie Greekes, who were all marshalled in very good order to present battaile. The oddes was too apparent, both in numbers of men, and in readinesse, as also in aduantage of ground: for the Persian had a great multitude of Horse, the Greeke very few and feeble, being to fight in an open plaine. Therefore all the Ionians, together with the Ilanders and others, of such places as bordered vpon the Kings Dominions, did either betake themselves to present flight; or abiding a while for shame, did plainly discover by their looks, that they meant not to be more bold than wise. Only Dercyllidas with his Peloponnesians regarding their honor, prepared to endure the fight: which must needs haue brought 40 them to destruction, if the counsaile of Pharnabazus had bene followed, who perceiving the opportunitie of so great a victorie, was not willing to let it slip. But Tissaphernes, who naturally was a coward, seeing that countenance of resistance was made, beganne to consider what strange defence the Souldiers of Xenophon had shewed, and thinking that all the Greekes were of the like resolution, held it the wisest way to craue parly; the conclusion of which was, That a truce should be made, to last vntill Tissaphernes might receiue answer from the King, and Dercyllidas from Sparta, concerning the demands propounded in the Treatie, which were on the one part, that all the Greekes in Asia might enjoy their owne libertie and lawes, but contrariwise on the other side, that the Lacedemonians should depart Asia, and leaue the 50 Townes to the Kings pleasure. This Treatie was of none effect; only it serued to free the Greekes from the present danger, and to gaine time vnto Tissaphernes, who desired to auoide the warre by procrastination, which he durst not aduenture to finish by triall of a battaile.

§. III.

§. III.

How the Lacedemonians took reuenge vpon the Eleans for old displeasure. The discontents of the Corinthians and Thebans, conceived against the State of Sparta.

IN the meane season the Lacedemonians, who found none able to withstand them in Greece, beganne to call the Eleans to account for some disgraces receiued by them during the late warres, when leasure was wanting to the requittall of such peticie injuries. These Eleans being 10 Presidents of the Olympique games, had set a fine vpon the Citie of Sparta, for Non-paiment of which, they forbade them to come to the solemnities; and publicly whipt one of them, that was a man of note, for presuming to contend against their decree. Likewise they hindred Agis King of Sparta, from doing sacrifice to Iupiter; and in all points vied great contempt toward the Spartans, who now had no businesse that could hinder them from taking reuenge: and therefore sent a peremptorie message to the Eleans, commanding them to set at libertie the Cities which they held in subiection. This was the vsual pretence which they made the ground of all their warres: though little they cared for the libertie of such 20 Townes, which they caused afterwards to become followers, and little better than meere Vassals of the Lacedemonians. In their late warres with Athens, the strong opposition which they found, caused this goodly Title of libertie to worke vey slowly: but hauing now to doe with a State of great spirit and small force, it gaue present successe to their desires. Two yeeres together they sent an Armie into the Countrey of the Eleans: the first yeere an earthquake (held in those times a prodigious signe, and which did alwaies forbid the prosecution of any enterprise in hand) caused them to retire: the second yeere, all the Townes of the Eleans did hastily reuolt, and the Citie it selfe was driuen to submission; consenting both to suffer their old subiects freely to enioy their libertie, and to haue her owne walls throwne 30 downe. Only the Presidentship of the Olympian games was left vnto them, which, it was not to be doubted that they would in time comming vse modestly, finding themselves to stand at the mercy of Sparta. In this expedition all the Greekes were assitant to the Lacedemonians, excepting the Corinthians and Beotians, whose aide hauing been of as much importance in the late Peloponnesian Warre, as the force of Sparta it selfe, they could not smother their dislike of their vnequall diuision following the victorie; which gaue to Sparta the command of all Greece; to Thebes, and Corinth, only securitie against Athens, but such a securitie as was worse than the danger. For when the equall greatnesse of two mightie Estates did counterpoise 40 each the other, it was in the power of these Neutral Common-weales to adhere to either, as the condition of their affaires required; but when to reuenge injuries, they had by mortall hatred prosecuted the warre to extremities, leauing the one Citie naked of power and friends, the other mightily encreased in both, it was then (if not necessarie to obey the greatnesse which themselves had made yet) foolish and dangerous to prouoke it. Neuertheless, it was not the purpose of the Spartans to take occasion of any quarrell, which they could not finish at pleasure, till such time as they had by victorie or composition made some good end with the Persian, toward whom they bent all their care and forces.

B. IIII.

*The passage of AGESILAUS into Asia. His warre with TISSAPHERNES.
How TISSAPHERNES was put to death, and the warre diuerted into another Prouince, through perswasion and gifts of TITHRAUSTES his succesor. How carlesse the Persian Lieutenants were of the Kings good.*

AGESILAUS newly made king of Sparta, was desirous to haue the honour of the victory, without without cause, he expected vpon those of Asia; and therefore procuring a great Armie to ioyne with that of Dercylidas, he tooke his way in great pompeto Aulis in Boeotia, a Haven, lying opposite to the Iland of Euboea, in which place Agamemnon (leading the power of all Greece to the warre against Troy, many Ages before) had embarked his men. In imitation of Agamemnon hee meant also to do sacrifice in Aulis, which the Thebans, Lords of that Countrey, would not permit, but saying that the performance of such ceremonies in that place, belonged vnto their Officers, they were so vnable to conceale their malice, that sending some Companies of horse, they threw downe his sacrifice from the Altar. It was not then conuenient time for Agesilaus to entangle himselfe and his Countrey in any new warre; therefore waiting better opportunitie of reuenge, he quietly swallowed the contumelie, and followed his maine intendment. Having landed his men at Ephesus, he was entertained by Tissaphernes with a Treatie of peace, wherein Agesilaus peremptorily requiring that the Persian should restore to liberty all the Greek Townes in Asia, was promised that the King, being first informed of his demands, should send answer to his good liking, if he would in the meane while make truce. Truce was therefore made, which Tissaphernes had sought onely to winne time of making prouision for the warre, and getting supply of men and money from Artaxerxes; whilst Agesilaus was busie in settling the Estates of his confederate Cities on that side of the Sea. The end of this long vacation from warre was at the comming down of these forces which Artaxerxes had sent at what time Agesilaus received a plain message from Tissaphernes, that either he must forth-with depart out of Asia, or make good his aboade by strong hand. Agesilaus returning word, that hee was glad to heare that his enemies had by perurie deferred vengeance from Heauen, prepared to inuade them; and sending word to all the Townes which lay betwene him, and Caria, that they should provide victuals and other necessities for his Armie, did easily make Tissaphernes beleue, that his intent was to inuade that Prouince wherein Tissaphernes dwelt, and which was vnto for Horle, in which part of his forces the Persian had most confidence. Therefore Tissaphernes bestowing all his Companies of foot in Caria, entred with his horse into the plains of Maander, hoping thereby to stoppe the passage of a heauie foot-Armie, not suffering them to passe into that Countrey which was fittest for their seruice. But the Greekes left him waiting there in vaine, and marched directly into Phrygia, where they tooke great spoile without resistance, till such time as the Horle men of Pharnabazus met him, who in a small skirmish hauing the better of the Greekes, were the occasion that Agesilaus returned to Ephesus. Although in this last fight onely twelve men were lost, yet Agesilaus perceiving by that triall how hard it would be to pruaile, and hold the maiestie of the field, without a greater strength of Horle, tooke all possible care to encrease that part of his forces. By which means hauing enabled himselfe, whilst winter lasted hee entred vpon the Countrey of Tissaphernes, as soone as the season of the yeere would permit, and not onely tooke a great bootie, but finding the Horle men of Tissaphernes in the plaine of Maander, without assistance of their infanterie, hee gaue them battaile, and had a great victorie, taking their Campe in which hee found great riches. The blame of this losse fell heauie vpon

Tissaphernes, who either vpon cowardlie had absented himselfe from the battaile, or following some other bulineffe, was then at Sardes. For which cause his Master hauing him in distrust, and thinking that peace might be the sooner had, which he much desired, if the man, so odious to the whole Nation of the Greekes, were taken out of the way, he sent into those parts Tithraustes a Persian, to cut off the head of Tissaphernes, and succede him in the gouernment. Such was the end of this bafe and cowardly Politician, who little caring to offend Heauen, when by perurie he could aduance his purposes on Earth, failed at the last through too much ouer-weening of his owne wisdom, euen in that part of cunning, wherein he thought himselfe most perfectly for suppling, that by his great skill in subtilie negotiation hee should one way or other circumuent the Greekes, and make them weary of Asia; he did not seeke to finish the warre, and according to his Masters will, bring all things speedily to quiet, but rather to temporize, till he might finde some opportunitie of making such end as best might stand with the Kings honour and his own. Wherein it seemes that he much mistooke his Princes disposition, who though he had highly rewarded him for the aide which he did bring in his time of danger, yet would hee much more gladly haue taken it, if he could haue found such means whereby the danger it selfe might haue bene auoided: as not louing to haue warre, whilst by any conditions (honourable or not) he might obtaine peace. And this appeared well by the course which Tithraustes tooke at his first possession of the low-Countries. For he sent Embassadors to Agesilaus, in very friendly sort, letting him know, that the man who had bene Author of the warre, was now taken out of the way; and that it was the Kings pleasure to let the Greekes enjoy their owne lawes and libertie, vpon condition, that they should pay him the tribute accustomed, and the Armie be forthwith dismissed. The answer to this proposition, was by Agesilaus referred to the Councill of Sparta; in the meane season he was content to transferre the warre into the Prouince of Pharnabazus, at the request of Tithraustes, who bought his departure with thirtie Talents.

This was a strange manner of Warre, both on the offense and on the defense part. For Agesilaus hauing entertained great hope of vanquishing the great King, was contented to forbear his severall Prouinces, at the entreatie of the Lieutenants: and those Lieutenants being employed by the King to maintaine his Estates against all enemies (wherein if they failed, they knew that their heads might easily be taken from their shoulders) were little offended at any losse that fell on their next Neighbour-Prouinces, which were subiect likewise to the same Crowne of Persia, so long as their own gouernment could be preferred free from waile and danger. The cause of this disorder on the Persian side, I can ascribe to nothing so deucedly, as to the corrupted estate of the Court, wherein Eunuchs, Concupisces, and Admirers of pleasure, were able by partiall construction to countenance, or disgrace, the actions of such as had the managing of things abroad; and to that foolish manner of the Kings (which was so vsuall that it might be called a rule) to reward or punish the Prouinciall Gouernour, according to the benefit or losse, which the Countrey giuen in charge vnto each of them recieued, during the time of his rule. Whereby it came to passe, that as euery one was desirous to make his owne Territorie yeeld a large increase to the Kings treasure; so no man was careful to assit his borderers, if losse or danger might thereby grow to himselfe and his; but sat still as an idle beholder, when perhaps by joyning their forces, it had not bene vncasie to recompence the spoile of one Countrey, by conquering another, or defending a third from farre greater miseries.

§. V.

The Warre and Trestie betweene AGESILAUS and PHARNABAZUS.

AGESILAUS having thus compounded with Tithraustes, entred Phrygia, burning and wasting the Countrey without resistance. Hee tooke the Palace of Pharnabazus, and by his Lieutenant draue him out of his Campe. These actions, together with his honourable behaviour, which added much to their lustre, were more glorious then profitable. For he did not winne Cities and Places of strength, which might haue increased his power, and giuen assurance to the rest of his proceedings: but purchased fame and high reputation, by which he drew vnto him some that were discontented and stood vpon bad termes with the great King, whom he lost againe as easily, by means of some slight iniurie done to them by his vnder-Captaines. Pharnabazus did not enclose himselfe in any Towne for feare of being besieged, but kept the field, lying as neere as he could safely to the enemies, with whom it was not his purpose to fight, but to make some good end by composition, which he found not vncalle to doe. For the pleasures, by him formerly done to the State of Sparta, in the times of their most necessitie, had beene so great, that when hee (obtaining parlie) did set before their eyes his bounty towards them, and his loue (which had beene such, that besides many other hazards of his person, he had for the rescue of their fleet when it was driuen to runne a-shore at Abydos, aduentured to ride into the Sea as farre as he could finde any ground, and fight on horse-backe against the Athenians) together with his faith which had neuer beene violated in word or deede: they knew not how to excuse their ingratitude, otherwife then by telling him, That hauing warre with his Master, they were enforced, against their will, to offend him. Agessilaus did make a faire offer to him, that if he would reuolt from the King to them; they would maintaine him against the Persian, and establish him free Prince of the Countrey wherein hee was at that time onely Deputie to Artaxerxes. But Pharnabazus told him plainly, That if the King his Master did put him in trust to make warre against them, he would not faile to doe the best that he could as their enemy; if the charge were taken out of his hand, and he commanded to obey another, he would then shift side, and betake himselfe to their alliance. The issue of this parlie was, That the Armie should no longer abide in Phrygia, nor againe returne into it, whilst employment could be found elsewhere. The excuse made by Agessilaus, and the withdrawing of his forces out of those parts, were not sufficient to appease Pharnabazus, whom he had not inuaded for want of more necessarie businessse elsewhere; but because his Countrey would yeeld great bootie; and for the hire of thirtie Talents. By this means the Lacedemonians changed an honourable Friend into a hot Enemy, who afterwards requited their vnthankfulnesse with full reuenge.

§. VI.

The great commotions raised in Greece by the Thebans and others, that were hired with gold from the Persian.

IN the meane while Tithraustes, perceiuing that Agessilaus meant nothing lesse then to returne into Greece, and let Artaxerxes rest quietly in Asia, tooke a wife coule whereby the Citie of Sparta was not only driuen to looke to her owne, and giue over her great hopes of subuerting the Empire, but was beaten out of all that had beene gotten by many late victories, and saw her Dominion restrained vnto the narrow bounds of her owne Territorie. Hee sent into Greece fiftie talents of silver, to be employed in raising warre against the Lacedemonians; which treasure was, by the subtil practice of him that was put in trust with it, in such wise dispersed, among the principall men of the Thebans, Argives, & Corinthians, that all those Estates hauing formerly borne secret hate to that of Sparta, were now desirous of nothing so much as of open war. And lest this great heate of the incensed multitude should, for want of present exercise, begin to faint, and vanish away in idle wordes, occasion was found out to thrust the Lacedemonians into Armes, that they themselves might seeme Authours of the quarrell. Some land there was in the tenure of the Locris, to which the Thebans had in former time laid claime; but the Phocians either hauing the better title, or finding the greater fauour, had it adjudged vnto them, and receiued yearly money for it. This money the Locris were either hired or perswaded to pay now to the Thebans, who readily accepted it. The Phocians not meaning so to lose their Rent, made a distresse by strong hand, recouering a great deale more than their owne; which the Thebans (as in protection of their new Tnants) requited with an inuasion made vpon Phocis, wasting that Countrey in the manner of open warre. Such were the beginnings of professed hostilitie betweene Thebes and Sparta, and the first breaking out of their close enmitie, that had long time, though hardly, been concealed. For when the Phocian Embassadors came to Sparta, complaining of the violence done by the Thebans, and requesting succour, they had very fauourable audience, and readie consent to their suite; it being the manner of the Lacedemonians, to deferre the acknowledgement of injuries receiued, until occasion of reuenge were offered, and then to discouer their indignation in cold blood. At this time they had very good opportunitie to worke their owne wills, hauing no other war to disturbe them in Greece, and hearing out of Asia no newes, that could offend or trouble them. Wherefore they sent Lysander to raise all the Countreies about Phocis, and with such forces as he could leaue, to attend the comming of Pausanias King of Sparta (for Sparta, as hath beene shewed before, had two Kings) who should follow him with the strength of Peloponnesus. Lysander did as he was appointed, and being of great reputation in those parts, he drew the Orchomenians to reuolt from Thebes. Pausanias likewise raised all Peloponnesus, except the Corinthians, (who refused to assist him in that enterprise) meaning to ioinc with Lysander, and make a speedie end of the war. The consideration of so great a danger, approaching so swiftly, caused the Thebans to seeke what helpe they could abroad, forasmuch as their owne strength was farre too little to make resistance against such mightie preparations. It was not vnknown to them, that many followers of the Lacedemonians were otherwise affected in heart than they durst vtter in countenance; but the good wishes of such people were little auailable, considering that the most which could be expected from them, was, that they should doe as little hurt as they could, by which manner of tergiversation, the Corinthians did at that present cast themselves into the displeasure of the Spartans, to the no great benefit of Thebes. Wherefore it was thought the safest course, to procure the assistance of some Estate that might presently declare it selfe on their side, which would cause many others to follow the example, & make their partie strong. To this end they sent Embassadors to Athens, excusing old offences, as either not committed by publike allowance, or done in time of the generall warre, and recomenced with friendship lately shewne in their refusal of assisting Pausanias, when he came in behalfe of the thirtie Tyrants, against the good Citizens of Athens. In regard of which, and for their owne Honour sake, they requested them of aide in the present warre, offering to doe the best that they could for the restoring of Athens to her former Estate and Dignitie. Thrasybulus and his Friends, who persecuted by the thirtie, had been well entertained at Thebes, procured now the Citie to make a large requital of the courtesie which they had receiued. For it was decreed, that the State of Athens should not only refuse to aide the Lacedemonians in this Warre; but that it should assist the Thebans, and engage it selfe in their cause. Whilst Pausanias lay still, waiting the arrivall of his Confederates, Lysander being desirous to doe somewhat that might advance the businesse in hand, came to Haliartus, where, though Pausanias did not meet him, as had beene appointed, yet he attempted the Towne, and was slaine in fight by the Thebans, who came hastily to the rescue. As this victorie did encourage the Thebans, so the coming of Pausanias with his great Army did againe amaze them, with presentation of extreme danger; but their spirits were soone revived by the strong succour which was brought from Athens, in consideration of which, and of the late battaile, Pausanias durst not hazard a new fight with them, but receiving the bodies of those that were slaine, by composition, departed out of their Territorie, for which, either cowardice or indiscretion, he was at his returne to Sparta condemned as a Traitor, and driven to flee into Tegae, where he ended his daies in banishment.

her

§. VII.

How AGESILAVS was called out of Asia to helpe his Countrey. A victorie of the Spartans. CONON the Athenian, assisted by PHARNABAZUS, overcomes the Lacedaemonian fleet; recovers the massacre of the Seas; and rebuilds the walls of Athens.

His good successe, and the confederacie made with Athens, gave such reputation to the Thebans, that the Argives, Corinthians, Euboeans, Locrians, and Acrarnanes, did forthwith side with them, & raising a strong Army, determined to give battaile to the Lacedaemonians as neere as they might, to their owne dores; Considering that the force of Sparta it selfe was not great, but grew more and more by the adiunction of their Confederates. The Magistrates of Sparta perceiving the danger, sent for Agessilus, who readily obeyed them, and promising his friends in Asia to returne speedily to their assistance, passed the Straights of Hellefont into Europe. In the meane time the Cities of the new league had given battaile to the Lacedaemonians, and the remainder of their Associates, but with ill successe. For when the right-wing of each part had gotten the better hand, the Argives and Thebans returning from the chase in some disorder, were broken and defeated by the Lacedaemonians, who meeting them in good order, wonne from them the Honour which they had gotten, by forcing the left wing of the Lacedaemonians, and made the victorie of that day entirely their owne. The report of this battaile meeting Agessilus at Amphibolis, were by him sent over into Asia, where it is not likely that they brought much comfort vnto his friend, who had since his departure seene the Spartan fleet beaten, and Lysander the Admirall slaine. The same man, whose endeavour had brought the Athenians into order, by advancing the Sea-forces of the Lacedaemonians with money, and all manner of supplies, was now the occasion that the power of Athens grew strong at Sea, when the Citie was despoiled of her old reputation, and scarcely able to maintaine an Army by Land for her owne defence. Pharnabazus considering how much it imported the King his Master, to have the Greeks divided into such factions, as might utterly disable them from undertaking abroad, thought it the safest way for himselfe, during these broiles, to take such order, that he should not need any more, to seeke peace by entreatie and commoration of old benefits, at their hands, who vnprovoked had sold his loue for thirtie Talents. To which purpose he furnished Conon the Athenian with eight ships, who had escaped, when the fleet of Athens was surprised by Lysander at Agos-Potamos; giuing him the command of a great Naue, wherewith he requited the losse received at Agos-Potamos, by repaying the Lacedaemonians with the like destruction of their fleet at Cnidus. After this victorie Conon failed to Athens, bringing with him, partly as the liberallitie of Pharnabazus, partly as the fruit of his victorie, so strong a Naue, and so much gold, as encouraged the Athenians

Athenians to rebuild their walls, and thinke more hopefully vpon recouering the Signiorie which they had lost.

§. VIII.

Of sundrie small victories gotten on each part. The Lacedaemonians lose all in Asia; The Athenians recover some part of their old Dominion.

Neither the Lacedaemonians, by many victories at Land, maintained for some yeeres the honour of their estate, endangered very greatly by this losse at Sea. For Agessilus obtained the better with his horse-men from the Thebans, who were accounted the best riders in Greece: He walled Baetia, and fought a great battaile at Coronea against the Thebans, and their Allies, whom he overthrew; and by his Marshall Gylis foraged the Countrey of Laeris: which done, he returned home.

The gaine of these victories was not great, & the reputation of them was, by many losses, much defaced. For the Thebans did in the battailes of Coronea vanquish the Orchomenians, who stood opposite vnto them, and retired vnbroken to Mount Helicon, opening way perforce when Agessilus charged them in the returne from the pursuit. Likewise Gylis was slaine with a great part of his Armie by the Laerians, and some other exploits by the Lacedaemonians performed against the Corinthians, were repayed with equall damage received in the parts adioyning; many Townes being easily taken, and as easily recovered. The variety of which enter-fates was such, that the Thebans themselves were drawne, by the losse of the haue of Corinth, to sue for peace, but could not get audience, till such time as the newes came of a great victorie obtained by Iphicrates, Generall of the Athenian forces at Lechaum, wherupon the Theban Embassadors being sent for, and willing to doe their message, required only in forme, to haue a safe conduct giuen them, that they might enter into Corinth. From this time forward the Warre was made for a while only by incursions, wherein the Acheans, confederates of Sparta, felt most losse, their whole state being endangered by the Acrarnians, who held with the contrarie side, vntill Agessilus repaid these invaders with equall, or greater calamities, brought vpon their owne Lands, which did so afflict the Acrarnians, that they were driven to sue for peace. But the affaires at Sea were of moll consequence, vpon which the successe of all depended. For when the Townes of Asia perceived, that the Lacedaemonians were not only intangled in an hard war at home, but almost disabled to passe the Seas, having lost their fleet at Cnidus; they soone gaue eare to Pharnabazus, who promised to allow that they should vied their own lawes, if they would expell the Spartan Gouvernours. Onely the Citie of Abidos did stand firme, wherein Dercylidas lay, who did his best to containe all the Townes about Hellefont, in the alliance of the Lacedaemonians; which he could not doe, because the Athenian fleet vnder Thrasybulus tooke in Byzantium, Chalcedon, and other places thereabout, reducing the Isle of Lesbos to their ancient acknowledgement of Athens.

The base conditions offered vnto the Persian by the Lacedaemonians. Of sundrie fights and other passages in the warre. The peace of ANTALCIDAS.

About this time the Spartans beganne to perceiue how vncasie a thing it would bee, to maintaine the warre against men as good as themselves, assisted with the treasures of Persia: wherefore they craued peace of Antaxerxes, most basely offering, not only to renounce the Greeks inhabiting habiting Asia, & to leaue them to the Kings disposition, but withall to let the Islanders, and euerie Towne in Greece, as well the little as the great, at full and absolute libertie whereby they said that all the principal Estates of their Countrie would be weakened, that no one, nor all of them should be able to stirre against the great King. And sure it was, that the power of the Countrie being broken, and rent into many small pieces, could neither haue disquieted the Persian, by an offensive warre, nor haue made any good defence against him, but would haue leit it easie for him in continuance of time, to haue taken the Cities one after another, till he had made himselfe Master of all. The Spartans were not ignorant of this, but were so carried with enuie, that perceiving how the dominion of the Seas was like to returne to Athen, they chose rather to giue all from themselves and others, and make all a-like weak; than to permit that any of their owne Nation should grow stronger than themselves, who so lately had commanded all. Yet this great offer was not at the first accepted, both in regard that the other Estates of Greece, who had in the Kings behauiour together against the Lacedamonians, did by their severall Embassadours oppose themselves vnto it, and for that it was thought safest for Artaxerxes, rather to weaken the Lacedamonians yet more, than by interposing himself to bring friends and foes on the suddaine to an equalitie. Especially Struthas, whom Artaxerxes did send as his Lieutenant into the low-Countries, did seeke to repay the harme done by Agesilans in those parts: which his intent appearing plaine, and all hope of the peace being thereby cut off; Timbro was sent into Asia to make war vpon Struthas; and others were appointed to other places, whereby the warre, being scattered about, all the Isles and Townes on the firme Land grew almost to the manner of piracie and robbetrie, affording many skirmishes, but few great actions worthie remembrance. Timbro was slaine by Struthas, and in his place Diphridas was sent who demeaned himselfe more warily. Diretyldas was removed from his charge at Abydus, because he had not impeached Thrasibulus in his enterprises about Hellepont; Anaxibius, who succeeded him, was surprisid and slaine in a skirmish by Iphicrates the Athenian. Thrasibulus, departing from Leibes toward Rhodes, was slaine by the way at Apendus. The Citie of Rhodes had long before ioined with the Lacedamonians, who erected there (as was their manner) an Aristocratie, or the Government of a few the principall Citizens, where as contrariwise the Athenians were accustomed to put the Souerainetie into the hands of the people, each of them seeking to assure themselves, by erecting in the Townes of their Confederates a Government like vnto their owne: which doing (where more especiall cause did not hinder) caused the Nobilitie to fauour Sparta, and the Commons to incline to Athen. The people of Aeginarou vpon the coast of Attica, which caused the Athenians to land an Armie in Agina, and besiege their towne: but this siege being raised by the assistance of the Lacedemonian fleet, the Islanders beganne a new to molest Attica, which caused the Athenians to man their ships againe, that returned beaten, hauing lost foure of thirteene. The losse of these ships was soone recompensed by a victory which Chabrias the Athenian General had in Agina, where vpon the Islanders were faine to keepe home, and leaue to the Athenians the Seas free. It may well seeme strange that the Citie of Athen, hauing but newly raised her walls; hauing not by any fortunate and important battaile secured her estate from dangers by land; but onely depending vpon the assistance of such Confederates, as carried vnto different ends, had often discovered themselves irresolute in the common cause; would send a fleet and an Armie to Cyprus, in defence of Eusegoras, when the mastery of the Seas, was so ill assured, that an Island lying in the eie of Pyræus, had abilitie to vex the coast of Attica. But as the ouer-weaning of that Citie did cause it vsually to embrace more then it could compass; so the insolencie and shamelesse iniustice of the people, had now bred in the chiefe Commanders, a desire to keepe themselves farre out of sight, and to seeke employments at such distance as might secure them from the enuies of the enuious, and from publike iudgements, out of which

few or none escaped. For which cause Timotheus did passe away much part of his time in the Isle of Lesbos, Iphicrates in Thrace, and Chabrias now did carrie away into Cyprus a greater force than his Countrie well could haue spared, with which he returned not when the businesse in Cyprus came to an end, but sought new adventures in Egypt, whereby arose neither thanks to himselfe, nor profit to his Citie, though honour both to him and it. The Athenians being thus carelesse of things at hand, had a notable blow giuen vnto them, shortly after that Chabrias was gone to Cyprus, euen within their owne Haven. For Telentius, a Lacedemonian, being made Governour of Agina, conceived a strong hope of surpriuing the Naue of Athen, as it lay in Piræus; thinking a right that it was a harder matter to encounter with ten ships prepared for the fight, than with twentie lying in harbour, whose Mariners were asleep in their Cabbins, or drinke in Tavernes. Wherefore he failed by night vnto the mouth of the Port, which entring at the breake of day, hee found (according to his expectation) most of the men on shore, & few or none leit aboard to make resistance: by which meanes hee tooke many ships laden with marchandizes, many fisher-men, passengers, and other Vessels, also three or foure Gallies, hauing sunke or broken, and made vnsecurable, as many of the rest as the time would suffer. About this time Pharnabazus, the Lieutenant of Phrygia, had one of the Kings Daughters giuen to him in marriage, with whom hee liued about the Court; and many Officers that fauoured the Lacedamonians were placed in the lower Asia; by whose assistance, the fleet of Sparta grew victorious about Hellepont; in such wise, that perhaps they should not haue needed the peace, which they themselves procured by Antalcidas, from the great King, the conditions whereof were such as are mentioned before, giuing freedom to all the Cities of Greece, and diuiding the Countrie into as many seuerall States as there were petty Boroughs in it. Thus Artaxerxes hauing bought his owne peace with money, did likewise by his money become arbitrator & decider of Controuerfies betwene the Greekes, disposing of their businesse in such wise as stood best with his owne good. The renor of Artaxerxes his decree was, That all Asia and Cyprus should be his owne; the Isles of Lemnos, Imbrus, and Scirus be subject to Athen; all other Greece Townes, as well the little as the great, be set at libertie; and that whosoeuer should refuse this peace, vpon them the approuers of it should make warre, the King assisting them by Land and Sea, with men, and ships, and treasure. The Athenians were so discouraged by their losses at Sea; the Lacedamonians by ruolt of their Confederates, and the necessitie of maintaining many Garrisons, for which they wanted money; and other States by the miseries of the warre, whereof they saw no end; that all (excepting the Thebians) did consent vnto these Articles. This was called the peace of Antalcidas: whereof the Lacedamonians taking vpon themselves the execution, did not only compell the Argives to depart out of Corinth (which vnder pretence of defending they held by Garrisons, lately thrust into it, not as Patrons, but as Lords) and the Thebians to leaue Boetia free, of which Prouince Thebes had alwaies held the government: the Thebians themselves being also comprehended vnder the name of the Boetians; but caused the Mantineans to throw downe their owne Citie, and to dwell in Villages: alleging that they had formerly beene accustomed so to doe, though purposing indeede to chastise them, as hauing bene ill affected to Sparta in the late Warre. By these courses the Lacedamonians did hope that all the small Townes in Greece would, when occasion should require it, willingly follow them in their warres, as Authors of their libertie; and that the great Cities hauing lost all their dependants, would be vnable to make opposition.

The warre which the Lacedæmonians made vpon Olynthus. They take Thebes by treason; and Olynthus by famine.

Whilest these warres, which ended without either victorie or profit, consumed the riches and power of Greece, the Citie of Olynthus in Thrace was growne so mighty, that shee did not only command her Neighbour Townes, but was become terrible to places farre removed, and to Sparta it selfe. Great part of Macedonia, together with Pella, the principall Citie of that Kingdome, was taken by the Olynthians, who following the vsuall pretence of the Lacedæmonians, to set at libertie the places ouer which King Amyntas did tyrannize, had almost now driven him out of his Dominions, and taken all to themselves. The Citizens of Acanthus and of Apollonia, being nearest vnto the danger of these incroaching neighbours, acquainted the Lacedæmonians with their feare, affirming that this Dominion of the Olynthians would bee too strong for all Greece, if some continuance of time should giue it reputation, which only it wanted, wherefore they requested assistance, but in such termes as did found of compulsion; protesting that either they must warre vpon Olynthus, or become subject vnto her, and fight in her defence. Heereupon was made a halfe leaue of 20 men, two thousand being presently sent away with promise to be seconded by a greater Armie. Whilest these two thousand gaue such beginning to the warre, as agreed with their small number, the body of the Armie following them, surprised the Citadell of Thebes, which was betraied into the hands of Phylidas the Lacedæmonian, by some of the Magistrates, who sought to strengthen their faction by the flauerie of their Countrie. The Thebans were ill affected to Sparta, but had not in any one point violated the peace lately made betwene them; which caused the Lacedæmonians to doubt whether this act of Phylidas were more worthy of reward or of punishment; In conclusion, profit so farre ouerweighed honestie, that the deepe was approued, many principall Citizens of Thebes condemned to death, many driuen into banishment; and the Traitors rewarded with the gouernement of the Citie: by whose authoritie, and the force of the Garrison, the Thebans were compelled to serue the Lacedæmonians, in all, and more than all that they could require. This successe of power hauing strengthened the Lacedæmonians, caused them to entertaine the greater forces about Olynthus, which (notwithstanding the losse of one great battaile, and some other disasters) they compelled at length by famine to render it selfe to their obedience.

After this Olynthian Warre, which endured almost three yeeres, it seemed that no Estate in Greece was able to make head against that of Sparta: but it was not long ere the Thebans found meanes to shake off their yoke, and gaue both example and meanes to others to doe the like. One of the banished men found by conference with a Scribe of the Theban Magistrates, comming to Athens, that the tyrannic wherewith his Countrie was oppressed, pleased him no better than it did those who for feare of it were fled from home. Whereupon a plot was layd betwene these two, that soon found very good successe, being managed thus. Seven of the banished men forooke Athens priuily, and entred by night into the fields of Thebes; where spending the next day secretly, they came late in the euening to the Gates like husband-men returned turned from worke, and so passed vndiscovered vnto the house of Charon, whom Phylidas the Scribe had drawne into the conspiracie. The day following a sollemne feast being then held in the Citie, Phylidas promised the Gouernours, who were insolent and lustfull men, that hee would conueigh vnto them that night the most beautifull Dames of the Towne, with whom they should take their pleasure. Hauing cheared them with such hope, and plentie of good wine, hee told them when the time of performance (which they vrged) came, that hee could not make good his promise, vnlesse they would dimitt their followers, because the Gentlewomen, who attended without a Chamber, would not endure, that any of the seruants should see their faces. Vpon this occasion the attendantes were dismissed, and the Conspirators, attired like Ladies and their Maides, brought into the place, who taking aduantage of the Gouernours loose behauiour, flew them al vpon the fodaine with Daggers, which they brought hidden vnder their garments. Then presently calling off their disguise, they went to other places, where faining themselves to come to the Gouernours vpon business, they got admittance; and slew those which were of the Lacedæmonian faction. By the like deuice they brake into the prison, slew the Goler; and set at libertie such as they thought meete, and being followed by the desperate men, proclaimed libertie, making the death of the Tyrants known. The Capitaine of the Castle hearing the Proclamation, thought the Rebels to bee stronger than indeed they were: the Citizens contrariwise mistrusted, that it was a practice to discouer such, as would be forward vpon occasion of reuolting. But as soone as day-light reuealed the plaine truth, all the people tooke armes & besieged the Castle, sending hastily to Athens for succour. The Garrison also sent for aide vnto the Townes adioyning, whence a few broken troups comming to the rescue, were defeated on the way by the horse-men of Thebes. On the other side the banished Thebans did not only make speede to assist their Countreimen, but procured some Athenians to ioyne with them, and thereby came so strong into the Citie, that the Castle was yeilded, more through feare than any necessitie, vpon condition that the Souldiers might quietly depart with their Armes, for which composition the Capitaine at his returne to Sparta was put to death. When the newes of the doings at Thebes, and the successe arrived at Sparta, an Armie was raised forth with, and all things prepared as earnestly for the recouering of that Citie, as if some part of their ancient inheritance had bene taken from the Lacedæmonians, and not a Towne perfidiously vsurped by them, restored to her owne libertie. Cleombrotus, one of the Kings, was sent on this expedition, who hauing wearied his followers, with a toilsome Winters journey, returned home without any good or harme done; leaving Sphodrias, with part of his Armie, at Thebes, to intell the Thebans; who doing them some displeasures, made large amends by a foolish attempt vpon the Haven of Athens, which failing to take, hee wasted the Countrie adioyning, and draue away Cattaille, causing by this outrage the Athenians to enter with all their power into the Warre, out of which they were before very carefully seeking how to with-draw themselves.

CHAP. XII.

Of the flourishing estate of Thebes, from the battaile of Leuctra to the battaile of Mantinea.

§. I.

How Thebes and Atheni joyned together against Sparta. How the Athenians made peace for themselves, and others, out of which the Thebans were excluded. The battaile of Leuctra, and beginning of the Theban greatnesse.

TH^e Lacedemonians were men of great resolution, and of much grauitie in all their proceedings, but one dishonorable rule they held, That all respects withstanding the commoditie of Sparta were to be neglected; the practice of which doctrine, euen by the best and wisest of them, did greatly blemish that Estate, but when it was put in execution by insufficient overweening men, it seldome failed to bring vpon them in stead of profit vnjustly expected, both shame & losse. And so it befel them in these enterprises of Phædras, vpon the Cattle of Thebes, and Sphodrias vpon the Piræus. For howsoeuer Agesilaus did spoile the Countrey about Thebes, in which hee spent two Summers, yet the diligence of the Thebans repaired all, who by the good successe of some attempts grew stronger than they were at the first.

The Athenians likewise beganne to looke abroade, failing to the Ile of Corcyra, where they ordered things at their pleasure, and hauing in some fights at Sea preuailed, began as in the Peloponnesian warre, to surround Peloponnesus with a Naue; afflicting to the Lacedemonians, that had not the Thebans by their insolencie wearied their friends, and caused them to seeke for peace, it had bene very likely that the end of this warre, should haue soone come to a good end, which neuertheless, being persecuted by the Thebans (who opposed at once both these two great Estates) left the City of Sparta as much dejected as the beginning found it proud and tyrannous. But the Athenians perceiving how Thebes encroched every day vpon her weake Neighbours, not sparing such as had bene dependants vpon Athens, and finding themselves, whilest engaged in such a warre, vnable to relieue their complaining friends, resolved to settle the affaires of Greece, by renewing that forme of peace which Antalcidas had brought from the Persian. Wherefore they sent Messengers to Thebes, peremptorily signifying, That it was their intent to finish the Warre; to which purpose they willed the Thebans to send Embassadors along with them to Sparta; who readily condescended, fearing otherwise that they should be left out of the Treatie of peace, which came to passe, being so wrought by the courageous wisdom of Epaminondas, who vnderstood farre better than his Countymen, what was to be feared or hoped. In this Treatie the Lacedemonians and Athenians did soone agree; but when the Thebans offered to sweare to the Articles in the name of the Boeotians; Agesilaus required them to sweare in their owne name, and to leaue the Boeotians free, whom they had lately reduced vnder their obedience. Whereunto Epaminondas made answer, That the Citie of Sparta should giue example to Thebes by setting the Lacedonians free; for that the Signorie of Boeotia did by as good right appertaine to the Thebans, as that of Laconia to the Spartans. This was well and truly spoken; but was heard with no patience: For Agesilaus bearing a vehement hatred vnto those of Thebes, by whom he was drawne back out of Asia into Greece, & disappointed of all the glory which he had hoped to attchieue by the Persian Warre, did

now very passionately vrge that point of setting the Boeotians at libertie, and finding it as oblatrately refused, he dashed the name of the Thebans out of the league. At the lame time Cleombrotus the other King of Sparta lay in Phocia, who receiued command from the Gouernours of Sparta forthwith to enter vpon the Land of the Thebans with all his power, which he did, and was there slaine at Leuctra, and with him the flowre of his Armie. This battaile of Leuctra being one of the most famous that euer were fought betweene the Greekes, was not so notable for any circumstance foregoing it, or for the managing of the fight it selfe, as for the death of the King, and many Citizens of Sparta, but especially, for that after this battaile (betweene which and the conclusion of the generall peace there passed but twentie daies) the Lacedemonians were neuer able to recouer the strength and reputation which had formerly made them redoubted farre and neere; whereas contrariwise the Thebans, whose greatelt ambition had in former times confined it selfe vnto the little Region of Boeotia, did now begin to vndertake the leading and command of many People and Estates, in such wise, that soone after they brought an Armie of threescore and ten thousand strong vnto the Gates of Sparta. So much doe the afflictions of an hard warre, valiantly indured, aduance the affaires of the distressed, and guide them into the way of Conquest, by stiffening that resolution with a manly temper, which wealth and ease had through luxurie, rechelesseesse, and many other vices or vantities, made rustie and effeminate.

§. II.

How the Athenians tooke vpon them to maintain the peace of Greece. New troubles hence arising. Epaminondas inuadeth and wasteth the Territories of Lacedemon.

TH^e Athenians, refusing to take aduantage of this ouerthrow fallen vpon their old Enemies, and new Confederates the Lacedemonians; did neuertheless finely giue them to vnderstand, that their Dominion was expired, and therefore their pride might well be laid away. For taking vpon themselves the maintenance of the peace lately concluded, which Agesilaus (perhaps of purpose to make benefit of quarels that might arise) had left vnperfect, they assembled the Deputies of all the Estates confederated at Athens; where the generall libertie of all Townes, as well small as great, was ratified, vnder the stile Of the Athenians, and their Associates. Hereupon began fresh garboiles. The Mantinians, claiming power by this decree to order their affaires at their owne pleasure, did (as it were) in despite of the Spartans, who had enforced them to raze their towne, reedifie it, & allie themselves with such of the Arcadians as stood worst affected to Sparta. The Arcadians, a strong Nation, consisting of many Cities, were distracted with factions; some desiring to hold good correspondencie with the Lacedemonians; some to weaken & keep them low; yet all pretending other ends. The Lacedemonians durst not giue impeachment to the Mantinians; nor take vpon them to correct their ill-willers among the Arcadians, till such time as the factions brake out into violence, and each part called in forraigne helpe. Then was an Armie sent from Sparta, as it were in defence of the people of Tegea, against the Mantinians, but indeed against them both. Agesilaus had the leading of it, but effected nothing. The Thebans had by this time subdued the Phocians, & were become head of the Locrians, Acarnanians, Eubœans, & many others; with the power of which Countries they entered Peloponnesus in favor of the Arcadians, who had, vpon expectation of their coming obtained from giuing battaile to Agesilaus. The Armie of the Spartans being dismissed, and Epaminondas joyned with the Arcadians; the Region of Laconia was inuaded and spoiled: a thing so strange, that no Oracle could haue found beliefe if any had foretold it. Almost fixe hundred yeeres were spent, since the Dorians, vnder the posteritie of Hercules, had seized vpon Laconia, in all which time the found of an enemies trumpet was not heard in that Countrey: Ten yeeres were not fully past, since all Greece was at the deuotion of the Spartans: but now the Region which neither Xerxes with his huge Armie could once looke vpon, nor the mightie forces of Athens, and other Enemye-States had dared to set foot on, sauing by stealth, was all on a light fire, the very smoke whereof the women of Sparta were ashamed to behold. All which indignitie notwithstanding, the Lacedemonians did not issue out of Sparta to fight, but fought how to preferre the Towne, setting at libertie as many of their Helotes or Slaues as were willing to beare Armes in defence of the State; and somewhat pittifully entreated the Athenians to giue them succour. From Corinth and some Townes of Peloponnesus they receiued speedie assistance; the Athenians came forward more slowly, so that Epaminondas returned without battaile, hauing rebuild- 10 ded the Citie of Messene, and peopled it a-new by calling home the ancient Inhabitants, whom the Lacedemonians many Ages before had chased away into other Countries, possessing their Territories themselves.

§. IIII.

The composition between Athens and Sparta for command in warre against the Thebans; who againe invade and spoile Peloponnesus. Thev unfortunate presumption of the Arcadians.

THis journey therefore vtterly defaced the reputation of the Spartans, in such wise, that they did no longer demand the conduct of the Army, which was to be raised, nor any manner of precedence: but sending Embassadors from Sparta, and from all the Cities which held league with it, vnto Athens, they offered to yeeld the Admiraltie to the Athenians, requesting that they themselves might be Generalls by Land. This had become a composition well agreeing with the situation and qualitie of those two Cities; but it was rejected, because the Mariners and others that were to be imployed at Sea, were men of no marke or estimation, in regard of those companies of horse and foot whereof the Land-Armie was compounded, who being all Gentlemen or Citizens of Athens, were to haue serued vnder the Lacedemonians. Wherefore it was agreed that the authority should be diuided by time, the Athenians ruling five daies, the Lacedemonians other five, & so successfullly that each of them should haue command of all, both by Land and by Sea. It is manifest, that in this conclusion vaine ambition was more regarded than the common profit, which must of necessitie be very slowly aduanced, where consultation, resolution, and performance are so often to change hands. This appeared by a second inuasion of Peloponnesus, wherein the Thebans found their enemies so vnable to impeach them, that hauing fortified Isthmus from Sea to Sea, as in former times they had done against Xerxes, they were driven out of their strength by Epaminondas, who foraged the Countrey without resistance. But as the Articles of this league betwene Athens and Sparta did, by di- 40 uiding the conduct in such manner, disable the societie, and make it insufficient to those ends for which it was concluded; so the example of it wrought their good, by filling the enemies heads with the like vanitie. For the Arcadians considering their owne numbers which they brought into the field, and hauing found by many trials that their people were not inferior to others in strength of body, in courage, or in good Souldierishship, thought it good reason that they should in like manner share the gouernement, with their friends the Thebans; and not alwaies continue followers of others, by encralling whose greatness they should strengthen their own yoke. Here- 50 vpon they began to demaene themselves very insolently, whereby they grew hateful to their Neighbour, and suspected of the Thebans in an ill time. For a motion of generall peace hauing been made (which tooke not effect, because the City of Messene was not abandoned to the Lacedemonians) the next enterprise of the Spartans and their friends was vpon these Arcadians, who relying too much vpon their owne worth, were ouerthrowne in a great battaile, their calamitie being as pleasing to their Confederates, as to their Enemies.

§. IIII.

§. IIII.

The great growth of the Theban Estate. Embassages of the Greekes to the Persian; with the reasons why he most fauoured the Thebans. Troubles in the Persian Empire. The fruitlesse issue of the Embassages.

THe Thebans especially reioyced at the Arcadians misfortune, considering, that, without their aide, the successfull of all enterprises proued so ill; whereas they themselves had by their owne power accomplished 10 very well whatsoeuer they tooke in hand, and were become not only victorious ouer the Lacedemonians, but patrons ouer the Thebans, and Moderators of the great quarrels that had risen in Asiatick, where compounding the differences about that Kingdome, as pleased them best, they carried Philip the Sonne of Amyntas, and Father of Alexander the Great, as an Hostage vnto Thebes. Hauing therefore obtained such reputation, that little seemed wanting to make them absolute Commanders of all Greece, they sought meanes of alliance with the Persian King, to whom they sent Embassadors: the great and famous Capitaine Pelopidas, whose reputation drew Artaxerxes to grant vnto the Thebans all that they 20 desired; whereof two especiall points were, That Messene should remaine free from the Lacedemonians; and that the Athenians should forbear to send their ships of Warre to Sea; only the later of these two was somewhat qualified with clemencie to further aduice. The other States of Greece did also send their Embassadors at the same time, of whom few or none receiued much contentment. For the King hauing found by long experience, how farre it concerned him to maintaine a sure partie in Greece, did vpon many waightie considerations: resolve, to binde the Thebans firmly vnto him; iustly expecting, that their greatnesse should bee on that side his owne securitie. The Athenians had bene ancient enemies to his Crowne, and, hauing turned the profit of their victories vpon the Persian to the purchase of a 30 great Estate in Greece, maintained their Signorie in such puissant manner, that (sundry grievous misfortunes notwithstanding) they had endured a terrible warre, wherein the Lacedemonians being followed by most of the Greekes, and supplied with treasure, and all sorts of aide by Darius Nathus, were notable to vanquish them, till their owne indiscretion brought them on their knees. The Lacedemonians being victorious ouer Athens, had no sooner established their Dominion at home, than they undertooke the conquest of Asia, from which though, by the commotion raised in Greece with Persian gold, they were called backe, yet hauing renewed their power, and settled things in Greece, it was not vnlikely, that they should vpon the next aduantage haue pursued the same enterprise, had not they beene impeached 40 by this Theban Warre. But the Thebans contrariwise had alwaies discovered a good affection to the Crowne of Persia. They had sided with Xerxes in his inuasion of Greece; with Darius and the Lacedemonians against Athens. And finally, hauing refused much contumely to Agaglaus when he put to Sea, they drew him home by making warre on the Confederates of Sparta. Besides all these their good deservings, they were no Sea-men, and therefore vnlikely to looke abroad; whereunto it perchance they should haue any desire, yet were they disabled by the want of good haueu townes, which they could not seize vpon without open breach of that peace, whereof they intended to become the Executors, giuing libertie to all Cities that had at any time been free. Wherefore Artaxerxes did wholly condescend vnto the 50 requests of Pelopidas, as farre forth as he might without giuing open defiance to the rest of Greece; and by that meane he purchased his owne quiet, being neuer afterward molested by that Nation in the lower Asia. The ill meane which the Greekes had to disturbe Artaxerxes, was very beneficiall to the Estate of Persia shortly after these times, in that great rebellion of all the Maritime Provinces. For had then the affaires of Greece beene so composed, that any one Citie might without empeachment of the rest have transported an Armie, to assist the revolting Satrapæ, or Viceroyes of Caria, Phrygia, Lydia, Mysia, Lycia, Pamphilia, Cilicia, Syria, and Phœnicia, humane reason can hardly find the means, by which the Empire could have been preferred from that ruine, which the diuine Councel had deferred vnto the daies of Alexander. But this great conspiracie of so many large and wealthy Prouinces, wanting a firme bodie of good and hardy Souldiers, was in short space discussed and vanquished like a mist, without effect: these effeminate Asiaticques wearied quickly with the traualles and dangers incident to warre, forsaking the common cause, and each man struing to bee the first, that by treason to his company should both redeme the former treason to his Prince, & purchase withal his own promotion with encrease of riches. Of this commotion, which in course of time followed some actions not as yet related, I haue rather chosen to make short mention in this place, than hereafter to interrupt the Narration of things more important; both for that it was like a suddaine storme, rashly commenced, idly followed, and foolishly laied downe, hauing made a great noise without effect, and hauing small reference to any other action regardable; as also because in the whole reign of Artaxerxes, from the warre of Cyrus, to the inuasion of Egypt, I finde nothing (this insurrection, and a fruitlesse journey against the Cadusians excepted) worthy of any mention, much lesse of digression from the course of the businesse in Greece. All, or the most of his time, passed away so quietly, that he enioyed the pleasures which an Empire so great and wealthy could afford vnto so absolute a Lord, with little disturbance. The troubles which he found were only or chiefly Domestical, growing out of the hatred which Parysatis the Queen-Mother bare vnto his wife Statira, and to such as had bin the greatest enemies to her sonne Cyrus, or gloried in his death: vpon whom, when by poison and mischievous practices shee had satisfied her feminine appetite of reuenge, thenceforth she wholly applied her selfe to the Kings disposition, cherishing in him the lewd desire of marrying his own Daughter, & filling him with the perauersion, which Princes, not endued with an especiall grace, doe readily entertaine. That his owne will was the supreme law of his subject, and the rule by which all things were to be measured, and adjudged to be good or euill. In this imaginarie happinesse Pelopsias, and the other Embassadors of Greece, both found and left him, but left him by so much more assured than they found him, by how much the conclusion of his Treatie with them, being altogether to his owne advantage did seeme to promise, if not the perpetuities, along endurance of the same felicity to him and his, or (at the least) a full security of danger from Greece, whence only could any danger be feared. But such foundations of eternitie laied by mortal men in this transitory world, like the Tower of Babel, are either shaken from heauen, or made vaine and vnprofitable, ere the frame can be raised to full height, by confusion of tongues among the builders. Hereof was found a good example in the Thebans, and other Estates of Greece, 40 that had sent Embassadors to the Persians. For whereas it had been concluded, that all Townes, as well the little as the great, should be set at libertie, and the Thebans made Protectors of this common peace, who thereby should become the Iudges of all controuersies that might arise, and Leaders in warre of all that would enter into this Confederacy; the Kings letters being solemnly published at Thebes, in the presence of Embassadors, drawne thither from all parts of Greece; when an oath was required for obseruation of the forme of peace therein set downe, a dilatorie answer was made by the Embassadors, who said, that they were sent to heare the articles; not to sweare vnto them. Hereby the Thebans were driuen to send vnto each of the Cities to require the Oath; but in vaine. For when the Corinthians had boldly refused it, saying, That they did not need it; others tooke courage by their example to doe the like, disappointing the Thebans of their glorious hopes, to whom this negotiation with Artaxerxes gaue neither addition nor confirmation of greatness, but left them as if found them to rely vpon their owne swords.

§. V.

§. V.

How all Greece was diuided, betwene the Athenians and Lacedæmonians, on the one side, and Thebans on the other. Of the great tumults rising in Arcadia.

THe condition of things in Greece at that time did stand thus. Athens and Sparta, which in former times had commanded all that Nation, and each vpon enuie of the others greatness drawne all her followers into a cruell intestine warre, by which the whole Countrey, and especially the Estate of these two Cities, was brought very low, did now conioyne their forces against the Thebans, who sought to make themselves Lords of all. The Eleans, Corinthians, and Achaïans, followed the partie of these ancient governing Cities; either for the old reputation of them, and benefits received, or in dislike of those, who by strong hand were ready to become Rulers, to which authoritie they could not suddenly aspire without some iniurie and much enuie. The Citie of Thebes abounding with men, whom necessitie had made warlike, and many victories in few yeeres had filled with great spirits, & being so mightie in dependants, that shee had reduced all the continent of Greece without Peloponnesus (the Region of Attica, and very little part beside excepted) vnder such acknowledgement, as wanted not much of meere Vassallage, did hope to bring all Peloponnesus to the like obedience, wherein already shee had set good footing by her conjunction with the States of Argos, and of Arcadia. The Argiues had bene alwaies bad Neighbours to the Spartans, to whom they thought themselves in ancient Nobilitie Superiours, but were farre vnder them in valour, hauing bene often beaten out of the field by them, and put in danger of loosing all: which caused them to suspect and enuie nothing more than the greatness and honor of Sparta, taking truce with her when shee was at rest, and had leisure to bend her whole force against them, but firmly ioyning with her enemies whensoever they found her entangled in a difficult Warre. As the Argiues were, in hatred of Sparta, sure friends of Thebes, so the Arcadians, transported with a great opinion of their owne worthines, had formerly renounced and 30 provoked against them their old Confederates and Leaders, the Lacedæmonians, and were now become very doubtfull adherents to the Thebans. In which regard it was thought convenient by Epaminondas, and the State of Thebes, to send an Armie into Peloponnesus, before such time as these wauering friends should fall further off, and become either Neutrall, or, which was to be feared, open enemies. And surely great cause there was to suspect the worst of them, considering that without consent of the Thebans, they had made peace with Athens; which was very strange, and seemed no lesse to the Athenians themselves, who holding a firme league with Sparta at the same time when they the Arcadians treated with them, did neuertheless accept this new 40 Confederacie, nor relinquishing the old, because they found that, howlooser these Arcadians were enemies to the Lacedæmonians, they should hereby be drawne somewhat further from their alliance with Thebes, which without them was vnlikely to inuade Peloponnesus with a strong Armie. But this did rather hasten, than by any means stay, the coming of Epaminondas; who finding the way somewhat more clear for him (because the Citie of Corinth, which lay vpon the Silismas, and had bene aduerse to Thebes, was now, by miseries of this grieuous warre, driuen to become Neutrall) tooke occasion hereby, and by some disorders among the Arcadians, to visit Peloponnesus with an Armie, consisting of all the power of Thebes. A great tumult had risen in Arcadia about consecrated money, which many principal men 50 among them had laied hands on, vnder pretence of employing it to publike vses. In compounding the differences growne vpon this occasion, such, as had least will to render account of the money which had come into their hands, procured the Captaine of some Theban Souldiers, lying in Tegea, to take prisoners many of their COUNTRYMEN, as people desirous of innovation. This was done: but the vpr-roare thereby thereby caused was so great, that the prisoners were forth-with enlarged, and the Arcadians, who had in great numbers taken Armes, with much a doe scarce pacified. When complaint of the Captaines proceedings came to Thebes, Epaminondas turned all the blame vpon them, who had made the peace with Athens, letting them know, that he would be shortly among them, to iudge of their fidelitie, by the assistance which they should giue him, in that warre, which he intended to make in Peloponnesus. These Lordly wordes did greatly amaze the Arcadians; who needing not the aide of so mightie a power as he drew a-long with him, did vehemently suspect that great preparation to bee made against themselves. Hereupon such of them as had before sought meanes to settle the affaires of their Countrey, by drawing things to some good conclusion of peace, did now forth-with send to Athens for helpe, and withall dispatched some of the principall among them as Embassadors to Sparta, by whom they offered themselves to the common defence of Peloponnesus, now ready to be invaded. This Embassage brought much comfort to the Lacedaemonians, who feared nothing more than the coming of Epaminondas, against whom they well knew, that all their forces, and best prouisions, would bee no more than very hardly sufficient. Forbearing therefore to dispute about prerogatiues, they (who had been accustomed vnto such a supremacie, as they would in no wise communicate with the powerfull Citie of Athens, till other hope of securing their owne Estate could not be thought vpon) did now verie gently yeeld to the Arcadians, that the command of the Armie in chiefe, should be giuen, for the time, to that Citie, in whose Territorie it lay.

§. VI.

A terrible inuasion of Peloponnesus by EPAMINONDAS.

ERTAIN it is, that the condition of things did at that time require a verie firme consent, and vniforme care of the common safetie. For beside the great forces raised out of the other parts of Greece, the Argives, and Messenians, prepared with all their strength to ioyne with Epaminondas; who hauing lien a while at Nemea, to intercept the Athenians, receiued there intelligence, that the Armie coming from Athens would passe by Sea, whereupon he dislodged, and came to Tegea, which Citie, and the most of all Arcadia besides, forthwith declared themselves his. The common opinion was, that the first attemp of the Thebans, would be vpon such of the Arcadians as had revolted; which caused the Lacedaemonian Captaines to fortifie Mantinea with all diligence, and to send for Agellaw to Sparta, that he bringing with him all that small force of able men, which remained in the Towne, they might be strong enough to abide Epaminondas there. But Epaminondas held so good spiall vpon his Enemies, that had not an vnknowne fellow brought hastie aduertisement of his purpose to Agellaw, who was then well onward in the way to Mantinea, the Citie of Sparta had suddenly been taken. For thither with all speede and secrecie did the Thebans march, who had surely carried the Citie, notwithstanding any defence that could haue beene made by that handfull of men remaining within it; but that Agellaw in all flying haste got into it with his Companies, whom the Army of his Confederates followed thither to the rescue as fast as it was able. The arriual of the Lacedaemonians and their friends, as it cut off all hope from Epaminondas of taking Sparta, so it presented him with a faire aduantage vpon Mantinea. It was the time of Haruest, which made it verie likely, that the Mantineans, finding the warre to be carried from their walls into another quarter, would vie the commoditie of that vacation, by fetching in their corne, and turning out their cattell into their fields, whilest no enemy was neere that might empeach them. Wherefore hee turned away from Sparta to Mantinea, sending his horse-men before him, to seize vpon all that might be be found without the Citie. The Mantineans (according to the expectation of Epaminondas) were scattered abroad in the Countrey; farre more intent vpon their haruest-businesse, than vpon the warre, whereof they were secure, as thinking themselves out of distance. By which presumption it fell out, that great numbers of them, and all their Cattell, being vnable to recover the Towne, were in a desperate case; and the Towne it selfe in no great likelihood of holding out, when the enemy should haue taken all their prouision of victuals with so many of the people, as had not ouer-dearly beene redeemed, by that Citie returning to societie with Thebes. But at the same time, the Athenians coming to the succour of their Confederates, whom they thought to haue found at Mantinea, were very earnestly entreated by the Citizens to rescue their goods, and people, from the danger whereinto they were fallen, if it were possible by any couragious aduerture to deliuer those who otherwise were giuen as lost. The Thebans were knowne at that time to bee the best Souldiers of all the Greekes, and the commendation of good horsemanship had alwaies beene giuen to the Thebans, as excellling in that qualitie all other Nations; yet the regard of honour so wrought vpon the Athenians, that for the reputation of their Citie, which had entred into this warre, vpon no necessitie of her owne, but onely in desire of relieuing her distressed friends, they issued forth of Mantinea, not abiding so long as to refresh themselves, or their horses with meat, and giuing a lustie charge vpon the enemy, who as brauely received them, after a long and hote fight, they remained masters of the field, giuing by this victorie a safe and easie retreat to all that were without the walls. The whole power of the Boetians arrived in the place soone after this battaile, whom the Lacedaemonians and their Assitants were not farre behinde.

EPAMINONDAS, considering that his Commission was almost now expired, and that his attempts of surprising Sparta and Mantinea, hauing failed, the impression of terrour which his name had wrought in the Peloponnesians, would soone vanish, vnlesse by some notable act he should abate their courage in their first growth, and leaue some memorable character of his expedition; resolved to giue them battaile, whereby he reasonably hoped both to settle the doubtfull affections of his own Associates, and to leaue the Spartans as weak in spirit and abilitie, as he found them, if not wholly to bring them into subjection. Hauing therefore warned his men to prepare for that battaile, wherein victorie should be rewarded with Lordship of all Greece; and finding the alacritie of his Souldiers to be such, as promised the accomplishment of his owne desire; he made shew of declining the enemy, and intrenching himselfe in a place of more aduantage, that so by taking from them all expectation of fighting that day, hee might allay the heate of their valour, and afterward strike their senses with amazement, when hee should come vpon them vnexpected. This opinion deceiued him not. For with very much tumult, as in so great and sodaine a danger, the enemy ranne to Armes, necessitie enforcing their resolution, and the consequence of that daies seruice vrging them to doe as well as they might. The Theban Armie consisted of thirtie thousand foot, and three thousand horse; the Lacedaemonians and their friends were short of this number, both in horse and in foot, by a third part. The Mantineans (because the warre was in their Countrey) stood in the right wing, and with them the Lacedaemonians: the Athenians had the left wing, the Achaens, Elcans, and others of lesse account, filled the bodie of the Armie. The Thebans stood in the left wing of their owne battaile, opposite to the Lacedaemonians, cedemonians, hauing by them the Arcadians; the Eubears, Lorians, Sicyonians, Messinians, and Thebaisians with others, compounding the maine battaile; the Argiues held the right wing; the horse-men on each part were placed in the flanks, only a troupe of the Eleans were in reare. Before the footmen could joyne, the encounter of the horse on both sides was very rough, wherein finally the Thebans prevailed, notwithstanding the valiant resistance of the Athenians: who not yielding to the enemy either in courage or skill, were ouer-laid with numbers, and so beaten vpon by Thebaisian slings, that they were driuen to forsake the place, and leaue their infanterie naked. But this retreat was the lesse disgracefull, because they kept themselves together, and did not fall backe vpon their owne foot-men; but finding the Theban horse to haue giuen them ouer, and withall discouering some Companies of foot, which had bene sent about by Epaminondas, to charge their battaile in the reare, they brake vpon them, routed them, and hewed them all in peeces. In the meane season the battaile of the Athenians had not onely to doe with the Argiues, but was hardly pressed by the Theban Horse-men, in such wise that it beganne to open, and was readie to turne backe, when the Elean Squadron of Horse came vp to the reliefe of it, and restored all on that part. With farre greater violence did the Lacedaemonians and Thebans meete, these contending for Dominion, the other for the maintenance of their ancient honour, so that equall courage and equal losse on both sides made the hope and appearance of victorie to either equally doubtfull: vnlesse perhaps the Lacedaemonians being very firme abiders, might seeme the more likely to preuaile, as hauing borne the firsh brunt, and furie of the on-set, which was not hitherto remitted, and being framed by Discipline, as it were by Nature, to excell in patience, whereof the Thebans, by practice of a few yeeres, cannot be thought to haue gotten a habite so sure and generall. But Epaminondas perceiving the obdurate stiffenesse of the Enemies to bee such, as neither the badde successe of their owne horse, nor all the force of the Boeotian Armie, could abate so farre, as to make them giue one foote of ground; taking a choise Companie of the most able men, whom hee cast into the forme of a Wedge, or Diamond, by the aduantage of that figure against a Squadron, and by his owne exceeding vertue, accompanied with the great strength and resolution of them which followed him, did open their ranks, and cleaue the whole battaile in despiight of all resistance. Thus was the honour of that day wonne by the Thebans, who may iustly bee said to haue carried the victorie, seeing that they remained Masters of the ground whereon the battaile was fought, hauing driuen the Enemy to lodge farther off. For that which was alleaged by the Athenians, as a token that the victorie was partly theirs, the slaughter of those Mercenaries vpon whom they lighted by chance in their owne flight, finding them behinde their Armie, and the retaining of their dead bodies; it was a Ceremonie regardable onely among the Greekes, and serued meereley for ostentation, shewing that by the fight they had obtained somewhat, which the Enemy could not get from them otherwise than by request. But the Thebans arrived at the generall immediate end of battaile; none daring to abide them in the field: whereof a manifest confession is exprest from them, who forsake the place which they had chosen or accepted, as indifferent for triall of their ability and prowesse. This was the last worke of the incomparable vertue of Epaminondas, who being in the head of that Warlike troupe of men, which broke the Lacedaemonian Squadron, and forced it to giue back in disaray, was furiously charged on the sodaine, by a desperate Company of the Spartans, who all at once threw their Darts at him alone; whereby receiuing many wounds, hee neuertheless with a singular courage maintained the fight, vsing against the Enemies many of their Darts, which hee drew out of his owne bodie; till at length by a Spartan, called Anticrates, hee receiued so violent a stroke with a Dart, that the wood of it brake, leauing the yron and a peece of the tronchion in his breast. Hereupon hee sunke downe, and was soone conueighed out of the fight by his friends; hauing by his fall fall somewhat animated the Spartans (who saine would haue got his bodie) but much more inflamed with reuengefull indignation, the Thebans, who raging at this heauie mischance did with great slaughter compell their disordered enemies to leaue the field; though long they followed not the chase, being wearied more with the sadnesse of this disaster, than with all the trouble of the day. Epaminondas being brought into his Tent, was told by the Philicians, That when the head of the Dart should be drawne out of his bodie, hee must needs die. Hearing this, hee called for his shield, which to haue lost, was held a great dishonour: It was brought vnto him. He bade them tell him which part had bee victorie; answere was made, that the Boeotians had wonne the field. Then said he, it is late time for mee to die, and withall sent for Solides, and Diophantes, two principall men of Warre, that were both slaine; which being told him, He aduised the Thebans to make Peace, whilst with aduantage they might, for that they had none left that was able to discharge the office of a Generall. Herewithall he willed, that the head of the weapon should be drawne out of his bodie; comforting his friends that lamented his death, and want of issue, by telling them, that the victories of Lextra and Maninae were two faire Daughters, in whom his memorie should liue.

So died Epaminondas, the worthiest man that euer was bred in that Nation of Greece, and hardly to bee matched in any Age or Countrey: for hee equaled all others in the seuerall vertues, which in each of them were singular. His Iustice, and Sinceritie, his Temperance, Wisdome, and high Magnanimitie, were no way inferior to his Militarie vertue; in euery part whereof hee so excelled, That hee could not properly bee called a Warre, a Valiant, a Politique, a Bountifull, or an Industrious, and a Prouident Capitaine; all these Titles, and many other, being due vnto him, which with his notable Discipline, and good Conduict, made a perfect composition of an Heroique Generall. Neither was his priuate Conuersion vnanswerable to those high parts, which gaue him praise abroad. For he was Graue, and yet very Affable and Courteous; resolute in publique businesse, but in his owne particular case, and of much mildnesse: a louer of his People, bearing with mens infirmities, wittie and pleasant in speech, farre from insolence, Master of his owne affections, and furnished with all qualities that might winne and keepe loue. To these Graces were added great ability of bodie, much Eloquence, and very deepe knowledge in all parts of Philosophie and Learning, wherewith his minde being enlightened, rested not in the sweetnesse of Contemplation, but brake forth into such effects as gaue vnto Thebes, which had euer more bene an vnderling, a dreadfull reputation among all people adjoining, and the highest command in Greece.

§. VIII.

Of the peace concluded in Greece after the battile of Maninae. The voyage of Agessilas into Egypt. His death, and qualities; with an examination of the comparison made betwene him and Pompey the Roman.

THis battaile of Maninae was the greatest that had euer bene fought in that Countrey betwene the Naturals; and the last. For at Larissa, Thon, and Platae, the populous Armies of the barbarous Nations gaue rather a great fame, than a hard triall to the Graecian valour; neither were the practice of Armes and Art Militarie so perfect in the beginnings of the Peloponnesian Warre, as long continuance and daily exercise had now made them. The times following produced no actions of worth or moment, those excepted excepted which were vnder taken against foraine enemies, prouing for the most part unfortunate. But in this last fight all Greece was interceded, which neuer had more able Souldiers, and braue Commanders, nor euer contended for victory with greater care of the successe, or more obdurate resolution. All which notwithstanding, the issue being such as hath bene related, it was found best for euery particular Estate, that a general peace should be established, euery one retaining what hee presently had, and none being forced to depend vpon another. The Athenians were by name comprised in this new league; which caused the Lacedaemonians not to enter into it. Their standing out hindred not the rest from proceeding to conclusion; considering that Sparta was now too weake to offend her Neighbours, and therefore might well bee allowed to shew that anger in ceremonies, which had no power to declare it selfe in execution. This peace, as it gaue some breath and refreshing to all the Country, so to the Cities of Athen and Sparta it afforded leisure to seeke after wealth by foraine employment in Egypt, whither Agesslaus was sent with some small forces to assist, or indeed, as a Mercenary, to serue vnder Tachos King of Egypt in his warre vpon Syria. Chabrias the Athenian, who had before commanded vnder Seris King of Egypt, went now as a voluntary, with such forces as he could raise by entreatie, and offer of good pay, to the same cruize. The Egyptian Kings descended from Amyrians of Sais, who rebelled against Darius Nebuch, hauing retained the Country, notwithstanding all intestine dissensions, and foraine incursions, during three Generations of their owne race, were so well acquainted with the valour of the Greekes, that by their helpe (easily procured with gold) they conceived great hope, not onely to allure themselves, but to become Lords of the Provinces adjoining, which were held by the Persian. What the issue of this great enterpryse might haue been, had it not fallen by Domestick rebellion, it is vncertaine. But very likely it is, that the rebellion it selfe had soone come to nothing, if Agesslaus had not proued a false Traitor, ioyning with Nectanebus, who rose against his Prince, and helping the Rebel with that Arme which the money of his owne Countrey; though it seeme rather, that hee grudged because the King tooke vpon himselfe the Conduct of the Arme, vsing his seruice onely as Lieutenant, who had made full accompt of being appointed the Generall. Howsoeuer it came to passe, Tachos being shamefully betrayed by them, in whom he had reposed his chiefe confidence, fled vnto the Persian, who vpon his submission gaue him gentle entertainment; and Nectanebus (who seemes to haue bene the Nephew of Tachos) reigned in his stead. At the same time the Citizens of Mendes had set vp another King, to whom all, or most of the Egyptians yielded their obedience. But Agesslaus fighting with him in places of advantage, preuailed so farre, that hee left Nectanebus in quiet possession of the Kingdome; who in recompence of his treason to the former King Tachos, and good seruice done to himselfe, rewarded him with two hundred and thirtie Talents of siluer, with which bootie failing homewards, he died by the way. He was a Prince very temperate, and valiant, and a good Leader in warre, free from couetousnesse, and not reproched with any blemish of lust; which praises are the lesse admirable in him, for that the discipline of Sparta was such as did endue euery one of the Citizens (not caried away by the violent streame of an ill nature) with all, or the chiefe, of these good qualities. Hee was neuertheless very arrogant, peruerse, vniust and vaine glorious, measuring all things by his owne will, and obdurate prosecuting those courses, whose ends were beyond hope. The expedition of Xenophon had filled him with an opinion, that by his hand the Empire of Persia should be ouerthrowne; with which conceipt being transported, and finding his proceedings interrupted by the Thebans, and their Allies, hee did euer after beare such hatred vnto Thebes, as compelled that Estate by meere necessitie to grow warlike, and able, to the vtter dishonour of Sparta, and the irreparable losse of all her former greatnesse. The commendations giuen to him by

Xenophon his good friend, haue caused Plutarch to lay his name in the ballance against Pompey the Great; whose actions (the solemne grauitie of carriage excepted) are very disproportionable. Yet we may truly say, That as Pompey made great warres vnder sundrie Climates, and in all the Prouinces of the Roman Empire, exceeding in the multitude of imployments all that were before him; so Agesslaus had at one time or other, some quarrell with euery Towne in Greece, had made a Warre in Asia, and meddled in the businesse of the Egyptians, in which variety he went beyond all his Predecessours; yet not winning any Countries, as Pompey did many, but obtaining large wages, which Pompey neuer tooke. Herein also they are very like; Each of them was the last great Captaine which his Nation brought forth in time of libertie, and each of them ruined the libertie of his Countrey by his owne Lordly wilfulness. We may therefore well say, Similia magis omnia quam paria; The resemblance was neerer than the equality. Indee the freedome of Rome was lost with Pompey, falling into the hands of Cesar, whom he had enforced to take Armes; yet the Roman Empire stood, the forme of Government only being changed; But the libertie of Greece, or of Sparta it selfe, was not forfeited vnto the Thebans, whom Agesslaus had compelled to enter into a victorious warre; yet the Signiorie, and ancient renowne of Sparta was presently lost; and the freedome of all Greece being wounded in this Theban warre, and after much blood lost, ill healed by the peace ensuing, did very soone, vpon the death of Agesslaus, giue vp the Ghost, and the Lordship of the whole Countrey was seized by Philip King of Macedon, whose actions are now on foot, and more to be regarded than the Contemporarie passages of things, in any other Nation.

§. I.

What Kings reigned in Macedon before PHILIP.

HE Greekes, of whom wee haue alreadie made large discourse, nor as yet wearied with intestine warre, nor made wise by their vaine contention for superioritie, doe still, as in former times, continue the inuasion and vastation of each other.

Against Alexes, the greatest Monarch of that part of the World, they defended their libertie, with as happie successe, as euer Nation had, and with no lesse honour, than hath euer beene acquired by deeds of Armes. And hauing had a triall and experience, more than fortunate, against those Nations, they so little regarded what might come from them, who had 50 so often forfeited the reputation of their forces, as what focuer could be spared from their owne distraction at home, they transported ouer the Hellespont, as sufficient, to entertaine and busie them withall.

But, as it commonly falleth out with every man of marke in the world, that they vnder-stand, and perish, by the hands and harmes which they least feare; so feared it at this time with the Greeks. For of Philip of Macedon (of whom we are now to speake) they had so little regard, as they grew even then more violent in denouncing each other, when the fast-growing greatness of such a neighbour King should, in regard of their owne safeties, have secured them for a strong argument of union and accord. But the glory of their Pyrrhus victories, wherewith they were pampred and made proud, taught them to neglect all Nations but themselves, and the rather to value as little the power and purposes of the Macedonians, because those Kings and States, which late nearer them than they did, had in the time of Amynas, the Father of Philip, so much weakened them, and wonne vpon them, that they were not (as the Grecians perswaded themselves) in any one age, likely to recouer their owne, much lesse to worke any wonders against their borderers. And, indeed, it was not in their Philosphie to consider, That all great alterations are storme-like, suddaine, and violent; and that it is then ouer-late to repaire the decayed and broken banks, when great Rivers are once swollen, fast-running, and enraged. No, the Greeks did rather imploy themselves in breaking downe thoe defences, which stood betwene them and this inundation: than seeke to rampare and re-enforce their owne fields, which by the Leuell of reason they might haue found to haue lien vnder it. It was therefore well concluded by OROSIUS: Grecia Ciuitates dum imperare singula cupiunt, imperium omnes perdididerunt; The Cities of Greece lost their command, by striving each of them to command all.

The Kingdome of Macedon, so called of Macedon, the Sonne of Ofiris, or, as other Authors affirme, of Iupiter and Atira, is the next Region towards the North which bordereth Greece; It hath to the East, the Aegean Sea; it is bounded on the North and North-west, by the Thracians and Ilyrians; and on the South and South-west, by Thessalie and Epirus.

Their Kings were of the family of Temenus, of the race of Hercules, and by nation Argines, who are listed as followeth. About some fixe yeeres after the translation of the Assyrian Empire, Arbaces then governing Media; Caranus of Argos, commanded by an Oracle, to lead a Colonic into Macedon, departed thence with many people, and as hee was marching through that Countrie, the weather being raynie and tempestuous, hee espied a great heard of Goats, which fled the storme as fast as they could, halting them to their knowne place of couert. Whereupon Caranus, calling to minde, that he had also by another Oracle bene directed, to follow the first troupe of those beafts, that should either lead him, or flye before him; He pursued these Goats to the Cates of Edessa, and being vndiscovered by the Inhabitants, by reason of the darknesse of the aire, he entered their Citie without resistance, and possessed it. Soone after this, by the ouerthrow of Cisseus, Caranus became Lord of the rest of Macedon, and held it eight and twisse yeeres. Canus succeeded Caranus, and reigned twelue yeeres. Tyrmas followed Canus, and ruled eight and twentie yeeres.

Perdiccas the first, the sonne of Tyrmas, gouerned one and fiftie yeeres: a Prince, for his great valour, and many other vertues, much renowned. Solinus, Plinie, Iustine, Eusebius, Theophrastus, Antiochens, and others affirme, that he appointed a place of buriall for himselfe; and for all the Kings of Macedon his Successours, at Aega: assuring them, that the Kingdome should so long continue in his line and race, as they continued to lay vp their bodies in that Sepulchre; wherein it is said, that because Alexander the Great failed, therefore the posteritie of the Temenide failed in him: a thing rather deuised after the effect, as I conceiue, then foretold by Perdiccas.

Argæus succeeded vnto Perdiccas, and ruled eight and twentie yeeres. Philip the first, his successour, reigned eight and twentie yeeres. Euphorus followed Philip, gouerned fixe and twentie yeeres: in whose infancie the Ilyrians inuaded Macedon, and hauing obtained a great victorie, they pursued the same to the great danger of that State. Whereupon the Macedonians, gathering new forces, and resolving either to recouer their former losse, or to loose at once both their their Kingdome and their King, they carried him with them in his Cradle into the field, and returned victorious; for they were either confident that their Nation could not bee beaten (their King present); or rather they perswaded themselves that there was no man so void of honour and compassion, as to abandon their natural Lord, being and Infant, and no way (but by the hands of his seruants) able to defend himselfe from destruction. The like is reported by Aminius, of Clotarius the sonne of Fredegunda.

Alcetas succeeded Euphorus, and ruled nine and twentie yeeres.

Amynas the first succeeded Alcetas, and reigned fiftie yeeres; Hee liued at such times as Darius Hyllaspes, after his vnprosperous returne out of Seythia, sent Artabazus with an Armie into Europe, who in Xerxes name required Amynas to acknowledge him for his Supreme Lord, by yeelding vnto him Earth and Water. But his Embassadors, as you haue heard before, were, for their insolent behaviour towards the Macedonian Ladies, slaine by the direction of Alexander, who was the sonne of Amynas, and his Successour.

Alexander, furnished the rich, the sonne of Amynas, gouerned Macedon three and fiftie yeeres. He did not only appeale the wrath of Alexander, for the slaughter of the Persian Embassadors, by giuing Ozæa his Sister, to Bubares of the bloud of Persia, but by that match he grew so great in Xerxes grace, as he obtained all that Region betwene the Mountaines of Olympus and Hemus, to be vnto the Kingdome of Macedon. Yet could not these benefits buy his affection from the Greekes. For Xerxes being returned into Asia, and Artabazus made Generall of the Persian Armie, Alexander acquainted the Greekes with all his intents and purposes against them. He had three sonnes, Perdiccas, Alcetas, and Philip.

Perdiccas the second, the sonne of Alexander, liued in the time of the Peloponnesian Warre, and reigned in all eight and twentie yeeres. The Warres which hee made were not much remarkable: the Storie of them is found here and there by peices, in Thucydides, his first fixe bookes. Hee left behind him two sonnes, Perdiccas, who was very young, and Archelaus who was base borne.

Perdiccas the third, being deliuered to the custodie and care of Archelaus, was at seven yeeres of age cast into a Well and drowned by his false Guardian: who excusing this fact to Cleopatra the Mother of the young King, said, That the child in following a Goose hastily, fell thereinto by misaduenture. But Archelaus staid not here: for hauing thus dispatched his brother, hee slew both his Vncle Alcetas the sonne of Alexander the Rich, and Alexander the sonne of this Alcetas, his Cousin Germaine, and enioyed the Kingdome of Macedon himselfe foure and twentie yeeres.

This Archelaus, of whom both Plato and Aristotle make mention, though hee made himselfe King by wicked murder, yet he performed many things greatly to the profit of his Nation. It is said, That he sought by all meanes to draw Socrates vnto him, and that he greatly loued and honoured Eurypides the Tragedian. He had two sonnes, Archelaus and Orestes.

Archelaus the second succeeded his Father, and hauing reigned seven yeeres, hee was slaine in hunting, either by chance or of purpose, by Crataus.

Orestes his younger sonne was committed to the education of Euphorus, of the roial bloud of Macedon; and had the same measure which Archelaus had measured to his Pupill; for Euphorus murdered him and vsurped the Kingdom, which hee sold some fixe yeeres: the same who denied passage to Agesilaus King of Sparta, who desired after his returne from the Asian expedition, to passe by the way of Macedon into Greece.

This vsurper left three sonnes, Panfamus, Argæus, and Alexander. Panfamus succeeded his father Euphorus, and hauing reigned one yeere, hee was driuen out by Alexander the sonne of Philip, the sonne of the first Perdiccas, the sonne of Alexander the Rich; which Philip was then preferred, when Archelaus the Bastard slew his brother Perdiccas, his Vncle Alcetas; and his sonne Alexander. reigned (though very vnquietly) foure and twentie yeeres; for he was not only infected by Pausanias, assisted by the Thracians, and by his brother Argæus; incouraged by the Illyrians; and by the said Argæus, for two yeeres dispossest of Macedon: but on the other side, the Olynthians, his Neighbours neere the Ægean Sea, made themselves for a while Masters of Pella, the chiefe Citie of Macedon.

Amyntas the second had by his Wife Eurydice, the Illyrian, three Sonnes; Alexander the second, Perdiccas the third, and Philip the second, Father of Alexander the Great; and one Daughter called Euryone or Exione: He had also by his second Wife Gyges, three Sonnes; Archelaus, Argæus, and Menelaus, afterward slaine by their brother Philip: He had more by a Concubine, Ptolomie, surnamed Alorites, of the Citie Aloris, wherein he was borne.

Alexander the second reigned not much about one yeere, in which time hee was invaded by Pausanias, the sonne of Æropus, but defended by Iphicrates the Athenian, while he was at that time about Amphipolis. Hee was also contrained (for the payment of a great summe of money) to leaue his youngest brother Philip in Hostage with the Illyrians, who had subiected his Father Amyntas to the payment of tribute. After this, Alexander, being invited by the Aleuads against Alexander the Tyrant of Phæris in Thessalie, hauing redeemed his brother Philip to draw the Thebans to his assistance, entred into confederacie with Pelopidas, being at that time in the same Countrey, with whom he also left Philip with diuers other principall persons for the gage of his promises to Pelopidas. But Eurydice his Mother falling in loue with her Sonne-in-law, who had married her Daughter Euryone or Exione, practized the death of Alexander her sonne, with a purpose to conferre the Kingdome on her Paramour, which Ptolomie Alorites did put in execution: by means whereof hee held Macedon for three yeeres, but was soone after slaine by Perdiccas the brother of Alexander. Diodorus hath it otherwisc of Philip being made pledge; and sayeth, That Amyntas his Father deliuered him for hostage to the Illyrians, by whom he was conuicd to Thebes, there to be kept: others report that Philip (while his Father was yett liuing) was first ingaged to the Thebans, and deliuered for hostage a second time by Alexander his brother.

Perdiccas the third, after he had slaine Alorites his base-brother, gouerned Macedon five yeeres, and was then slaine in a battaile against the Illyrians, according to Diodorus; but Iustine affirmeth, that he perished by the practice of Eurydice his Mother, as Alexander did.

§. II.

The beginning of *PHILIP*s raigne; and how he deliuered Macedon from the troubles wherein hee found it entangled.

PHILIP the second, the youngest sonne of Amyntas by Eurydice, hauing beene instructed in all knowledge requisite vnto the gouernment of a Kingdome, in that excellent education which hee had vnder Epaminondas, making an escape from Thebes, returned into Macedon, in the first yeere of the hundred and fifti Olympiad, which was after the building of Rome three hundred fourescore and thirteene yeeres: and finding the many enemies and dangers wherewith the Kingdome was inuironed, hee tooke on him, not as King (for Perdiccas left a sonne, though but an infant) but as the Protector of his Nephew, and Commander of the men of Warre. Yet his fruitfull ambition soone ouergrew his modestie, and hee was easily periuaded by the people to accept both the Title of King, and withall the absolute Rule of the Kingdome. And to say the truth, The necessitie of the State of Macedon at that time required a King both prudent and active. For, besides the incursions of the Illyrians and Pannonians, the King of Thrace did set vp in opposition Pausanias, the Athenians, Argæus, sonnes sonnes of the late vsurper Æropus: each of these labouring to place in Macedon a King of their owne Election. These heauie burdens when Philip could not well beare, he bought off the weightiest by money, and by faire promises vnloosed himselfe of so many of the rest, as he ranne vnder the remainder happily enough. For, notwithstanding that his brother Perdiccas had his death accompanied with foue thousand Macedonians, beside these that were wounded and taken prisoners; and that the Pannonians were destroying all before them in Macedon, and that the Athenians with a fleet by sea, and three thousand Souldiers by Land vnder Marcius, did beat vpon him on all sides and quarters of his Countrey: Yet after he had practised the men of warre of Pannonia, and corrupted them with gitts; and had also bought the King of Thrace from Pausanias, he forthwith made head against the Athenians his stiffest enemies; and, for the first, he preuented their recouerie of Amphipolis, a Citie on the frontier of Macedon: and did then pursue Argæus the sonne of Æropus, set against him by the Athenians, and followed him lo hard at the heeles, in his retreat from Æges, that he forced him to abide the battaile: which Argæus lost, hauing the greatest part of his Armie slaine in the place. Those of the Athenians, and others which remained vnbroken, tooke the aduantage of a strong peece of ground at hand, which though they could not long defend, yett auoiding thereby the present tunc of the Souldiers, they obtained of the vanquishers life and libertie to returne into Attica. Whereupon a peace was concluded betwene him and the Athenians for that present, and for this clementie hee was greatly renowned and honoured by all the Greekes.

§. III.

The good successe which PHILIP had in many enterprises.

NOW had Philip leisure to looke Northward, and to attend the Illyrians and Peonians, his irreconcilable enemies and borderers: both which hee inuaded with so prosperous successe, as hee slew Bardilis, King of the Illyrians, with seuen thousand of his Nation, and thereby recouered all those places which the Illyrians held in Macedon: and withall, vpon the death of the King of Pannonia, hee pierst that Countrey, and after a maine victorie obtained, hee enforst them to pay him tribute. This was no sooner done, than (without staying to take longer breath) hee halted speedily towards Larissa, vpon the Riuer Peneus in Thessalie, of which Towne hee soone made himselfe master; and thereby he got good footing in that Countrey, whereof hee made vse in time following. Now although hee resolved either to subdue the Thessalians, or to make them his owne against all others, becaue the horse-men of that Countrey were the best, and most feared in that part of Europe, yett he thought it most for his safetie to close vp the entrances out of Thrace, least while hee inuaded Thessalie and Greece towards the South, those ample Nations, lying towards the North, should either withdraw him, or ouer-runne Macedon as in former times. He therefore attempted Amphipolis, seated on the famous Riuer of Strimon, which parteth Thrace from Macedon, and wonne it. He also recouered Pydna; and (to the North of Amphipolis) the Citie of Crenides (sometime Darus) and called it after his owne name Philippi: to the people whereof St. Paul afterward directed one of his Epistles. This place, wherein Philippi stood, is very rich in Mines of gold, out of which, greatly to the aduancement of *Philipp*s affaires, he drew yeerely a thousand talents, which make fixe hundred thousand French Crownes.

And that hee might with the more ease disburden the Thracian shores of the Athenian Garrisons, to which hee had giuen a great blow by the taking in of Amphipolis, hee entred into league with his Fathers malicious enemies the Olynthians, whom the better to fasten vnto him, he gaue them the Citie of Pydna with the Territory, meaning ning nothing lesse than that they should enjoy it, or their owne Estate, many yeeres.

Now that he might by degrees winne ground vpon the Greeks, he tooke the faire occasion to deliuer the Citie of Pheres in Thessalie, from the tyrannie Lycophron and Tiphonius. Who, after they had conspired with Thebe the wife of Alexander, who vsurped vpon the libertie of that State, they themselves (Alexander being murdered) held it also by the same strong hand and oppression that Alexander did, till by the assistance of Philip they were beaten out, and Pheres restored to her former libertie. Which act of Philip did for euer after fasten the Thessalians vnto him, and, to his exceeding great aduantage, bind them to his seruice. 10

§. IIII.

Of the Phocian Warre which first drew PHILIP into Greece.

ABout this time, to wit, in the second yeere of the hundred and sixth Olympiad, eight yeeres after the battaile of Marinaus, and about the eighth yeere of Ariaxerxes Ochus, beganne that Warre, called Sacred. Now, as all occasions concurre towards the execution of eternall providence, and of euerie great alteration in the World there is some preceeding preparation, though not at the first easily discerned; so did this reuengefull hatred by the Thebans, Thessalians, and Locrians, conceived against the Phocians, not only teach Philip how he might with halfe a hand wrest the sword out of their fingers; but the Greekes themselves beating downe their owne defences, to giue him an easie passage, and beating themselves, to giue him victorie without perill, left nothing vnperformed towards their owne slauerie, sauing the title and imposition. Of this Warre the Thebans (made ouer-proude by their victorie at Leutres) were the inflamers. For at the Councill of the Amphyctiones, or of the general Estates of Greece; in which, at that time, they swaied most, they caused both the Lacedaemonians and Phocians to be condemned in greater summes of money than they could well beare; the one for surprisling the Cattle of Cadmea in the time of peace, the other for ploughing vp a peece of ground belonging to the Temple of Delphos. The Phocians being resolved not to obey this Edict, were secretly set on and encouraged by the Lacedaemonians; and for refusal were exposed as Sacrilegors, and accused to all their Neighbour-Nations, for whom it was then lawfull to invade, and destroy them at their pleasures.

The Phocians perswaded thereunto by Philomelus, a Captaine of their owne, call the same dice of hazard that Caesar after many Ages following did; but had not the same chance. Yet they dealt well enough with all the enemies of their owne Nation. And the better to beare out an vngracious quarrell, of which there was left no hope of composition, they resolved to sacke the Temple it selfe. For seeing that for the ploughing of a peece of Apollon's ground, they had so much offended their neighbour-God, and their Neighbour-Nations, as worse could not befall them than alreadie was intended; they resolved to take the gold with the ground, and either to perill for all, or to preuaile against all that had commission to call them to account. The treasure which they tooke out of the Temple in the beginning of the Warre, was tenne thousand talents, which in those daies serued them to wage a great many men, and such was their successe in the beginning of the warre, as they wonne three great battailes against the Thebans, Thessalians, and Locrians, but being beaten in the fourth, their Leader Philomelus call himselfe head-long over the Rockes.

In the meane while the Cities of Chersonesus, both to defend themselves against their bad-Neighbour Philip, who encroched vpon them, and to draw others into their quarrell, rendred themselves to the Athenians. Philip prepareth to get them into his hands, and at the siege of Methone lost one of his eyes. It is said, That hee that that shot him, did purposely direct his arrow towards him, and that it was written on the shaft thereof: After PHILIPPO; After PHILIPPO; for so hee was called that gaue him the wound. This Citie he ciued with the siege.

The Tyrant Lycophron before mentioned, while Philip was builed on the border of Thrace, and the Thessalians engaged in the holy warre, entred Thessalie with new forces, being alited by Onomarchus, Commander of the Phocian Armie, in place of Philomelus. For hereby the Phocians hoped to entertaine the Thessalians at home, as they should not find leisure to invade them. Whereupon was Philip the second time called into Thessalie, but both the Thessalians, and Maccedonians, (Philip being present) were vtterly ouerthrowne by Onomarchus; and great numbers of both Nations lost. From Thessalie, Onomarchus drew speedily towards Actis, and with the same victorious Armie brake the forces of the Tartars, and tooke from them their Citie of Coronea. But Philip impatient of his late misadventure, after he had reinforced his Armie, returned with all speed into Thessalie, there to find againe the honour which he lately lost: and was the second time incountred by Onomarchus, who brought into the field twentie thousand foot, and five hundred horse. All this great preparation sufficed not for Onomarchus was by Philip surmounted, both in numbers and in good fortune, his Armie ouerturned, six thousand slaine, and three thousand taken: of which number himselfe being one, was among others hanged by Philip. Those that fled, were in part receiued by the Athenian Gallies, which sailed alongst the coast, commanded by Chares, but the greater number of those that tooke the Sea, were therein deuoured ere they recoured them. Lycophron was now againe driuen out of Thessalie, and Pheres made free as before.

§. V.

Of the Olynthian Warre. The ambitious practices of PHILIP.

From hence Philip resolved to invade Phocia it selfe, but the Athenians did not fauour his entrance into those parts, and therefore with the helpe of the Lacedaemonians they retrencht his passage at the Straits of Thermopylae. Whereupon hee returned into Maccedon, and after the taking of Alciphorne, Tarone, and other Townes, hee quarrelled with the Olynthians, whom not long before he had wooed to his alliance, and bought his peace of them. For the Olynthians were very strong, and had euermore both braued and beaten the Maccedonians. It is said, that Philip hauing put to death Archelaus his halfe brother (for Archelaus had three sonnes by Eurydice the Mother of Philip, and three other sonnes by Gygae; but Philip's elder brothers by the same Mother being dead, he determined to rid himselfe also of the rest) the two younger held themselves within Olynthus; and that the receiving of them by the Olynthians was the cause of the warre, Isidore affirmeth. But iust quarrels are ballanced by iust Princes, for to this King all things were lawfull that might any way serue his turne; all his affections, and passions, how diuers foueuer in other men, were in his ambition swallowed vp, and therein conuerted. For hee neither forbore the murder of his owne brothers, the breach of faith, the buying of other mens fidelity, hee esteemed no place strong where his Aile loaden with gold might enter, Nor any Citie or State vnconquerable, where a few of the greatest, to be made greater, could looke the sense of other mens sorrow and subjection. And because hee thought it vaine to practise the winning of Olynthus, till he had inclosed all the power they had within their owne walls, hee entred their Territorie, and by the aduantage of a well compounded and trained Armie, he gaue them two ouerthrowes ere hee fate downe before the Citie it selfe: which done, he bought Euthierates and Lafthetes from their people, and from the seruice of their Countre and Common weale, by whole treason hee entred the Towne, slew his brothers therein, sackt it, and sold the Inhabitants for slaves by the

the drum. By the spoile of this place he greatly enriched himself, and had treasure sufficient to buy in other Cities withall, which he daily did. For so was hee aduised by the Oracle in the beginning of his vndertaking, That hee should make his affualls with silver speares: Whereupon Horace well and truly said.

By gifts the Macedon claue Gates a-funder,
And Kings enuying his estate brought vnder.

And it is true that he wonne more by corruption and fraude, than he did by force. For as he had in all the principall Cities of Greece his secret workers (which way of Conquest was well followed by Philip the second of Spaine:) So when in the contention betwene the Competitors for the Kingdome of Thracia, he was chosen the Arbitrator, he came not to the Councell accompanied with Pietie and Iustice, but with a powerful Armie and hauing beaten and slaine both Kings, gaue sentence for himselfe, and made the Kingdome his owne.

§. VI.

How PHILIP ended the Phocian Warre.

HE warre still continuing betwene the Phocians, and the Associates of the holy warre, the Boeotians, finding themselves vnable to subdill without some present aide, sent vnto Philip for succour, who willingly yielded to their necessities, and sent them such a proportion of men, as were neither sufficient to master their enemies, nor to assure themselves, but yet to inable them to continue the warre, and to waste the strength of Greece. They also sent to Artaxerxes Ochus for supply of treasure, who lent them thirtie talents, which makes a hundred & fourescore thousand Crownes: but when with these supplies they had still the worit in all their attempts against the Phocians, who held from them three of their strongest Cities within Boeotia itselfe, They then be sought Philip of Macedon that he would assist them in person, to whom they would give an entrance into their Territory, and in all things obey his Commandements in that Warre.

Now had Philip what he longed for, for he knew himselfe in state to giue the law to both, and so quitting all his other purposes towards the North, he marched with a speedie pace towards Boeotia, where being arriued, Phalaecus who commanded the Phocian Armie, fearing to flock with this victorious King, made his owne peace, and withdrew himselfe with a Regiment of eight thousand Souldiers into Peloponnesus, leaving the Phocians to the merie of the Conquerour, and for conclusion he had the glorie of that warre called Sacred, which the Gracians with so many mutuall slaughters had continued for ten yeeres, and, besides the glorie, hee posselt himselfe of Orchomene, Coronea and Corisa, in the Countrie of the Boeotians, who invited him to bee victorious ouer themselves. Hee brought the Phocians into seruitude, and wasted their Cities, and gaue them but their Villages to inhabite, referring to himselfe the yeerly tribute of threescore talents, which make fixe and thirtie thousand French Crownes. He also hereby (besides the fame of pittie for seruice of the Gods) obtained the same double voice in the Councell of the Amphyctiones, which the Phocians had, with the superintendencie of the Pythian games, forfeited by the Corinthians, by being partakers in the Phocian sacriledge.

How PHILIP with ill successe attempted vpon Perinthus, Byzantium, and the Scythians.

PHILIP, after his triumphant returne into Macedon, by the Lieutenant of his Armie Parmenio, slaughtered many thousands of the Illyrians, and Dardaniens, and brought the Thracians to pay him the tenth part of all their reuenues. But his next enterprise against the Perinthians failed his furie. Perinthus was a Citie of Thrace, seated vpon Propontis, in the mid-way betwene Sestos and Byzantium, a place of great strength, and a people resolu'd to defend their libertie against Philip, where the Athenians encouraged and assisted them. Philip late downe before it with a puissant Armie, made many faire breaches, gaue many furious assaults, built many ouer-topping and commanding Towers about it. But hee was repeld with equal violence. For whereas Philip thought by his continuall assaults to wearie them, and waste both their men and munition, they were supplied, not only from the Persians with men and money, and succoured from Byzantium which stood vpon the same Sea-coast, but they were relieved from Athen, Chio, and Rhodes, by the conduction of Phocion, with whatsoeuer was wanting to their necessitie. But because those of Byzantium, by reason of their neighbour-hood, and the easie passage by water, gaue them often and readie helpe; Philip remoued with the one halfe of his Armie and besieg'd it, leaving fiftene thousand foot before Perinthus, to force it if they could; but to be short, he failed in both attempts, (as all Princes commonly doe that vnder-take diuers enterprises at onetime) and returned into Macedon with no lesse dishonour than losse: whereupon he made an Ouer-ture of peace with the Athenians, and greatly desired it, to which though Phocion perswaded them in all he could, and that by the occasion offered they might greatly aduantage their conditions, Yet Demosthenes with his eloquence preuailed in the refusal. In the meane while, Philip having digested his late affront, and supplied his experience, by the taking of an hundred and threescore and ten Marchants ships, he gathered new forces, and being accompanied with his sonne Alexander, led them into Scythia; but hee was also vn-prosperous in this enterprise: For the Triballi, a people of Mesia set on him in his returne, wounded him, and tooke from him the greatest part of the spoiles, which he had gathered.

§. VIII.

How PHILIP overthrowing the Greekes in the battaile of Chaeronea, was chosen Captaine-General of Greece. The death of PHILIP.

AMONG these Northren Nations (part of which hee suppress, and part quietly) hee spent some eight yeres; and in the ninth yeere, after the end of the holy warre, he was to his great aduantage invited againe by the Gracians to their assistance. For the Citizens of Amphissa hauing disobeyed the decree of the Amphyctiones, in which Philip had a double voice, and who by reason that the Thebans and Loerians gaue countenance and aide to the Amphissians, the rest were not of themselves able to constrain them, they besought Philip to come in person to their assistance. Now you must thinke that Philip was not long in resolu'ing vpon this enterprise; hee needed no drawing on, whom nothing could keepe backe; nor other disuasion than a mairing power could hold thence. He therefore commanded his Armie forthwith to march; the same being compounded of thirtie thousand foot, and two thousand horse; and with as much expedition expedition as could be made, he entred Phocis, wanne Plataea, and brought into subjection all that Region.

The rest, and especially the Athenians, although they had good cause to feare that a great part of this forme would fall on themselves, yet were they dissuaded by Demophilus from accepting such reasonable conditions of peace as Philip offered, and rather made choise (having drawne the Thebans to joyne with them) to leaue the injoying of their estates and their freedome to the chance of one battaile, than to hold it either by composition, or by the grace of Philip. But this their Oratours eloquence cost them deare. It is true that he could farre more easily minde them of the vertue of their Ancestors, then make them to be such as they were. Hee might reparate vnto them (with wordes mouing passion) the wonders they wrought at Marathon, but hee could not transforme the Macedonians into Perians, nor draw from the dead, a Miltiades, an Aristides, a Themistocles, or a Cimon, or any of those famous Commanders, whose great vertues they had payed with the greatest ingratitude that euer Nation did. A Phocion they had, but by the strength of a contrarie faction hee was at this time in disgrace, and not employed: in so much as when the Armies of Philip and the Confederates encountered, although some thousand of the Athenians abid the killing, and the like number well-nere of the Thebans died with them; yet the want of wortheie men on that side to hold vp the rest, and to draw them on, and the many choise Captains of the Macedonians, encouraged by a King of a growing fortune, as it gaue to Philip so shining a victorie that Alexander by the light thereof found his way (in despite of all the Nations interjacent) into Persia, India, and Egypt: So it cut to the ground, and gaue end and date to all the Grecian glorie: Yea their libertie (saith Curtius) with their large Dominion wonne with so many difficulties, continued for so many Ages, and so often defended against the greatest Kings, was now lost in a moment, and for euer lost.

Now this aduised King (never passionate to his disadvantage) to the end hee might obtaine the Soueraignetie ouer all Greece, and be acknowledged for their Captaine-Generall against the Persians, without any further hazard or trouble, was content to let goe those Athenians that were taken at this battaile of Cheronea, as he also forbore to attempt any thing against their Citie: but in Thebes (which lately by the vertue of Epaninondas triumphed ouer the rest) hee lodged a Garrison of Macedonians. And being soone after (according vnto the long desire which he had nourished of this Soueraignetie) by the generall States at Corinth, stiled the first Commander of all the Grecians, and contribution of men and money granted him, he compounded an Armie of great strength, and vnder the commandement of Attalus and Parmenie, transported the same ouer the Hellspont into Asia, to begin the Warre. Of his enterprise against Persia hee fought the successe from the Oracle at Delphos, from whence hee received such another convertible riddle as Craesus did when he attempted Cyru, and was in like sort mistaken in the exposition.

But as it is hard to discern and withstand the flatteries of our owne appetites, so did *Philip*s ambitious desire to invade Persia abuse his judgement, so farre, that the death, wherewith himselfe was threatened, hee vnderstood to be deliuered of his enemy, whom he intended presently to invade. Before his purposed departure into Asia, hee prepared for the marriage of his Daughter Cleopatra with Alexander King of Epirus, to which feast and pastimes thereat appointed, hee invited all his Friends, and Allies, with the principall persons of the Grecian Cities, from whom hee received much honour and many rich presents; but this was indeede the feast of his Funerall. For hauing refused to doe iustice to one Pausanias a Gentleman of his Guard, whom Attalus (greatly fauoured by Philip) had first made drunke, and then left to be carnally abused by diuers base persons, This Pausanias grew into so great detestation of the Kings partialitie in so foule a fact, as when Philip was passing towards the Theater, he drew a sword from vnder his long garment and wounded him to death, when hee had liued fixe and fortie yeeres, and raigned fixe and twentie.

Iustine reports it, that Olympias encouraged Pausanias to murder the King her husband, which after his death shee boldly auowed, by the honour shee did vnto Pausanias in crowning his dead bodie, in consecrating his sword vnto Apollo, by building for him a Monument, and other like Graces.

What good foundations of ALEXANDERS greatness were laid by Him.
Of his laudable qualities, and Issues.

Now although he were then taken from the World, when he had mastered all opposition on that side the Sea, and had scene the fruits of his hopes and labours, changing colour towards ripenesse and perfection, yet he was herein happy that hee liued to see his sonne Alexander at mans estate, and had him selfe been an eye-witnesse of his resolution, and singular valour in this last battaile.

The foundation of whose future greatness hee had laid so soundly for him, with so plaine a pattern of the buildings which himselfe meant to erect, as the performance and finishing was farre more easie to Alexander, though more glorious than the beginnings were vnto Philip, though less famous. For besides the recouerie of Macedon it selfe, in competition betweene him and the sonnes of Aegropus, the one assisted by the Thracians, the other by the Athenians, and besides the regaining of many places possit by the Ilyrians, the crushing of all those Northern Kings his Neighbours, the ouerthrow of Olynthus, a State that despised the power of his Father, the many Maritime Cities taken, of great strength and ancient freedome, and the subjection of that famous Nation of Greece, which for so many Ages had defended it selfe against the greatest Kings of the World, and wonne vpon them; Hee left vnto his sonne, and had bred vp for him, so many choise Commanders, as the most of them, both for their valour and judgement in the warre, were no lesse worthy of Crownes, than himselfe was that wore a Crowne: For it was said of Parmenie (whom Alexander, vngatefull to so great vertue, impiously murdered) That Parmenie had performed many things challenging eternal fame, without the King, but the King, without Parmenie neuer did any thing wortheie of renowne; as for the rest of his Captaines, though content to obey the Sonne of such a Father, yet did they not after Alexanders death endure to acknowledge any man Superiour to themselves.

Of this Prince it is hard to judge, whether his ambition had taught him the exercise of more vices, than Nature, and his excellent Education had enriched him with vertues. For besides that he was Valiant, Wise, Learned, and Master of his Affections, hee had this fauour of Pietie, that hee rather laboured to satisfie those that were grieved, than to suppress them. Whereof (among many other) wee finde a good example in his dealing with Arcadian, and Nicanor; whom, when for their euill speech of Philip, his familiars perswaded him to put to death; Hee answered them, That first it ought to be considered, whether the fault were in them that gaue him ill language, or in himselfe: Secondly, that it was in euery mans owne power to bee well spoken off; and this was shortly proued, for after Philip had relieved their necessities, there were none within his Kingdome that did him more honour than they did. Whereupon hee told those that had perswaded him to vse violence, that he was a better Philition for euill speech than they were.

His Epistles to Alexander his sonne are remembered by Cicero, and Gellius; and by Dion: and Chrysostome exceedingly commended. His Stratagems are gathered by Polyenus and Frontinus, his wife sayings by Plutarch. And albeit hee held Macedon as in his owne right, all the time of his raigne, yet was hee not the true and next Heire thereof for Amintes the sonne of his Brother Perdiccas (of whom hee had the protection protection during his infancy) had the right. This Amyntas likewise married to his Daughter Cyna, who had by him a Daughter called Eurydice, who was married to Philip base sonne Aridaus, her Vncle by the mothers-side: both which Olympias, Philip first Wife, and Mother to Alexander the Great, put to death; Aridaus by extreme tortments: Eurydice likewise strangled.

Philip had by this Olympias, the Daughter of Neoptolemus, King of the Molossians, (of the race of Achilles) Alexander the Great, and Cleopatra. Cleopatra was married to her Vncle Alexander, King of Epirus, and was after her Brother Alexander death slaine at Sardis, by the commandment of Antigonus.

By Andraste, an Illyrian, his second wife, hee had Cyna, married as is shewed before.

By Nicasipolis, the Sister of Teson, Tyrant of Pheres, hee had Thessalonica, whom Cassander, after he had taken Pidna, married, but shee was afterward by her Father-in-law Antipater put to death.

By Cleopatra, the Niece of Attalus, he had Caranus, whom others call Philip, him, Olympias, the Mother of Alexander the Great, caused to be roasted to death in a copper Pan. Others lay this murder on Alexander himselfe. By the same Cleopatra hee had likewise a Daughter, called Eurydice, whom Olympias also murdered at the Mothers brest.

By Phila and Meda he had no issue.

Hee had also two Concubines, Arfince, whom, after hee had gotten with child, hee married to an obscure man, called Lagus, who bare Ptolomie, King of Aegypt, called the sonne of Lagus, but esteemed the sonne of Philip: by Philina, his second Concubine, a publicke Dancer, he had Aridaus, of whom wee shall haue much occasion to speake hereafter.

Of ALEXANDER the Great.

§. I.

A briefe rehearsal of ALEXANDERS doings, before hee invaded Asia.

ALEXANDER, afterward called the Great, succeeded vnto Philip his Father; being a Prince no lesse valiant by Nature, than by Education, well instructed, and enriched in all sorts of Learning and good Arts. Hee began his raigne ouer the Macedonians foure hundred and seuentene yeeres after Rome built, and after his owne birth twentie yeeres. The strange dreames of Philip his Father, and that one of the gods, in the shape of a Snake, begat him on Olympias his Mother, I omit as foolish tales; but that the Temple of Diana (a worke the most magnificent of the World) was burnt vpon the day of his birth, and that so strange an accident was accompanied with the newes of three seuerall victories, obtayned by the Macedonians, it was very remarkable, remarkable, and might with the reason of those times be interpreted for ominous; and foreshewing the great things by Alexander afterward performed. Vpon the change of the King, the Neighbour-Nations, whom Philip had oppressed, beganne to consult about the recouerie of their former libertie, and to adventure it by force of Armes. Alexanders yong-yeeres gaue them hope of preuailling, and his suspected feuerity increased courage in those, who could better resolute to die, than to liue slavishly. But Alexander gaue no time to those swelling humours, which might speedily haue endangered the health of his estate. For after reuenge taken vpon the Conspirators against his Father, whom he slew vpon his Tomb; and the celebration of his Funerall, hee first fastened vnto him his owne Nation, by freeing them from all exactions, and bodily slauerie, other than their seruice in his warres, and vfed such Kingly austeritie towards those that contemned his yong yeeres, and such clemencie to the rest that perswaded themselves of the crueltie of his disposition, as all affections being pacified at home, He made a present journey into Peloponnesus, and so well excelled his spirits among them, as by the Counsell of the States of Greece, he was according to the great desire of his heart, elected Capitaine-Generall against the Perians, vpon which war Philip his Father had not only resolved, (who had obtained the same title of Generall Commander) but had transported vnder the leading of Parmenis, and Attalus, a part of his Arme, to recouer some places on Asia-side, for the safe descent of the rest.

This enterprise against the Perians occupied all Alexanders affections; those faire marks of riches, Honour, and large Dominion, hee now flou at both sleeping and waking: all other thoughts and imaginings were either grieuous or hateful. But a contrary winde ariseth; for hee receiue th aduersitiment that the Athenians, Thebans, and Lacedemonians, had vnted themselves against him, and, by assistance from the Perians, hoped for the recouerie of their former freedome. Hereto they were perswaded by Demosthenes, himselfe being thereto perswaded by the gold of Peria; the deuice he vfed was more subtile than profitable, for hee caused it to be bruted that Alexander was slaine in a battaile against the Triballes, & brought into the assembly a Companion whom hee had corrupted to affirme, that himselfe was present and wounded in the battaile. There is indeede a certaine Doctrine of Policie (as Policie is now a daies defined by fallhood and knauerie) that deuised rumours and lies, if they serue the turne, but for a day or two, are greatly auailable. It is true that common people are sometime mockt by them, as Souldiers are by false alarums in the Warres; but in all that I haue obserued, I haue found the successe as ridiculous as the inuention. For as those that finde themselves at one time abused by such like brutes, doe at other times neglect their duties, when they are vpon true reports, and in occasions perilous, summoned to assemble; so doe all men in generall condemne the Venters of such trumperie, and for them feare vpon necessarie occasions to entertaine the truth it selfe. This labour vnlooked for, and losse of time, was not only very grieuous to Alexander, but by turning his sword from the ignoble and estiminate Perians, against which he had directed it, towards the manly and famous Grecians, of whose assistance he thought himselfe assured, his present vndertaking was greatly disordered. But he that cannot indure to liue against the winde, shall hardly attaine the Port which hee purpoeth to recouer: and it no lesse becommeth the worthiest men to oppose misfortunes, than it doth the weakest children to bewaile them.

Hee therefore made such expedition towards these Reuolters, as that himselfe, with the Arme that followed him, brought them the first news of his preparation. Hereupon all stagger, and the Athenians, as they were the first that moued, so were they the first that fainted, seeking by their Embassadors to pacifie the King, and to be receiued againe into his grace. Alexander was not long in resoluving, for the Perians perswaded him to pardon the Grecians. Wife men are not easily drawne from great purposes by such occasions as may easily be taken off, neither hath any King euor brought to effect any great affaire, who hath intangled himselfe in many enterprises at once, not tending to one and the same certaine end.

And hauing now quieted his borderers towards the South, he resolved to assure those Nations which lay on the North-side of Macedon, to wit, the Tracians, Thibaltes, Peones, Getes, Agrians, and other salvage people, which had greatly vexed with incursions, not only other of his Predecessours, but euen Philip his Father: with all which, after diuers ouerthrowes giuen them, hee made peace, or else brought them into subjection. Notwithstanding this good successe, he could not yet find the way out of Europe. There is nothing more naturall to man than libertie; the Greekes had enjoyed it ouer-long, and lost it too late to forget it; they therefore shake off the yoke once againe. The Thebans, who had in their Citadell a Garrison of a thousand Macedons, attempt to force it; Alexander halseth to their succour, and presents himselfe with thirty thousand foot, all old Souldiers, and three thousand horie, before the Citie, and gaue the Inhabitants some daies to resolve, being euen heart-licke with the desire of passing into Asia. So vnwilling, indeede, he was to draw blood of the Gracians, by whom hee hoped to serue himselfe elsewhere, that hee offered the Thebans remission, if they would only deliuer into his hands Phanix and Protyestes, the fluriers vp of the Rebellion. But they, oppoling the mouncing fortune of Alexander, (which bare all resistance before it, like the breaking-in of the Ocean-Sea) in stead of such an answer, as men besieged and abandoned should haue made, demanded Philotas and Antipater to be deliuered vnto them; as if Thebes alone, then layed in the ballance of Fortune with the Kingdome of Macedon, and many other Prouinces, could either haue euened the scale or swaied it. Therefore in the end they perished in their obstinacie. For while the Thebans oppose the Armie assailable, they are charged at the back by the Macedonian Garrison, their Citie taken and razed to the ground, sixe thousand slaine, and thirty thousand sold for slaves, at the price of foure hundred and fortie talents. This the King did to the terror of the other Gracian Cities.

Many Arguments were used by Cleandrus one of the prisoners, to perswade Alexander to forbear the destruction of Thebes. He prayed the King to believe that they were rather misse-led by giuing hasty credit to false reports, than any way malicious; for being perswaded of Alexanders death, they rebelled but against his Successour. He also besought the King to remember, that his father Philip had his education in that Citie, yea that his Ancestor Hercules was borne therein: but all persuasions were fruitlesse; the times wherein offences are committed, doe greatly aggravate them. Yet for the honour he bare to learning, he pardoned all of the race of Pindarus the Poet, and spared, and set at libertie Timoclea, the sister of Theagenes, who died in defence of the libertie of Greece against his Father Philip. This Noblewoman being taken by a Thracian, and by him rauished, hee threatened to take her life vnlesse she would confesse her treasure: she led the Thracian to a Well, and told him that she had therein cast it: and when the Thracian stooped to looke into the Well, she suddainly thrust him into the mouth thereof, and stoned him to death.

Now because the Athenians had receiued into their Citie so many of the Thebans, as had escaped and fled vnto them for succour, Alexander would not grant them peace, but vpon condition to deliuer into his hands both their Orators which perswaded this second revolt, and their Captaines; yet in the end it being a torment vnto him to retard the enterprise of Persia, he was content that the Orators should remaine, and accepted of the banishment of the Captaines, wherein he was exceeding ill aduised, had not his fortune, or rather the prouidence of God, made all the resistance against him vnprofitable: for these good Leaders of the Gracians betooke themselves to the seruice of the Persian, whom after a few daies he inuadeth.

§. II.

How ALEXANDER passing into Asia, fought with the Persians vpon the River of Granicus.

When all was now quieted at home, Alexander, committing to the trust of Antipater both Greece and Macedon, in the first of the Spring did passe the Hellepont, and being readie to dis-imbarke, he threw a Dart towards the Asian shore, as a token of defiance, commanding his Souldiers not to make any walke in their owne Territorie, or to burne, or deface those buildings which themselves were presently, and in the future to possesse. He landed his Armie, consisting of two and thirtie thousand foot, and five thousand horie, all old Souldiers, neere vnto Troy, where he offered a solemne sacrifice vpon Achilles Tombe, his maternall Ancestor.

But before he lett his own coast, he put to death, without any offence giuen him, all his Mother-in-lawes Kinsmen, whom Philip his Father had greatly advanced, not sparing such of his owne as he suspected. Hee also tooke with him many of his tributarie Princes, of whose fidelitie he doubted; thinking by vniuersall cruelty to assure all things, both in the present and future. Yet the end of all fell out contrary to the policy which his Ambition had commended vnto him, though agreeing very well with the iustice of Gods; for all that he had planted, who soone after withered, and rooted vp; those, whom he most trusted, were the most traitorous; his mother, friends, and children, fell by such another mercilesse sword as his owne, and all manner of confusion followed his dead bodie to the graue, and lett him there.

When the knowledge of Alexanders landing on Asia side was brought to Darius, hee so much scorned the Armie of Macedon, and had so contemptible an opinion of Alexander himselfe, as hauing stiled him his seruant on a letter which hee wrote vnto him, reprehending his disloyaltie and audacitie (for Darius intitled himselfe King of Kings, and the Kinsman of the gods) hee gaue order withall to his Lieutenants of the lesser Asia, that they should take Alexander alive, whip him with rods, and then conuay him to his presence: that they should sinke his ship; and send the Macedons taken prisoners beyond the Red-Sea, belike into Ethiopia, or some other vnhealthfull part of Affrica.

In this sort did this glorious King, confident in the glittering, but heartlesse, multitude which he commanded, dispose of the already vanquished Macedonians; but the ill destinies of men beare them to the ground, by what illrong confidence soeuer armed. The great numbers which he gathered together, and brought in one heape into the field, gaue rather an exceeding advantage to his enemies, then any discouragement at all. For besides that they were men utterly vnacquainted with danger, men who by the name and countenance of their King were wont to preuaile against those of lesse courage than themselves, men that tooke more care how to embroder with gold and siluer their vpper garments, as if they attended the inuasion but of the Sunne-beames, than they did to arme themselves with yron and Steele against the sharpe pikes, swords and darts of the hardie Macedonians; say, besides all these, euen the opinion they had of their owne numbers, of which euery one in particular hoped that it would not fall to his turne to fight, filled euery of them with the care of their owne safetie, without any intent at all to hazard any thing but their owne breath, and that of their horses, in running away. The Macedonians as they came to fight, and thereby to enrich themselves with the gold and Jewels of Persia, both which they needed, so the Persians, who expected nothing in that Warre but blowes and wounds, which they needed not, obeyed the King, who had power to constrain them in assembling themselves for his seruice; but their owne feares and cowardice, which in time of danger had most power ouer them, they only then obeyed, when their rebellion against so seruile a passion did instill and violently require it. For saith VAGETIVS: Quemadmodum bene exercitatus miles praelium cupit, ita fortissimus indolens; nam sciendum est in pugna vsum amplius prodesse quibus vires; As the well praetised Souldier desires to come to battaile, so the raw one fears it: for we must understand, that in fight it more auiles to haue bene accustomed vnto the like, than only to haue rude strength. What manner of men the Perfians were, Alexander discovered in the first encounter, before which time it is said, by those that writ his storie, That it was hard to iudge, whether his daring to vnder take the Conquest of an Empire so well peopled, with a handfull of men, or the successe he had, were more to be wondered at. For at the River of Granick, which seuereth the Territorie of Troy from Prepontis, the Perfians sought to stop his passage, taking the higher ground and banke of the river to defend, which Alexander was forced (as it were) to clime vp vnto, and scale from the Level of the water; Great resistance (saith Curtius) was made by the Perfians, yet in the end Alexander preuailed. But it seemes to mee, that the victorie then gotten was exceeding easie, and that the twentie thousand Perfian foot-men, said to be slaine, were rather kil'd in the back, in running away, than hurt in the bosomes by resisting. For had those twentie thousand foot, and two hundred and fiftie horse-men, or after Plutarch, two thousand and fise hundred horse-men, died with their faces towards the Macedonians, Alexander could not haue bought their liues at so small a rate, as with the losse of foure and thirtie of all sorts of his owne. And if it were also true, that Plutarch doth report, how Alexander encountered two of the Perfian Commanders, Spiridates and Rhaphaces, and that the Perfian horse-men fought with great furie, though in the end scattered; and lastly, how those Gracians in Darius his pay, holding themselves in one bodie vpon a piece of ground of aduantage, did (after mercy was refused them) fight it out to the last; how doth it then resemble truth, that such resistance hauing bene made, yet of Alexanders Armie there fell but twelue Foote-men, and two and twentie Horse-men?

§. III.

A digression concerning the defence of hard passages. Of things following the battaile of Granick.

THe winning of this passage did greatly encourage the Macedonians, and brought such terror vpon all those of the lesser Asia, as hee obtained all the Kingdomes thereof without a blow, some one or two Townes excepted. For in all inuasions, where the Nations inuaded haue once bene beaten vpon a great aduantage of the place, as in defence of Rivers, Streights, and Mountaines, they will soone haue perswaded themselves, that such an enemy vpon equal termes and euen ground, can hardly be resisted. It was therefore Machiuels counsell, that he which resolue to defend a passage, should with his ablest force oppose the Assailant. And to say truth, few Regions of any great circuit are so well fenced, that Armies of such force as may be thought sufficient to conquer them, can be debarrd all entrance, by the natural difficultie of the waies. One passage or other is commonly left vnguarded: if all be defended, then must the forces of the Countrie be distracted, and yet lightly, some one place will be found that is defended very weakly. How often haue the Alpes giuen way to Armies, breaking into Italie? Yea, where shall we finde that euer they kept out an inuadour? Yet are they such, as (to speake briefly) afflikt with all difficulties those that trauaile ouer them; but they giue no securitie to those that lie behind them: for they are of too large extent. The Townes of Lumbarde perswaded themselves that they might enioy their quiet, when the Warlike Nation of the Switzers had vnder taken to hinder Francis the French King from descending into the Duchie of Milan: but whilst these Patrons of Milan, whom their owne dwelling in those

Mountaines had made littell of all other for such a crueltie, were busied in custodie of the Alpes; Francis appeared in Lumbarde, to so much the greater terror of the Inhabitants, by how much the lesse they had expected his arriuall. What shall we say of those Mountaines, which locke vp whole Regions in such sort, as they leaue but one gate open? The Straights, or (as they were called) the gates of Taurus in Cilicia, and those of Thermopyle, haue seldome bene attempted, perhaps becau'e they were thought impregnable; but how seldome (if euer) haue they bene attempted in vaine? Xerxes and long after him, the Romans, forced the entrance of Thermopyle; Cyrus the younger, and after him Alexander, found the Gates of Cilicia wide open; how strongly soeuer they had bene locked & barred, yet were those countries open enough to a fleet that should enter on the backe-side. The defence of Rivers how hard a thing it is, we finde examples in all histories that beare good witness. The deepest haue many Fords; the swiftest and broadest may be passed by Boates, in case it be found a matter of difficultie to make a bridge. He that hath might enow to defend all the length of his owne banke, hath also enow to beat his enemy; and may therefore doe better to let him come ouer, to his losse, than by struing in vaine to hinder the passage, as a matter tending to his owne disadvantage, fill the heads of his Souldiers with an opinion, that they are in ill case, hauing their meanes of safeguare taken from them, by the skill or valour of such as are too good for them. Certainly, if a River were sufficient defence against an Armie, the Isle of Mona, now called Anglesey, which is iudged from North-Wales by an arme of the Sea; had bene safe enough against the Romans, inuading it vnder conduct of Julius Agricola. But he wanting, and nor meaning to spend the time in making vessels to transport his forces, did assaye the fords. Whereby hee so amazed the enemies attending for ships and such like prouision by Sea, that surely beleecuing nothing could bee hard or inuincible to men, which came so minded to Warre, they humbly intreated for peace, and yielded the Island. Yet the Brittaines were men stout enough; the Perfians very dastards.

It was therefore wisely done of Alexander, to passe the River of Granick in face of the enemy; not marching higher to seeke an easier way, nor labouring to conuey his men ouer it by some later meanes. For hauing beaten them vpon their own ground, he did thereby cut off no lesse of their reputation, than of their strength, leauing no hope of succour to the partakers and followers of such vnable Protectors.

Soone after this victorie he recovered Sardis, Ephesus, the Cities of the Trallians and Magnefia, which were rendred vnto him. The Inhabitants of which, with the people of the Countrie, he receiued with great grace, suffering them to be gouerned by their owne lawes. For he obserued it well; Nouum Imperium inbeantibus vtilis clementia fama; It is commodious vnto such, as lay the foundations of a new Soueraignty, to haue the same of being mercifull. He then by Parmentio wanne Miletus, and by force mastered Halicarnassus, which becau'e it resisted obstinately he razed to the ground. From whence he entred into Caria, where Ada the Queene, who had bene cast out of all that shee held (except the Citie of Alinda) by Darius his Licutenants presented her selfe vnto him, and adopted him her sonne and successor; which Alexander accepted in so gracious part, as he left the whole Kingdom to her disposing. Hee then entred into Lycia, and Pamphilia, and obtained at the Sea-coasts, and subiecting vnto him Pisidia, he directed himselfe towards Darius (who was said to be aduanced towards him with a marvellous Armie) by the way of Phrygia: For all the Prouince of Asia the lesse, bordering vpon the Sea, his first victorie layed vnder his feet.

While he gaue order for the gouernment and settling of Lycia, and Pamphilia, the sent Cleander to raise some new Companies in Peloponnesus, and marching towards the North, hee entred Celene seated on the River Alexander, which was abandoned vnto him, the Castle onely holding out, which also after fortie daies was giuen vp: for so long time he gaue them to attend succour from Darius. From Celene he past on through Phrygia towards the Euxine Sea, till he came to a City called Gordium, the Regall-seate, in former times, of King Midas. In this City it was that he found the Gordian-knot, which when he knew not how to vndoe, he cut it a-sunder with his sword. For there was an ancient prophetic did promise to him that could vntie it, the Lordship of all Asia; whereupon Alexander, not respecting the manner how, so it were done, assumed to himselfe the fulfilling of the prophesie, by hewing it in pieces.

But before he turned from this part of Asia the lesse towards the East, hee tooke care to cleare the Sea-coast on his backe, and to thrust the Persians out of the Islands of Leibos, Scio, and Cos, the charge whereof hee committed vnto two of his Captaines, giuing them such order as he thought to be most conuenient for that seruice; and deliuering vnto them fiftie Talents to defray the charges; and withall out of his first spoile gotten, hee sent threecore talents more to Antipater his Lieutenant in Greece and Macedon. From Ceknas he removed to Ancira, now called Anguora, standing on the same Riuer of Sangarius, which runneth through Gordium: there hee mustred his Armie, and then entred Paphlagonia, whose people submitted themselves vnto him, and obtained freedom of tribute: where he left Catus Governour with one Regiment of Macedonians lately arrived.

Heere he vnderstood of the death of Mennon, Darius Lieutenant, which bartned him greatly to passe on towards him, for of this only Captaine hee had more respect than of all the multitude by Darius assembled, and of all the Commanders he had besides. For so much hath the spirit of some one man excelled, as it hath vnderaken and effected the alteration of the greatest States and Common-weales, the erection of Monarchies, the conquest of Kingdomes and Empires, guided handfulls of men against multitudes of equal bodily strength, contriued victories beyond all hope and discourse of reason, conuerted the fearfull passions of his owne followers into magnanimitie, and the valour of his enemies into cowardize; such spirits haue bene stirred vp in sundry Ages of the world, and in diuers parts thereof, to erect and cast downe againe, to citablisth and to destroy, and to bring all things, Persons and States, to the same certaine ends, which the infinit Spirit of the Ymmerfall, piercing, mouing, and governing all things, hath ordained. Certainly the things that this King did were marvellous, and would hardly haue bene vnderaken by any man else: and though his Father had determined to haue invaded the lesser Asia, it is like enough that he would haue contented himselfe with some part thereof, and not haue discovered the Riuer of Indus, as this man did. The swift course of victory, wherewith he ranne ouer so large a portion of the World, in so short a space, may iustly be imputed vnto this, that he was neuer encountered by an equall spirit, concurring with equall power against him. Hereby it came to passe that his actions being limited by no greater opposition, then Desert places, and the mere length of tedious iournies could make, were like the Calasius of Rhodes, not so much to be admired for the workmanship, though therein also praise-worthy, as for the huge bulke. For certainly the things performed by Xenophon, discover as braue a spirit as Alexanders, and working no lesse exquisitely, though the effects were lesse materiall, as were also the forces and power of command, by which it wrought. But hee that would finde the exact patterne of a noble Commander, must looke vpon such as Epaminondas, that encountering worthy Captaines, and those better followed than themselves, haue by their singular vertue ouer-topped their valiant enemies, and still preuailed ouer those, that would not haue yielded one foot to any other. Such as these are, doe seldom liue to obtaine great Empires. For it is a worke of more labour and longer time, to maister the equall forces of one hardie and well-ordered State, than to tread downe and vnterly subdue a multitude of feeble Nations, compounding the body of a grosse vniuersitie Empire. Wherefore these Parus Potentes, men that with little haue done much vpon enemies of like ability, are to be regarded as choise examples of worth; but great Conquerours, to be rather admired for the substance substance of their actions, than the exquisite managing: exactnesse and greatnesse concurring to seldom, that I can finde no instance of both in one, save only that braue Roman Cæsar.

Having thus larre digressed, it is now time that wee returne vnto our Easterne Conqueror; who is traouailing hastily towards Cilicia, with a desire to recover the Streights thereof before Darius should arrive there. But first making a dispatch into Greece, hee sent to those Cities, in which hee reposed most trust, some of the Persian Targets which hee had recovered in his first battaile; vpon which, by certaine inscriptions, hee made them partakers of his victorie. Herein he well aduised himselfe; for hee that doth not as well impart of the honour which hee gaineth in the Warres, as hee doth of the spoiles, shall neuer be long followed by those of the better fort. For men which are either well borne or well bred, and haue more of wealth than of reputation, doe as often satisfie themselves with the purchase of glorie; as the weak in fortune, and strong in courage, doe with the gaine of gold and siluer.

The Governour of Cilicia hearing of Alexander comming on, left some Companies to keepe the Streights, which were indeede very defensible; and withall, as Curtius noteth, hee beganne ouer-late to prise and put in execution the Counsell of Alcemon: who in the beginning of the Warres aduised him to waste all the provisions for Men and Horle, that could not be lodged in strong places, and alwaies to giue ground to the Inuader, till hee found some such notable aduantage as might assuredly promise him the obtaining of victory. For the fury of an invading Army is best broken, by delays, change of diet, and want, eating sometimes too little, and sometimes too much, sometimes reposing themselves in beds, and more often on the cold ground. These and the like suddaine alterations bring many diseases vpon all Nations out of their owne Countries. Therefore if Darius had kept the Macedonians but a while from meat and sleepe, and refusing to giue or take battaile, had wearied them with his light horse, as the Parthians afterward did the Romans, hee might perchance haue saved his owne life, and his estate. For it was one of the greatest encouragements giuen by Alexander to the Macedonians, in the third and last fall 30 tall battaile, that they were to fight with all the strength of Persia once.

Xerxes, when hee inuaded Greece and fought abroad, in being beaten, lost onely his men; but Darius being inuaded by the Greekes, and fighting at home, by being beaten, lost his Kingdome; Pericles, though the Lacedemonians burnt all in Attica to the Gates of Athens, yet could not be drawne to hazard a battaile: for the inuaded ought euermore to fight vpon the aduantage of time and place. Because wee reade Histories to informe our vnderstanding by the examples therein found, wee will giue some instances of those that haue perished by aduenturing in their own countries, to charge an invading Armie. The Romans, by fighting with Hannibal, were brought to the brink of their destruction.

Pompey was well aduised for a while, when hee gaue Cæsar ground, but when by the importunitie of his Captaines he aduentured to fight at Pharsalia, hee lost the battaile, lost the freedome of Rome, and his owne life.

Ferdinand, in the Conquest of Naples, would needs fight a battaile with the French to his confusion, though it was told him by a man of sound judgement, that those Counsells which promise surtie in all things, are honourable enough.

The Constable of France made frustrate the mighty preparation of Charles the Fifth, when hee inuaded Preuence, by wasting the Countrie, and forbearing to fight; so did the Duke of Alua wearie the French in Naples, and dissolve the boisterous Armie of the Prince of Orange in the low-Countries.

The Leigers, contrarie to the aduice of their General, would needs fight a battaile with the Bougonians, inuading their Countrie, and could not be persuaded to linger the time; and say their aduantage; but they lost eight and twenty thousand vpon the place. Philip of Valois set vpon King Edward at Cressie, and King John when the English were well nere tired out, and would in short time by an orderly pursuit haue have bene walled to nothing; contrained the black Prince with great fury, neere Poitiers, to joyne battaile with him: But all men know what lamentable successe these two French Kings found. Charles the Fitt of France made another kinde of Fabian-Warlike; and though the Englisb burnt and walled many places, yet this King held his resolution to forbear blowes, and followed his aduice which told him, 1 hat the Englisb could neuer get his inheritance by Inoke; and it is reported by Belley and Hervault, that King Edward was wont to say of this Charles, that hee wanne from him the Duchie of Guien without euer putting on his Armour.

But where God hath a purpose to destroy, wife men grow short-lived, and the charge of things is committed vnto such as either cannot see what is for their good, or know not how to put in execution any sound aduice: The course which Alexander had propounded, mult in all appearance of reason haue brought the Macedonian to a great perplexitie, and made him stand still a while at the Streights of Cilicia, doubting whether it were more shamefull to returne; or dangerous to proceede. For had Cappadocia and Paphlagonia bene walled whilest Alexander was farre off; and the Streights of Cilicia bene defended by Arfenes, Gouvernor of that Prouince, with the best of his forces: hunger would not haue suffered the enimie, to lay the triall of all meanes that might be thought vpon, of forcing that passage; or if the place could not haue bene maintained, yet might Cilicia, at better leisure haue bene so thoroughly spoiled, that the heart of his Armie should haue bene broken, by seeking out miseries with painfull trauaile.

But Arfenes leauing a small number to defend the Streights, took the best of his Armie with him, to walle, & spoile the Countrey; or rather, as may seeme, to finde himselfe some worke, by preence of which he might honestly runne further away from Alexander. Hee should rather haue aduentured his person in custodie of the Streights, whereby hee might perhaps haue saued the Prouince; and in the meane time, all that was in the fields, would haue bene conueighed into strong Townes. So should his Armie, if it were driuen from the place of aduantage, haue found good entertainment within walled Cities, and himselfe with his horse-men haue had the lesse worke in destroying that little which was left abroad. Handling the matter as he did, hee gaue the Cilicians cause to wish for Alexanders comming, and as great cause to the Keepers of the passage not to hinder it. For cowards are wise in apprehending all formes of danger. These Guardians of the Streights, hearing that Arfenes made all haste to joyne himselfe with Darius, burning down all as he went, like one despairing of the defence, beganne to grow circumspect, and to thinke that surely their Generall, who gaue as loost the Countrey behinde their backs, had exposed themselves vnto certaine death, as men that were good for nothing else, but to dull the Macedonian swords. Wherefore, not affecting to die for their Prince and Countrey (which honour they saw that Arfenes himselfe could well forbear) they speedily followed the foote-steps of their Generall, gleaming after his Haruest. 40 Thus Alexander without labour got both the entrance of Cilicia, abandoned by the cowardise of his Enemies, and the whole Prouince that had bene alienated from the Persian side by their indiscretion.

§. IIII.

Of the vnwarlike Armie leuid by Darius against Alexander.
The vnadvised counsel which Darius tooke in this expedition. He is vanquished at Issus; where his Mother, Wife, and Children are made prisoners. Of some things following the battaile of Issus.

IN the meane season Darius approached; who (as Curcius reports) had compounded an Armie of more than two hundred & senetic thousand Souldiers, out of diuers Nations; Infirme musters them at three hundred thousand Foot, and a hundred thousand Horse; Plutarch at fixe hundred thousand.

The manner of his comming on, as Curcius describes it, was rather like a masker than a man of Warre, and like one that tooke more care to set out his glorie and riches, than to prouide for his owne safety, perswading himselfe, as it seemed, to beat Alexander with pompe and sumptuous Pageants. For, before the Armie there was carried the holy fire which the Persians worshipped, attended by their Priests, and after them three hundred and threescore and five yong-men, answering the number of the daies of the yeere, couered with Scarlet; then the Chariot of Iupiter drawne with white Horses, with their Riders cloathed in the same colour, with rods of gold in their hands; And after it, the Horse of the Sunne: Next after these followed ten sumptuous Chariots, inlaid and garnisht with silver and gold, and then the Vantguard of their horse, compounded of twelve seuerall Nations, which the better to auoid confusion, did hardly vnderstand each others language, and these marshalled in the head of the rest, being beaten, might serue very fitly to disorder all that followed them; in the taile of these Horses the Regiment of foote marched, with the Persians called immortal, because if any died, the number was presently supplied: and these were armed with chaines of gold, and their coates 30 with the same metall imbrodered, whereof the sleeves were garnished with pearle, baies, either to catch the hungrie Macedonians withall, or to perswade them that it were great inciuilltie to cut and to deface such glorious garments. But it was well said: Sumptuosus inductus miles, se virtute superiorem alij suon existimet, cum in praelij oportet fortitudine animi, & non vestimentis muniri, quoniam hostes vestibus non debellantur; Let no man thinke that hee exceedeth those in valour, whom hee exceedeth in gay garments, for it is by men armed with fortitude of mind, and not by the apparell they put on, that enemies are beaten. And it was perchance from the Roman Papyrus that this aduice was borrowed, who when he fought against the Sannites in that fatall battaile, wherein they all sware either to preuaile or die, thirtie thousand of them hauing apparelled themselves in white garments, with high crests and great plumes of feathers, bade the Roman Souldiers to lay aside all feare: Non enim cristas vulnera facere, & per picta atque aurata scuta transire Romanum pilum; For these plumed crests would wound no bodies, and the Roman pile would bore holes in painted and gilded shields.

To second this Court-like company, fifteen thousand were appointed more rich and glittering than the former, but apparelled like Women (belike to breede the more terrour) and these were honoured with the Title of the Kings Kinmen. Then came Darius himselfe, the Gentle-men of his Guard-robe, riding before his Chariot, which was supported with the gods of his Nation, cast and cut in pure gold; these the Macedonians did not serue, but they serued their turnes of these, by 50 changing their massie-bodies into thinne portable and currant coate. The head of this Chariot was set with precious stones, with two little golden Idols, couered with an open-winged Eagle of the same metall: The hinder part being raised high when Darius late, had a covering of inestimable value. This Chariot of the King was followed with ten thousand Horse-men, their Lances plated with silver, and their heads heads guile; which they meant not to imbrow in the Macedonian blood, for feare of marring their beautie. He had for the proper Guard of his person two hundred of the blood Royall, blood too Royall & precious to be spilt by any valorous adventure, (I am of opinion that two hundred sturdie fellows, like the Switzers, would haue done him more seruice, and these were backt with thirtie thousand foot-men, after whom againe were led foure hundred spare horses for the King, which if hee had meant to haue vsed, he would haue marshalled somewhat nearer him.

Now followed the Rearward, the same being led by Sisyambis the Kings Mother, and by his Wife, drawne in glorious Chariots, followed by a great traine of Ladies their attendants on horse-back, with fifteen Wagons of the Kings children, and the wives of the Nobilitie, waited on by two hundred and fiftie Concubines, and a world of Nurses, and Eunuchs, most sumptuously apparelled. By which it should seeme that Darius thought that the Macedonians had beene Comedians or *Tumbler*s; for this troupe was far fitter to behold those sports than to be present at battailes. Betweene these and a company of slight-armed slaues, with a world of Vallets, was the Kings treasure, charged on fixe hundred Mules, and three hundred Camels, brought, as it proved, to pay the Macedonians. In this sort came this Mage King into the field, incumbered with a most vnconuenient traine of Strumpets, attended with troupes of diuers Nations, speaking diuers languages, and for their numbers impossible to be marshalled, and for the most part so effeminate, & so rich in gold and in garments, as the same could not but haue encouraged the nakeddest Nation of the world against them. We finde it in daily experience, that all discourse of magnanimitie, of National Vertue, of Religion, of Libertie, and whatsoever else hath been wont to moue and incourage vertuous men, hath no force at all with the common Souldier, in comparison of spoile and riches. Their ships are boarded vpon all disadvantages, the rich Townes are furiously assaulted, and the plentifull Countries willingly invaded. Our English Nations haue attempted many places in the Indies, and runne vpon the Spaniards head-long, in hope of their Royals of plate, and Pistols, which had they been put to it vpon the like disadvantages in Ireland, or in any poore Countie, they would haue turned their Peeces and Pikes against 30 their Commanders, contending that they had beene brought without reason to the Butcherie and slaughter. It is true that the warre is made willingly, and for the most part with good successe, that is ordained against the richest Nations; for as the needie are alwaies aduenturous, so plentie is wont to shunne perill. And men that haue well to liue, doe rather studie how to liue well, I meane wealthily, than care to die (as they call it) honourably. Car ouit ny' rien a gaigner, que des coups volentiers il ny' va pas; No man makes haste to the market, where there is nothing to be bought but blowes.

Now if Alexander had beheld this preparation before his consultation with his South-faiers, hee would haue fastned himself by the our-sides of the Persians, and neuer haue looked into the intrayles of Beasts for successe. For leauing the descrip- 40 tion of this second bataille (which is indeede no-where well described, neither for the confusion and halfe running away of the Asians could it be) we haue enough by the slaughter that was made of them, and by the few that fell of the Macedonians, to informe vs what manner of resistance was made. For if it be true that threecore thousand Persian footmen were slaine in this bataille, with ten thousand of their horsemen: Or (as Curtius saith) an hundred thousand footmen, with the same number of horse-men, and besides this slaughter, fortie thousand taken prisoners, while of Alexanders Armie there miscaried but two hundred and fourecore of all sorts, of which numbers Arianus and other Historians cut off almost the one halfe: I doe verily beleue, that this smal number rather did with the ouer-trauaile and paines-taking in killing their enemies, than by any strokes receiued from them. And surely if the Persian Nation (at this time degenerate and the basest of the World) had had any fauour remaining of the ancient valour of their forefathers; they would neuer haue sold so good cheape, and at so vile a price, the Mother, the Wife, the Daughters, and other the Kings children; had their owne honor bene valued by them at nothing, and the Kings safetie and his estate at lesse. Darius by this time found it true, that Charidemus a banished Grecian of Athens had told him, when hee made a view of his Armie about Babylon, to wit, That the multitude which hee had assembled of diuers Nations, richly attired, but poorly armed, would bee found more terrible to the Inhabitants of the country, whom in passing by they would deuour, than to the Macedonians, whom they meant to assaile; who being all old and obedient Souldiers, imballt in grosse Squadrons, which they call their Phalanx, well couered with Armour for defence, and furnished with weapons for offence of great advantage, would make so little account of his delicate Persians, louing their ease and their palat, being withall ill armed and worse disciplined, as except it would please him to entertaine (hauing so great abundance of treasure to doe it withall) a sufficient number of the same Grecians, and so to encounter the Macedonians with men of equall courage, hee would repent him ouer-late, as taught by the miserable successe like to follow.

But this discourse was so vnpleasing to Darius (who had beene accustomed to nothing so much as to his owne prizes, and to nothing so little as to heare truth;) as he commanded that this poore Grecian should be presently slaine: who while hee was a funding in the Tormentors hand, vsed this speech to the King, That Alexander, against whom hee had giuen this good counsell, should assuredly reuenge his death, and lay deferred punishment vpon Darius for despising his aduice.

It was the saying of a Wise man: Desperata eius Principia salus est, cuius aures ita formate sunt, ut alpera que vitia, nec quicquam nisi incundum accipiat; That Princes fastie is in a desperate case, whose eares iudge all that is profitable to bee too sharpe, and will entertaine nothing that is vnpleasant.

For libertie in counsell is the life and essence of counsell; Libertas consilij est eius vita, & essentia, quae cepta consilium euascent.

Darius did likewise value at nothing the Aduice giuen him by the Grecian Souldiers that serued him, who intreated him not to fight in the Streights: but had they beene Counsellers and directors in that Warre, as they were vnderlings and commanded by others, they had with the helpe of a good troupe of horse-men beene able to haue opposed the furie of Alexander, without any assistance of the Persian foot-men. For when Darius was ouerthrowne with all his cowardly and confused rabble, those Grecians, vnder their Captaine Amyntas, held firme, and marched away in order in despite of the vanquishers. Old Souldiers are not easily dismayed: we reade in Histories ancient and moderne, what braue retreats haue beene made by them, though the rest of the Armie in which they haue serued, hath beene broken.

At the bataille of Ranennus, where the Imperials were beaten by the French, a Squadron of Spaniards, old Souldiers, came off vnbroken and vndismayed; whom when Gaston de Foix, Duke of Nemours, and Nephew to Lewis the twelfth, charged, as holding the victorie not intire by their escape, hee was ouer-turned and slaine in the place. For it is truly said of those men, who, by being acquainted with dangers feare them not, That, Neglecto periculo imminentis mali opus ipsum quantumvis difficile aggrediuntur; They goe about the businesse it selfe, how hard soeuer it be, not standing to consider of the danger, which the mischance hanging ouer their heads may bring; and as truly of those that know the wayes but by heare-say. Quod valentes sunt & praesentes ante pericula, in ipsis tamen periculis discedunt; They haue shittie enough, and to spare, till dangers appeare; but when perill indeede comes, they get them gone.

These Grecians also that made the retract, aduised Darius to retire his Armie into the plaine of Mesopotamia, to the end that Alexander being entred into those large fields and great Champions, he might haue inuined the Macedonians on all sides with his multitude; and withall they counsell'd him to diuide that his huge Armie into parts, not committing the whole to one stroke of Fortune, whereby he might might haue fought many battailes, and haue brought no greater numbers at once then might haue bene well marshalled and conducted. But this counsell was so contrarie to the cowardly affections of the Persians, as they perswaded Darius to inuiron the Graecians which gaue the aduice, and to cut them in pieces as Traitors. The infinite wisdom of God doth not worke alwaies by one and the same way, but very often in the alteration of Kingdomes and Estates, by taking vnderstanding from the Gouernours, so as they can neither giue nor discern of Counsels, For Darius that would needs fight with Alexander vpon a straitned piece of ground, nere vnto the Citie of Issus, where he could bring no more hands to fight than Alexander could, (who by the aduice of Parmenio staid there, as in a place of best advantage) was vtterly ouerthrowne, his Treasure lost, his Wife, Mother, and Children (whom the Graecians his followers had perswaded him to leaue in Babylon, or elsewhere) taken prisoners, and all their traine of Ladies spoiled of their rich Garments, Jewels, and Honour: It is true, that both the Queene, with her Daughters, who had the good hap to be brought to Alexanders presence, were entertained with all respect due vnto their birth, their Honours preserved, and their Jewels and rich Garments restored vnto them; and though Darius Wife was a most beautifull Ladie, and his Daughters of excellent forme, yet Alexander mastered his affections towards them all: only it is reported out of Aristobulus the Historian, that he imbraced the Wife of the valiant Memnon, her Husband lately dead, who was taken flying from Damascus by Parmenio: at which time the Daughters of Oebus, who reigned before Darius, and the Wives and Children of all the Nobilitie of Persia in effect, fell into captiuitie; at which time also Darius Treasure (not lost at Issus) was seized, amounting to fixe thousand and two hundred talents of coine, and of Bullock fixe hundred talents, with a world of riches besides.

Darius himselfe leaving his brother dead, with diuers other of his chiefe Captaines (casting the Crowne from his head) hardly escaped.

After this ouerthrow giuen vnto Darius, all Phoenicia (the Citie of Tyre excepted) was yeelded to Alexander, of which Parmenio was made Gouernour.

Aradus, Zidor, and Biblos, Matrimitate Cities of great importance, of which one Strato was King (but hated of the people) acknowledged Alexander. Good fortune followed him so fast that it troade on his heeles; for Antigonus, Alexanders Lieutenant in Asia the lesse, ouerthrew the Cappadocians, Paphlagonians, and others lately reuolted; Aristodemus, Darius Admirall, had his Fleet partly taken, and in part drowned by the Macedonians newly leauied; the Lacedemonians that warred against Antipater were beaten; foure thousand of those Greeks which made the retreat at the last battaile, forsaking both the partie of Darius and of Alexander, and led by Amyntas into Egypt, to hold it for themselves, were buried there; for the time was not yet come to diuide Kingdomes.

Alexander, to honour Ephesion, whom he loued most, gaue him power to dispose of the Kingdom of Zidon. A man of a most poore estate, that laboured to sustaine his life, being of the Royall blood, was commended by the people vnto him, who changed his Spade into a Scepter, so as he was beheld both a Begger and a King in one and the same houre.

It was a good desire of this new King, when speaking to Alexander, he wisht that he could beare his prosperitie with the same moderation, and quietnesse of heart, that he had done his aduersitie; but ill done of Alexander, in that he would not performe in himselfe that which he commended in another mans desire: for it was a signe that he did but accompanie, and could not gouerne his felicitie.

While he made some stay in those parts, he received a letter from Darius, importing the ranfome of his Wife, his Mother, and his Children, with some other conditions of peace, but such as rather became a Conqueror, than one that had now been twice shamefully beaten, not vouchsafing in his direction, to stile Alexander King. It is true, that the Romans, after that they had received an ouerthrow by Pyrrhus, returned him a more scornfull answer vpon the offer of peace, than they did before the trial of his force. But as their fortunes were then in the Spring, so that of Darius had already cast lease, the one a resolute well armed and disciplined Nation, the other cowardly and effeminate. Alexander disdaind the offers of Darius, and sent him word that he not only directed his letter to a King, but to the King of Darius himselfe.

How ALEXANDER besieged and winne the Citie of Tyre.

ALEXANDER coming nere to the Citie of Tyre, received from them the present of a golden Crowne, with great store of victuals, and other presents, which he tooke very thankfully, returning them answer, That he desired to offer a sacrifice to Hercules, the Protector of their Citie, from whom he was descended. But the Tyrians like not his companie within their Walls, but told him that the Temple of Hercules was leat in the old City adioyning, now abandoned and desolate. To be short, Alexander resolute to enter it by force, and though it were a place in all mens opinion impregnable, because the Island whereon it was built, was eight hundred furlongs from the Maine, yet with the labour of many hands, hauing great store of stone from the old Tyre, and timber sufficient from Lybanus, he filled the passage of the Sea betwene the Island and the Maine, which being more then once carried away by the strength of the Sea vpon a storme of winde, sometime by the Tyrians fired, and sometime torne asunder, yet with the helpe of his Nauie which arrived (during the siege) from Cyprus, he ouercame all difficulties and preuailed, after he had spent seuen months in that attempt. The Tyrians in the beginning of the siege had barbarously drowned the messengers sent by Alexander, perswading them to render the Citie, in respect whereof, and of the great losse of time and men, hee put eight thousand to the sword, and caused two thousand of those, that escaped the first furie, to be hanged on Crosses on the Sea-shore, and reserved for slaues (saith Diodore) thirteene thousand; Agrianus reckons them at thirtie thousand. Many more had died, had not the Zidonians, that serued Alexander, conueied great numbers away by shipping vnto their owne Citie.

Happy it was for Apollo that the Towne was taken, for one of the Tyrians hauing dreamt, that this god meant to forsake the Citie, they bound him fast with a golden chaine to the Idoll of Hercules; but Alexander like a gracious Prince loosened him againe.

It is true, that it was a notable enterprife and a difficult: but great things are made greater. For Nabuchodonosor had taken it before, and filled vp the channell, that lay betweene the Island and the Maine.

The gouernment of this Territorie he gaue to Philotas, the Sonne of Parmenio; Citicia, he committed to Socrates; and Andromachus Lieutenant vnder Parmenio; Euphemon had the charge of the Fleet, and was directed to finde Alexander at Gaza towards Egypt.

§. VI.

How DARIUS offered conditions of peace to ALEXANDER. ALEXANDER winnes Gaza; and deales graciously with the Iewes.

IN the meane while Darius sends againe to Alexander, sets before him all the difficulties of passing on towards the East, and laith the losse of the last battaile to the straitnesse of the place: he hoped to terrifie him, by threatening to encompass him in the plaine Countries, he bids him consider, how impossible it was to passe the Riuer of Euphrates, might haue fought many batailles, and haue brought no greater numbers at once then might haue bene well marshalled and conducted. But this counsell was to contrarie to the cowardly affections of the Persians, as they perswaded Darius to inuiron the Gracians which gaue the aduice, and to cut them in pieces as Traitors. The infinite wisdom of God doth not worke alwaies by one and the same way, but very often in the alteration of Kingdomes and Estates, by taking vnderstanding from the Gouernours, so as they can neither giue nor diserne of Counsels, For Darius that would needs fight with Alexander vpon a straightned piece of ground, nere vnto the Citie of Issus, where he could bring no more hands to fight than Alexander could, (who by the aduice of Parmenio staid there, as in a place of best advantage) was vterly ouerthrowne, his Treasure lost, his Wife, Mother, and Children (whom the Gracians his followers had perswaded him to leaue in Babylon, or elsewhere) taken prisoners, and all their traine of Ladies spoiled of their rich Garments, Jewels, and Honour: It is true, that both the Queene, with her Daughters, who had the good hap to be brought to Alexanders presence, were entertained with all respect due vnto their birth, their Honours prelerued, and their Jewels and rich Garments restored vnto them; and though Darius Wife was a most beautifull Ladie, and his Daughters of excellent forme, yet Alexander maltred his affections towards them all: onely it is reported out of Aristobulus the Historian, that he imbraced the Wife of the valiant Memnon, her Husband lately dead, who was taken flying from Damascus by Parmenio; at which time the Daughters of Oebus, who raigned before Darius, and the Wives and Children of all the Nobilitie of Persia in effect, fell into captiuitie; at which time also Darius Treasure (not lost at Issus) was seized, amounting to fixe thousand and two hundred talents of coine, and of Bullion five hundred talents, with a world of riches besides.

Tigris,

Darius himselfe leauing his brother dead, with diuers other of his chiefe Captaines (casting the Crowne from his head) hardly escaped.

After this ouerthrow giuen vnto Darius, all Phoenicia (the Citie of Tyre excepted) was yielded to Alexander, of which Parmenio was made Gouernour.

It is true, that the Romans, after that they had receiued an ouerthrow by Pyrrhus, returned returned him a more scornfull answer vpon the offer of peace, than they did before the trial of his force. But as their fortunes were then in the Spring, so that of Darius had already cast lease, the one a resolute well armed and disciplined Nation, the other cowardly and effeminate. Alexander disdaind the offers of Darius, and sent him word that he not only directed his letter to a King, but to the King of Darius himselfe.

§. V.

How ALEXANDER besieged and wanne the Citie of Tyre.

ALEXANDER comming nere to the Citie of Tyre, receiued from them the present of a golden Crowne, with great store of victuals, and other presents, which he tooke very thankfully, returning them answer, That he desired to offer a sacrifice to Hercules, the Protector of their Citie, from whom he was defended. But the Tyrians like not his companie within their Walls, but told him that the Temple of Hercules was seated in the old City adioyning, now abandoned and desolate. To be short, Alexander resolute to enter it by force, and though it were a place in all mens opinion imprugnabile, because the Island whereon it was built, was eight hundred furlongs from the Maine, yet with the labour of many hands, hauing great store of stone from the old Tyre, and timber sufficient from Lybanus, he filled the passage of the Sea betwene the Island and the Maine, which being more then once carried away by the strength of the Sea vpon a storme of winde, sometime by the Tyrians fired, and sometime torne asunder, yet with the helpe of his Nauie which arriued (during the siege) from Cyprus, he overcame all difficulties and preuailed, after he had spent seuen months in that attempt. The Tyrians in the beginning of the siege had barbarously drowned the messengers sent by Alexander, perswading them to render the Citie, in respect whereof, and of the great losse of time and men, hee put eight thousand to the sword, and caused two thousand of those, that escaped the first furie, to be hanged on Crosses on the Sea-shore, and reserved for slaues (saith Diodore) thirtene thousand; Arrianus reckons them at thirtie thousand. Many more had died, had not the Zidonians, that serued Alexander, conueied great numbers away by shipping vnto their owne Citie.

Happy it was for Apollo that the Towne was taken, for one of the Tyrians hauing dreamt, that this god meant to forsake the Citie, they bound him fast with a golden chaine to the Idoll of Hercules; but Alexander like a gracious Prince loosened him againe.

It is true, that it was a notable enterprife and a difficult but great things are made greater. For Nabuchodonosor had taken it before, and filled vp the channell, that lay betweene the Island and the Maine.

The gouernement of this Territorie he gaue to Philotas, the Sonne of Parmenio; Cilicia, he committed to Socrates; and Andromachus Lieutenant vnder Parmenio; Euphrosion had the charge of the Fleet, and was directed to finde Alexander at Gaza towards Egypt.

§. VI.

How DARIUS offered conditions of peace to ALEXANDER. ALEXANDER winnes Gaza; and desires graciously with the Iewes.

IN the meane while Darius sends againe to Alexander, lets before him all the difficulties of passing on towards the East, and laetly the losse of the last battaile to the straightnesse of the place: he hoped to terrifie him, by theatning to encompass him in the plaine Countries, he bids him consider, how impossible it was to passe the Riuer of Euphrates, Tigris,
Q 999

Tigris, Araxes, and the rest, with all such other fearefull things. for he that was now filled with nothing but feare, had arguments enough of that nature to present vnto another. All the Kingdomes betwene the River of Alys, and the Helleſpont, hee offered him in Dower with his beloved daughter. But Alexander answered, That he offered him nothing but his own, and that which victorie and his own vertue had posselt him of; That he was to giue conditions, and not to receive any, and that he hauing passed the Sea it selfe, disdaind to thinke of resistance in transporting himselfe ouer Rivers. It is said, that Parmenio, who was now old and full of honour and riches, told the King, that were he Alexander, he would accept of Darius his offers; to which Alexander answered, That so would he, if he were Parmenio.

But he goes on towards Egypt, and comming before Gaza, Betis a faithfull seruant to Darius, shuts the Gate against him, and defends the Towne with an obstinate resolution, at the siege whereof Alexander receiued a wound in the shoulder, which was dangerous, and a blow on his legge with a stone; Hee found better men in this place than he did at the former battailes, for he left so many of his Macedonians buried in the sands of Gaza, that hee was foor to send for a new supply into Greece. Here it was that Alexander first began to change condition, and to exercise cruelty. For after that he had entred Gaza by assault, and taken Betis, (whom Iosephus calleth Babemeſis) that was weakened with many wounds, and who neuer gaue ground to the Assaults; he bored holes through his teete, and caused him to be drawne about the streets, whilst he was as yet alive; who being as valiant a man as himselfe, disdaind to aske him either life or remission of his torments. And what had he to countenance this his tyrannie, but the imitation of his Ancestor Achilles, who did the like to Heitor? It is true, that cruelty hath alwaies somewhat to couer her deformitie.

From Gaza (saith Iosephus) he led his Army towards Ierusalem, a Citie, for the antiquitie and great fame thereof, well known vnto him while he lay before Tyre; He had sent for some supply thither, which Iaddus the high Priest, being subiect and sworne to Darius, had refused him. The Jewes therefore fearing his reuenge, and vnable to resist, committed the care of their estates and fustetie to Iaddus, who, being taught by God, issued out of the Citie covered with his Pontificall Robes, to wit, an vpper garment of purple, embroidered with gold, with his Miter, and the plate of gold wherein the name of God was written, the Priests and Leuits in their rich ornaments, and the people in white garments, in a manner vsuall, stately and graue, as Alexander greatly admired it. Iosephus reports it, that he fell to the ground before the high Priest, as reuerencing the name of God, and that Parmenio reprehended him for it; How soeuer it was, I am of opinion, That he became so confident in his enterprise, and so assured of the successe after the prophesie of Daniel had been read vnto him, wherein he saw himselfe, and the conquest of Persia so directly pointed at, as nothing thenceforth could discourage him or feare him. He confessed to Parmenio (saith Iosephus) That in Dio a Citie of Macedon, when his minde laboured the conquest of Asia, he saw in his sleepe such a person as Iaddus, and so appalled, professing one and the same God, by whom he was incouraged to pursue the purpose he had in hand with assurance of victorie. This apparition, formerly apprehended only by the light of his fantasie, he now beheld with his bodily eyes; wherewith he was so exceedingly pleased and imboldened, as contrarie to the practice of the Pheicians, (who hoped to haue fact and destroyed Ierusalem) he gaue the Jewes all, and more than they desired, both of libertie and immunitie, with permission to liue vnder their owne lawes, and to exercise and enjoy their owne Religion.

ALEXANDER WINNES Egypt: and makes a iourne to the Temple of HAMMON.

From Ierusalem Alexander turned againe towards Egypt, and entred it, where Darius his Lieutenant, Aſaces, receiued him and deliuered into his hand the Citie of Memphis, with eight hundred talents of treasure, and all other the Kings riches. By this wee see that the Kings of Persia, who had more of affection than of iudgement, gaue to the valiantest man hee had but the command of one Citie, and to the veriest coward the gouernement of all Egypt. When he had set things in order in Egypt, he beganne to trauaile after God-head, towards Iupiter Hammon, so foolishly had prosperitie made him. He was to passe ouer the dangerous and drie sands, where, when the water which he brought on his Camels backe was spent, he could not but haue perished, had not a maruailous shewre of raine fallen vpon him, when his Armie was in extreme despaire. All men that know Egypt, and haue written thereof, asseme, That it neuer rains there; but the purposes of the Almighty God are secret, and he bringeth to passe what it pleaseth him; for it is also said, That when hee had lost his way in those vast deserts, that a flight of Crows flew before the Armie, who making faster wing when they were followed, and fluttering slowly when the 20 Army was cakt backe, guided them ouer those pathlesse sands to Iupiters Temple.

Arrianus from the report of Ptolemeus, the sonne of Lagus, saies, That he was led by two Dragons, both which reports may be a-like true; But many of these wonders and things prodigious, are fained by those that haue written the storie of Alexander, as that an Eagle lay howring directly ouer his head at the battaile of Issus; That a Swallow flew about his head when he slept, and could not be feared from him, till it had wakened him at Helicarnassus, fore-shewing the treason of Ereptus, practised by Darius to haue slaine him; That from the yron barres of which the Tyrans made their defensive engines, when Alexander besieged them, there fell drops of blood; and that the like drops were found in a loafe of bread, broken by a Macedonian Souldier, at the same time; That a Turfe of earth fell on his shoulder, when he lay before Gaza, out of which there flew a Bird into the aire. The Spaniards in the conquest of the West-Indies haue many such pretie tales; telling how they haue been assisted in battaile, by the presence of our Ladie, and by Angels riding on white horses, with the like Romish miracles, which I thinke themselves do hardly beleue. The strangest things that I haue read of in this kind being certainly true, was, That the night before the battaile at Nonarra, all the Dogges which followed the French Armie, came from them to the Switzers, leaping and fawning vpon them, as if they had beene bred and fed by them all their liues, and in the morning following, Triunlers and Tremouille, Generals for Lewys the twelfth, were by these Imperial Switzers utterly broken and put to ruine.

The place of this Idol of Iupiter Hammon is ill described by Curtius, for he bounds it by the Arabian Troglodites on the South, betwene whom and the Territorie of Hammon, the Region Thebas, or the superiour Egypt, with the Mountaine of Lybia, and the River of Nilus, are interiacent, and on the North he ioynes it to a Nation, called Nassimones, who bordering the Sea-shore, liue (saith hee) vpon the spoiles of shipwracke, whereas the Temple or groue of this Idol hath no Sea neere it by two hundred miles and more, being found on the South part of Lybia; these Nassimones being due West from it, in the South part of Marmarica.

When Alexander came neere the place, hee sent some of his Parasites before him to practise the Priests attending the Oracle, That their answer might be giuen in all things, agreeable to his made ambition, who affected the title of Iupiters sonne. And so he was flured, Sonne of Iupiter, by the Devils prophet, whether prepared before to flatter him, or rather (as some thinke) defective in the Greek tongue; For whereas he meant to say Opaidios, that is; O Sonne of Iupiter, in stead of, O deus sonne; for which Grammaticall error he was richly rewarded, & a rumor presently spread, that the great Iupiter had acknowledged Alexander for his owne.

He had heard that Perseus and Heracles had formerly consulted with this Oracle. The one, when he was imploied against Gorgon, The other, against Anteus & Bulrus; and seeing these men had derided themselves from the gods, why might not hee? By this it seemes, that he hoped to make his followers and the world fooles, though indeede he made himselfe one, by thinking to couer from the Worlds knowledge his vanities and vices; and the better to confirme his followers in the beliefe of his Deitie, hee had practized the Priests to giue answer to such as consulted with the Oracle, that it should be pleasing to Iupiter to honour Alexander as his Sonne.

Who this Ammon was, and how represented, either by a bosome carried in a Boate, or by a Ramme, or a Rammes-head; I see that many wise-men haue troubled themselves to finde out; but, as Arrianus speaks of Dionysius, or Liber Pater (who liued faith St. Augustine in Moses time) Ea quæ de dijs veteres fabulis suis conscripserunt, non sunt nimium curiose peruestiganda; we must not over-curiously search into the fables, which the Ancients haue written of their gods.

But this is certaine and notable, that after the Gospel beganne to be preached in the world, the Deuill in this and in all other Idols became speechlesse. For that this Hammon was neglected in the time of Tiberius Cæsar, and in the time of Traian altogether forgotten, Strabo and Plinarch witness.

There is found nere his Temple a fountaine called Fons solis (though Ptolomie in his third African Table sets it farther off) that at mid-night is as hot as boyling water, and at Noone as cold as any yeer, to which I cannot but giue credit, because I haue heard of some other Wells of the nature, and because it is reported by Saint Augustine, by Diodore, Herodotus, Plinie, Cicero, Solimus, Arrianus, Curcius, and others, and indeed our Bathes in England are much warmer in the night, than in the day.

§. VIII.

How ALEXANDER marching against Darius, was opposed very unskilfully by the Enemy.

From the Temple of Hammon he returned to Memphis, where among many other learned men, he heard the Philosopher Pfamonius, who, belike understanding that he affected the title of Iupiters Sonne, told him that God was the Father-King of all men in generall; and reuelling the pride of this haughtie King, brought him to say, That God was the Father of all mortall men, but that he acknowledged none for his children save good men.

Arist. Pol. l. 5.

He gaue the charge of the severall Prouinces of Egypt to severall Governours, following the rule of his Master Aristotle, That a great Dominion should not be continued in the hands of any one: whom therein the Roman Emperours also followed, not daring to commit the government of Egypt to any of their Senators, but to men of meaner rank and degree. He then gaue order for the founding of Alexandria vpon the Westermost branch of Nilus. And having now settled (as hee could) the citie of Egypt, with the Kingdomes of the lesser Asia, Phenicia, and Syria, (which being the pawnes of Darius his ill fortune, one happie victorie would readily haue redeemed,) he led his Army towards Euphrates, which passage though the same was committed to Mazeus to defend, yet was it abandoned, and Alexander without resistance path it. From thence he marched toward Tygris, a Riuer for the swiftnesse thereof called by the Perfians, The Arrow. Here, as Curcius, and Reason it selfe testifies, might Darius easily haue repelled the invading Macedonians; for the violent course of the streame was such, as it draue before it many waightie stones, and those that moued not but lay in the bottom, were so round and well polished by continuall rolling, rolling, that no man was able to fight on so slippery a footing; nor the Macedonian foot-men to wade the Riuer, otherwise than by ioyning their hands and entrellacing their Armes together, making one waightie and entire body to resist the swift passage and furious race of the streame. Besides this notable helpe, the Channell was so deepe towards the Easterne shore, where Darius should haue made head, as the footmen were inforced to lift their Bowes, and Arrows, and Darts ouer their heads to keepe them from being moyled, and made vnseruiceable by the Waters. But it was truly and vnderstandingly said of Homer.

Qualem quotidie ducit pater viderumq; Deorumq;.*

The mindes of men are euer so affected,
As by Gods will they daily are directed.

And it cannot be denied, that as all Estates of the World, by the surfeit of misgovernement haue beene subiect to many grievous, and sometimes mortall diseases: So had the Empire of Persia at this time brought it selfe into a burning and consuming Feauer, and thereby become frantick and without vnderstanding, forewarning manifestly the dissolution and death thereof.

But Alexander hath now recovered the Easterne shores of Tygris, without any other difficultie, than that of the nature of the place; where Mazeus (who had charge to defend the passage both of Euphrates and it) presented himselfe to the Macedonians, followed with certaine companies of Horse-men, as if with newen forces hee durst haue charged them on euen ground, when as with a multitude farre exceeding them, hee forooke the aduantage which no valour of his enemies could easily haue overcome. But it is commonly seene, that carefull and cowardly men doe euer follow those waies and counsels, whereof the opportunitee is already lost.

It is true that he set all prouisions a fire wherewith the Macedonians might serue themselves ouer Tygris, thinking thereby greatly to haue distressed them; but the execution of good counsell is fruitlesse when vnseasonable. For now was Alexander so well furnished with carriages, as nothing was wanting to the competence of the Armie which he conducted. Those things also which he fought to waste, Alexander being now in sight, were by his Horse-men saved and recovered. This, Mazeus might haue done some daies before at good leisure; or at this time with great a strength of horse-men, as the Macedonians durst not haue pursued them, seauing the strength of their foote out of sight, and farre behinde.

The new prouisions of Darius, Accidents foregoing the battaile of Arbela.

DARIVS, vpon Alexanders first returne out of Egypt, had assembled all the forces, which those Regions next him could furnish, and now also were the Arians, Scythians, Indians, and other Nations arrived; Nations (saith Curcius) that rather serued to make vp the names of men, than to make resistance. Arrianus hath numbered them with their Leaders; and finds of Foot-men of all sorts ten hundred thousand, and of horse 50 foure hundred thousand, besides armed Chariots, and some few Elephants. Curcius who musters the Armie of Darius at two hundred thousand foote, and neere fiftie thousand horse, comes (I thinke) neerer to the true number; and yet seeing he had more confidence in the multitude than in the valour of his Vassals, it is like enough that hee had gathered together of all sorts some three or foure hundred thousand, with which hee hoped in those faire plaines of Assyria to haue ouer-borne the few numbers of the invading Armie. But it is a Rule in the Philosophie of the Warre.

In omni praelio non tam multitudo, & virtus indocta, quam ars & exercitum solent prae se victoriam; In curie battaile skill and practice doe more towards the victory, than multitude and rude audacity.

While Alexander gaued to his Armie after their passage ouer Tygrus, there happened an Eclipse of the Moone, of which the Macedonians, not knowing the cause and reason, were greatly affrighted. All that were ignorant (as the multitude alwaies are) took it for a certaine preface of their ouerthrow and destruction, in so much as they began not only to murmur, but to speake it boldly, That for the am-
10 much as they began not only to murmur, but to speake it boldly, That for the ambition of one man, a man that disdained Philip for his Father, and would needs be called the Sonne of Iupiter, they should all perish; For he not only infornt them to make warre against Worlds of enemies, but against Riuers, Mountaines, and the Heauens themselves.

Hereupon Alexander being readie to march forward made a hals, and to quiet the mindes of the multitude, he called before him the Egyptian Astrologers, which followed him thence, that by them the Souldiers might be assured that this defec-
10 tion of the Moone was a certaine preface of good successe; for that it was natural they neuer imparted to the common people, but reserved the knowledge to them-
10 selves, so as a forrie Almanack-maker had bene no small foole in those daies.

Of this kind of superstitious obseruation Caesar made good vſe, when hee fought against Ariovſtus and the Germani: for they being perswaded by the casting of lots, that if they fought before the change of the Moone, they should certainly lose the
10 battaile, Caesar forſt them to abide it, though they durst not giue it, wherein ha-
10 ving their mindes already beaten by their owne superstition, and being resolutely charged by the Romans, the whole armie in effect perished.

These Egyptians gaue no other reason than this, That the Grecians were vnder the aspect of the Sunne, the Persians, of the Moone; and therefore the Moone failing and being darkened, the state of Persia was now in danger of falling, and their glorie of being obscured. This iudgement of the Egyptian Priests being noised through 10 all the Armie, all were satisfied, and their courage redoubled. It is a principle in the Warre, which, though deuised since, was well obserued then. Exercitum terrore plenum Dux: ad pugnam non ducit; Let not a Captaine leade his Armie to the fight, when it is possessed with matter of terror.

It is fully obserued by Curſus, that the people are led by nothing so much as by superstition; yea, we finde it in all Stories, and often in our owne, that by such in-
10 ventions, deuised tales, dreames, and prophesies, the people of this Land haue been carried head-long into many dangerous tumults and insurrections, and still to their owne losse and ruine.

As Alexander drew neere the Persian Armie, certaine letters were surprized written by Darius to the Grecians, perswading them for great summes of money, either
10 to kill or betray Alexander. But these by the aduice of Parmenio he suppressed.

At this time also Darius his faire Wife, oppressed with sorrow, and wearied with trauell, died. Which accident Alexander seemed no lesse to bewaile than Darius, who upon the first bruit suspected that some dishonourable violence had bene offered her, but being satisfied by an Eunuch of his owne that attended her, of Alexander Kingly respect towards her, from the day of her being taken, he desired the im-
10 mortal Gods, That if they had decreed to make a new Master of the Persian Empire, then it would please them to conferre on so iust and continent an enemy as Alexander, to whom he once againe before the last trial by battaile offered these con-
10 ditions of pence.

That with his Daughter in marriage he would deliuer vp and resigne all Asia the lesse, and with Egypt, all those Kingdomes between the Phenician Sea, and the Riuer of Euphrates; That he would pay him for the ranſome of his Mother, and his other Daughter thirte thousand talents, and that for the performance thereof, hee would leaue his Sonne Oechus in hostage: To this they sought to perswade Alexander by such arguments as they had. Alexander causing the Embassadors to be re-10

10 moured, aduised with his Counsell, but heard no man speake but Parmenio, the very right hand of his good fortune; who perswaded him to accept of these faire condi-
10
10 tions. Hee told him, that the Empire betwene Euphrates and Tellepost was a faire addition to Macedon; that the retaining of the Persian prisoners was a great
10
10 cumber, and the treasure offered for them of farre better vſe than their persons, with diuers other arguments; all which Alexander rejected. And yet it is no-
10 10 table that if he had followed his aduice, and bounded his ambition within those limits, he might haue liued as famous for vertue as for fortune, and lett himself a Successor of 10
10 able age to haue enioyed his estate, which afterward, indeed, hee much enlarged, rather to the greatning of others than himselfe: who to assure themselves of what they had viurped vpon his issues, lett nor one of them to draw breath in the world
10 10 within a few yeeres after. The truth is, That Alexander in going so far into the East, lett behinde him the reputation which he brought out of Macedon; the reputation of a iust and prudent Prince, a Prince temperate, aduised and gratefull: and being taught new lessons by abundance of prosperitie, became a louer of wine, of his owne flatterie, and of extreme crueltie. Yea, as Seneca hath obserued, the taint of 10
10 one vnjust slaughter, amongst many, defaced and withered the flourishing beaurie of all his great acts and glorious victories obtained. But the Persian Embassadors stay his answer, which was to this effect, That whatsoever hee had bestowed on the Wife and children of Darius, proceeded from his owne naturall clemencie and magnanimitie, without all respect to their Master, that thanks to an enemy was im-
10
10 proper; that he made no warres against aduersitie, but against those that resisted him; not against Women and Children, but against armed enemies: and although by the reiterated practice of Darius, to corrupt his Souldiers, and by great summes
10
10 of money to perswade his friends to attempt vpon his person, hee had reason to doubt that the peace offered was rather pretended than meant, yet hee could not 10
10 (were it otherwise and faithfull) resolue in haste to accept the same, seeing Darius had made the Warre against him, not as a King with Royall and ouert-force, but as a Traitor by secret and base practice; That for the Territorie offered him, it was 10
10 already his owne, and if Darius could beate him back againe ouer Euphrates, which he had already past, he would then beleue that hee offered him somewhat in his owne power: Otherwise he propounded to himselfe for the reward of the Warre, 10
10 which hee had made, all those Kingdomes as yet in Darius possession, wherein, whether he were abused by his owne hopes or no, the battaile which hee meant to 10
10 fight in the day following should determine. For conclusion, he told them, that he came into Asia to giue, and not to receiue; That the Heauens could not hold two 10
10 Sunnes: and therefore if Darius could be content to acknowledge Alexander for his Superiour, he might perchance be perswaded to giue him conditions fit for a se-
10 10 cond Person, and his Inferiour.

p. X.

The battaile of Arbela: and that it could not be so strongly fought as report hath made it.

WHEN this answer the Embassadors returned, Darius prepares to fight, and 10
10 sends Mazæus to defend a passage, which he neuer yet dared so much as to hazard. Alexander consults with his Captaines, Parmenio per-10
10 swades him to force Darius his Camp by night; so that the multitude of enemies might not moue terror in the Macedonians, being but 10 10 few. Alexander disdaines to scale the victorie, and resolues to bring with him the

day-light, to witnesse his valour. But it was the successe that made good Alexanders resolution, though the counsell giuen by Parmenio was more found: For it is a ground in Warre, Si pauci necessarij cum multitudine pugnat cogatur, confilium est noctis tempore belli fortunam tentare. Notwithstanding vpon the view of the multitude at hand, hee flaggers and intrenches himselfe vpon a ground of aduantage, which the Persian had abandoned: And whereas Darius for feare of surpris had stood with his Armie in armour all the day, and forborne sleepe all the night, Alexander gaue his men rest and store of fooode, for reason had taught him this Rule in the Warre, In pugna Adiliter valdus resistant, sic ubi potius, refecti fuerint, nam fames intrinsecus magis pugnat, quam ferrum exterius; Souldiers doe the better stand to it in fight; if they haue their bellies full of meate and drinke; for hunger within, fights more eagerly than Steele without.

The numbers which Alexander had, saith Arrianus, were fortie thousand foot, and seuen thousand horse; these belike were of the Europaean Armie; for hee had besides both Syrians, Indians, Egyptians, and Arabians, that followed him out of those Regions. He vsed but a short speech to his Souldiers to encourage them; and I thinke that he needed little Rhetorick; for by the two former battailes vpon the Riuer of Granick and in Cilicia, the Macedonians were best taught with what men they were to encounter. And it is a true saying, Victoria Victoriam parat, animamq; victoribus auget, & aduersarijs auferit; One victorie begets another; and puts courage into those that haue already had the better, taking spirit away from such as haue beene beaten.

Arrianus and Curtius make large descriptions of this battaile, fought at Gaugamela; They tell vs of many charges and re-charges; That the victory inclined sometime to the Persians, sometime to the Macedonians; That Parmenio was in danger of being ouerthrowne, who led the left wing; That Alexanders Reare-guard was broken and his carriages lost; That for the fierce and valorous encounters on both sides, Fortune her selfe was long vnclosed on whom to bestow the Garland: And lastly, That Alexander in person wrought wonders, being charged in his retreat. But, in conclusion, Curtius deliuevs in accompt but three hundred dead Macedonians, in 30 all this terrible daies worke, slaying, That Ephesion, Perdiccas and others of name were wounded. Arrianus findes not a third part of this number slaine; of the Persians there fell fortie thousand (saith Curtius) thirtie thousand according to Arrianus: Ninetic thousand, if we beleue Diodor. But what can wee iudge of this great encounter, other than that, as in the two former battailes, the Persians vpon the first charge ranne away, and that the Macedonians pursued? For if of these foure or fise hundred thousand Asians brought into the field by Darius, euery man had but cast a Dart, or a Stone, the Macedonians could not haue bought the Empire of the East at so easie a rate, as sixe or seuen hundred men in three notorious battailes. Certainly, if Darius had fought with Alexander vpon the bankes of Euphrates, and had armed but fiftie or threecore thousand of this great multitude, only with Spades (for the most of all he had were fit for no other weapon) it had been impossible for Alexander to haue past that Riuer so easily, much lesse the Riuer of Tygrus. But as a man whose Empire God in his providence had determined, He abandoned all places of aduantage, and suffered Alexander to enter so farre into the bowels of his Kingdome, as al hope and possibilitie of escape by retreat being taken from the Macedonians, they had presented vnto them the choise, either of death or victorie; to which election Darius could no way constrain his owne, seeing they had many large Regions to runne into from those that invaded them.

Of things following the battaile of Arbela. The yielding of Babylon and Susa.

DARIVS after the rout of his Armie recovered Arbela the same night, better followed in his flight, than in the fight. He propounded vnto them that ranne after him his purpose of making a retreat into Media, perswading them that the Macedonians, greedie of spoile and riches, would rather attempt Babylon, Susa, and other Cities, filled with treasure, than pursue the vanquished. This miserable resolution his Nobilitie rather obeyed than approved.

Alexander soone after Darius his departure arriues at Arbela, which with a great masse of treasure, and Princely ornaments, was rendred vnto him: for the feare which conducted Darius, took nothing with it but shame and dishonour. Hee that had bene twice beaten, should rather haue sent his treasure into Media, than brought it to Arbela, so neere the place where he abid the coming of his enemies; if he had bene victorious, he might haue brought it after him at leisure, but being ouercome, hee knew it vnpossible to driue Mules and Camels laden with gold from the pursuing Enemy, seeing himselfe, at the ouerthrow hee had in Cilicia, cast the Crowne from his head, to runne away with the more speed. But errors are then best discerned when most incurable. Es praeceps magis reprehendi possunt quam corrigi; It is easier to reprehend than amend what is past.

From Arbela Alexander took his way towards Babylon, where Maazens in whom Darius had most confidence rendred himselfe, his children and the Citie. Also the Capitaine of the Castle, who was keeper of the treasure, firewed the streets with flowres, burnt frankincense vpon Altars of silver as Alexander passed by, and deliuered vnto him whatsoever was committed to his trust. The Magi (the Chaldeans Astrologers) followed this Capitaine in great sollemnitie to entertaine their new King: after these came the Babylonian horlemen, infinite rich in attire, but exceeding poore in warlike furniture. Betwene these (though not greatly to be feared) and himselfe, Alexander caused his Macedonian foote-men to march. When he entered the Castle, he admired the glorie thereof, and the abundance of treasure therein found amounting to fiftie thousand talents of silver vncoynd. The Citie it selfe I haue elsewhere described with the Walles, the Towers, the Gates and the Circuite, with the wonderful place of pleasure about two miles in Circuite, surrounded with a Wall of fourecore foote high, and on the top thereof (being vnderborne with Pillars) a Grove of beautifull and fruitfull trees, which it is said that one of the Kings of Babylon caused to be built, that the Queene and other Princesses might walke priuately therein. In this Citie, rich in all things, but most of all in Voluptuous pleasures, the King rested himselfe and the whole Armie foure and thirtie daies, consuming that time in banquetting and in all sorts of effeminate exercise, which to much softned the mindes of the Macedonians, not acquainted till now with the like delicacies, as the severe discipline of warre which taught them the suffrances of hunger and thirst, of painefull trauaile, and hard lodging, began rather to be forgotten, than neglected.

Here it was that those bands of a thousand Souldiers were erected, and Commanders appointed ouer them, who thereupon were titled Chiliarchi. This new order Alexander brought in, was to honor those Capitaines which were found by certaine selected Iudges to haue deserved best in the late warre. For before this time the Macedonian companies consisted but of fise hundred. Certainly the drawing downe of the foote-bands in this latter age hath ben the cause (saith the Macisat Monist) that the title and charge of a Capitaine hath bene bestowed on euery Pique Band or Spurr-Cow, for when the Capitaines of foote had a thousand Souldiers vnder

one Ensigne, and after that five hundred, as in the time of Francis the first, the title was honorable, and the Kings were lesse charged, and farre better leiued. K. Henry the eighth of England neuer gaue the commandement of any of his good ships, but to men of knowne valour, and of great estate, nay sometime he made two Gentlemen of qualitic commanders in one ship: but all orders and degrees are fallen from their reputation they had.

While Alexander was yet in Babylon, there came to him a great supply out of Europe, for Antipater sent him fixe thousand foote and five hundred horse, out of Macedon, of Thracians three thousand foot, and the like number of horse, and out of Greece foure thousand foote and four hundred horse, by which his Armie was greatly strengthened: for those that were infected with the pleasures of Babylon, could hardly be brought againe, De quitter la plume par dormir sur la dure; To change from soft beds to hard boards.

Hee left the Cattle and Citie of Babylon with the Territories about it in charge with three of his owne Captaines, to wit, Agathon, Mineus, and Appollonius, to supply all wants a thousand talents: but to grace Mazæus, who rendered the citie vnto him, he gaue him the title of his Lieutenant ouer all, and tooke with him Baginthes that gaue vp the Citie, and hauing distributed to euery Souldier a part of the Treasure, he left Babylon and entred into the Prouince Satrapene: from thence hee went on towards Susa in Persia, the same with Ptolomie, Hercotus, and Elianus call Memnonia, situate on the river Euleus, a Citie sometime gouerned by Daniel the Prophet. Abulites also, gouernour of this famous Citie gaue it vp to the Conqueror, with fifty thousand talents of siluer in bullion, and twelue Elephants for the warre, with all other the treasures of Darius. In this fort did those Vallais of fortune, louers of the Kings prosperitie, not of his person (for so all ambitious men are) purchase their owne peace and safetie with the Kings treasures. And herein was Alexander well aduised, that whatsoeuer titles he gaue to the Persians, yet hee left all places of importance in trust with his owne Captaines, to wit, Babylon, Susa, and Persepolis, with other Cities and Prouinces by him conquered; for if Darius (as yet liuing) had beaten the Macedonians but in one battell, all the Nobilitie of Persia would haue returned to their naturall Lord. Those that are Traitors to their owne Kings, are neuer to bee vsed alone in great enterprises by those Princes that entertaine them, nor euer to be trusted with the defences of any frontier Towne, or Fortresse of waight, by the rendering whereof they may redeeme their libertie and estates lost. Hereof the French had experience, when Don Pedro de Nauarra, being banished out of Spain, was trusted with Fosterabe, in the yeere 1523.

While Alexander spoiled Arbela, Mazæus might haue furnisht the King from Babylon, and while hee raised foure and thirtie daies at Babylon, Abulites might haue holpen him from Susa: and while hee feasted there, Tiridates from Persepolis might haue relieved him, for the great masse of treasure was laied vp in that Citie. But who hath fought out and frinded fearefull aduersitie? It is certaine, that benefits binde not the ambitious, but the honest: for those that are but greedy of themselves, doe in all changes of fortune onely consult the conseruation of their owne greatness.

The gouernement of Susa, with the Cattle and Treasure, hee committed to his owne Macedonians, making Abulites who rendered it vnto him his Lieutenant, as he had done Mazæus and others, in giuing them Titles, but neither trust nor powers for hee left three thousand old Souldiers in Garrison to assure the place; and Darius Mother and her children to repose themselves.

It is said, that Charles the fifth hauing promised Charles of Bourbon the gouernement of Marfelles, if hee could haue for it, and whereof hee made sure accompt, told some of his neerest Counsellors, that he meant nothing lesse than the performance of that promise, because hee should thereby haue left the Duke (reuioued from his Master) very well wherewithall to haue recouered his fauour.

¶ XII.

How ALEXANDER came to Persepolis, and burnt it.

Rom Susa Alexander leadeth his Armie toward Persepolis, and when hee sought to passe those Mountaines which lunder Susiana and Persia, hee was foundly beaten by Ariobarzanes, who defende d against him those Straights, called Pyla Persidis, or Susides; and after the losse of many Companies of his Macedonians, he was fofit to saue himselfe by retreat, causing his foote to march close together, and to couer themselves by their Targets from the stones tumbled on them from the Mountain top. Yet in the end hee found out another path, which a Lycian, liuing in that Countrey, discovered vnto him, and came thereby suddenly in view of Ariobarzanes, who being in-fort to fight vpon euen ground, was by Alexander broken, whereupon he fled to Persepolis, but (after that they of Persepolis had refused to receiue him) hee returned and gaue a second charge vpon the Macedonians, wherein hee was slaine. In like manner did King Francis the first, in the yeere 1515. finde a way ouer the Alpes; the Switzers vnder-taking to defende all the passages, who, if their footmanhip had not faued them vpon the Kings descent on the other side, they had bene all paid for their hard lodging on those Hills.

Foure thousand Greekes, saith Curtius, (insigne numbers them but at eight hundred) hauing been taken prisoners by the Persians, presented themselves to Alexander now in sight of Persepolis. These had the barbarous Persians so maimed and defaced, by cutting off their Hands, Noses, Eares, and other Members, as they could no way haue bene knowne to their Country-men, but by their voices; so each of these Alexander gaue three hundred Crownes, with new garments, and such Lands as they liked to liue vpon.

Tiridates, one of Darius his false-hearted Grandes, hearing of Alexander s approach, made him know that Persepolis was ready to receiue him, and praid him to double his pace, because there was a determination in the people to spoile the Kings treasure. This Citie was abandoned by many of her Inhabitants vpon Alexander s arrivall, and they that staid followed the worst counsell, for all was left to the libertie of the Souldiers, to spoile and kill at their pleasure. There was no place in the world at that time, which, if it had bene laied in balance with Persepolis, would haue weighed it downe. Babylon, indeede, and Susa, were very rich; but in Persepolis lay the bulke and maine store of the Persians. For after the spoile that had bene made of money, curious plate, bullion, Images of gold and siluer, and other Jewels; there remained to Alexander himselfe one hundred and twentie thousand talents. Hee left the same number of three thousand Macedonians in Persepolis, which hee had done in Susa, and gaue the same formall honor to the Traitor Tiridates, that hee had done to Abulites; but hee that had the trust of the place was Nicartides, a creature of his owne. The bodie of his Armie hee left here for thirtie daies, of which the Commanders were Parmenio and Craterus, and with a thousand horse and certaine troupes of chosen foote, hee would needs view in the Winter-time those parts of Persia, which the snow had couered, a fruitlesse and foolishe enterprise, but as Seneca saies: Non ille ire vult, sed non potest stare; He hath not a will to goe, but he is comable to stand still. It is said and spoken in his praise: That when his Souldiers cried out against him, because they could not indure the extreme frost, and make way, but with extreme difficultie, through the snow, that Alexander forooke his horse, and led them the way. But what can be more ridiculous than to bring other men into extremitie, thereby to shew how well himselfe can indure it? His walking on foote did no otherwise take off their wearinesse that followed him, than his sometime for bearing to drinke did quench their thirst, that could lesse indure it. For mine owne little judgement I shall rather commend that Capitaine, that makes carefull provision for those that follow follow him, & that seekes wisely to prevent extreme necessity, than those witlesse arrogant fooles, that make the vaunt of having induced equally with the common Souldier, as if that were a matter of great glorie and importance.

We finde in all the Warres that Caesar made, or the best of the Roman Commanders, that the prouision of victuals was their first care. For it was a true saying of Coligni, Admirall of France; That whose will shape that best (meaning Warre) must begin with his belly.

But Alexander is now returned to Persopolis, where those Historians, that were most amorous of his vertues, complaine, that the opinion of his valour, of his liberality, of his clemencie, towards the vanquished, and all other his Kingly conditions, were drowned in drinke; That he smothered in carrowling cups all the reputation of his actions past, and that by descending, as it were, from the reuerend Throne of the great King, into the companie and familiaritie of base Harlots, he beganne to be despised both of his owne and all other Nations. For being perswaded, when he was inflamed with wine, by the infamous Strumpet Thais, hee caused the most sumptuous and goodly Cattle and Citie of Persopolis, to be consumed with fire, notwithstanding all the arguments of Parmenio to the contrarie, who told him that it was a dishonour to destroy those things by the perswasions of others, which by his proper vertue and force he had obtained; and that it would be a most groeue perswasion to the Asians, to thinke hardly of him, and thereby aliene their hearts: For 20 they might well beleuee that he which demolished the goodliest Ornaments they had, meant nothing lesse than (after such vastation) to hold their possession. Fore uolentiam crudelitas sequitur; Crudelitas dicitur commonly followe drunkennesse: For so it fell out soone after, and often, in Alexander.

§. XIII.

The Treason of Bessus against Darius. Darius his death.

ABout this time he received a new supply of Souldiers out of Cilicia, and goes on to finde Darius in Media. Darius had there compounded his fourth and last Armie, which hee meant to haue increased in Bactria, had not heard of Alexander comming on, with whom (trusting to such companies as hee had, which was numbred at thirtie or fortie thousand) hee determined once againe to trie his fortune. He therefore calls together his Captaines & Commanders, and propounds vnto them his resolution, who being desperat of good successe vsed silence for a while. Artabazus, one of his eldest men of Warre, who had sometime liued with Philip of Macedon, brake the yce, and protesting that hee could neuer be beaten by any aduersitie of the Kings, from the faith which he had euer ought him, with firme confidence, that all the rest were of the same disposition (whereof they likewise assured Darius by the like protestation) hee approved the Kings resolution. Two only, and those the greatest, to wit, Naburzanes, and Bessus, whereof the latter was Governour of Bactria, had conspired against their Master, and therefore aduised the King to lay a new foundation for the Warre, and to pursue it by some such person for the present, against whom neither the gods nor Fortune had in all things declared themselves to be an enemy: this preamble Naburzanes vied, & in conclusion aduised the election of his fellow Traitor Bessus, with promise, that the warres ended, the Empire should againe be restored to Darius. The King swollen with disdain prest towards Naburzanes to haue slaine 30 him, but Bessus & the Bactrians whom he commanded, being more in number than the rest, with-held him. In the meane while Naburzanes with-drew himselfe, and Bessus followed him, making their quarter a-part from the rest of the Armie. Artabazus, the Kings faithfull seruant, perswaded him to be aduised, and serue the time, seeing seeing Alexander was at hand, and that hee would at least make shew of forgetting the offence made, which the King being of a gentle disposition, willingly yeelded, vnto. Bessus makes his submission and attends the King, who remoues his Armie. Patron, who commanded a Regiment of foure thousand Greekes, which had bin all the former Battailles serued Darius with great fidelitie, and alwayes made the retreat in sight of the Macedonians, offered himselfe to guard his person, protesting against the Treason of Bessus, but it was not in his dcltine to follow their aduice wio from the beginning of the Warre gaue him faithfull counsell but hee inclined still to Bessus, who told him, that the Greekes with Patron their Capaine were corrupted by 10 Alexander, and practised the diuision of his faithfull seruants. Bessus had drawne vnto him thirtie thousand of the Armie, promising them all those things by which the louers of the World and themselves are wont to be allured, to wit, riches, safetie, and honour.

Now the day following Darius plainly discovered the purposes of Bessus, and being overcome with passion, as thinking himselfe vnable to make head against these vngratefull and vnaturall Traytors, he prayed Artabazus his faithfull seruant, to depart from him, and to provide for himselfe. In like sort he discharged the rest of his attendants, all save a few of his Eunuchs; for his Guards had voluntarily abandoned him: His Persians being most base Cowardes, durst not vnderake his defence 20 against the Bactrians, notwithstanding that they had foure thousand Greekes to ioyne with him, who had beene able to haue beaten both Nations. But it is true, that him, which forsakes himselfe, no man followes. It had beene farre more Man-like and King-like to haue dyed in the head of those foure thousand Greekes, which offered him the disposition of their liues, (to which Artabazus perswaded him) than to haue lien bewailing himselfe on the ground, and suffering himselfe to be bound like a Slave by those ambitious Monsters that layd hand on him, whom neyther the consideration of his former great estate, nor the honours he had giuen them, nor the trust reposed in them, nor the world of benefits bestowed on them, could moue to pittie: no, nor his present aduersitie, which aboue all things should haue mooued them, 30 could pierce their viperous and vngratefull hearts. Vaine it was indeed to hope it, for infidelitie hath no compassion.

Now Darius, thus forsaken, was bound and layd in a Cart, covered with hides of Beasts, to the end that by any other ornament he might not bee discovered; and to adde despayt and derision to his aduersitie, they fastned him with Chaynes of Gold, and so drew him on among their ordinary Carriages and Carts. For Bessus and Naburzanes perswaded themselves to redeeme their liues and the Prouinces they held, eyther by deliuering him a Prisoner to Alexander, or if that hope failed, to make themselves Kings by his slaughter, and then to defend themselves by force of Armes. But they failed in both. For it was against the nature of God, who is most iust, to pardon so strange villanie, yea though against a Prince purely Heathenish and an Idolater.

Alexander hauing knowledge that Darius was retired towards Bactria, and durst not abide his comming, halsted after him with a violent speed, and because hee would not force his Foot-men beyond their powers, hee mounted on horse-backe certaine selected Companies of them, and best aimed, and with fixe thousand other Horse, rather ranne than marched after Darius. Such as hated the Treason of Bessus and secretly forsooke him, gaue knowledge to Alexander of all that had happened, informing him of the way that Bessus tooke, and how neere hee was at hand: to many men of worth daily ranne from him. Hereupon Alexander againe distilled his 50 pace, and his Vant-gard being discovered by Bessus his R care, Bessus brought a Horse to the Cart, where Darius lay bound, perswading him to mount therein, and to saue himselfe. But the vnfortunate King refusing to follow those that had betrayed him, they cast Darts at him, wounded him to death, and wounded the Beasts that drew him, and slew two poore seruants that attended his person. This done, they all fled that could, leaving the rest to the mercie of the Macedonian Swords.

Polystratus a Macedonian, being by pursure of the vanquished preit with thirst, as he was refreshing himselfe with some water that he had discovered, espying a Cart with a Teame of wounded beasts breathing for life, and notable to mowe, leached the same, and therein found Darius bathing in his owne blood. And by a Persian captive which followed this Polystratus, he vnderstood that it was Darius, and was informed of this barbarous Tragedie. Darius also seemed greatly comforted (if dying men ignorant of the liuing God can bee comforted) that hee cast not out his last sorrowes vnheard, but that by this Macedonian, Alexander might know and take vengeance on those Traitors, which had dealt no lesse vnworthily than cruelly 10 with him, recommending their reuenge to Alexander by this Messenger, which hee besought him to pursue, not because Darius had desired it, but for his owne honor, and for the sake of all that did, or should after weare Crownes. Hee also, hauing nothing else to present, rendred thankes to Alexander for the Kingly grace vied towards his Wife, Mother, and Children, desiring the immortal Gods to submit vnto him the Empire of the whole world. As hee was thus speaking, impatient death pressing out his few remaining spirits, he desired water, which Polystratus presented him, after which he liued but to tell him, that of all the best things that the world had, which were lately in his power, he had nothing remaining but his last breath, where-with to desire the Gods to reward his compassion. 20

§. XIII.

IT was now hoped by the Macedonians, that their trauells were neere an end, every man preparing for his retorne. Hereof when Alexander had knowledge, hee was greatly grieved; for the bounded earth 30 sufficed not his boundlesse ambition. Many arguments hee therefore vied to draw on his Armie farther into the East, but that which had most strength was, that Bessus, a most cruell Taitor to his Master Darius, hauing at his deuotion the Hyrcanians, and Bactrians, would in short time (if the Macedonians should retorne) make himselfe Lord of the Persian Empire, and enioy the traits of all their former trauailes. In conclusion, hee wanne their consents to goe on: which done, leaving Craterus with certaine Regiments of foot, and Amyntas with fixe thousand Horse in Parthia, hee enters not without some opposition into Hyrcania, for the Mardons, and other barbarous Nations, defended certaine passages for a while. Hee passeth the River of Zioberus, which taking beginning in 40 Parthia, dissolues it selfe in the Caspian Sea: it runneth vnder the ledge of Mountaines, which bound Parthia and Hyrcania, where hiding it selfe vnder ground for three hundred furlongs, it then riseth againe and followeth its former course. In Zabacarta or Zendacarta, the same Citie which Ptolomie writes Hyrcania, the Metropolis of that Region, hee rested fiftene dayes, banquetting, and feasting therein.

Phataphernes, one of Darius his greatest Commanders, with other of his best followers, submit themselves to Alexander, and were restored to their places and governments. But of all other hee graced Ariabazus most highly for his approved & constant faith to his Master Darius. Ariabazus brought with him ten thousand and five hundred Greekes, the remainder of all those that had serued Darius; He treats with Alexander for their pardon, before they were yet arrived, but in the end they render themselves simply without promise or composition: he pardons all but the Lacedemonians, whom he imprisons; their Leader hauing slaine himselfe. Hee was also wrought, though

(though to his great dishonour) to receiue Nabarchanes that had joyned with Bessus to murder Darius.

§. XV.

Of THALESTRIS Queene of the Amazons; where, by way of digression it is shewed, that such Amazons haue beene, and are.

10 Ere it is said, that Thalestris or Minthea, a Queene of the Amazons, came to visite him, and her sute was, (which shee easily obtayned) That shee might accompanie him till shee were made with childe by him: which done (refusing to follow him into India) she returned into her owne Countrie.

Plutarch citeth many Historians, reporting this meeting of Thalestris with Alexander, and some contradicting it. But, indeede, the letters of Alexander himselfe to Antipater, recounting all that befell him in those parts, and yet omitting to make mention of this Amazonian businesse, may iustly breed suspition of the whole matter as forged. Much more iustly may we suspect it as a vaine tale, because an Historian of the same time reading one of his bookes to Lysimachus (then King of 20 Thrace) who had followed Alexander in all his voyage, was taught at by the King for inserting such newes of the Amazons, as Lysimachus himselfe had neuer heard of. One that accompanied Alexander tooke vpon him to write his acts; which to amplify, He tolde how the King had fought single with an Elephant, and slaine it. The King hearing such stuffe, caught the booke, and threw it into the River of Indus; saying, that it were well done to throw the writer after it, who by inserting such fables, disparaged the truth of his great exploits. Yet was we beleue and know that there are Elephants, though it were false that Alexander fought with one; so may we give credit vnto writers, making mention of such Amazons, whether it were true or false that they met with Alexander; as Plutarch leaves the matter vndetermined. 30 Therefore I will heere take leaue to make digression, as well to shew the opinions of the ancient Historians, Cosmographers, and others, as also of some moderne discoverers touching these warlike Women, because not onely Strabo, but many others of the these our times make doubt, whether, or no, there were any such kinde of people. Iulius Solinus wares them in the North parts of Asia the lesse. Pom. Mela finds two Regions filled with them; the one, on the River Thermodon; the other, neere the Caspian Sea; Quæ (saith hee) Sauromatides appellant; Which the people call Sauromatides. The former of these two had the Cimerians for their Neighbours; Certum est (saith Vadianus, who hath Commented vpon Mela) illos proximos Araxenibus iussit; It is certaine that the Cimerians were the next Nations to the Amazons. PTOLOMÆ 40 lets them farther into the Land North-wards, neere the Mountaines Hippiæ, not farre from the Pillars of Alexander. And that they had Dominion in Asia it selfe toward India, Solinus and Pliny tell vs; Where they gouerned a people called the Pandæans, or Padeans, so called after Pandæ the Daughter of Hercules, from whom all the rest deriue themselves. Claudian affirms, That they commanded many Nations: For he speaks (largely perhaps as a Poet) thus:

Medis lenibus, Sabæis
Imperat hic sexus: Reginarumq; sub armis, Barbaria pars magna iacet.

*Cluid. de cap.
Ptolepinæ.*

50 Over the Medes, and light Sabarans, raigens
This female sexe; and vnder armies of Queene, Great part of the Barbarian Land remains.

L. 2. Diadormus Siculus hath heard of them in Lybia, who were more ancient (saith hee) than those which kept the banks of Thermodon, a Riuer falling into the Euxine Sea neere Heracium.

Herodotus doth also make report of these Amazons, whom hee tells vs that the Scythians call Aorpatas, which is as much as Vindictors or Men-killers. And that they made incursion into Asia the lesse, sackt Ephesus, and burnt the Temple of Diana, Manethon and Suennius report, which they performed thirtie yeeres after Troy was taken. At the siege of Troy it selfe were reade of Penthesilea, That shee came to the succour of Priamus.

L. 22. 7. Am. Marcellinus gives the cause of their inhabiting vpon the riuer of Thermodon, to speaking confidently of the Warres they made with diuers Nations, and of their overthrow.

Plutarch in the life of Theseus, out of Philochorus, Hellanicus, and other ancient Historians, reports the taking of Antiope Queene of the Amazons by Hercules, and by him giuen to Theseus, though some asseigne, That Theseus himselfe got her by force when shee came to visit him aboard his ship. But in substance there is little difference; all confessing, That such Amazons there were. The same Author in the life of Pompey speaks of certaine companies of the Amazons, that came to aide the Albanians against the Romans, by whom, after the battaile, many Targets and Buckins of theirs were taken vp: and hee saith farther, That these women entertaine the Gela and Lelages once a yeere, Nations inhabiting betwene them and the Albanians.

But to omit the many Authors, making mention of Amazons that were in the old times; Fran. Lopez who hath written the navigation of Orellana, which he made downe the Riuer of Amazons from Pern, in the yeere 1542. (vpon which Riuer, for the diuers turnings, he is said to haue sailed sixe thousand miles) reports from the relation of the laid Orellana, to the Council of the Indies, That hee both saw those women and fought with them, where they fought to impeach his passage towards the East-Sea.

It is also reported by Vlricus Schmidel, that in the yeere 1542. where he sailed vp the Rivers of Paraguana and Parabol, that he came to a King of that Countie, called Scherues, inhabiting vnder the Tropick of Capricorne, who gaue his Captaine Eryandio Rieffere, a Crowne of silver, which hee had gotten in fight from a Queene of the Amazons in those parts.

Ed. Lopes, in his description of the Kingdome of Congo, makes relation of such Amazons, telling vs, That (agreeable to the reports of elder times) they burne off their right brest, and liue a-part from men, save at one time of the yeere, when they feast and accompanie them for one moneth. These (saith he) possesse a part of the Kingdome of Monomotapa in Africa, nineteene degrees to the Southward of the line: and that these women are the strongest guards of this Emperour, all the East Indian Portegals know.

I haue produced these authorities, in part, to iustifie mine owne relation of these Amazons, because that which was deliuered mee for truth by an ancient Cacique of Guiana, how vpon the Riuer of Papayena (since the Spanish discoueries called Amazons) that these women still liue and gouerne, was held for a vaine and vnprobable report.

¶ XVI.

How ALEXANDER fell into the Persians Luxurie: and how hee further pursued BESSVS.

NOW as Alexander had begunne to change his condition after the taking of Perspolis: so at this time his prosperitie had so much overwrought his vertue, as hee accompted clemencie to bee but basenesse, and the temperance which hee had vied all his life-time, but a poore and deiectiond humour, rather becoming the instructors of his youth, than the condition and state of so mighty a King, as the world could not equall. For hee perswaded himselfe that he now represented the greatnesse of the gods; he was pleased that those that came before him, should fall to the ground, and adore him; hee wore the Robes and garments of the Persians, and commanded that his Nobilitie should doe the like; hee entertained in his Court, and Campe, the same shamelesse rabble of Curtians, and Sodomitical Eunuchs, that Darius had done, and imitated in all things the proud, voluptuous, and detested manners of the Persians, whom hee had vanquished. So licentious is felicitie, as notwithstanding that hee was fully perswaded, that the Gods whom hee serued (detesting the vices of the inuaded) assisted him in all attempts against them, he himselfe, contrarie to the Religion he profest (which how Idolatrous soeuer it were, could not be but fearefull vnto him by neglecting it) became by imitation, and not by ignorance or education, a more foule and fearefull Monster than Darius, from whose tyrannic hee vaunted to haue deliuered so many Nations. Yea, those that were dearest and neerest vnto him, began to be ashamed of him, entreating each other with this, and the like scornefull discourse; That Alexander of Macedon was become one of Darius his licentious Courtiers; That by his example, the Macedonians were in the end of so many traualles, more impouerished in their vertues, than enriched by their victories; and that it was hard to iudge whether the Conquerors, or the Conquered were the baser slaves. Neither were these opinions so reuerend, but that the noise of them came to his eares. He therefore with great gifts sought to pacifie the better sort, and those of whose iudgements he was most ialous; and making it knowne to the Armie, that Bessus had assumed the title of a King, and called himselfe Artaxerxes, and that hee had compounded a great Armie of the Bactrians, and other Nations, hee had arguments enow to perswade them to goe on, to the end that all already gotten, might not with themselves (so farre ingaged) be cast away. And because they were possessed with the spoiles of so many Cities, as the whole Armie seemed but the guard of their carriages, (not much vnlike the warfare of the French) hauing commanded euery mans handells to be brought into the market-place, he together with his owne, caused all to bee consumed with fire. Certainly, this could not but haue prouoked most dangerous vnto him, seeing the common-Souldiers had more interest in these things which they had bought with their painfull traualles, and with their blood, than in the Kings ambition; had not (as Seneca often obserued) his happie temeritie ouer-come all things. As hee was in his way, newes came to him, that Satibarzanes, whom hee had established in his former gouernement ouer the Arrians, was revolted; whereupon leauing the way of Bactria, he fought him out, but the Rebelle, hearing of his coming, fled to Bessus, with two thousand Horse. Hee then went on towards Bessus, and by setting a great pile of wood on fire, with the aduantage of a strong winde, wonne a passage ouer an high and vnaceffable Rocke, which was defended against him, with thirteene thousand foote. For the extremitie of the Flame and smoke, forced them from the place, otherwise inuincible. I saw in the third ciuill warre of France, certaine Caves in Languedoc, which had but one entrance, and that very narrow, cut out in the mid-way of high Rockes, which wee knew not how to enter by any ladder or engine, till at last, by certaine bundels of straw, let downe by by an yron chaine, and a waigty stone in the middle, those that defended it, were so smothered, as they rendered themselves with their plate, monie, and other goods therein hidden. There were also some three yeeres before my arrival in Guiana, three hundred Spaniards well mounted, smothered to death, together with their Horses, by the Countrie people, who did set the long dry grasse on fire to the Eastward of them, (the winde in those parts being alwayes East) so as notwithstanding their flying from the smoke, there was not any one that escaped. St. John Borriowes also, with a hundred Englishs, was in great danger of being lost at Margarita, in the West-Indies, by hauing the grasse fired behind him, but the smoke being timefully discovered, hee recovered the Sea before with the losse of sixtene of his men. I remember these things, but to giue caution to those that shall in times to come invade any part of those Countreies, that they alwayes, before they passe into the Land, burne downe the grasse and fedge to the East of them; they may otherwise, without any other enemy, than a handfull of straw set on fire, die the death of honey-Bees, burnt out of the Hiuie.

§. XVII.

A Conspiracie against ALEXANDER. The death of PHILOTAS and PARMENIO.

ALXANDER was, after he parted hence, no where resisted, till he came into Aria, to the East of Bactria, where the chiefe City of that Province, called Artacoana, was a while defended against him, by the revolt of Sartibarzanes, but in the end hee receiued the Inhabitants to mercie. At this place his Armie was re-enforced with a new supply of five thousand and five hundred foote, and neere five hundred Horse, out of Greece, Theffalie, & other places. His iourne out of Persia into these parts, is very confusedly described. For hauing (as all his Historians tell vs) a determination to find Bessus in Bactria, he leaues it at the very entrance, and takes the way of Hyrcania; from thence he wanders Northward towards the obscure Mardi, vpon the Caspian-Sea, and thence ouer the Mountaines Coronus into Aria, and Drangianus.

At this time it was that the treason of Dimnus brake out, of which Philotas the foane of Parmenio was accused, as accessarie, if not principall. This Dimnus, hauing (I know not vpon what ground) conspired with some others against the life of Alexander, went about to draw Nicomachus, a yong man whom hee loued, into the same treason. The Youth, although hee was firmlie bound by oath to secrecie, when he heard so foule a matter vttered, beganne to protest against it so vehemently, that his friend was like to haue slaine him for securitie of his owne life. So, constrained by feare, hee made shew as if hee had bene wonne by perswasion, and by seeming at length to like well of the businesse, hee was told more at large what they were, that had undertaken it. There were nine or ten of them, all men of ranke; whose names Dimnus (to countenance the enterprise) reckoned vp to Nicomachus, Nicomachus had no sooner freed himselfe from the company of this Traitor Dimnus, than he acquainted his owne brother Cebalinus with the whole Historie: whereupon it was agreed betwene them, that Cebalinus (who might with least suspition) should goe to the Court, and vtter all. Cebalinus, meeting with Philotas, told him the whole businesse; desiring him to acquaint the King therewith: which hee promised to doe, but did not. Two dayes passed, and Philotas neuer brake with the King about the matter, but still excused himselfe to Cebalinus by the Kings want of leisure. This his coldnesse bred suspition, and caused Cebalinus to adresse himselfe to another, one Metron, Keeper of the Kings Armourie, who forth-with brought him to Alexanders presence. Alexander, finding by examination what had passed betwene Cebalinus and Philotas, did fully perswade himselfe that this concealment of the treason, son, argued his hand to haue bene in the businesse. Therefore when Dimnus was brought before him, he asked the Traitor no other question then this: Wherein haue I offended thee, that thou shouldst thinke PHILOTAS more worthe to be King than I? Dimnus perceiuing, when he was apprehended, how the matter went, had so wounded himselfe, that he liued no longer, than to giue his last groane in the Kings presence. Then was Philotas called, and charged with the suspition, which his silence might iustly breed. His answer was, That when the practice was reuealed vnto him by Nicomachus, he judging it to be but frivolous, did forebore to acquaint Alexander therewithall, vntill he might haue better information. This error of his, (if it were onely an error) although Alexander, for the notorious seruices of his Father Parmenio, of his brother Nicanor lately dead, and of Philotas himselfe, had freely pardoned and giuen him his hand for assurance; yet by the instigation of Craterus, hee againe swallowed his Princely promise, and made his enemies his Iudges: Curtius giues a note of Craterus in this businesse; How hee perswaded himselfe, that hee could neuer finde a better occasion to oppress his priuate enemy, than by pretending pietie, and dutie towards the King. Heerof a Poet of our owne hath giuen a note as much better, as it is more generall in his Philotas.

See how these great men cloathe their priuate hate,
In these faire colours of the publike good,
And to effect their ends, pretend the State,
As if the State by their affection stood,
And arm'd with power and Princes jealousies,
Will put the least conceit of discontent
Into the greatest ranke of treacheries,
That no one action shall seeme innocent;
Yea valour, honour, bountie, shall be made
As accessaries vnto ends vnjust:
And euen the seruice of the State must lade
The needfull't vndertaking with distrust,
So that base vileness; idle Luxurie,
Seeme safer farre, than to doe worthily, &c.

Now although it were so, that the King, following the aduice of Craterus, had resolved the next day to put Philotas to torment, yet in the very euening of the same night in which he was apprehended, he called him to a banquet, and discoursed as familiarly with him as at any other time. But when in the dead of the night Philotas was taken in his lodging, and that they which hated him beganne to binde him; he cryed out vpon the King in these wordes: O ALEXANDER, the malice of mine Enemies hath surmounted thy mercie, and their hatred is farre more constant than the word of a King. Many circumstances were urged against him by Alexander himselfe; (for the Kings of Macedon did in person examine the accusations of treason) and this was not the least (not the least offence, indeede, against the Kings humour, who desired to be glorified as a God) That when Alexander wrote vnto him concerning the title giuen him by Iupiter Hammon; Hee answered, That hee could not but reioyce that he was admitted into that sacred Fellowship of the gods, and yet hee could not but withall grieve for those that should liue vnder such a one as would exceede the nature of man. This was (saith Alexander) a firme perswasion vnto me, that his heart was changed, and that hee held my glory in despiight. See what a strange Monster Flatterie is, that can perswade Kings to kill those that doe not praise and allow those things in them, which are of all other most to bee abhorred. Philotas was brought before the multitude, to heare the Kings Oration against him: he was brought forth in wilde garments, and bound like a Thiefe; where hee heard himselfe, and his absent Father the greatest Captaine of the World, accused, his two other Brothers,

Helior and Nicanor having beene lost in the present Warre. Hee was so greatly oppressed with griefe, as for a while he could utter nothing but teares, and sorrow had so waited his spirits, as hee sunk vnder those that led him. In the end the King asked him, in what language he would make his defence; he answered, In the same wherein it had pleased the King to accuse him, which hee did, to the end that the Persians, as well as the Macedonians, might vnderstand him. But hereof the King made his advantage, perswading the assembly, that hee disdained the language of his owne Countre, and so with-drawing himselfe, left him to his mercilesse enemies.

This proceeding of the Kings, Philotas greatly lamented, seeing the King, who had so sharply inuoyed against him, would not vouchsafe to heare his excuse. For, 10 not his enemies onely were emboldened thereby against him, but all the rest, having discovered the Kings disposition and resolution, contended among themselves, which of them should exceede in hatred towards him; Among many other arguments, which hee vied in his owne defence, this was not the weakest; That when Nicomachus desired to know of Dimnus, what men of mark and power were his partners in the conspiracie (as seeming vnwilling to aduenture himselfe with meane and base Companions) Dimnus named vnto him Demetrius of the Kings Chamber, Nicanor, Amyntas, and some others, but spake not a word of Philotas, who by being Commander of the Horse, would greatly haue valued the partie, and haue incouraged Nicomachus. Indeede, as Philotas said well for himselfe, it is likely that Dimnus, 20 thereby the better to haue heartned Nicomachus, would haue named him, though hee had neuer dealt with him in any such practice. And for more certaine proofe, that he knew nothing of their intents, that practised against the King, there was not any one of the Conspirators, being many, inforced by torments, or other wise, that could accuse him, and it is true, that aduersity being seldom able to beare her owne burden, is for the most part found so malicious, as shee rather desires to draw others (not alwayes deseruing it) into the same danger, than to spare any that it can accuse. Yet at the last, howeouer it were, to auoide the extremity of resilesse and vnnaturall torments, deuised by his profligate enemies Craterus, Cennus, Ephesion, and others, Philotas accused his owne selfe; being perswaded that they would haue slaine him 30 forthwith. But hee failed euen in that miserable hope, and suffering all that could be layd on flesh and blood, hee was forced to deliuer, not what he knew, but whatsoeuer best pleased their cares, that were farre more mercilesse than death it selfe.

Of this kinde of iudiciall proceeding S. Augustine greatly complaineth as a matter to bee bewailed, saith he, with Fountaines of teares. Quid cum in sua causa quisq; torquetur: & cum queritur vitium sit nocens cruciatur: & innocens (sui pro incerto scelere certissimas penas: non quia illud commississe detegitur, sed quia non commississe nescitur) What shall we say to it, when one is put to torture in his owne case; and tormented & whil- 40 lest yet it is in question whether he be guiltie, and being innocent, suffers assured punishment for a fault, of which there is no certaintie, not because he is knowne to haue committed the offence, but because other doe not know that he hath not committed it?

It had beene enough for Alexanders sagacity, if Philotas had beene put to death without torment, the rest would not much haue grieued thereat, because hee was greatly suspected. But Hemelaus, who afterward conspired against him, made the Kings cruelty and delight in blood, the greatest motive of his owne ill intent. Therefore, Seneca, speaking of Alexander, saith thus: Crudelitas minime humanum malum est, indignum tam miti animo; feruissimas rabies est sanguine gaudere & vulneribus. & abiecto homine, in siluestre animal transire; Crueltas non est humane vice; it is unworthy of so milde a spirit. It is euen a beastly rage to delight in blood and wounds, and casting away the nature of man, to become a savage Monster.

For the conclusion of this Tragedie, Curtius makes a doubt, whether the confession that Philotas made, were to giue end to the torments which hee could not any longer indure, or that the same was true indeede; For (saith hee) in this case, they that speake truly, or they that deny falsly, come to one and the same end. Now, while while the Kings hands were yet wet in blood, he commanded that Lyncestes, sonne in Law to Antipater, who had beene three yeeres in prison, should be slaine: The same dispatch had all those that Nicomachus had accused: others there were that were suspected, because they had followed Philotas, but when they had answered for themselves that they knew no way so direct to winne the Kings fauour, as by loving those whom the King fauoured: they were dismissed. But Parmentio was yet liuing; Parmentio, who had serued with great fidelitie as well Philip of Macedon the Kings Father, as himselfe; Parmentio that first opened the way into Asia; That had deprett Attalus the Kings enemy; that had alwayes, and in all hazards, the leading of 10 the Kings Vant-guard, that was no lesse prudent in counsell, than fortunate in all attempts; A man beloued of the men of Warre, and, to say the truth, hee that had made the purchase for the King of the Empire of the East, and of all the glorie and fame hee had: That he might not therefore reuenge the death of his Sonne, though not vpon the King, (for it was unlikely that hee would haue dishonoured his fidelitie in his eldest age, hauing now liued threescore and ten yeeres) yet vpon those that by the witchcraft of flatterie had posselt themselves of his affection; it was resolved that he should be dispatched. Polydamas was employed in this businesse, a man whom of all other Parmentio trusted most, and loued best, who (to bee short) finding him in Media, and hauing Cleander and other Murderers with him, slew him walking in his 20 Garden, while hee was reading the Kings letters. Hecce vixit PARMENIO, fuit, Lib. i. militis domus, clari viri; Multa sine Rege prospera, Rex sine illo nihil magna rei gesserat; This was the end of PARMENIO (saith CURIUS) who had performed many notable things without the King, but the King, without him, did neuer effect any thing worthy of praise.

¶ XVIII.

How ALEXANDER subdued the Bactrians, Sogdians, and other people. How Bessus was deliuered into his hands. How hee fought with the Seythians.

When these things had end, Alexander went on with his Armie, and brought vnder his obedience the Arasians or Euergetians; hee made Amendes (sometime Darius his Secretarie) their Gouvernour; then hee subdued the Arachosians, and left Menon to command ouer them. Heere the Armie, sometimes led by Parmentio, findes him, consisting of twelve thousand Macedons and Greekes, with whom hee passeth through some cold Regions with difficultie enough. At length hee came to the foote of the Mountain Taurus towards the East, where hee built a Citie which hee honoured with his owne name, and peopled it with seuen thousand of his olde Macedons, worne with age and with traualles of the warre, The Arians, who since hee left them were reuolted, hee subdued againe by the industrie and valour of Caranus and Erigenus; And now hee resolves to finde out the new King Bessus in Bactria. Bessus, hearing of his coming, prepares to passe ouer the great Riuer of Oxus which diuides Bactria from Sogdiana; Artabazus is made Gouvernour of Bactria abandoned by Bessus; The Macedonian Armie suffereth for want of Water, in so much as when they came to the Riuer of Oxus, there died more of them by drinking inordinately, then Alexander had lost in any one battaile against the Persians. And it may well be; For as Clytus had after obiect vnto him hee fought against women, not against men, and not against their persons but their shadows. Hee found on the banks of this great Riuer no manner of Timber or other materials, to make either boates, bridges, or rafts, but was forced to fow together the Hides that couered his carriages, and bushe them with straw, and on them in sixe daies to passe ouer his Armie; which Bessus might easily haue distrest, if hee had dared but to beholde the Macedonian Ar- 50 farre farre off. Hee had formerly complained againſt Darius for neglecting to defend the banks of Tigris, and other paſſages, and yet now, when this traitorous ſlaine had ſtyled himſelfe a King, hee durſt not performe any thing worthy of a ſlaine. And therefore thoſe that were neereſt vnto him, and whom he moſt truſted, to wit, Spitamenes, Dataphernes, Catanes, and others the Commanders of his Armie, moued both by the care of their owne ſafety, and by the memorie of Bessus his Treason and cruelty againſt Darius, bound him in the like manner that hee had done his Maſter, but with this difference, that he had the chaine cloſed about his neck like a maſtiue Dog, and ſo was dragged along to be preſented to his enemy.

In the meane while Alexander was arrived at a certaine Towne inhabited with Greekes of Miletum, brought thither by Xerxes, when long before he returned out of Greece, whoſe iſſues had well-neere forgotten their Countrey-language. Theſe moſt cruelly (after they had receiued him with great ioy) hee put to the ſword, and deſtroyed their Citie. At this place he receiued Bessus, and hauing rewarded Spitamenes with the reſt that deliuered him, he gaue the Traitor into the hands of Oxaites, Darius his brother, to be tormented.

But while he now thought himſelfe ſecure, ſome twenty thouſand Mountainers aſſaulted his Camp; in repelling whom he receiued a ſhor in the leg, the arrow head ſticking in the fleſh, ſo as hee was carried in a Horſe-Lytter, ſometime by the horſe men, ſometime by the foote.

Soone after hee came vnto Maracanda, which Petrus Peroninus takes to be Samar-chand, the regall Citie of the great Taneriſine. It had in compaſſe threeſcore and ten furlongs (Curtius ſaith.) Heere he receiued the Embaſſadors of the Scythians (called Anians) who offered to ſerue him.

The Bactrians are ſhortly againe with the Sogdians ſtirred to Rebellion, by the ſame Spitamenes and Catanes, who had lately deliuered into his hands the Traitor Bessus. Many Citieſ were reſoluedly defended againſt him, all which, after victorie, hee deſaced and raſed, killing all therein. At one of theſe hee receiued a blow on the necke which ſtrucke him to the ground, and much diſabled him for many daies after. In the meane while Spitamenes had recovered Maracanda, againſt whom hee employed 30 Menedemus with three thouſand foote and eight hundred horſe.

In the heate of theſe tumults Alexander marched on (if we may beleue Curtius and others) till he came to the Riuer of Tanais, vpon whoſe banke he built another Alexandria threeſcore furlongs in compaſſe, which hee beautified with houſes within ſeuentene daies after the walls built. The building of this Citie is ſaid to haue bene occasion of a warre betwene him and the Scythians; the Scythian King perſwading himſelfe, that this new Towne was fortified of purpoſe to keepe him vnder. I doe not well vnderſtand, why the Scythians, offering warre in ſuch terrible manner that Alexander was iudged by his owne Souldiers to counterfeit ſickeſſe for very feare, ſhould neuertheleſſe make ſuite for peace: neither finde I the reaſon why Alexander (not intending the conqueſt of thoſe Northerne deſarts, but only the defence of his owne banke) ſhould reſuſe to let them alone, with whom he could not meddle further then they ſhould agree to ſuffer him. Yet hereof is made a great matter; and a victorie deſcribed; in purſuit of which the Macedons ranne beyond the bounds and monuments of Bacchus his expedition.

The truth is, That Curtius and Trogus haue greatly miſtaken this Riuer which they call Tanais. For it was the Riuer of Iaxartes, that runnes betwene Sogdiana and Scythia, which Alexander paſt ouer, while Menedemus was employed in the recoverie of Samar-chand. But Tanais which diuides Aſia from Europe, is neere two thouſand miles diſtant from any part of Bactria and Sogdiana, and the way deſart & vnknowne. So that Alexander had (beſides Iaxartes) the great Riuer of Volga and many others to ſwimme ouer, ere he could recouer Tanais: which (from the place where he was) he could hardly haue diſcouered with the Armie that followed him, if he had imploied all the time that he liued in Aſia in that trauaile.

Where-

Wherefore it is enough to beleue, that the Aſiaticke Scythians, making ſome effort to diſturb the erection of this new Citie, which was like to giue ſome hindrance to their excuſions, were driuen away by the Macedonians; and being naked of deſentine Armes, eaſily chaſed ſome tenne or twelue miles, which is the ſubſtance of Curtius his report. As for the limits of Bacchus his iourne; like enough it is that Bacchus (if in his life time he were as ſober a man, as after his death he was held a drunken God) went not verie farre into that waile Countrey, where hee could finde nothing but trees and ſtones, nor other buſineſſe than to ſet vp a monument.

Threeſcore of the Macedons are ſaid to haue bene ſlaine, and one thouſand one hundred hurt in this fight, which might eaſily be in paſſing a great Riuer, defended againſt them by good Archers. Of Scythian horſes one thouſand eight hundred were brought into the Campe, and many priſoners. It is forbidden by ſome Hiſtorians, and indeede it is hardly poſſible, to ſet downe the numbers of ſuch as periſh in battell: yet Cæſar commonly did it. And where the diligence of the victors hath bene ſo iniquitiuſe into the greatneſſe of their owne ſucceſſe, that writers haue bene able to deliuer ſuch particulars by credible report, I hold it not vnlawfull to ſet downe what wee finde; eſpecially when it ſerues to giue light to the buſineſſe in hand. The ſmall number which the Macedonians loſt; the omiſſion of the number which they ſlew (a thing not vſual in Curtius, who forbears nothing that may ſet out the greatneſſe of Alexander) and the little bootie that was gotten; doe make it probably, that this warre was no better than the repulſion of a few rousing Tartars (the like being yeerely performed by the Moſſonite, without any boalt) and therefore better omitted by ſome Hiſtorians, than ſo highly extolled as a great exploit by others.

While Alexander was aſſuring himſelfe of thoſe Scythians bordering vpon Iaxartes, he receiued the ill newes that Menedemus was ſlaine by Spitamenes, the Armie (by him led) broken, and the greateſt numbers ſlaine, to wit, two thouſand foote, and three hundred horſe. He therefore, to appeaſe the rebellion, and to take reuenge of Spitamenes, makes all the haſte he can; but Spitamenes flies into Bactria. Alexander ³⁰ kills, burnes, and laies waſte all before him; not ſparing the innocent children, and ſo departs, leauing a new Governour in that Prouince.

To repaire this loſſe he receiued a great ſupply of nineteene thouſand Souldiers out of Greece, Lycia, and Syria; with all which, and the old Armie, hee returns towards the South, and paſſeth the Riuer of Oxus; on the South-ſide whereof hee built fixe Townes neere each other for mutuall ſuccour. But hee finds a new ſtave-³⁰ vp-Rebell, called Arimazes, (a Sogdian) followed with thirrie thouſand Souldiers that defended againſt him a ſtrong piece of ground on the top of a high Hill; whom when Alexander had fought in vaine to winne by faire words, hee made choiſe of three hundred yong-men, and promiſed ten talents to the firſt, nine to the ſecond, and ſo in proportion to the reſt, that could finde a way to creepe vp to the top thereof. This they performed with the loſſe of ſome two and thirrie of their men, and then made a ſigne to Alexander, that they had performed his commandement. Hereupon he ſent one Cophes to perſwade Arimazes to yeeld the place; who, being ſhewed by Cophes that the Armie of Macedon was already mounted vp, yeelded ſimply to Alexanders mercie, and was (with all his kinned) ſcourged and crucified to death; which puniſhment they well deſerued for neglecting to keepe good watch in ſo dangerous a time. For the place, as ſeemes by the deſcription, might eaſily haue bene defended againſt all the Armies of the World. But, what ſtrength cannot doe; Mans wit, being the moſt forcible engine, hath often effected; Of which ³⁰ I will giue you an example in a place of our owne.

The Iland of Sarkis, ioyning to Garnſey and of that gouernement, was in Queene Maries time ſurpriſed by the French, and could neuer haue bene recovered againe by ſtrong hand, hauing cartell and come enough vpon the place to feede ſo many men as will ſerue to defend it, and being euer way ſo inacceſſible, that it might bee held held against the Great Turke. Yet by the industrie of a Gentleman of the Netherlands, it was in this fort regained. Hee anchored in the roade with one Ship of small burden, and, pretending the death of his Marchant, besought the French, being some thirtie in number, that they might burie their Marchant in hallowed Ground, and in the Chappell of that Isle; offering a present to the French of such Commodities as they had aboard; whereto (with condition that they should not come ashore with any weapon, no not so much as with a Knife) the French-men yielded. Then did the Flemings put a Coffin into their Boat, not filled with a dead carcase, but with Swords, Targets, and Harquebusses; The French received them at their landing; and searching euery of them so narrowly as they could not hide a Pen-knife, gaue them leaue to draw their Coffin vpon the Rocks with great difficultie; some part of the French tooke the Flemish Boat and rowed aboard their Ship, to fetch the commodities promised, and what else they pleased, but being entred, they were taken and bound. The Flemings on the Land, when they had carried their Coffin into the Chappell, shut the doore to them, and taking their weapons out of the Coffin, let vpon the French; they runne to the Cliffe and cry to their Companie aboord: the Fleming to come to their succour, but finding the Boat charged with Flemings, yielded themselves and the place. Thus a Fox-taile doth sometimes helpe well to piece out the Lions-skinne, that else would be too short.

§. XIX.

How ALEXANDER slew his owne friends.

For these Sogdian and Sythian Warres, we reade of Alexanders killing of a Lion, and other frivolum matter, and that hee committed the Government of Macedonia, & the Country about it, to Clytus; and how he slew him soone after, for valuing the vertue of Philip the father before that of Alexander the sonne, or rather because he objected to the King the death of Parmenio, and derided the Oracle of Hammon: for therein hee toucht him to the quicke, the same being deliuered in publike and at a drunken Banquet. Clytus, indeed, had deserued as much at the Kings hands, as any man liuing had done, and had in particular faued his life, which the King well remembered when he came to himselfe, and when it was too late. Yet to say the truth, Clytus his insolencie was intolerable. As he in his Cups forgot whom he offended, so the King in his (for neyther of them were themselves) forgot whom he went about to slay, for the griefe wherof he tare his owne face and forwored so inordinately, as, but for the perswasions of Callisthenes, it is thought he would haue slaine himselfe.

Wine begat Furie, Furie matter of Repentance: but preceding mischiefs are not amended by succeeding bewailings: Omne vitium ebrietas & incendit, & detegit: obstantem malis conatibus recurdiam remouet; ubi possedit animum nimis vis vini, quicquid mali latebat, emergit: non facit ebrietas vitia, sed prouohat; Drunkenness both kindles and layes open euery vice; it remoues out of the way that shame which gues impediment vnto bad attempts; where wine gets the mastery, all the ill that before lay hid den or takes out: drunkenness indeed rather discouers vices, than makes them.

Soone after this, Spitamenes, who slew Bessus, and had lately reuolted from Alexander, was murdered by his Wife, and his head presented to Alexander. Spitamenes being taken away, the Dahans also seized vpon his fellow-conspirator Dataphernes, and deliuered him vp. So Alexander being now freed from all these pettie Rebels, disposed of the Provinces which hee past ouer, and went on with his Armie into Gabaz, where it suffered so much Hunger, Cold, Lightning, Thunder, and Storme, as hee lost in one Tempest a thousand of his Train. From hence hee invaded the Sacari, and destroyed their Country. Then came he into the Territorie of Cobortanes, who submitted himselfe vnto him, feasted him greatly, and presented him with thirtie beautifull Virgins, among whom Roxane, afterward his Wife, was one: which although all the Macedonians disdained, yet none of them durst vfe any freedom of speech after Clytus his death. From hence he directed his course towards India, hauing so increased his numbers, as they amounted to an hundred and twentiethousand armed men.

In the meane while hee would needes bee honoured as a God: whereto that hee might allure the Macedonians, hee imploied two pernicious Parafites, Hagu and Gleo; whom Callisthenes opposed: For among many other honest arguments vfed to the assembly, he told Gleo, That he thought, that Alexander would disdaine the gift of God-head from his Vassalls; That the opinion of Sanctity, though it did sometime follow the death of those, who in their life-time had done the greatest things, yet it neuer accompanied any one as yet liuing in the world. He further told him, That neither Hercules nor Bacchus were Deified at a banquet, and vpon drinke, (for this matter was propounded by Gleo at a carowing feast) but that, for the more than manly acts by them performed while they liued, they were in future and succeeding Ages numbered among the gods. Alexander stood behinde a partition and heard all that was spoken, waiting but an opportunitie, to be reuenged on Callisthenes, who being a man of free speech, honest, learned, and a louer of the Kings honour, was yet soone after tormented to death, not for that hee had betrayed the King to others: but because hee neuer would condescend to betray the King to himselfe, as all his detestable flatterers did. For in a conspiracie against the King made by one Hermolans and others (which they confest) he caused Callisthenes without confession, accusation, or triall, to be torne a-funder vpon the racke: This deed, vnworthy of a King, Seneca thus censureth. Hoc est ALEXANDRI crimen aeternum, quod nulla virtus, nulla bellorum felicitas redimet. Nam quotiens quis dixerit, Occidit Persarum multa milia: opponitur, & CALLISTHENES: Quotiens dictum erit, Occidit DARIUM: opponitur, & CALLISTHENES. Quotiens dictum erit, Omnia Oceano tenus viciit, ipsam quoque tentauit nouis classibus, & Imperium ex angulo Thraciae vsque ad Orientis terminos protulit: dicitur, sed CALLISTHENES occidit. Omnia licet antiqua Ducum Regumque exemplar anserit, ex his que fecit nihil tam magnum erit quam scelus CALLISTHENES: This is the eternall crime of ALEXANDER, which no vertue nor felicity of his in warre shall euer be able to redeme. For as often as any man shall say, He slew many thousand Persians; it shall be replied, Hee did so, and he slew CALLISTHENES: When it shall be said, He slew DARIUS, it shall be replied, and CALLISTHENES; When it shall be said, Hee wonne all as farre as to the very Ocean, thereon also hee aduentured with vnusall Nauies, and extended his Empire from a corner of Thracia, to the utmost bounds of the Orient, it shall be said withall, But he killed CALLISTHENES. Let him haue out-gone all the ancient examples of Captaines and Kings; none of all his acts makes so much to his glory, as CALLISTHENES to his reproach.

§. XX.

Of ALEXANDERS iourney into India. The battaile betwene him and PORUS.

With the Armie before remembered, of one hundred and twenty thousand foot and horse, Alexander did enter the borders of India, where such of the Princes, as submitted themselves vnto him, hee entertained louingly, the rest hee constrained; killing Man, Woman, and Child, where they resisted. Hee then came before Nisa built by Bacchus, which after a few daies was rendred vnto him. From thence hee remoued to a Hill at hand, which on the top had goodly Gardens filled with delicate fruits and Vines, dedicated to Bacchus, to whom hee made feasts for ten daies together. Now when hee had drunke his fill, hee went on towards Dadala, and thence to Andera, Countries

Sfff

Countries spoiled and abandoned by the Inhabitants, by reason whereof, victuals failing, he diuides his Armie; Ptolemie led one part, Cenon another, and himselfe the rest. They take many Townes, whereof that of greatest fame was Masage, which had in it three hundred thousand men; but after some resistance, it was yielded vnto him by Crope the Queene, to whom againe he restored it; at the siege of this Citie he receiued a wound in the legge. After this, Nora was taken by Polyperchon, and a Rocke of great strength by himselfe: he wanne also a passage vpon one Eryx, who was slain by his companie, and his head presented to Alexander. This is the summe of Alexander's doings in those parts, before such time as he arriued at the Riuer of Indus. Comming to Indus, he found there Ephesione, who (being sent before) had 10 prepared boats for the transportation of his Army, and ere Alexander's arriuall, had perswaded Omphis King of that part of the Country to submit himselfe to this great Conquerour. Therefore, soone vpon Alexander's comming, Omphis presented himselfe with all the strength of his Country, and sixe and fiftie Elephants, vnto him; offering him his seruice and assistance. Hee made Alexander know, that hee was an Enemy to the next two great Kings of that part of India, named Abisares and Porus; wherewith Alexander was not a little pleased, hoping by this diuision to make his owne victorie by farre the more easie. Hee presented Alexander with a Crown of gold, so did he the rest of his Commanders, and withall fourecore talents of siluer coine, which Alexander not onely refused, but to shew that hee was co-20 uetous of glory, not of gold, he gaue Omphis a thousand talents of his own treasure, besides other Persian rarities. Abisares, hauing heard that Alexander had receiued his enemy Omphis into his protection, resolved to make his owne peace also: For, knowing that his owne strength had but equall that of Omphis, and that there was no other difference betweene them, than that which the chance of Warre gaue, he thought it an ill match when Alexander, who had already beaten vnder foote all the greatest Princes of Asia, should make himselfe a Party and Head of the quarrell. So had Alexander none now to stand in his way but Porus, to whom he sent a commandement, that he should attend him at the border of his Kingdome, there to doe him homage. But from Porus hee receiued this manly answer; That hee 30 would satisfie him in his first demand, which was to attend him on his borders, and that well accompanied; but for any other acknowledgement hee was resolved to take counsell of his Sword. To be short, Alexander resolves to passe ouer the Riuer Hydaspes, and to find Porus at his owne home. Porus attends him on the farther banke with thirtie thousand foote, fourecore and ten Elephants, and three hundred armed Chariots, and a great troupe of Horle. If Darius had done the like on Tigris, Alexander had surely staied somewhat longer ere he had seene India. The Riuer was foure furlongs broad, which makes halfe a mile, and withall deepe and swift. It had in it many Ilands, among which there was one well shadowed with wood, and of good capacite. Alexander sent Ptolemie vp the Riuer with a great part of the Armie, throwing the rest from the view of Porus: who by this deuice being drawne from his first incamping, sets himselfe downe opposit to Ptolemie, supposing that the whole Armie of Macedon came to force their passage there. In the meane while Alexander recouers the farther thore without resistance. He orders his troups and aduanceth towards Porus, who at first rather beleecues, that Abisares his Confederat (but now the Confederat of fortune) had been come ouer Hydaspes to his aide, than that Alexander had past it. But he finds it otherwife, and sends his Brother Hagis with foure thousand horle, and a hundred armed waggons to entertaine him. Each waggon had in it foure to fight, and two to guide it; but they were at this time of little vse: for there had fallen so much ruine, and thereby the fields were 50 so moistned, as the horles could hardly trot. The Seythians & Dahans had the Vanguard, who so galled these Indians, as they brake their reines, & other furniture, overturning the waggons, and those in them. Perdiccas also gaue vp the Indian horle-men, and the one & the other were foor to recoile. Porus moues forward with grolle of his Armie Armie, that those of his Vanguard scattered might recouer his Reare: Alexander being followed with Ephesione, Ptolemie, and Perdiccas, tooke on him to charge the Indian horle-men on the left wing, commanding Cenon or Penon to invade the right; Antigonus and Leonatus, hee directed to breake vpon Porus his battaile of foote, strengthened with Elephants, Porus himselfe being carried vpon one of them of the greatest stature. By these beasts the Macedonian foot were most offended; but the Archers and Darters being well guarded with the long and strong Pikes of the Macedonians, so galled them, as being enraged, they turned head, and ranne ouer the foote that followed them: In the end, and after a long and doubtfull fight, by the aduantage of weapon, and by the courage and skilfulnesse of the Macedonian Captaines, the victorie fell to Alexander, who also farre exceeded Porus in number: for besides the Macedonians and other Easterne and Northern Nations, Porus was assailed by his owne Confederate and Countrie people. Yet for his owne person he neuer gaue ground otherwife then with his sword towards his enemies, till being weakened with many wounds, and abandoned by his army, he became a prisoner to the Conqueror, from whom againe hee receiued his estate with a great enlargement.

How ALEXANDER finished his expedition, and returned out of India.

For beare to trouble my selfe and others with a trifolious discourse of Serpents, Apes and Peacocks, which the Macedonians found in these their trauailes: or of those pettie Wars which Alexander made betwene the ouerthrow of Porus, and his falling downe the Riuer of Indus. The descriptions of places about the head and branches thereof are better knowne vnto vs in this Age, by meanes of our late Navigations into those parts, than they were in any former times. The magnificence and riches of those Kings we could in no sort be perswaded to belecue, till our owne experience had taught vs, that there were many stranger things in the World, than are to be seene betwene London and Stanes.

Our great trauceller Mandevile, who died in the yeere 1372. and had seene so much of the World, and of the East Indies, wee accompted the greatest fabler of the World; yet had he another reputation among other Nations, as well able to iudge as we. Witnesse the Monument made of him in the Couent of the Friars Guilminis in Liege, where the religious of that place keepe some things of his, Comme pour hon- 60 norable memoire de son Excellence; For an honorable memoire of his Excellence, faith Guichardine.

The Countries towards the Springs of Indus, and where those many Riuer of Hydaspes, Zaradrus, Aefines, and the rest, fall into the maine streame, are now posselt by the great Mogor, the ninth from Tamberlane, who commands all that tract betwene Persia and Indus towards the West, as also a great extent of Countrie towards Ganges. In the mouth of Indus, the Ascension, a ship of London, suffered shipwracke, in the yeere 1609. and some of the company trauailed ouer Land till they came to Aggra, the same great Citie (as I take it) which our later Cosmographers call Nagra, being named of old Dionysopolis.

Phylotratius in the life of Apollonius Tyanus, speaking of the expedition of Bacchus and Hercules into the East India, tells vs, that those two great Captaines (whom Alexander fought by all meanes to out-fame) when they indued to subiect vnto them the Oxydrace, a people inhabiting betwene the Riuer of Hyphasis and Ganges, they were beaten from the assault of their cities with thunder and lightnings. This may well be vnderstood by the great Ordinance that those people had then in vse. For it is now certainly known, that the great Kings of the vntermost East, haue had the vse of the Canon, many hundreds of yeeres since, and euen since their first ciuillie and greatnesse, which was long before Alexanders time. But Alexander pierst not so farre into the East. It sufficed, that hauing already ouer-wearied his Armie, hee discovered the rest of India by fame. The Indian Kings whom he had subdued, informed him, that a Prince called Aggramenes, who commanded many Nations beyond the Riuer of Ganges, was the powerfulllest King of all those Regions: and that he was able to bring into the field two hundred thousand Foot, three thousand Elephants, twentie thousand Horse, and two thousand armed Chariots. With this report, though Alexander were more inflamed, than euer to proceede in this discouerie and conquest, yet all the art he had, could not perswade the Souldiers to wander ouer those great deserts beyond Indus and Ganges, more terrible vnto them than the greatest Armie that the East could gather. Yet at the last contented they were, after many perswasive Orations, to follow him towards the South, to discover such part of the Ocean Sea, as was neerer at hand, whereunto the Riuer of Indus was their infallible guide. Alexander seeing that it would be no otherwise, deuised a prettie trick, wherewith he hoped to beguile posteritie, and make himselfe seeme greater than he was. He enlarged his Campe, made greater trenches, greater cabins for the Souldiers, greater Horse-stalles, and higher mangers than his Horfes could feede in. He cauled all furniture of Men and Horfes to bee made larger than would serue for vse; and scattered these Armourrs and Bridles about his Campe, to be kept as reliques, and wondered at by the Sauages. Proportionable to these he raised vp twelue great Altars to be the monument of his iournies end. This was a ready way to encrease the fame of his bignesse; to his greatnesse it could adde nothing saue a suspicion, that it was lesse than is thought, seeing he stroue so earnestly to make it thought more than it was.

This done, he returned againe to the banke of Aeefines, and there determined to set vp his fleet where Aeefines and Hydaspis incounter, where to testifie by a surer monument, how farre he had past towards the East, he built by those riuers two Cities: the one he called Nicaea, and the other Bucephalon, after the name of his beloued Horse Bucephalus. Here againe he receiued a fourth supply of fixe thousand Thracian Horse-men, seuen thousand Foot, and from his Lieutenant at Babylon fixe and twentie thousand Armourrs, garnished with siluer and gold, which hee distributed among his Souldiers. About these Riuers he wanne many Townes, and committed great slaughter on those that resisted; It is then written of him, that assaunting a Citie of the Oxidracans, he leapt from the top of the wall into it, and fought, I know not how long, against all the Inhabitants; tales like those of Beuis of Southampton, friuolous and incredible. Finally, hee past downe the Riuer with his fleet, at which time also the newes came vnto him of a rebellion in Bactria, and then of the arriual of an hundred Embassadors from a King of India, who submitted himself vnto him. Hee seated these Embassadors vpon a hundred beds of gold, with all the sumptuosity that could bee deuised, who some after their dispatch returned againe with a present of three hundred Horse, one hundred and thirtie Waggons, and to each foure Horfes, a thousand Targets, with many other things rare and rich.

Their entertainments ended, he sailes towards the South, passeth through many obscure Nations, which did all yeeld vnto him either quietly, or compelled by force: among these he builded another Alexandria. Of many places which he took in this passage, Samus was one, the Inhabitants whereof fought against him with poisoned Swords, with one of which Ptolomie (afterward King of Egypte) was wounded, and cured by an hearbe which Alexander dreamt that he had seene in the mouth of a Serpent.

When he came neere the out-let of Indus (being ignorant of the tides of the Sea) his Gallies as they were on a sudden shuffled one vpon another by the Flood, so on the Ebbe they were left on the drigground, and on the sandie bankes of the Riuer, uer, wherewith the Macedonians were much amazed, but after he had a few daies obserued wel the course of the Sea, hee past out of the riuers mouth some few miles, and after Sacrifices offered to Neptune returned: and the better to informe himselfe, he sent Nearchus and Onesiferus, to discover the coast towards the mouth of Euphrates. Arrianus in the beginning of his sixth Booke hath written this passage downe the Riuer of Indus at length, with the manner of the Vellels, in which hee transported his Army, the Commanders that were sed therein, and other the marvellous prouisions made.

Neere the out-lets of this Riuer, he spent some part of the Winter, and in eighteene daies march from thence recovered Gedrosia, in which passage his Armie suffered such miserie for want of foode, that of a hundred and twentie thousand foot, and twelue thousand horse, which he carried into India, not the fourth part returned aliuie.

§. XXII.

Of Alexanders Riot, Crueltie, and death.

Rom Gedrosia, Alexander led his Armie into Carmania, and so drawing neere to Persia, hee gave himselfe wholly to feasting and drinking, imitating the triumphs of Bacchus. And though this Swinish vice bee hateful enough in it selfe, yet it alwaies inflamed this King to Crueltie. For (saith Curtius) the Hang-man followed the feast, for a space of one of his Provinciall Governours he commanded to be slaine, so as neither did the excess of voluptuousnesse qualifie his cruelty, nor his cruelty binder in ought his voluptuousnesse.

While hee refreshed his Army in these parts, a new supply of fixe thousand loote and a thousand horse, was brought him by Cleander, and his fellows, that had been employed in the killing of Parmentis. Against these Murderers great complaint was made by the Deputies of the Prouinces, in which they had commanded; and their offences were so outrageous, as Alexander was perswaded, that had they not altogether despaired of his returne out of India, they durst not haue committed them. All men were glad of the occasion, remembering the vertue of him, whom they had slaughtered. The end was, That Cleander, and the other chiefe, with fixe hundred Souldiers by them imploied, were deliuered ouer to the Hang-man: euerie one reioicing that the Ire of the King was at last executed on the ministers of his Ire.

Nearchus and Onesiferus were now returned from the coast, and made report of an Island rich in gold, and of other strange things; wherevpon they were commanded to make some farther discouerie: which done, that they should enter the mouth of Euphrates, and finde the King at Babylon.

As he drew neere to Babylon, he visited the Sepulchre of Cyrus in Pasargada, now called Chelquera: where he was presented with many rich gifts by Orsines, one of the Princes of Persia, of the race of Cyrus. But because Bagoas, an Eunuch in especiall fauour with the King, was neglected, hee not only practised certaine loose fellows to witnesse against Orsines, that he had robbed Cyrus tomb, for which he was condemned to die; but hee assisted the Hang-man with his owne handes in tormenting him. At which time also Alexander cauled Phradates to be slaine, suspecting his gretnes. Caperat (saith Curtius) esse preceptis ad representanda supplicia, item ad deteriora credenda; He began headlong to shed blood, and to beleue false reports. It is true, that he tooke a way to make all men wearie of his gouernement, seeing crueltye is more fearefull, than all the aduentures that can be made against it.

At this time it is said, that Calanus the Philosopher burnt himselfe, when hee had liued threecore and thirtene yeeres. Whether herein he followed the custome of his Countrey, being an Indian, Or sought to prevent the griefe and incommoditie of Arrianus hath a farre different description of Cyrus Tomb.

they were no lesse plagues to mankind, than an ouer-flow of waters, drowning all the leuill, or some burning drought, whereby a great part of liuing creatures is scorched vp.

CHAP. III.

The raigne of ARIDEVS.

10

Of the question about succession to ALEXANDER.

THE death of Alexander left his Armie (as Demades the Athenian then compared it) in such case, as was that monstrous Giant Polyphemus, hauing lost his only eye. For, that which is reported in fables of that great Cyclops, might well be verified of the Macedonians: their force was intolerable, but for want of good guidance vncffectuall, and harmefull chiefly to themselves. The causes whereof (vnder the diuine ordinance) were, partly the vncertainetie of Title to succession in the Kingdome of Macedon, partly the stubborne pride of Alexander himself, who thinking none worthy to bee his Heire, did refuse to establish the right in any one, leaving euery one to his owne fortune; but especially the great ambition of his followers, who all had learned of their Master to suffer no equals; a lesson soone taught vnto spirits reflecting vpon their owne worth, when the reuerence of a greater object faileth.

It hath formerly bene shewed, That Philip (the Father of Alexander) gouerning in Macedon as Protector, assumed vnto himselfe the Kingdome, not rendering it vnto Amyntas, (the Sonne of his elder brother Perdiccas) when he grew to mans estate; but only bestowing vpon him in marriage a Daughter of his owne: by which bond, and much more by his proper strength, he assured the Crowne vnto himselfe: Amyntas neuer attempting ought against Philip; though (with price of his life) hee did against Alexander in the beginning of his raigne. Wherefore Eurydice the sole issue of his marriage, ought in reason to haue bene acknowledged Queene after Alexander; as hauing better Title thereto, than either He or Philip had, when they liued, vnlesse (peraduenture) some Law of that Nation forbade the raigne of women. But the excellent vertue of those two Princes had vtterly defaced the right of all Pretenders, not claiming from their owne bodies: and so great were their conquests, that Macedon it selfe was (in regard of them) a very small Appendix; and no way deferring to be laied in ballance against the demand of their posteritie, had they left any able to make challenge of the Royall seate.

Alexander hauing taken many wiues, had issue by none of the principall of them. Bar sine the Daughter of Artabazus a Persian had borne vnto him a yong Sonne; and Roxane the Daughter of Oxyartes (whom he had more solemnly married) was left by him great with child. But the basenesse of the Mothers, and contempt of the conquered Nations, was generally alleaged in Barre of the Plea made for them, by some that would (perhaps) haue wrought out their owne ends, vnder the name of Alexanders children.

Cleopatra

Cleopatra the sister of Alexander, widdow to the King of Epirus, and Arideus his base brother (sonne to Philip by a Concubine of no account) who had married the Ladie Eurydice before mentioned, were next in course. Of Cleopatra there was no speech, which may giue suspicion, that either Law or Custome had made that sexe vncapable of the Soueraignetie Arideus (besides his bastardie) was neither for person nor qualitie fit to rule as King; yet vpon him the election fell, but slowly, and (as happeneth often) for lack of a better: when the Counsaillers hauing ouer-labored their disagreeing wits in deuiling what was best, were content for very wearinesse to take what came next to hand.

Ptolomie (soone after King of Egypt) concurring with them who rejected all mention of the halfe-Persian broode, King Alexanders children, was of opinion, that the rule of all should be giuen to the Captaines, that going for law which by the greater part of them should be decreed: so farre was hee from acknowledging any one as true Heire to the Crowne.

This Ptolomie was called the sonne of Lagos, but reputed of Philip: who hauing vfed the company of Arsinoe Ptolomies mother, deliuered her in marriage to Lagos being great with child. Therefore, whether it were so, that he hoped well to worke his owne fortune out of those dissensions, which are incident vnto the consultations of many ambitious men, equall in place, forcing them at length to redeme their quiet with subiection to one, deferring regard by his blood, and trust for his euill carriage; or whether hee desired only to get a share to himselfe, which could not haue come to passe, had all bene giuen to one: plaine enough it is, that he thought not on preferring Arideus before himselfe; and therefore gaue such counsaile as fitted his owne and other mens purposes. Yea, this deuce of hisooke plaine in deede, though not in forme as he had propounded it: For, it was in effect all one, to haue assembled at Alexanders emptie chaire, as Ptolomie had conceived the forme of their consultations, or to set in the chaire such a King as Arideus, no wiser then the chaire it selfe. Also the controuersies arising were determined by the greater part of the Captaines; by the greater part, if not in number, yet in puissance.

But as these counterfeit shewes of dissembling aspirers, doe often take check by the plaine dealing of them, who dare to goe more directly to worke: so was it like to haue fared with Ptolomie and the rest, when Arsinus, another of the Captaines, interpreted the words of Alexander, saying, That he left his Kingdome to the worthiest, as designing Perdiccas, to whom (lying at the point of death) hee deliuered his ring. It seemed good in reason, that Alexander should bee disposer of his owne purchases; and those tokens of Alexanders purpose appeared plaine enough, so long as no man would interpose another construction: euery one being vncertaine how the secret affections of the rest might be inclined. Many therefore, either out of their loue, or because they would not be of the latest, vrged Perdiccas to take vpon him the estate Royall. He was no stranger to the Royall blood; yet his birth gaue him not such reputation, as the great fauour of his dead King, with whom hee had bene very inward, and that especially since the death of Ephesius (a powerfull Minion) into whose place he was chosen. For his owne worth hee might well be commended, as a good man of Warre, and one that had giuen much proofe of his private valour. But very furly hee was: which qualitie (joynd with good fortune) carried a shew of Majestie: being checkt with misaduenture, it was called by a true name Pride; and rewarded with death.

In the present businesse a foolish ouer-wecning did him as great harme, as it had bene great happinesse to haue succeeded Alexander. For not content to haue the acclamation of the Souldiers, approving the sentence of Arsinus, he would needs counterfeit modestie; thinking that euery one of the Princes would haue intreated him to take the waightie burden of an Empire, which would bee the lesse enuious, the more solemnity he vfed in the acceptance. It is truly said, He that fainteth himselfe a sheepe, may chance to be eaten by a Wolfe. Melager, (a man by nature en-uous, and bearing a particular hatred to Perdiccas, took advantage of his irresolute behaviour, and very bitterly inveighed against him. In conclusion, he pronounced, that whosoever was Heire to the Crowne, the Souldiers ought to be Heires to the treasure; and therefore he invited them, who were nothing slow, to share it. This disturbed all the Consultation. The Captaines were left alone, farre enough from agreeing, and not able to have brought any conclusion to good effect without consent of the Souldiers, who greedie of spoile thronged about Meleager.

§. II.

The election of ARIDÆVS, with the troubles thereabout arising;
the first division of the Empire.

DVring this vp-rote, mention was made of Arideus by some one, and entertained with good liking of many, vntill at last it grew to the voice of the Armie. Meleager hauing with drawne himselfe tumultuously from the company of the Lords, was glad of so faire an occasion to make himselfe great: therefore he produced Arideus, commended him to the Souldiers, who called him by his Fathers name Philip, and brought him into the Palace, inuelling him in Alexanders Robes, and proclaiming him King. Many of the Nobles withstood this election, but in vaine: for they could not resolve what course to follow, reiecting this. Only Python, a hot-headed man, took vpon him to proclaim the Sonne of Alexander by Roxane, according to the counsaile which Perdiccas at first had giuen, appointing Perdiccas and Leonatus his Protectors. But this child was not yet borne, which made that attempt of Python vaine. Finally, Perdiccas with fixe hundred men, and Ptolomie with the Kings Pages took vpon them to defend the place where Alexanders bodie lay: but the Armie conducted by Meleager, who carried the new King about whether he listed, easily brake in vpon them, & enforced them to accept Arideus for their Soueraigne Lord. Then by the intercession of the ancient Captaines, a reconciliation was propounded and admitted, but on neither side faithfully meant.

Leonatus, who was of the Roiall blood, a goodly Gentleman and valiant, issued out of Babylon, being followed by all the horie, which consisted (for the most part) of the Nobilitie. Perdiccas abode in the Citie (but standing vpon his guard) that he might be ready to take the opportunitie of any commotion, that should happen among the infanterie. The King (who was gouerned by Meleager) commanded or gaue leave to haue Perdiccas made away; which attempt succeeded ill, being neither secretly carried, nor committed to sure executioners. Their coming was not unexpected: and they were by Perdiccas rebuked with such grauitie, that they departed honeste than they came, being forrie of their bad enterprise. Vpon the newes of this attempt the campe was in an vp-rote, which the King seeking to pacifie, wanted authoritie, as hauing newly got the Crowne by them, and holding it by their courtisie. The matter it selfe afforded no good excuses, and his indiscretion made them worse. He said, that no harme was done, for Perdiccas was alive: but their exclamations were against the tyrannous enterprise, which hee imputed to Meleager; abandoning the surest of his friends to the rage of the multitude, who were not appeased, vntill the King by offering to resigne his estate vnto them, renewed out of their pittie that fauourable affection, which had moued them to set him vp at the first.

Perdiccas hauing now ioyned himselfe with Leonatus, kept the fields, intending to cut off all prouision of victuals from the Citie. But after sundrie Embassies passing betwene the King and the Nobles, (they requiring to haue the Authors of sedition giuen vp into their handes; the King, that Meleager might be ioyned with Leonatus and Perdiccas, as a Third ingouernment of the Armie) things were compounded according to the Kings desire. Meleager should haue done well to consider, that such men as had one day demanded his head, were not like the day following to giue him a principall place among them without any new occasion offered, had not some purpose of treacherie lurked vnder their great facilitie. Generall peace was renewed, and much loue protested where little was intended. The face of the Court was the same which it had bene in Alexanders time: but no longer now did the same heart giue it life; and windie spirits they were which moued in the arteries. False reports were giuen out by appointment of Perdiccas, tending to his owne disgrace, but in such termes as might seeme to haue proceeded from Meleager: who finding part of the drift, but not all, tooke it as an iniurie done to himselfe; and (as desirous of a true friendship) desired of Perdiccas, that such authors of discord might be punished. Perdiccas (as a lover of peace) did well approue the motion; and therefore agreed that a generall Muster should be made, at which time the disturbers of the common quiet should receiue their punishment (as was the manner for Souldiers offending) in presence of the Armie. The plot was mischieuously laid: Had Meleager giuen way to seditious rumours, he must needs haue incurred the generall hatred of all, as a fower of dissension; and thereby with publike approbation might haue bene cut off, as hauing often offended in that kinde: his Prince being too weak a Patron. Now seeking redresse of these disorders, he hastened his owne ruine, by a lesse formal, but more speedie way. This kinde of Muster was very solemne, and practised with many ceremonies, as for cleansing of the Armie. The Horse-men, the Elephants, the Macedonian foot, the Mercenaries, were each according to their qualitie set in array, a part from others, as if they had bene of sundrie sorts, met at adventure: which done, the manner was to skirmish (as by way of exercise) according to direction of their severall Captaines. But at that time the great battaile of Macedonian Pikes, which they called the Phalanx, led by Meleager, was of purpose bestowed in a ground of disadvantage; and the countenance of the horse and Elephants beginning to giue charge vpon them, was such, as discovered no jesting pastime nor good intent. Kings were alwaies wont to fight among the horse-men: of which cullome Perdiccas made great vse that day, to the vtter confusion of his enemies. For Arideus was alwaies gouerned by him; which for the present had him in possession. Two or three daies before he had sought the death of Perdiccas at the instigation of Meleager: now he rides with Perdiccas vp and downe about the foot-men, commanding them to deliuer vnto the death all such as Perdiccas required. Three hundred they were who were cast vnto the Elephants, and by them slaine, in the presence of the King, who should haue defended them, and of their affrighted companions. But these three hundred were not the men whose punishment Meleager had expected: they were such as had followed him, when he disturbed the first consultation that was held about the election of a new King, and some of them his especial friends. Hauing therefore kept himselfe quiet a while, as vnwilling to giue offence to them which had the advantage; when hee saw their proceedings tend very manifestly to his destruction, he fled away into a Temple, which he found no Sanctuary: for thither they sent and slew him.

The Armie being thus corrected was led into the Citie, where a new Councell of the Princes was held, who finding what manner of man their King was, diuided all the Provinces of the Empire among themselves; leauing to Arideus the office of a Visitor, and yet making Perdiccas his Protector, and Commander of the forces remaining with him. Then were the funerals of Alexander thought vpon; whose bodie hauing bene seuen daies neglected, was opened, and embalmed by the Egyptians: no signe of poison appearing, how great fouler the suspicion might be. The charge of his buriall was committed to Arideus: one of the Captaines, who was two yeeres preparing of great and costly shew, making a stately Chariot in which the corps was laid; many coarces of his friends being laied in the ground, before before that of Alexander was beltowed in Alexandria, a Citie of his owne building in Egypt.

§. III.

The beginning of the Lamian Warre.

WHilest these things were in doing, or presently after, Antipater and Craterus, two principall Noble men, and inferiour to none of Alexanders followers; if not greater than any of the rest, were builed in Greece 10 with a Warre, which the Athenians more brauely than wisely had begunne in Alexanders life, but now did prosecute more boldly than before, vpon the courage which they had taken by his death. Alexander, not long before he died, had commanded that all the banished Greekes (few excepted) should be restored vnto their former places. Hee knew the factious qualitie of the Grecian Estates, and therefore thought so to provide, that in euery Citie hee would haue a sure partie. But it fell out otherwise: For hee lost the hearts of many more than hee wanne by this proud iunjunction. His pleasure indeede was fulfilled; yet not without great murmuring of the whole Nation, as being against all order of Law, and a beginning of open tyrannie. The Athenians greatly decayed in citie, but retaining more, than was needfull, of their ancient spirits, forbade the execution of this decree in their Dominions; so did also the Ætolians, who were valiant men, and inhabited a Region well fortified by nature: yet neither of them tooke Armes, but seemed to beare themselves, as men that had done no more then they might well iustifie by reason: neuertheless to prevent the worst, the Athenians gaue secret instructions to Leosthenes a Captaine of theirs, willing him to leaue an Armie, but in his owne name, and to keepe it in a readinesse for their vse. This was no hard thing for Leosthenes to doe: great numbers of Grecke Souldiers being lately returned from the Asian Warre in poore estate, as defrauded of their pay by the Captaines. Of these he had gathered vp eight thousand, when the certaine newes were brought of Alexanders 30 death: at which time the Citie of Athens declared it selfe, and more honorably than wisely, proclaimed open Warre against the Macedonians, for the libertie of Greece. Here vpon Leosthenes drew in the Ætolians, and some other Estates, gaue battaile to the Boeotians, who sided with Antipater, and ouerthrew them; growing so fast in reputation, and so strong in Adherents; That Antipater (arming in all haste, yet suspecting his owne strength) was faine to send into Asia to Craterus for succour.

Nothing is more vaine than the feares and hopes of men, shunning or pursuing their destinies a farre off, which deceiue all mortall wisdom, even when they seeme neere at hand. One moneth was scarcely past, since nothing so heavily burthened the thoughts of Antipater as the returne of Craterus into Macedon; which hee then feared as death, but now desired as the most likely assurance of his life. Craterus, whom Alexander held as of all men the most assured vnto him, was sent into Macedon to conueigh home the old Souldiers (that was the pretence) and to succed Antipater in the gouernement of Macedon and Greece. The suspitions were strong that he had a priue charge to put Antipater to death: neither did that which was commonly published found much better; which was, That Antipater should be sent vnto the King, as Captaine of the yong Souldiers, newly to be leauied in Europe. For Alexander was much incensed against him by his Mother Olympias; and would sometimes giue out speeches testifying his owne iousellie and hatred of him; but yet hee stroue to smother it, which in a cruell Prince becometh little good. Few of Alexanders Lieutenants had escaped with life: most of them indeede were meane persons in regard of those who followed him in his Indian expedition, and were therefore (perhaps) removed to make place for their betters. But if the Kings rigour gour was such, as could finde rebellious purposes (for so hee interpreted euen lewd gouernement) in base persons; little might Antipater hope for, who hauing sitten Piercy ten yeeres in the strongest part of the Empire, was called away to the presence of so fell a Master, and the enuie of a Court, wherein they had bene his inferiours, which would now repine to see him their equall. Therefore whether his feare drew him to preuention, working first the Kings death by poison, giuen by his Son Isolau, Alexanders cup-bearer; or whether it brake not forth vntill opportunitie had changed it into the passion of reuenge, which was cruelly performed by his Sonne Cassander: great cause of much feare hee had, which I note in this place, as the ground 10 of effects to be produced in very few yeeres.

At the present Craterus was sent for, and all the Captaines of companies lying neere, solicited to make haste. Not without cause. For in Macedon there could not at that time be raised more than thirteene thousand foot, and fixe hundred horse; which Muster was of raw Souldiers, all the force of the Countrie being emptied into Asia. The Thessalians indeede who had long stood firme for Philip and Alexander, who also were the best horse-men of Greece, furnished him with very braue troupes, that might haue done great seruice, had their faith held out, which they changed for the libertie of Greece. With these forces did Antipater in Thessalie trie the fortune of a battaile with Leosthenes; rather (as may seeme) fearing the increase 20 of his enemies power and rebellion of the Greekes, (were they not checked at the first) than presuming on his owne strength. For Leosthenes had of Athenians, Ætolians, and Mercenaries, two & twentie thousand foot, besides the assistance of many petty Signories, and of some Illyrians, and Thracians: of horse hee brought into the field about two thousand and five hundred; but ouer-strong hee was that way also, when once the Thessalians had revolted vnto him. So Antipater lost the day: and his losse was such, that hee neither was able to keepe the field, nor to make a safe retraite into his owne Countrie: therefore hee fled into the Towne of Lamis, which was well fortified, and well provided of all things necessarie to beare out a siege. Thither did Leosthenes follow him, present him battaile againe, and vpon the refusall close vp the 30 Towne with earth-works, and a wall. There will wee leaue him for a while, travelling in the last honourable enterprife that euer was vnder taken by that great Citie of Athens.

§. IIII.

How PERDICCAS employed his Armie.

KING Arideus liuing vnder the rule of Perdiccas, when all the Princes were gone each to his owne Prouince, kept a naked Court: all his greatnesse consisting in a bare citie, supported by the strength of his 40 Protector, who cared not for him other wise than to make vse of him. Perdiccas had no Prouince of his owne peculiar, neither was he like to be welcome to any whom he should visit in his Gouernement. A stronger Armie then any of the rest hee had, which he might easily hope in that vnsettled condition of things to make better worth to him, than many Prouinces could haue been. The better to accomplish his desires, hee closely sought the marriage of Cleopatra, the sister of Alexander; yet about the same time hee either married Nicea the Daughter of Antipater, or made such loue to her as blinded their eyes, who did not somewhat narrowly search into his doings.

50 Ariarathes the Cappadocian, the second of that name, and tenth King of that Countrie, had continued faithfull to the Persian Empire as long as it stood: following the example of his forefathers, euen from Pharnaces the first that reigned in Cappadocia, who married Atossa sister to the great Cyrus. Some of his Ancesters had (indeede) bene oppressed by the Persians: but what Fortune took from them at one time, Vertue restored at another, and their faithfull Princes had much increased all. But now in the fatal Period of so great an Empire, with much wisdom, and (Darius being slain) with sufficient honour, he might have acknowledged the Macedonian in the Perfians toome. This hee did not; neither did Alexander call him to account, being occupied with greater cares. But Perdiccas, who had no greater business, wherein to entertaine his Armie, found it expedient both for the honour of the Empire, to take in that in-land Kingdome, surrounded with Prouinces of the Macedonian conquest, and for his owne particular to haue one opportune place of sure retreat, vnder the gouernement of a stedfast friend. Therefore he entred Capadocia, fought with Ariarathes, who drew into the field thirtie thousand foot, and fiftene thousand horse (a strong Army, had it not encountered a stronger, and better trained) wanne the victorie, and thereby the whole Kingdome. But with much crueltie did he vse the victorie: for hauing taken Ariarathes prisoner with many others, hee crucified him, and as many of his Kindred as he could light vpon: and so deliuered that Prouince to Eumenes, whom of all men liuing he trusted most.

Another part of his forces he had committed to Pythion; rather as to the most honourable of such as remained about him, than as to the most assured. Pythion was to subdue the Greekes, rebelling in the high Countries of Asia. About twenty thousand foot, and three thousand horse they were, (all old Souldiers) who planted in Colonies by Alexander, to bridle the barbarous Nations, were soone wearie of their 20 vnpleasant habitations, and the rude people, among whom they liued: and therefore tooke aduantage of the present troubles to seeke vnto themselves a better fortune. Against these Pythion went, more desirous to make them his owne, than to destroy them: which intent of his Perdiccas discouraging, did both giue him in charge to put all those Rebels to the sword, giuing the spoiles of them to his Souldiers, and further enioyned it vnto Pythions Captains (his own creatures) that they should see this command executed. These directions for vse of the victorie might haue procured needlesse; so vncertaine was the victorie it selfe. A Capitaine of the Rebels commanding ouer three thousand, corrupted by Pythion, did in the heat of the fight (which was very doubtfull) retire without needlesse to a Hill not farre off. This dis- 30 maied the rest, and gaue the day to Pythion: who being farre enough from Perdiccas, offered composition to the vanquished, granting vnto them their liues and libertie, vnder condition of laying down their armes; and hereupon he gaue them his faith. Being master of these companies, he might well haue a good opinion of his owne power: all power being then valued by strength in followers, when as none could vaunt himselfe as free Lord of any Territorie. He had thirteene thousand foot, and eight thousand eight hundred horse, besides these new Companions, whom needlesse feare without great losse had caused to leaue the field: but in true estimation all the greatnesse wherof Pythion might thinke himselfe assured, was (and soone appeared to be) inherent in Perdiccas. For by his command were ten thousand foot, 40 and eight thousand horse, of those which followed Pythion, leauied; the Rulers of the Prouinces carefully obeying the letters of Perdiccas, by which they were enioyned to giue assistance to that business: and by vertue of the precept giuen vnto them by Perdiccas, did the Macedonians cut in pieces all those poore men who had yielded themselves; leauing Pythion as naked as he came forth to returne vnto his great Maister.

Now was Perdiccas mightie above the mightie, and had faire leisure to pursue his hopes of marriage with Cleopatra, and thereby to make himselfe Lord of all; but this must be secretly carried for feare of opposition. How it succeeded will appeare, when the Lamian warre taketh ending.

The proesse of the Lamian warre.

Elefth Antipater hardly besieged, wanting meanes to free himself without succours from his friends in Asia. Those helps not appearing so soone as he expected, he came to parle with Leofthenes, & would haue yielded vnto any termes of reason, wherewith men possessed with hope of victorie, do seldome limit their desires. Leofthenes willed him without further circumstance to submit himselfe to discretion. This was too much for him, that had once commanded ouer them, who now required of him such a dishonourable composition. Wherefore knowing that the extremities, from which as yet he was far enough, could bring no worse with it, Antipater prepared for the defence; and the other for winning the Towne, which felt great want of victuals.

In this lingering warre, the Atolians (whether wearie of sitting still at a siege, or hauing business which they pretended at home) took their leaue, & returned into their owne Countrey. Their departure left the trenches so thinly manned, that Antipater found means to fall out vpon his enemies to their great losse: for many were slain, and Leofthenes himselfe among them, ere he could be repulsed into the Towne. Yet hereby the Macedonians were nothing relieved, their victuals wasted, and they were not strong enough to deale with the Greekes in open fight. Craterus was long in coming, Lysimachus who was neere at hand in Thrace, had work too much of his own, leading no more than 4000. foote, and 2000. horse, against Senthes the Thracian King, who brought into the field about four times that number; and though Lysimachus, not without losse, had gotten one victorie, yet the enimie abounding in multitude, felt not the blow so much as might abate his courage. Therefore Leonatus was earnestly sollicit for Antipaters friends, ere he could be repulsed into the Towne. He had the gouernement of Phrygia the lesse, and was able to raise an Army of more than 20000. foote, and 2500. horse, whether leauied out of his Prouince, or appointed vnto him out of the maine Armie, it is vncertaine. Certaine it is, that he was more willing to take in hand the iourney into Greece, than Antipater was to haue him come.

For Cleopatra had written vnto him, desiring his presence at Pella, the chiefe Citie of Macedon, and very kindly offering her selfe to be his wife; which letters he kept not so close as had bene requisite, and therefore brought himselfe into great suspicion, that soone ended with his life. Antiphilus, chosen Generall by the Athenians in place of Leofthenes, hearing of his approach, forsooke the siege of Lamia, and took the ready way to these great Conquerors of Asia, with purpose to giue them an euill welcome home, before Antipater and they should ioyne in one. He had (notwithstanding the departure of the Atolians) the aduantage of Leonatus in horse, by the ods of 2000. Thessalians; in other things he was equall to him in cause he thought himselfe Superior, in the fortune of that day he proued so: for he won a great victorie (chiefly by vertue of the Thessalians) which appeared the greater by the end of Leonatus himselfe; who fighting valiantly, was driuen into a marshie piece of ground, where hee found his death, which desperately he had sought among the Indians, but it waited for him at home, not far fro the place of his natiuitie. He was the first of Alexanders Captaines which died in battaile, but al, or most of the rest, shal follow him the same way. After this day, the Athenians did neuer any thing futable to their ancient glory.

The vanquished Macedonians were too weake to renew the fight, & too proud to flee. They betooke themselves to high grounds, vntil for seruice on horse back, and so abode in sight of the enimie that day: the day following Antipater with his men came into their camp, and tooke the charge of all. The Athenians perceiving their strength to be at the greatest, and fearing lest that of the enimie should increase, did earnestly seeke to determine the matter quickly by another battaile. But still Antipater kept himselfe on ground of aduantage: which gaue more than reasonable confidence to the Greekes, many of whom departed to their homes, accounting the enimie to be vanquished. This rechelesse (incorrigible in an Armie of voluntaries) was very inexcusable; seeing that the victories by Land were much detacted by losses at Sea, where the Athenians labouring to haue made themselves once againe Masters, were put to the work.

But now the fatal captiuitie of Greeke came on, of which she neuer could bee deliuered vnto this day. Craterus with a strong Armie hauing made great marches from Cilicia, passed ouer into Europe, and comming into Thessalie, ioyned himselfe with Antipater. The forces of Lamachus, Antipater, and Craterus, being ioyned in one, contained fortie thousand mightily armed, three thousand light-armed men, and five thousand horse; of which numbers the Greekes wanted a thousand and five hundred in horse, in foot eightene thousand. Carefully therefore did Antiphilus labour to auoid the necessity of a battaile, vntill such time as the Townes confederate, should returne vnto the campe those bands which had straggled from it. But those companies were so slow in comming, and Antipater so vrgent vpon the Greekes, that compelled they were to put the matter in hazard without further attendance. Like enough it is, that with a little more helpe they had carried away the victorie: for the Thessalians had the vpper hand, and held it, vntill such time as they perceiued their battailes (ouer-laid with multitude) retire vnto the higher grounds, which caused them also to fall back. So the Macedonians became Lords of the field, hauing little else to boast of, considering that with the losse of a hundred and thirtie men, they had purchased only the death of some five hundred enemies. Yet herof was great vse made. For the Greekes, as not subiect vnto the full command of one General, and being euerie one desirous to prelerue his owne estate, and Citie; concluded to make a treatie of peace with Antipater; who being a subtille artificer, & well vnderstanding their apptell to diuision, refused to harken to any generall composition, but willed euery Citie to deale apart for it self. The intent of this deuiſe was so apparent, that it was reiected; the Greekes choosing rather to abide the comming of their Assitants, whose vnreasonable carelesnes betraied the cause. Antipater and Craterus besieging & winning some townes in Thessalie, which the army of the Confederates wanted meanes & courage to relieue, wearied that Nation from attending any longer vpon other mens vnlikely hopes, with their owne assured and present calamity.

§. VII.

Of the peace granted to Athens by ANTIPATER. OF DEMOSTHENES his death.

THe Thessalians falling off, all the rest soone followed severally, and sued for peace; the gentle conditions giuen to the most forward, inuiting such as were slack. Only the Athenians and Etolians held out. Little fauour could they hope for, hauing bene Authors of this tumult; and their feare was not great; the state of the warre being farre from them. But the celeritie of Antipater confounded all their imaginations; who sate still at Athens, deuiſing vpon courses of prosecuting the Warre to come, which came to their dores, before their consultation could finde issue. He was ready to enter vpon their Frontiers; they had no abilitie to resist, and were as heartlesse as friendlesse. All that remained was to send Embassadors, desiring peace vpon some good termes: necessity enforcing them to haue accepted even the very worst. Phocion, with Demades the Orator, and Xenocrates the Philosopher, were chiefe of this Embassage; Phocion as the most Honorable; Demades as a strong Perswader; (both of them well respected by Antipater) and Xenocrates, as one admired for wisdom, grauitie of manners, and vertue; but all these ornaments consisting in speculation, and therefore of lesse regard, when their admiration was to cost much in reall effects.

Antipater calling to minde the pride of Leofthenes, required of the Athenians, that they should wholly submit themselves to his pleasure; which being (perforce) granted, he commanded them to defray the charges of the warre past, to pay a fine, and entertaine a Garrison. Further, he abrogated the popular estate, committing the the gouernement of the Citie to those of most wealth, depriving of the right of suffrage all such as wanted a conuenient proportion of riches.

About nine thousand they were, all men of good substance, to whom the administration of the Common-wealth was giuen; a number great enough to retaine the name and forme of a Democratie. But the rascal multitude of beggerly persons, accustomed to get their liuings out of the common troubles, being now debarr'd from bearing offices and giuing their voices, cried out, that this was a meere Oligarchie; the violent vsurpation of a few inroaching vpon the publike right. These turbulent fellows (of whom King Philip had bene wont to say, That warre to them was peace, and peace warre) Antipater planted in Thrace, and gaue them lands to manure, leauing as few of them as he could to molest the quiet of Athens.

To the same end (yet withall for satisfying his owne suspitions and hatred) hee caused Demosthenes and Hyperides famous Orators, with some others to bee slaine. Had the death of these two, especially of Demosthenes, bene forborne, the rest of his proceedings in this action might well haue passed for very milde: whereas now all such, as either are delighted with the Orations of Demosthenes, or haue surrendered their iudgements to Authors iustly admiring him, as the most eloquent of all that euer did speake and write, condemne him vterly, calling him a bloudy tyrant. Such grace and reputation doe the learned arts finde in all ciuill Nations, that the euill done to a man, famous in one of them, is able to blemish any action, how good soeuer otherwise it be, or honourably carried.

Demosthenes had taken Sanctuary in the Temple of Neptune, in the Isle of Calauria; there did Archias (sent with Souldiers by Antipater for the purpose) finde him, and gently perswade him to leaue the place, but not so preuailling, hee threatened violence. Then Demosthenes, entreating a little respite as it had bene to write somewhat, secretly took poison, which he had kept for such a necessity, and so died; rather choosing to doe the last execution vpon himselfe, than to fall into the hands of such as hated him. Only this act of his (commendable, perhaps, in a Heathen man) argued some valour in him; who was otherwise too much a coward in battaile, how soeuer valiant in perswading to enterprises; wherein the way to very honourable ends was to be made through passages exceeding dangerous. Hee loued monie well, and had great summes giuen him by the Persians, to encourage him, in finding worke for the Macedonians at home. Neither did hee (in me thinks) in taking from the Persians which loued not his Countrey, great reward, for speaking such things as tended to his Countreys good; which hee did not cease to procure, when the Persians were no longer able to giue him recompence. Such as in tender contemplation of his death can indure no honourable, though true, mention of Antipater, may (if they can) beleue Lucian, who tells vs, That it was Antipaters purpose to haue done him great honour. Sure it is, that hee was a stedfast enimie to the Macedonians; therefore discretion required that he should be cut off.

The matters of Athens being thus ordered, the chiefe command was left in the hands of Phocion, a vertuous man, and louer of his Countrey, yet applying himselfe to the necessity of the times; by which commendations he had both at other times done the Citie much good, and now procured this peace, which (though grievous to free-men, yet fauourable to the vanquished) hee endeouored carefully to prelerue.

How CRATERUS and ANTIPATER were drawne from their Ætolian Warres into Asia. The grounds of the first civil Warre betweene the Macedonian Lords.

SO Antipater with Craterus returned into Macedonia, where they strengthened their friendship with a new alliance; Craterus taking Phila, the Daughter of Antipater, to Wife. Shortly after they went against the Ætolians, whose pouertie was not so easily danted, as the luxurious wealth of the more powerfull State of Athenes had bene. Their Countrie was rough and mountainous, hauing many places of great fastnes, into which they conueied such of their goods as they most esteemed, and of their people, as were least fit for warre: with the rest they fortified the strongest of their Cities, and so abode the coming of the Macedonians, whom they manfully resisted. With great obstinacie did the Macedonians contend against the difficulties of the places, which the Ætolians made good as long as their victuals held out. But when Craterus had shut vp all passages, and viterly debarred them of reliefe; then were they put to a miserable choice; either to descend from their strong holds, and fight vpon equall ground, with vnequall numbers; or endure the miseries of hunger and cold, against which they could make no long resistance; or to yeild themselves to the Macedonians: who incensed by the losse of many good Souldiers, were not like to leaue so stubborn enemies in places, which might giue confidence to rebellion. In cases of extremitie, much finenesse of wit apprehending all circumstances of danger commonly doth more hurt, than a blunt consideration of that only, which at the present is in hand. These Ætolians did not as yet want meat; but their enemies daily molested them: wherefore as yett they thought vpon nothing but fighting. Fortune was gracious to their courage. For such newes came out of Asia into the Macedonian campe, as made Antipater and Craterus thinke euery houre a moneth, till they had rid their hands of these Ætolians, giuing them whatsoever conditions they would aske: yett with purpose to call them to seuer account; yea, to roote them out of Greece by death, or by captiuitie, when once they should haue settled the affaires of Asia; as they hoped and desired. But of mens purposes God is the disposer: in whose high Counsell it was ordained, that this poore Nation should continue a troublesome barre to the proceedings of Macedon and Greece, and (when time had ripened the next Monarchie) an open gate to let the Roman Conquerors into those and other Prouinces. Likewise concerning the matters of Asia, the reformation intended by Antipater and Craterus, was so farre from taking effect, that it serued merely as an introduction to all the ciuill warres ensuing.

The grounds of the Asiaticque expedition, which did set the world in an vp-rore, were these: Antipater and Craterus were of Alexanders Captaines the mightiest in reputation: The one, in regard of his ancient precedencie, and the present rule which he bare in the parts of Europe. The other, as of all men the best beloved, and most respected, both of Alexander and of the whole Armie. Next vnto these had Perdiccas bene; whom the aduantage of his presence at the Kings death did make equall, or superiour, to either of these, if not to both together. The first intents of Perdiccas were, to haue comforted with these two, and to haue bene with them a third partner in the gouernment of all; to which purpose hee entertained the discourse of marriage with one of Antipaters Daughters. But seeing in short space the strength of that gale of winde which bore him vp, he began to take wing and soare quite another way. Arideus was a very simple man, yett serued wel enough to weare the title of that Maistie, whereof Perdiccas being Administrator, and hoping to become proprietarie, the practice was more seuer than had been in the daies of Alexander.

ander: the desire to seeme terrible, being very familiar with weake Princes, and their ambitious Officers, who know no other meanes of preferring themselves from contempt, and of giuing such a fierie lustre to their actions, as my darrell the eyes of the beholders. How cruelly the poore Greekes in the higher Asia were all put to the sword; and how tyrannously the King and Princes of Cappadocia were crucified, hath alreadie bene shewd. The Pisians were the next who felt the wrath of these counterfait Alexanders. One Citie of theirs was vterly razed; the children sold for slaues, and all the rest massacred. The Isaurians by this example growne desperate, when after two or three daies triall they found themselves vnable to continue the defence, lockt themselves into their houses, and set the Towne on fire, into the flame whereof the yong-men did throw themselves, after that they had a while repelled the Macedonians from the wals.

These exploits being performed, the Armie had no other worke than to sift the ashes of the burnt Citie for gold and siluer; but Perdiccas had businesse of greater importance troubling his braines. Nothing was more contrarie to his ends, than to sit still without imploiment: letting his Souldiers grow idle about him, whilst others grew great, and tooke deeper roote in their seuerall Prouinces. Hee purposed therefore to transport his forces into Europe, vnder pretence of bringing the King into Macedonia, the seate of his Ancestors, and head of the Empire. The Kings preference would make the offices of his Vice-royes (during the time) actually void; Antipater with Craterus being once in case of priuate men, and onely Perdiccas holding authoritie, the match with Cleopatra might easily bee made. So should greatness meete with a good title; and what more could be wished? Some impediment the power of Ptolomie might giue, who held Egypt well fortified with men, but much better with loue of the people; yett if the businesse prospered in Macedonia, like enough it was that either Ptolomie would follow of himselfe, or bee driuen to come to reason. Antigonous likewise then gouerning in Phrygia, a busie-headed man, and ill affected to the side, was to bee looked into, and made away, for feare of further trouble. So thought Perdiccas, and was deceived in so thinking. Antigonous was as good a man of warre, of as deepe a judgement, as high a spirit, and as great vnder taking, as any of Alexanders Captaines. His imploiments had bene lesse than some of theirs, which made him also the lesse respected. But his thoughts were as proud as theirs: for, he valued himselfe by his owne worth, not by the opinions of other men; with carefull attention had hee watched Perdiccas, and founded the depth of his purposes, which it was now high time to discouer. For Perdiccas hauing with a jealous eye pried into the demeanour of Antigonous, and finding him no way fit for his turne, caused him to be charged with such accusations, as might suffice to take away his life, especially by a Iudge that fought his death. This deuice Antigonous would not seeme to perceiue, but prepared himselfe in shew to make answere, in deede, to make escape, which easily he did, putting himselfe and his sonne Demetrius aboard of some Armenian Gallies, that carried him to Antipater, laden with such tidings, as finished the Ætolian warre before mentioned.

As the coming of Antigonous made Craterus and Antipater manifestly perceiue their owne danger: so his flight gaue Perdiccas to vnderstand that his intentions were laid open, and must now be justified by the sword. Therefore hee prepared as fast as he could, not only for defence, but (as hauing on his side the Kings name) to meet with them at home; who were nothing slack in providing to encounter him. Ptolomie being aduertised of these proceedings, and considering how neerely they concerned him, sided with Antipater. To his gouernment of Egypt hee had annexed the Dominion of Cyrene, not without consent of the chiefe Citizens; and now in the midst of these garboiles he celebrated the funeral of Alexander with great solemnitie, purchasing thereby to himselfe much good will and many partakers, notwithstanding the terrible report of the Kings Armie comming against him.

§. VIII.

§. VIII.

PERDICCAS his voyage into Egypt, and his death.

PERDICCAS, vncertaine which way to bend his maine power, at length resolved to set vpon Ptolomie; leaving Eumenes to keepe to his vie, against Craterus and Antipater, the parts of Asia bordering vpon Europe.

It may seeme strange, that hee did not rather make head against thole who were out of Greece with a great number, and of more able men 10 than Ptolomie could bring. Perhaps he thought to make a quick end with Ptolomie, or beleeued that Craterus would not be readie for him soone enough. Sure it is that he rooke a bad course, and made it worse with ill handling.

Ptolomie by his sweet behauiour allured many to his partie, without helpe of any bad arts. Perdiccas contrariwise was full of insolencie, which neuer faileth to be rewarded with hatred; that is truly defined. An affection founded vpon opinion of an vnjust contempt. The whole storie of his proceedings in Egypt is not worth relating: for he did nothing of importance; but (as a wilfull man) tired his followers, and wasted them in hard enterprises without successe. His most forceable attempt was vpon a little Towne, called the Camels Wall: thither he marched by 20 night, with more halte then good speed; for Ptolomie preuenting him, did put himselfe into the place, where behauing himselfe not only as a good Commander, but as a stout Souldier, hee gaue the foile to Perdiccas, causing him to retire with losse; after a vehement, but vaine, assault continued one whole day. The night following, Perdiccas made another iourne, (which was his last) and came to the diuisions of Nilus, ouer against Memphis. There with much difficultie hee beganne to passe ouer his Armie into an Iland, where he meant to incampe. The current was strong, the water deepe, and hardly foordable. Wherefore he placed his Elephants about the passage, to breake the violence of the streame, and his horse-men beneath it; to take vp such as were carried away by swiftnesse of water. A great part of his Armie being arriued on the further banke, the channell beganne to waxe deepe; so that whereas the former companies had waded vp to the chinne, they who should have followed could finde no footing. Whether this came by rising of the water, or flitting away of the ground; (the earth being broken with the feete of so many Men, Horse, and Elephants) no remedie there was, but such as had passed must repasse againe, as well as they might: for they were too weak for the enemy, and could not be relieved by their fellows. With great confusion therefore they committed themselves to the Riuier, wherein about two thousand of them perished, a thousand were deuoured by Crocodiles; a miserable spectacle euen to such as were out of danger; such as were strong and could swimme, recovered the Campe; many were 40 carried downe the streame, and driuen to the contrarie banke, whereby they fell into the hands of their enemies.

This misfortune exasperated the Souldiers against their Generall, giuing libertie to their tongues, which long time had concealed the cull thoughts of their hearts. While they were thus murmuring, newes came from Ptolomy, which did set them in an vp-rore. Ptolomie had not only shewed much compassion on those who fell into his hands aliue, but performed all rights of funerall to the dead carcases, which the Riuier had cast vpon his side; and finally, sent their bones and ashes to be interred by their Kinsmen or Friends. This did not onely moue the common Souldier, but made the Captaines fall to mutinie, thinking it vnreasonable to make warre vpon so 50 vertuous and honorable a person, to fulfill the pleasure of a Lordly ambitious man, vsing them like slaues. The sedition growing strong wanted only a head, which it quickly found. Pythion was there, who inwardly hated Perdiccas, for the disgrace which hee had suffered by his procurement, after the victorie vpon the rebellious

Greekes.

Greekes. Pythion had liued in honourable place about Alexander; he was in the diuision of the Prouinces made Gouvernour of Media; hee had followed Perdiccas, and being in all things (the Protectorship excepted) equall to him, had neuertheless beene scornefully vsed by him, which now he requited. Drawing together a hundred of the Captaines, & a good part of the horse, which consisted of the Gentrie, (the footmen having declared themselves before) he entred the Tent of Perdiccas, where without further circumstance they all ranne vpon him, and slew him. Such end had the proud mis-governing authoritie of Perdiccas. Hee might haue liued as great as any, could he haue suffered any as great as himselfe; yea, peradventure 10 master of all, had he not bene too masterly ouer those which were already his.

The next day Ptolomie came into the campe, where he was joyfully received; he excused himselfe of things past, as not hauing bene Author, or giuen cause of the Warre, and was easily beleeued: the fauour of the Armie being such toward him, that needs they would haue made him Protector in the roome of Perdiccas. But this hee refused. It was an office fit for one, that would seeke to increase his greatness with his trouble. Ptolomie was well enough already; wherefore, for his owne quiet he forbore to accept it, and for their well-deferring of him hee procured that honourable charge to Pythion, and to Arideus the Captaine, who hauing had some companies of Souldiers, to furnish with their attendance the solemnities of Alexander's 20 Funerals, did with them adhere to him against Perdiccas.

In the middelt of these businesse came newes of two great victories obtained by Eumenes; which newes, had they arriued two or three daies sooner, had bene entertained with joyfull acclamations; and would haue giuen such reputation to Perdiccas, as had caused both his private maligners to continue his open flatterers, and his open enemies to haue accepted any tolerable composition. But these good tidings comming in ill time, when death had stopped the eares which would haue giuen them wel-come, found bad acceptance, as shall be shewed hereafter.

Victories of EUMENES in the lower Asia.

Efore wee proceede in the relation of things, happening about the person of the King, it is meete that wee speake of those businesse in the lower Asia, which were handled by Eumenes with notable dexterity, whilest Perdiccas was occupied in the Egyptian warres. Alcetas, the brother of Perdiccas, and Neoptolemus, had receiued command from Perdiccas to be assistant to Eumenes, and to follow his directions. But Alcetas made flat answere, That he would not; alleging the backwardnesse of his men to 40 beare armes against so great a person as Antipater, and a man so much honoured as Craterus, Neoptolemus was content to make faire shew, but inwardly hee repined at the Precedencie giuen to Eumenes, as thinking himselfe the better man. Eumenes discouering, through the counterfaieted looks of Neoptolemus, the mischief lurking in his heart, wisely dissembled with him, in hope to winne him by gentle behauiour, and sweet language, that commonly are lost, when bestowed vpon arrogant creatures. Yet the better to fortifie himselfe, that hee might stand vpon his owne strength, he raised out of the Countreies vnder his iurisdiction, about fixe thousand horse, giuing many priuiledges to such as were seruiceable, & training them well vp. Not without great neede. For when vpon aduertisement of the great preparations 50 made by Craterus and Antipater (who had newly passed the Hellepont) for the inuasion of his Prouinces, hee willed Neoptolemus to come to him with all his power, Neoptolemus did (indeed) aduance, but in hostile manner, though vnprovoked, presented him battaile. Neoptolemus had secretly couenanted with Antipater to lay open the way for him to the conquest of Asia, which now intending to performe, he was shamefully disappointed. For though his foot-men, being all Macedonians, had much the better, and prevailed farre vpon Eumenes his battailes; yet were his horse driuen out of the field, and himselfe compelled, with a few of them, to runne away, leauing naked the backs of his Macedonian foot-men, to bee charged by Eumenes, who forced them in such wise, that calling downe their Pikes, they cried for mercie, and gladly tooke their oath to doe him faithfull seruice. Antipater and Craterus endeouored with many goodly promises to draw Eumenes into their societie, who contrariwise offered himselfe, as a meane of reconciliation, betwene Perdiccas and Craterus, whom he dearly loued; professing withall his hatred to Antipater, and constant faith to the cause which he had vnderaken to maintaine.

Whilest these negotiations were on foot, Neoptolemus came with his broken crue to Antipater, and his Associates, vilifying Eumenes; and calling him a Scribe (at which foolish railing they laughed) but extolling the vertue of Craterus (as well hee might) with high commendations; assuring them, that if Craterus did but once appeare, or that his voice were but heard by any Macedonian in Eumenes his Campe, the victorie was wonne, for they would all forth-with requit vnto him. Earnestly therefore he desired them to giue him aide against Eumenes, and especially requested that Craterus might haue the leading of the Armie to be sent. Their owne affections did easily lead them to condescend to his motion; and good hope there was, that the reputation of Craterus might preuaile as much, as the force which hee drew along. For hee had in the middle of Alexanders venities, when others (imitating their King) betooke themselves to the Persian fashions of garments and customes, retained the ancient Macedonian forme of behaviour, and apparel; whereby hee became verie gracious with the common Souldiers, who beheld these new tricks of Asia, with discontented eyes, as reprochfull and derogatorie to the manners of their native countrie. So Antipater tooke the way toward Cilicia, to hold Perdiccas at bay, and to ioyne with Ptolomie. Craterus vied great celeritie, to haue taken Eumenes reuelling (as he hoped) according to the common fashion of Captaines after a great victory. But hee had a watie and well aduised enemy to encounter, who kept good espiall vpon him, and with much wisdom fore-saw all that was to bee feared, and the meanes of preuention, which his courage did not faile to execute.

Eumenes was not ignorant, that Craterus was able to defeat him without battaile, yea without stroke; him therefore he feared more than the Armie following him: (yet the Armie following him was such, as much exceeded his owne in foot-men, but was inferiour in horse-men) and thought it more vncasie to keepe the Macedonians from reuolting to him, than from knowing him. Hereupon hee tooke in hand a strange piece of worke, which desperation of all courses else taught him, and wise managing, prosperously accomplished. He gaue out reports, that Neoptolemus was returned with such companie as hee could gather together, and had gotten Pigres (a Captaine of no great estimation, who lay not farre off) to ioyne with him. Having animated his men against Neoptolemus, whom hee knew to be despised and hated among them, (as hauing been vanquished by some of them, & forsaken others in plaine field, whilst they valiantly fought in his quarrell) hee tooke great care to keepe them from receiuing any intelligence of the enemies matters. Peremptorily he commanded, that no Messenger nor Trumpeter should be admitted; and not herewith satisfied, he placed against Craterus no one Macedonian, nor any other that much would haue regarded him had he been knowne: but Thracians, Cappadocians, and Persians, vnder the leading of such, as thought more highly of none, than of Perdiccas and himselfe. To these also hee gaue in charge, that without speaking or hearkening to any word, they should runne vpon the enemy, and giue him no leisure to say or doe any thing, but fight. The directions which hee gaue to others, hee did not faile to execute in his owne person; but placing himself in the right wing of his battaile, opposite to Neoptolemus, who (as hee vnderstood) conducted the left wing on the contrarie side, he held the Macedonians arranged in good order, and readie to charge charge the enemy as soon as the distance would giue leaue. A rising piece of ground lay betwene them, which hauing ascended, the Armies discouered each other: but that of Eumenes euery way prepared for the fight, the other wearied with long iournies, which ouer-hastily they had made, seeking the deceitfull issue of fruitles hopes. Then was it high time for Craterus (hauing failed in surprising them as enemies) to discouer himselfe to his old friends and fellow-souldiers, of whom hee could see none. Phoenix a Tenidion, and Artabazus a Persian, had the leading of that side, who mindfull of their instructions, beganne to giue vpon him, with such countenance as told him his errour; which to redeme, hee bade his men fight and winne the day, and take the spoile to themselves. But the Beare whose skinn hee fels is not yet caught. The ground whereon the battaile was fought gaue most aduantage to the horse, who encountered very roughly on all parts: especially about Eumenes and Neoptolemus, who as soone as they had discouered one another, could not containe themselves, but with great rage met bodie to bodie, and letting loose their bridles, grappled so violently together, that their horses ran from vnder them, leauing both of them tumbling on the ground. Neoptolemus rose first vp, but Eumenes had his sword first drawne, where-with hee houghed the other, causing him to fall downe and fight vpon one knee. In this conflict they receiued many wounds, but Neoptolemus giuing slight ones tooke such as were deadly, by which hee died in the place, and was there (being half-dead half-alive) stripped by his mortall enemy, whose reuillings hee required, lying euen at the last gaspe, with one wound in the groin, dangerous had it not wanted force. The death of Neoptolemus caused his followers to runne away vpon the spur, and seek shelter behind the battailes of their foe. They were nothing hotly pursued. For Eumenes pained himselfe to carrie succour to his left wing, which he suspected much to be distressed; but found accompanied with the same fortune, that had assisted him when he fought in person. Craterus had gallantly borne himselfe a while, and sustained the impression of Artabazus and Phoenix, with more courage than force; holding it nothing agreeable with his honour to retire and protract the fight, when he was charged by men of little estimation or note. Other wise it is not vnlike, that hee might haue either carried the day, or preferred himselfe to a better aduention by giuing ground, as the rest (when he and Neoptolemus were slaine) did. But whilst hee fought to preserve his reputation, hee lost his life by the fall of his horse, or his falling from his horse, through force of a wound receiued; vpon which accident hee was trampled vnder foot by many that knew him not, and so perished vnknowne, till it was too late to know it. Eumenes comming to the place where he lay, made great lamentation, as hauing alwaies loued and honoured Craterus, of whose death hee was now become the instrument. The vanquished Armie entertained a Treatie of peace with Eumenes, making shew of willingness to become his followers; but their intent was only to refresh themselves, which (by his permission) hauing done, they slea away by night, and fled toward Antipater.

This battaile fought within ten daies of the former, wanne to Eumenes more reputation than good will: for his owne Souldiers took the death of Craterus heavily, and the Armies lying further off were enraged with the newes. But other matters there were which incensed men against him, besides the death of Craterus, whereof it manifestly appeared, that hee was as sorrie as any that pretended greater heavinesse. His Armie wanted pay. This was a great fault; which he wisely amended, by giuing to them the spoile of such Townes as were ill-effected to him. So hee deemed the loue of his owne men, who of their meere motion appointed vnto him a guard for defence of his person. Others were not so easie to be reconciled. They who had bene Traitors to Perdiccas, hated him for his faithlesse, as greatly, as they thought that he would hate them for their faithfull; neither found they any fairer way of excusing their late reuolt, than by accusing and condemning the side which they had forsaken. Wherefore they proclaimed Eumenes a Traitor, and con-condemned him to die: but it was an easier matter to giue that sentence, than to put it in execution.

¶ X.

Quarrels betweene Eurydice the Queene, and Python the Protector.
Python resignes his office, into which Antipater is chosen.

PYTHON and Arideus being chosen Protectors of King Aridaeus, and the children of Alexander, tooke the way to Asia the lesse, conducting the Armie through Syria. Of these two, Python was the greater in reputation, yet farre too weake to sustaine so important a charge. For Eurydice, wife to King Aridaeus, was come to her husband, a Lady of a masculine spirit, well understanding what she was or should bee, and thinking her selfe able to support the waight which Fortune had laied vpon her foolish husband, being due to her owne title. Her Mother Cyna, sister to Alexander by her Father King Philip, was married (as hath beene shewed) to Amyntus, who was right Heire to the Kingdome of Macedon, being the onely sonne of King Perdiccas, *Philip*s elder brother.

This Cyna was a warlike woman; shee had led Armies, and (as a true Sister of Alexander) fighting hand to hand with Caria Queene of the Phrygians, a Virago like vnto her selfe, had slaine her. Shee brought vp this Eurydice in the same vnuomanly art of warre, who now among the Souldiers beganne to put in practise the rudiments of her education, to the small contentment of Python, that could not brooke her curious intermeddling in his charge. Whether it were so, that Python had some purpose to aduance the sonne of Alexander by Roxane, to the Kingdome; (as once he had fought to doe) or whether the Queene did suspect him of some such intent; or whether onely desire of rule caused her to quarrell with him; quarrell shee did, which disturbed the proceeding against Eumenes. The Armie hauing taken off such a rank-riider as Perdiccas, would not afterward be reined with a twined thread, Python bearing himself vpon his office, took vpon him to giue directions in the kings name, which the Queene did oftentimes controuersing the same name, with more authoritie, and better liking of the Souldiers. Python, seeing this, would needes resigne his office, whether vpon wearinesse of the contentions daily growing, or on purpose to bring the Queene into enuie, it is vncertaine. Perhaps hee thought, that now being the farre worthiest man in the Campe, he should be intreated to retaine the place, and haue his authoritie confirmed, or (as might be increased, were it but for want of a fit Successeur. Eurydice was nothing forie at this course; for now he thought to manage the affaires of the Empire at her owne wil, being freed from the troublesome assistance of a Protector. But the Souldiers disappointed both her and Python, of their contrarie expectations: choosing Antipater, the onely powerful man of *Alexander*s Captaines, then liuing, into the roome of Python. Hereat the Queene fretted exceedingly, and beganne to deale earnestly with the Macedonians, that they should acknowledge no Lord saue onely the King their Soueraigne. Yet shee failed of her purpose, being hindred (as may seeme) by three things: the apparent weaknesse of her husband; the growth of *Alexander*s children, who (though borne of outlandish women) were bred in the Macedonian campe; and the mightinesse of Antipater, who commanding a great Armie newe at hand arrived in few daies at the campe, and enforced Eurydice to hold her selfe content. Antipater was of such power, that he needed not to worke by any close deuices, as Perdiccas had done: he had no concurrents, all the Governours of Provinces that remained aliue, acknowledged him their better: yea, many of them he displaced out of hand, putting others in their roomes. This done, hee tooke the King, Queene, and Princes along along with him into Macedonia, leauing Antigonus General of the Royall Armie: to whom for his good seruices done, and to be done against Eumenes, hee gaue the rule of Susiana, besides his former Provinces, and committed into his hands the government of Asia during that warre.

¶ XI.

Antigonus Lieutenant of Asia, winnes a battaile of Eumenes, and begetteth him in Nora: He vanquisheth other followers of Perdiccas.

HERE begins the greatnesse of Antigonus, whose power in few yeeres oner-growing, the rest wanted little of spreading it selfe ouer the whole Monarchie. Hee was to make warre vpon Eumenes, Alectus the brother, and Attalus the brother-in-law to Perdiccas: worke enough to keepe his Armie employed in the publike seruice, till such time as he might find occasion to make vse of it in his owne businesse. The first of these which he vnderooke was Eumenes, with whom Alectus and Attalus refused to ioyne, hauing vnseasonably contended with him in time of common danger about the chief place. Eumenes had an Army strong in number, courage, and all needfull provisions; but obedient only at discretion. Therefore Antigonus tried all waies of corrupting his Souldiers; tempting first the whole Armie with letters: which practice failing by the cunning of Eumenes (who made shew as if he himselfe had scattered abroad those letters, to trie the faith of his men) he dealt apart with such Captaines, as hee thought most easie to be wonne. Of these Captaines one rebelled, breaking out too hastily before any helpe was neere him, yet looking so carelessly to himselfe, that he and his were surpris'd, when he thought his enemies were off. Another follower of Eumenes (or rather of good fortune, which he thought now to be in company with Antigonus) kept his treacherie secret, reseruing it for the time of execution. Vpon confidence of the treason which this fall man Apollonides had vnderaken, Antigonus presented battaile to Eumenes; in the heate whereof Apollonides, General of the horse to Eumenes, fled ouer to the contrary side, with such as he could get to follow him: but was closely followed by some, whose company he desired not. Eumenes, perceiving the irrecoverable mischiefe which this traiterous practice brought vpon him, pursued the villain, and cut him off before he could thrust himself into the troups of Antigonus, and boast of his treacherie. This was some comfort to Eumenes in the losse of that battaile, which disabled him vtterly to keepe the field; and left it very hard for him to make a safe retreat. Yet one thing he did which much amazed his enemies, and (though a matter of small importance) caused Antigonus himselfe to admire his high resolution. It was held no small part of the victorie to get possession of the dead bodies. Eumenes, whilst Antigonus held him in chace, turned out of the way, and fetching a compass, returned to the place where the battaile had been fought; there he burned (according to the manner of the time) the bodies of his own men, and interred the bones and almes of the Captaines, and common Souldiers, apart, raising vp heapes of earth as Mountaines ouer them, and so went his way. As this bold aduenture bred in the Macedonians, (returned to their campe) great admiration of his braue spirit: so the newes which Menander (who was set to looke vnto their carriages) brought and published among them, enticed them to loue him as their honourable friend. He had found Menander in an open Plaine, carelesse, as after an assured victorie, and loaden with the spoiles of many Nations, the rewards of their long seruice; all which hee might haue taken: but fearing lest such a purchase should proue a heauie burthen to him, whose chiefe hope consisted in swift expedition, he gaue secret warning to Menander to flie to the mountaines, whilst he detained his men (vvhom authoritie could not haue restrained) by this sleight, setting them to bait their horses. The Macedonians extolled him for this courtisie, as a condemned him to die: but it was an easier matter to giue that sentence, than to put it in execution.

§. X.

Quarrels betwene Eurydice the Queene, and Python the Protector.
Python resignes his office, into which Antipater is chosen.

PYTHON and Aridæus being chosen Protectors of King Aridæus, and the children of Alexander, tooke the way to Asia the lesse, conducting the Armie through Syria. Of these two, Python was the greater in reputation, yet farre too weak to sustaine so important a charge. For Eurydice, wife to King Aridæus, was come to her husband, a Ladie of a masculine spirit, well understanding what she was or should bee, and thinking her selfe able to support the waight which Fortune had laide vpon her foolish husband, being due to her owne title. Her Mother Cyna, sister to Alexander by her Father King Philip, was married (as hath bene shewed) to Amyntas, who was right Heire to the Kingdome of Macedon, being the onely sonne of King Perdiccas, Philips elder brother.

This Cyna was a warlike woman; shee had led Armies, and (as a true Sister of Alexander) fighting hand to hand with Caria Queene of the Phrygians, a Virago like vnto her selfe, had slaine her. Shee brought vp this Eurydice in the same vnmannerly art of warre, who now among the Souldiers beganne to put in practice the rudiments of her education, to the small contentment of Python, that could not brooke her curious intermeddling in his charge. Whether it were so, that Python had some purpose to advance the sonne of Alexander by Roxane, to the Kingdome; (as once he had fought to doe) or whether the Queene did suspect him of some such intent; or whether onely desire of rule caused her to quarrell with him; quarrells did, which disturbed the proceeding against Eumenes. The Armie having shaken off such a rank-rider as Perdiccas, would not afterward be reined with a twined threed, Python bearing himself vp in his office, took vpon him to giue directions in the kings name, which the Queene did oftentimes controule, vsing the same name, with more authoritie, and better liking of the Souldiers. Python, seeing this, would needes resigne his office, whether vpon wearinesse of the contentions daily growing, or on purpose to bring the Queene into enuie, it is vncertaine. Perhaps hee thought, that now being the farre worthiest man in the Campe, he should be intreated to retaine the place, and haue his authoritie confirmed, or (as might be increased, were it but for want of a fit Successour. Eurydice was nothing forie at this course; for now she thought to manage the affaires of the Empire at her owne wil, being freed from the troublesome assistance of a Protector. But the Souldiers disappointed both her and Python, of their contrarie expectations: choosing Antipater, the onely powerful man of Alexanders Captaines, then liuing, into the roome of Python. Hereat the Queene fretted exceedingly, and beganne to deale earnestly with the Macedonians, that they should acknowledge no Lord saue onely the King their Soueraigne. Yet shee failed of her purpose, being hindred (as may seeme) by three things: the apparent weaknesse of her husband: the growth of Alexanders children, who (though borne of outlandish women) were bred in the Macedonian campe; and the mightinesse of Antipater, who commanding a great Armie neere at hand arrived in few daies at the campe, and enforced Eurydice to hold her selfe content. Antipater was of such power, that he needed not to worke by any close deuices, as Perdiccas had done: he had no concurrents, all the Gouvernours of Provinces that remained aliue, acknowledged him their better: yea, many of them he displaced out of hand, putting others in their rooms. This done, hee tooke the King, Queene, and Princes along along with him into Macedonia, leauing Antigonus Generall of the Royall Armie: to whom for his good seruices done, and to be done against Eumenes, hee gaue the rule of Susiana, besides his former Provinces, and committed into his hands the gouernment of Asia during that warre.

§. XI.

Antigonus Lieutenant of Asia, winnes a battaile of Eumenes, and besiegeth him in Nora: He vanquisheth other followers of Perdiccas.

HERE begins the greatnesse of Antigonus, whose power in few yeeres ouergrowing, the rell wanted little of spreading it selfe ouer the whole Monarchie. Hee was to make warre vpon Eumenes, Alextus the brother, and Attalus the brother in-law to Perdiccas: worke enough to keepe his Armie employed in the publike seruice, till such time as he might find occasion to make vse of it in his owne businesse. The first of these which he vnderooke was Eumenes, with whom Alextus and Attalus refused to ioyne, hauing vnseasonably contended with him in time of common danger about the chief place. Eumenes had an Army strong in number, courage, and all needfull provisions; but obedient only at discretion. Therefore Antigonus tried all waies of corrupting his Souldiers; tempting first the whole Armie with letters: which practice failing by the cunning of Eumenes (who made shew as if he himselfe had scattered abroad those letters, to trie the faith of his men) he dealt apart with such Captaines, as hee thought most easie to be wonne. Of these Captaines one rebelled, breaking out too hastily before any helpe was neere him, yet looking so carelessly to himselfe, that he and his were surpris'd, when he thought his enemies farre off. Another follower of Eumenes (or rather of good fortune, which he thought now to be in company with Antigonus) kept his treacherie secret, reseruing it for the time of execution. Vpon confidence of the treason which this fal man Apollonides had vnderaken, Antigonus presented battaile to Eumenes; in the heate whereof Apollonides, General of the horse to Eumenes, fled ouer to the contrary side, with such as he could get to follow him: but was closely followed by some, whose company he desired not. Eumenes, perceiving the irrecoverable mischiefe which this traitorous practice brought vpon him, pursued the villain, and cut him off before he could thrust himself into the troups of Antigonus, and boast of his treacherie. This was some comfort to Eumenes in the losse of that battaile, which disabled him vtterly to keepe the field; and left it very hard for him to make a safe retreat. Yet one thing he did which much amazed his enemies, and (though a matter of small importance) caused Antigonus himselfe to admire his high resolution. It was held no small part of the victorie to get possession of the dead bodies. Eumenes, whilst Antigonus held him in chase, turned out of the way, and fetching a compass, returned to the place where the battaile had bene fought; there he burned (according to the manner of the time) the bodies of his own men, and interred the bones and almes of the Captaines, and common Souldiers, apart, raising vp heapes of earth as Mountaines ouer them, and so went his way. As this bold aduventure bred in the Macedonians, (returned to their campe) great admiration of his braue spirit: so the newes which Menander (who was set to looke vnto their carriages) brought and published among them, enticed them to loue him as their honourable friend. He had found Menander in an open Plaine, carelesse, as after an assured victorie, and loaden with the spoiles of many Nations, the rewards of their long seruice; all which hee might haue taken: but fearing lest such a purchase should proue a heauie burthen to him, whose chiefe hope consisted in swift expedition, he gaue secret warning to Menander to flie to the mountaines, whilst he detained his men (whom authoritie could not haue restrained) by this sleight, setting them to baite their horses. The Macedonians extolled him for this courtesie, as a

noble Gentleman, that had forborne when it lay in his power to stripp them out of all their wealth, and make their children slaves, and to rauish their wives: but Antigonus told them, that he had not forborne to do this out of any good will to them; but out of mere subtiltie had auoided those precious fetters, which would haue hindered his speedie flight. He told them true. For Eumenes did not onely thinke all carriages to be ouer-burden some, but the number of his men to be more trouble-some than auailable in his intended course. Wherefore he sent them from him as fast as he could, wishing them to suist for themselves; and retaining onely five hundred horse, and two hundred foote. When he had wearied Antigonus awhile in following him vp and downe, he came to Nora: where againe, keeping no more about him, than necessity required to make good the place, he louingly dismissed all the rest. Nora was a little Fortresse in the borders of Lycania & Cappadocia, so strongly situated that it seemed impregnable, and so well victualled and stored with all necessities, that it might hold out for many yeeres. Thither did Antigonus follow, him, with more desire to make him his friend, than to vanquish him in warre. To this purpose he entertained parlee with him, but in vaine. For whereas Antigonus offered him pardon, and his loue; Eumenes required restitution of his Prouinces, which could not be granted without Antipaters consent. Then was Nora closed vp; where Antigonus leauing sufficient strength for continuance of the siege, tooke his iourne into Pisidia against Aleutus and Attalus, with whom hee made short worke. He came vpon them vnexpected, and seized on passages, which wanted not men, but such a Captain as Eumenes to haue defended them. Aleutus and Attalus, as they had beene too secure before his comming, so were they too aduenturous in fighting at the first sight, vpon all disadvantages; and their folly was attended with futable euent. Attalus with many principall Captaines was taken; Aleutus fled to the Citie of Termessus, where the loue of the younger sort was toward him so vehement; that stopping their eares against all perswasions of the ancient men, they needes would hazzard their liues and their Countrey in his defence. Yet this auailed him nothing: For the Gouernours of the Towne hauing secretly compounded with Antigonus, caused the yong men to fall out; and vsing the time of aduantage, they with their seruants did set vpon Aleutus, who vnable to resist, slew himselfe. His dead body was conueied to Antigonus, and by him barbarously torne, was cast forth without burial. When Antigonus was gone, the yong men interred the carcasie with solenne funerals, hauing once bene minded to set on fire their owne towne in reuenge of his death. Such fauour had hee purchased with courteous liberalitie: but to make an able Generall, one vertue, howe great soeuer, is insufficient.

PTOLOME winnes Syria and Phœnicia. The death of ANTIPATER.

WHilest these things were in doing, the rest of the Princes lay idle, rather seeking to enioy their Governments for the present, than to confirme or enlarge them. Onely Ptolome looking abroad, wanne all Syria and Phœnicia: an action of great importance, but not remarkable for any circumstance in the managing. Hee sent a Lieutenant thither with an Armie, who quickly tooke Lamædon prisoner, that ruled there by appointment of Antipater, and formerly of Perdiccas; but (as may seeme) without any great strength of Souldiers, farre from assistants, and vainely relying vpon the authority which had giuen him that Prouince, and was now occupied with greater cares, than with seeking to maintaine him in his Office.

Antipater was old and sickly, desirous of rest, and therefore contented to let Antigonus pursue the dispatch of those busineses in Asia. Hee had with him Polyperchon, one of the most ancient of Alexanders Captaines, that had lately suppressed a dangerous insurrection of the Ætolians, which Nation had stirred in the quarrell of Perdiccas, preuailling farre at the first, but soone losing all that they had gained, whilest Antipater was abroad in his Cilician expedition. In this Polyperchon, Antipater did repose great confidence; so farre forth, that (suspecting the youth of his owne Sonne Cassander of insufficiency in so great a charge) hee bequeathed vnto him on his death-bed the Government of Macedon and Greece, together with his Office of Protectorship. So Antipater died, being foure-score yeeres old, hauing alwaies trauailed in the great affaires of mightie Princes, with such reputation, that Alexander in all his greatesse was ialous of him, and the successours of Alexander did either quietly giue place vnto him, or were vnfortunate in making oppositions. In his private qualities he was a subtile man, temperate, frugal, and of a Philosophicall behauiour, not vnlearned, as hauing bene Scholler to Aristotle, and written some Histories. Hee had bene much molested by Olympias, Alexanders mother, whom after the death of her Sonne, hee compelled to abstaine from comming into Macedonia, or entermeddling in matters of estate: yea, at his owne death he gaue especiall direction, that no woman should be permitted to deale in the administration of the Empire. But this precept was soone forgotten; and yet, ere long, by forthfull experience approued to haue been found and good.

§. XIII.

OF POLYSPERCHON who succeeded vnto ANTIPATER in the Protectorship. The insurrection of CASSANDER against him.

POLYSPERCHON was very skilfull in the art of warre, hauing long time bene Apprentise in that occupation; other qualities, requisite in so high an Office as he vnderwent, either Nature had not giuen to him, or Time had robbed him of them. He manageth his busines more formally, then wisely, as a man of a second wit, fitter to assist, than command in chiefe. At the first entrance vpon the stage, hee called to counsaile all his friends, wherein, for waigbtie considerations (as they who weighed not the contrary reasons held them) the Queene Olympias was reuoked out of Epirus into Macedon, that the presence of Alexanders mother might countenance and strengthen their proceedings. For the condition of the times requiring, that the Gouernours of Prouinces abroad should keepe greater Armies, than were needefull or easie to be retained about the person of the King in Macedonia; it seemed expedient, that the face of the Court should be filled with all maiestie, that might giue authority to the Iniunctions from thence proceeding, and by an awfull regard containe within the bounds of dutie such as could not by force haue bene kept in order, being strong, and lying too farre off.

Such care was taken for prevention of imaginarie dangers and out of sight, whilest present mischiefe lay vnregarded in their bosomes. Cassander, the Sonne of Antipater, was not able to discouer that great sufficiency in Polyperchon, for which his father had reposed in him so much confidence: neither could hee discern such odds in the qualitie of himselfe and Polyperchon, as was in their fortune. Hee was left Captaine of one thousand; which Office by practice of those times was of more importance, than the title now seemes to imphie. He should thereby haue bene as Campe-master, or Lieutenant general to the other: a place no way satisfying his ambition, that thought himselfe the better man. Therefore hee began to examine his owne power, and compare with the forces likely to oppose him. All that had relied on his Father, were his owne assured, especially such as commanded the Garrisons bestowen in the principall Cities of Greece. The like hope was of the Magistrates, and others of principall authority, in those Common-weales, whose formes had bene corrected by Antipater, that they would follow his side, and draw in many partakers: it concerned these men in their owne particular to adhere vnto the Captains, by whom their faction was vp-held; and by whom the rascall multitude, couetous of regaining the tyrannous power which they had formerly exercised ouer the principall Citizens, were kept in order, obeying their betters perforce. Besides all these helpes, Cassander had the secret loue of Queene Eurydice, who had in priuate rendered him such courtisie, as was due onely to her husband. But neither the Queenes fauour, nor all his other possibilities, gaue him confidence to breake out into open rebellion; because he saw Polyperchon much reuerenced among the Macedonians, and strong enough to suppress him, before he could haue made head. Therefore he made shew of following his pleasures in the countrey, and calling many of his friends about him, vnder pretence of hunting, aduised 10 with them vpon the safest course, and most free from all suspicion. The necessitie was apparant of raising an Armie, before the businesse were set on foot; and to doe this, opportunitie presented him with faire meanes. Ptolomie had by fine force, without any commision, annexed Syria to his gouernement of Egypt and Cyrene; this was too much either for the King to trust him with, or for him to part with. Antigonus vpon the first newes of Antipaters death, began to lay hold vpon all that he could get, in such sort, that he manifestly discovered his intent of making himselfe Lord of all Asia. These two therefore stood in neede of a ciuill Warre; which Cassander well noted, and presumed withall, that the friendship which had passed betweene his Father and them, would auail him somewhat. Whereupon he secretly dispatched messengers to them both; and within a little while conueied himselfe on a sudden ouer the Hellepont, that hee might in person aduance the businesse with greater speede. Much perwasion is needlesse in winning a man to what he desireth. Antigonus coueted nothing more, than to finde Polyperchon worke, by raising some commotion in Greece. Yet (as formalities must not be neglected) Cassander did very earnestly presse him, by the memory of his Father, and al requisite exhortations, to assist him in this enterprife; telling him, that Ptolomie was readie to declare for them, and vrging him to a speedie dispatch. Antigonus on the other side repaid him with the same coine; saying, That for his owne sake, and his dead Fathers, whom he had very dearly loued, hee would not faile to giue him all manner of succour. Hauing thus seasted one another with words, they were nothing slacke 30 in preparing the common meanes, leading to their seuerall ends.

§. XIII.

The unworthie courses held by POLYSPERCHON, for the keeping daye of CASSANDER.

Great necessitie there was of timely prouision. For Polyperchon needed no other instructions to informe him of Cassanders drift, than the newes of his departure. He was no ignorant of the ready disposition, which might be found in Antigonus and Ptolomie, to the strengthening of rebellion; and well hee knew that one principall hope of Cassander was reposed in the confidence of such as ruled in the Græcian Estate. Therefore (loving to work circumspectly) he called another Councell, wherein it was concluded, that the Popular forme of gouernment should be erected in all the Cities of Greece; the Garrisons withdrawne; and that all Magistrates and principall Men, into whose hands Antipater had committed the supreme authority, should forthwith bee either slaine or banished. This was a sure way to diminish the number of Cassanders friends, and to raise vp many enemies to him in all quarters. Yet hereby was disclosed both an vnthankfull nature in Polyperchon, and a factious malice in his adherents. For how could he be excused of extreme ingratitude, that for hatred of the Sonne went about to dishonour the Fathers actions, whose only bountie had enabled him to doe it? or what could bee said in their defence, who sought to destroy 50 many many worthie men, friends to the State, by whom the Greekes were held restrained from stirring against the Macedonians: and in opposition to their priuate Enemy, gaue the rule of things to base Companions, and such as naturally maligned the Empire? But as in mans bodie, through sinnewes newly issuing from one branch, a finger is more vexed by inflammation of his next Neighbour, than by any disemper in the contrarie hand: so in bodie politique, the humours of men, subdiuided in faction, are more enraged by the disagreeable qualities of such as curbe them in their nercest purposes, than they are exasperated by the generall opposition of such as are diuided from them in the maine trunk. Hereby it comes to passe, that contrarie religions are invited to helpe against Neighbour Princes; bordering enemies drawne in, to the part in ciuill warres; and ancient hatred called to counsaile against iniurious friends. Of this fault Nature is not guiltie; shee hath taught the arme to offer it selfe vnto manifest losse in defence of the head: they are depraued affections, which render men sensible of their owne particular, and forgetfull of the more generall good, for which they were created.

The decree, whereby the Greekes were presented with a vaine shew of libertie, ranne vnder the Kings name; but so, as one might easily discern, that Polyperchon had guided his pen. For the maine point was, That they should follow such directions, as Polyperchon gaue, and treat with him about all difficulties. In the rest it 20 contained such a deale of kindeesse, as proceeding on a sudden from those who had kept them in hard subiection, might well appeare to haue some other root than the pretended good will; and was of it selfe too base and vnfit for a King to vse toward his conquered Subiects, and often-subdued Rebels.

§. XV.

Of the great commotions raised in Athens by POLYSPERCHONS decree.
The death of PHOCION.

Euertheless the Athenians with immoderate ioy entertained this happy-seeming Proclamation, and sought how to put it in execution without further delay. But Nicanor, Captaine of the Garrison, which kept one of their Hauens, called Munychia, in the lower part of the Towne, would needes take longer time of deliberation, than was 30 pleasing to their hasty desires.

Nicanor, as a trusty follower of Cassander, was by him shifted into the place, and Meniskus (that was Captaine there before) discharged, when Antipater was newly dead. His coming to Athens was no way gratefull to the Citizens, who soone after hearing the newes of Antipaters death, cried out vpon Phocion, saying, That hee had sufficient intelligence of that accident, and might by aduertising them in due time, haue put into their hands a faire opportunity of thrusting out the Macedonians. But these exclamations argued no more than a desire to shake off the Macedonian yoke. Farre more grieuouly would they haue bene offended, had they knowne the instructions, which Cassander had giuen to Nicanor, and his resolution to follow them. It was concluded, that he should not onely retain Munychia, any inhibition to the contrarie notwithstanding; but that hee should finde meanes to thrust some Companies into Piræus, and fortifie that also, which was the principall Hauen, against the high Towne. How to accomplish this, he rather wanted some reasonable pretence, than good abilitie. But the Athenians were not long in giuing him sufficient cause to do that, which he would haue done without any cause giuen. They 50 desired him to come vnto their Councell, assembled in the Piræus, there to consider of the Kings Proclamation: whither vpon Phocions word and safe conduct he came, and earnestly pressed them to hold with Cassander in the warre which was ready to breake forth. Contrariwise they vrged him first of all, to make them Matters of their owne, which how to vie, they might consult afterwards. Each of them refusing to condescend vnto the others demand; the Athenians (who did alwaies measure iustice by profit, yet seldom thrust by that course) practised with Dercylus, a Captaine following Polyperchon, and then lying neere at hand, that he should enter into the Towne, and take Nicanor prisoner. But Phocion, who then governed in Athen, a man very vnlike to the rest of the Citizens, being nothing pleased with such a trick of politike dishonestie, did quietly suffer him to depart and saue himselfe.

Nicanor hereupon beganne to deuise vpon taking Piræus; not as following now the protect of Cassander, but prosecuting his owne iurruence. He leauied as many 10 Souldiers as he could, and drew them closely into Munychia; which done, he issued into Piræus,ooke it, and intrenched himselfe therein, to the exceeding discomfort of the Athenians, who lately impatient of his keeping the one Haven, saw him now Master of both. Alexander, the sonne of Polyperchon, came thither shortly after with an Armie. Then were the Citizens in great hope of recouering all, and addressed themselves vnto him; who made faire shewes, intending more mischief, which they perceiued not, being blinded with the vaine Epistles of his Father, and of Olympias the old Queene. Olympias taking vpon her to command, before shee durst well adventure to returne into Macedon, had peremptorily charged Nicanor 20 to restore to the Athenians the places which hee held: but hee would first consider more of the matter. Polyperchon had further ordained, that the Isle of Samos should be rendred vnto them: a goodly offer, had it accorded with his power and meaning. He was (indeede) so farre from purposing to let them haue Samos, that as yet he did not thoroughly intend to let them haue themselues. The commoditie of their Hauens was such, as he would rather get into his owne hands, than leave in theirs; yet rather wished in theirs, than in Cassanders. His sonne Alexander notwithstanding this, made faire shew to the Athenians, and spent much labour in communing with Nicanor, but suffered not them, for whom he seemed to labor, to intermeddle with the businesse. Hereupon the Citizens grew zealous, and the displeasure they conceived against him they poured out vpon Phocion, depriving him of his office. This 30 was done with much tumult: banished men and strangers, thrusting themselves into the assembly of the Citizens, who distracted with sundry passions, growing out of their present misfortunes, thought euery one that best could inuigill against things past, a most likely man to finde some remedie for the euill threatening them. In this hurly burly was Alexander deuising how he might come to some good point of composition with Nicanor, and held much priuie conference with him; which he could not so secretly carrie, but that his negotiation was discovered, whereby the vp-rore in the Towne was so farre increased, that Phocion with many of his friends were accused, and driuen to seeke saueguard of their liues by flight. So they came to Alexander, who entertained them gently, and gaue them his letters of commendation to his Father, desiring him to take them into his protection.

Polyperchon was in the Countrey of Phocis, readie to enter with an Armie into Attica. Thither came Phocion with his Companions, hoping well that the letters which they brought, and their owne deserts, (having alwaies bene friends to the Macedonians, as farre as the good of their Countrey gaue leaue) should be enough to get patronage to their innocence. Besides all this, Dinarchus a Corinthian, Polyperchons familiar friend, went along with them, (in an euill houre) who promised to himselfe and them great fauour, by means of his acquaintance. But Polyperchon was an vnstable man, very earnest in what he tooke in hand, yet, either for want of iudgement in following them, or of honestie in holding the best of them, easily 50 changing his intended courses, and doing things by the halues, which made him commonly faile of good successe. For feare of Cassander, he had offered wonderfull kindnesse to the Athenians; this had caused them to loue him: out of their loue hee gathered hope of deceiuing them, which made him to change his minde, and seeke how how to get into his owne hands those keyes, with which Cassander held them fast lockt vp: finding himselfe disappointed of this purpose, and suspected as a false dishonourable man, hee stood wauering betwene the contrarie allurements of profit and reputation. To keepe the Athenians perforce at his deuotion, would indeede haue done well: but the effecting of this beganne to grow desperate; and many Townes of importance in Greece beganne to cast their eyes vpon his proceeding in that action. Wherefore hee thought it the wisest way to redeme their good opinion, by giuing all contentment vnto the popular faction, which then was growne to be Master of that Citie. And in good time for this purpose were the Athenian 10 Embassadors come, treading (as one may say) vpon Polyperchons heeles, whom they were sent to accule. These had solemne audience giuen to them in the Kings presence, who was attended by many great Lords, and for ostentations sake was glorified with all exteriour shewes of maiestie; yet all too little to change Arideus into Alexander: for he did nothing there, but either laugh or chafe, as hee saw others do. For beginning of the businesse Polyperchon commanded that Dinarchus should be tortured and laine. This was enough to tell his hearty affection to the Commonaltie of Athen, in that he spared not his old acquaintance for their sake, whole Embassadors hee then bade to speake. When their errand was done, and answer to it made by the accused, who had no indifferent hearing, Phocion and the rest were 20 pronounced guiltie of treason; but to giue sentence, and doe the execution vpon them, was (for Honours sake) referred vnto the Citie of Athen, because they were Burgeses. Then were they sent away to Athen, where the rascall multitude, not suffering them to speake for themselves, condemned them to die. So they perished being innocent. But the death of Phocion, a man very conspicuous, made the fortune of the rest to be of the lesse regard. Five and fortie times had hee bene chosen Gouverneur of the Citie, neuer suing for the place, but sent for when hee was absent: so well was his integritie knowne, and so highly valued, euen of such as were no pretenders to the same vertue. Hee was a good Commander in Warre, wherein though his actions were not verie great, yet were they of good importance, and neuer vnfortunate. Neuer did the Citie repent of hauing followed his counsaile: nor any priuate man of hauing trusted his word. Philip of Macedon highly esteemed him; so, and much more did Alexander, who (besides other signes of his loue) sent him two hundred talents of siluer, and offered to bestow vpon him of 30 foure Cities in Asia any one which hee would choose. But Phocion refused these and other gifts, howsoever importunately thrust vpon him; resting well contented with his honest pauerie: wherein hee liued aboue foure score yeeres, and then was compelled by the vnjust iudgement of wicked men to drinke that poyson, which by just iudgement of the righteous God, so infected the Citie of Athen, as from that day forwards it neuer brought forth any worthe man resembling the vertue of their 40 Ancients.

§. XVI.

50 Not long after these things were done, Cassander with such forces as Antigonus lent him, entred into Piræus; which newes drew Polyperchon head-long into Attica, with a great Army, but so ill victualled, that he was faine to depart without any thing done. Onely hee had giuen some impediment to the enemy; who not contented with defending what he held, beganne to looke out, and make new purchases abroad. Finding therefore himselfe vnable to drue Cassander out of Athen, hee left his sonne Alexander, with such number of men, as exceeded not the proportion of victuals, 80 to withstand his further incroching. The greattill part of his Armie he carried into Peloponnesus, to make the Countrie sure to himselfe, wherein Cassander had many Friends.

His doings in Peloponnesus were such, as they had beene in other parts of Greece. First, he beganne to fight with Edicts, restoring the Democratie, or Popular forme of gouernement. He commanded that the principall Citizens, that had by Antipater bene made Rulers, should be either slaine, or driuen into exile. This decree tooke immediate effect in most places: The vulgar sort being very ready to seale the Charter of their freedom and authoritie, with the blood of those who had kept them in subjection. Yet many Cities there were, which delighted in the rule of the chiefe Citizens; and many which wished well to Cassander, especially they of Megalopolis, on whom Polyperchon meant to inflict an exemplarie punishment of disobedience to him, which he termed Rebellion. Megalopolis had in it fiftene thousand serviceable men, well furnished of necessaries, and resolved to endure the worst. And neede there was of such resolution. For Polyperchon comming thither with all his power did so much, that he ouerthrow, by a Mine, three of their Bulwarks, and all the space of wall betweene them. But the Defendants manfully repelled the Macedonians which came vp to the breach; and at the same time with great labour they raised vp an inner wall, to beare out the next assault. The Assailants hauing failed to carrie the Towne at the first attempt, tooke much paine to cleare the ground, 10 and make faire way for their Elephants, whose violence was likely to ouerthrow all that came in their way. But the townes-men perceiuing their drift, prepared boords driuen through with long nailes, which they vsed as gall-throps, bestowing them slightly, couered with the points vpwards, in the way by which the beafts were to passe. Neither did they set any to encounter them in front, but appointed certaine light-armed men to beat vpon their sides with Arrows and Darts, as they were instructed by some that had learned the manner of that fight in the Asian Warres. Of these prouisions they made happie vse in the next assault. For by them were the Elephants (wherein the enemie chiefly trusted) either sorely hurt, or driuen back vpon the Macedonians, whom they trampled vnder feet. Polyperchon came as ill furnished for long abode to Megalopolis, as before to Athens. Therefore being neither able to dispatch the businesse quickly, nor to take such leisure as was requisite, hee forsooke the siege, with some losse, and much dishonour; leauing some part of his Armie to lie before the Towne for his credit.

After this hee sent Clitus, his Admirall, to Sea, to ioyne with Arrianus that was come out of Phrygia, and to cut off all succour which might come to the enemy out of Asia. Cassander also sent his whole Fleet vnder Nicanor, who taking along with him some ships of Antigonus, came to the Propontis, where hee fought with Clitus, and was beaten. But Antigonus hearing of the ouerthrow, gathered together the ships that were elaped, and manning them very well, sent out Nicanor againe, 40 affuring him of the victorie, as well he might. For hee sent out sufficient numbers of light-armed men, whom hee had caused to bee waisted ouer the Straights in small Vessels by night; these before day-light letting vpon Clitus, draue his men, that lay securely on the land, head-long into their ships; in which tumult Nicanor arriuing did assaile them so lustily, that few or none elaped him.

This losse at Sea, together with his bad successe by Land, brought Polyperchon into great contempt. He had a good facilitie in penning bloody decrees, but when the execution was referred to his owne sword, he could finde the matter more difficult. Wherefore the Athenians, perceiuing that hee had left them to shift for themselves, and was not able to giue them protection against the enemie which lay in 50 their bosomes, came to agreement with Cassander; accepting a Governour of his appointment; and restoring all things to the same state wherein Antipater had left them. The like inclination to the partie of Cassander, was found in very many Cities of Greece, which daily and willingly reuolted vnto him; as to an industrious man, man, and likely to preuaile in the end. Thus was the whole Countrie let in a combustion, vncable to be quenched; which presented vnto Antigonus an opportunitie, that he neglected not, of making himselfe Lord of Asia.

§. XVII.

ANTIGONVS seeks to make himselfe an absolute Lord; and thereupon treats with EUMENES, who disappointeth him. Phrygia and Lydia wonne by ANTIGONVS.

10 ANTIGONVS had in Antipaters life time a firme resolution, to make vnto himselfe the vtmost benefit that he might of the Armie committed to his charge. And in haire season for aduancement of his purposes came the newes of Antipaters death; euen then, when all the businesse in Pisidia was dispatched, and no more employment for the Armie remaining, saue onely the continuance of the siege of Nora; a smal thing of it selfe, but as hard as a greater matter; and requiring few men, but much time; when time of all things was most precious. Eumenes lay in that Fort of Nora, able to make the place good, and hoping that the mutabilitie, to which the present estate was mani- 20 festly subiect, would in continuance of some yeeres (which he might abide) worke more for him, than his enemies in that space could worke against him. His most feare was, that for want of exercise in that narrow Castle, his men and horses might grow sickly and vnseruiceable: which made him to practise many deuices of keeping them in health and lustie. But when hee had continued shut vp in this manner about a yeere, his hopes came to good passe, and he was eased of his cares by Antigonus himselfe, whose forces held him besieged.

Antigonus knowing the great sufficiency of Eumenes, and considering his fidelitie shewed vnto Perdiccas, thought that hee could not finde in all the world a fitter man than him, to imploy in managing those high designs, wherein hee doubted 30 not that hee should bee withstood by the mightiest Princes of the Empire. Hee sent therefore to Eumenes by one that was friend to them both, acquainting him with some part of his intent, and promising to make him a greater Lord than euer hee had bene, and the next man to himselfe, if things fell out as he desired: in regard whereof hee required onely his friendship, and thereupon sent him an oath to take; which done, he might at his good pleasure issue safely out of Nora, and enioy his perfect libertie. Eumenes perusing the forme of the oath, perceived the meaning of Antigonus, which was, rather to make him his follower than his fellow. For whereas, in a few words, it mentioned the King and Princes of the blood, rather to keepe the Deorum, than vpon any loyall intent; the binding words and summe of 40 all the rest were such, as tied him fast onely to Antigonus, omitting all reueration of due to the King or any other. This hee liked not, holding it vnseemly to become a sworne man to him, with whom hee had fought for the maistrie, and being assured that his voluntarie assistance, which way soeuer he gaue, would be more acceptable, and farre more honourable, than the course propounded. Yet would hee not therefore breake off the negotiation, and waite for some better occasion of enlargement, which might perhaps be long in coming; but seeming to bee well agreed with Antigonus, hee prepared to giue vp his Hold and depart. As for the oath it selfe, when he came to take it, he made shew of dislike, in that it was not solemne enough for such personages as they were, who could not be too ceremonious in testifying their Allegiance. The Macedonians which lay incamped before Nora, liked 50 his words, and gaue him leaue to put in Olympias, and the children of Alexander, binding himselfe to them and their adherents, as well as to Antigonus; and so he departed.

Antigonus had taken vpon him, as soone as hee came downe to the Sea-side, to remoue remoue some of the Gouvernours of Prouinces, behauing himselfe according to the authoritie which hee had receiued of Antipater, to exercise in the time of warre. Neither did hee want sufficient pretence whereby to iustifie his proceedings. For if Polyperchon might lawfully hold the Protector-ship, which the old man dotting on his death-bed bequeathed vnto him, as a legacie, without consent of the Princes or Souldiers; why might not he himselfe alwell retain the Lieutenants-ship of Asia, that was granted vnto him for the generall good of the State, in presence of the whole Armie, by the King, and by Antipater, who had power to ordaine what should seeme conuenient whilet he liued, nor to dispose of things that should happen after his death? To giue a faire colour to his ambition, this was enough: if any were not herewith satisfied, he had threescore thousand footmen, ten thousand horse, & thirtie Elephants in a readinesse to answer them.

The first that perceived his drift, and provided to resist him, was Arideus Gouvernour of Phrygia; who fortified the Townes of his owne Prouince, and sought to haue wonne Cyzicus, a faire Haven Towne, and seated very conueniently for him, but was faine to go away without it. Hereupon Antigonus tooke occasion to command him out of the Countrie. Arideus was so farre from obeying him, that he sent forces to relieue Eumenes. Neuerthelselfe finding that he was vnable of himselfe to make long resistance, heooke such companies as hee could draw along with him, and so passed ouer into Europe, to complaine at the Court. The like fortune had Clitus, who ruled in Lydia, and fought the like remedy of his fortune, with some hope at the first (for both of them were entertained with very good words) which quickly vanished, and grew desperate, when they were beaten at Sea, as hath already been declared.

ANTIGONVS pursues EUMENES. EUMENES hauing authoritie from the Court, raiseth great Warre against ANTIGONVS in defence of the Royall house.

ANTIGONVS hauing thus gotten into his hands all, or most of Asia thelesse, was able to haue entred Macedon, and seized vpon the Court; which that he forbore to doe, it proceeded (as may seeme) for some of these reasons. It would haue bred as much ialousie in Cassander, as feare in Polyperchon, which might haue brought them to tearmes of reconciliation; It would aske more time then hee could spare; and the enuie which followed the Protector-ship was such, as he that had power enough without the Office, ought rather to shunne, then to pursue. Besides all this, it was manifest that Eumenes would not only refuse to take his part, but would make war vpon him in defence of the Royall house, to which it was found that Antigonus did not stand well-affected. Against him therefore hee bent his course, and with an Armie of twentie thousand foote, and foure thousand Horse, made great haste toward Cilicia, hoping to suppress him before hee should bee able to make head.

Eumenes was one of those few that continued faithfull to their dead master, which being well knowne in the Court, hee had commission sent vnto him from thence to raise an Armie, and make warre vpon Antigonus, taking of the Kings treasure as much as hee should neede. Other letters also there were directed to all the Gouvernours of Prouinces, requiring them to giue assistance to Eumenes, and bee ordered by his direction: especially to the Captaines of the olde Souldiers, called the Argyrsphides, or siluer-shielded bands, commandement was giuen to be at his appointment. He had of his old followers gathered together two thousand foote, and five hundred hundred horse, before this authoritie was giuen him: but now he purposed with all the strength which he could make, to fight with Antigonus in defence of the Royall blood. Olympias had written to him, desiring him to bring help to her and her Nephew the sonne of Alexander; and in the meane time to giue her his aduice in that which Polyperchon required of her: for he was desirous to returne into Macedon, but suspected his ambition, as not contained within lawfull bounds. Eumenes therefore counseilled her to remaine in Epirus, till such time as hee could bring the warre to a good issue; which done, he promised that his faith and care should not be wanting to the seede of Alexander.

Strange it is to consider, that in all the Empire scarce any one could be found among the Noble-men, in whom Alexanders mother, wiues, and children, might repose firme confidence, sauing onely this Eumenes, a stranger to the Macedonian blood, borne at Cardia, a Citie of Thrace. His reputation was no more than his owne vertue had made it; his followers obeyed at their owne discretion; and compelled hee was to traualle as farre as Persia, to gather together an Armie sufficient, to resist the enemies that pursued his heeles.

§. XIX.

How the Princes of Macedon stood affected mutually. OLYMPIAS takes ARIDEVS and EVRYDICE, whom shee cruelly puts to death.

Now, so farre as in this present warre all the Rulers of the Prouinces did entermiddle; and great alterations happened; not onely in the parts of Asia, but Macedon it selfe, which brought a new face vnto the State; by the extirpation of the royall house of Philip and Alexander: I hold it conuenient in this place, before we enter into the particulars of the warre it selfe, to shew briefly how the great ones did mutually stand affected; and by what passions they were drawne into those courses, which overthrow most of them, and out of their ruines built the greatnesse of a few: as likewise to what extremitie the faction brake out in Macedon it selfe, about the maine controuersie of title to the Crowne, whereupon all other quarrels were or should haue bene depending.

Arideus the King, being simple and fearefull, did onely what hee was bidden.

Polyperchon, desirous to continue long in Office, had a purpose to aduance the sonne of Alexander by Roxane to the Kingdome, and become Gouvernour to a King of his owne making.

Eurydice the Queene discouering plainly this intent, and meaning nothing lesse than to let her husband serue as a Stale, keeping the throne warme till another were growne old enough to sit in it, grew acquainted with Cassander, who hated the memory of Alexander, and was therefore the fitter for her turne.

Cassander held fresh in mind the danger wherein his family had bene through Alexanders malice, together with the indignitie offered to himselfe by Alexander, who knocked his head against a wall for desiring one that adored him after the Persian manner. The displeasure hereof; and the pleasure which he tooke in the amorous Queene, made him to resolve, both to suppress the lineage which he hated, and to maintaine his beloued mistresse, either by supporting her weak husband, or by taking her to be his owne wife.

The rest of the Lords held it a thing indifferent who reigned ouer all, so as they might raigne in their severall Countries, and establish their authoritie in such way, that it might not be taken from them.

Among

Among these, Ptolome and Antigonus were well enough already, if their ambition would have suffered them to rest.

Pitho and Selenus lying farre off, and being strong, had some good hope to encroach vpon their neighbours. Against these, Pemesther and some others with much adoe hardly made resistance, vntill such time as Eumenes came to them; who propounded to himselfe great matters which he liued not to accomplish.

Olympias the old Queene (as it is common with Step-dames) hated the children of her husband by his other wifes. It was thought that shee had giuen poyson to Aridaus, which failing to take away his life, had much impaired both his bodie and wits. Now the considering, that Eumenes was too full of businesse to come home so soone as she wished that he should; and that Cassander daily preuailed in Greece: thought it the best way to ioyne with Polyperchon, and set vp, as King, her Nephew Alexander, the sonne of Roxane, remouing Aridaus before Cassander were able to defend him. To this intent he procured men among her kindred in Epirus, and so tooke her way towards Polyperchon, who ioyning with her, entred into Macedon.

Eurydice hearing these newes, wrote very earnestly to Cassander, praying him to set aside all other businesse, and come to succour her. Shee her selfe by entreatie, gifts and promises, drew to her partie as many of the Macedonians as shee could, vntill shee thought her owne side strong enough; and then taking her husband with her, went boldly forth against Olympias, and the Traitor Polyperchon.

These two Queenes met armed, as if the matter should haue beene determined by their own hands, which ended without any stroke stricken, by the revolt of those who followed Eurydice. For as soone as the Macedonians beheld Olympias; calling to mind her former Estate, and the victorious reignes of her husband and sonne, they refused to lift any weapon against her. Eurydice finding her selfe thus forsaken, fled towards Amphipolis, but was intercepted and made prisoner with her husband.

Olympias hauing obtained this victorie without blood, thought that all things would succeed as easily, and that vpon these same considerations for which they had refused to beare Armes against her, the Macedonians would not sticke to maintaine her, whatsoeuer her proceedings were. Hauing therefore shut vp Aridaus and his wife in a close roome, where they could scarce turne round, shee fed them through a little hole, till after a while it came in her head, (for feare lest the people should haue commiseration of him, that had reigned almost fixe yeeres and a halfe) to put them to death. So shee deliuered Aridaus to some barbarous Thracians, who tooke away his life by cruell torments: to Eurydice she sent a sword, a halter, and a cup of poyson, willing her to choofe the instrument of her owne death, who praying that the like presents might one day be sent to Olympias, yielded her necke to the halter, hauing spent her last curses not in vaine. Nicanor the brother of Cassander, and a hundred the chiefe of his friends, did Olympias then choofe out, all whom she commanded to be slaine. His brother Iolani that was already dead and buried, shee accused of poyson giuen to Alexander, & thereupon caused his Tombe to be throwne downe, and his bones to be scattered abroad. The Macedonians wondering at this furie, began to condemne themselves, and the folly of Polyperchon, who had, quite contrarie to Antipaters charge giuen on his death-bed, called this outrageous woman to the gouernement of the Empire.

How CASSANDER was reuenged vpon OLYMPIAS.

† I.

The great expedition of CASSANDER. OLYMPIAS shuts her selfe in to Pydna, where CASSANDER besiegeth her. ÆACIDES King of Epirus, coming to succour OLYMPIAS, is forsaken, and banished by his owne Subjects.

CASSANDER at that time lay before Tegea, in Peloponnesus; whither when all these ill tidings were brought to him, hee neuer staied to take the Citie, nor to giue order for the State of things in that Countrey, (though Alexander the sonne of Polyperchon were there with an Armie) but compounding with them of Tegea, hee willed his associates to looke to themselves as well as they could, till his returne, and so in al haste he tooke his iourne toward Macedon, carried headlong with the greedy desire of iust reuenge. The Ætolians had taken the Straights of Thermopylae, in fauour of the Queene and Polyperchon, to hinder his passage; but hee, not willing to mispend any time in dealing with them, got together as many ships as hee could, great and small, with which he transported his Army into Thessaly. There he diuided his companies, appointing some vnder Callias, a subtle Captaine, to hold Polyperchon busied, who then lay incamped neere to Perbebia; with the rest he marched directly against Olympias. Shee, hauing once preuailed by the respect giuen to her dignitie, tooke more care how to appeare Maiestically, than to make her selfe strong. To this ende she made a solemne progresse to Pydna, a Sea-towne, and well fenced, hauing in her companie all the flower of the Court, especially the great Ladies, among whom was Roxane, and her yong sonne Alexander, heire to the great Alexander, by his grandmothers designation: who, during his minority, kept the Sovereigne power in her owne handes. But all this pompe serued to little vfe, against the violence of the enimie, that soone presented himselfe before the walls; onely it fed the besieged with a vaine hope of succour, that would from all partes arrive, to rescue persons of their qualitie. And hereof there scone appeared faire likelihood, which as soone vanished, and went away in smoke.

For Æacides King of Epirus, made great haste to bring succour to Olympias, his consort, with whom Desdamia his daughter was also shut vp. Neuertheless, his Subjects were nothing forward in this expedition; but finding certaine passages taken in the way by Cassanders men, they called vpon him to retire, and quit the enterprife. The Kings importunitie vrging them to proceed, and the obstinate refusal of the Army, brake out at length into such termes, that when hee had raged in vaine against the multitude; his authority, with which hee thought to haue preuailed vpon them, was by them taken from him, and he compelled to forsake his Kingdome, and to wander vp and downe in forraine Countries a banished man, his people ioyning with the enimie, against whom he had led them forth to warr.

Pydna in the meane time was closed vp straitly, both by Sea and Land, so that neither any could issue out of the Citie, nor any reliefe be conueied into it; but it held out as long as any food was left, no memorable seruice being done there, whilst great actions were manag'd abroad.

†. II.

A continuation of OLYMPIAS her storie. POLYPERCHON defeated. Extreme famine in Pydna. OLYMPIAS yeldes to CASSANDER.

NOW, though order of time require it, that we should rehearse the doings of EYMEDES and ANTIQONVS in this place, leauing OLYMPIAS yet a while to the hower of her detuning, which growes the faster vpon her, because shee may discern it coming; yet that wee may not bee compelled to interrupt the course of our narration, by inserting her Tragedy in the midst of things, not manifestly coherent with it; wee will here (as elsewhere we haue done, and elsewhere must) continue to an ende one History, that we may not bee therewith distracted, when we shall come to the relation of another. All the hope of the besieged, remaining in Polyperchon, was in like maner disappointed, as their former trust had been, which was repoled in the succours of the Epirot. For Calles, who was sent against him, found the means to corrupt the greatest part of his Army with money, leauing him within a little while so slenderly accompanied, that hee was fit for no other but necessity of warre, than a swift retreat. When famine had so farre preuailed in the city, that the horses were killed as a precious food, many me feeding 20 on the dead carcasses of their fellows, and sawdust being giuen to the Elephants for prouender; some of the souldiers obtaining the Queenes leaue, (who could not denie it) others, without asking leaue, yelded themselves to the enemy, & were by him gently relieued, and sent abroad into the Country. The newes of the Queenes affaires, dispersed by these men, did so affright her wil-willers, that such as had referred themselves to the event, came in apace, and submitted them to Cassander. At length, when the mortalitie was so great in the Towne, that the liuing were euen poysoned with the noysome sent of the dead; Olympias bethought her selfe of stealing away by Sea in a Galley that she had: wherewith her successe was as bad as in the rest. For God had appointed this Towne, by her chosen as a place of refuge, to 30 be vnto her as a house of torment, and a Iail, out of which shee should not be deliuered, but vnto an euill death. Being therefore vterly broken with miseries, which daily afflicted her and the other Ladies, vnaccustomed to so wretched a kind of life, she offered composition, and with much labour hardly obtained of Cassander (who hauing fetcht her Gally out of the Hauens, accounted himselfe as good as master of her bodie) a graunt of her owne life. Immediately vpon her apprehension, Pella, the chiefe Citie of the Kingdome, was yelded to Cassander. Amphipolis did stand out: for Aristonous, to whom Olympias had giuen charge of such forces as were left abroad in the Country, taking courage from the successe of some pettie seruices wherein hee had preuailed, began to promise himselfe great vnlikelihoods. But Olympias, to win 40 Cassanders fauour, very earnestly required him vpon his faith to her, that he should giue it vp. He did so, and presently after was killed by his priuate enemies, that were set on by Cassander, who partly hated him vpon old respects, partly doubted him, as a man likely to seeke inuouation.

†. III.

The death of OLYMPIAS, and her condition.

WHEN Olympias had now heard sorrowfull tidings of all her friends, shee herselfe was called into question, and accused in an assembly of the Macedonians, for the murders (they were so filled in her affliction, which in time of prosperitie she called iustice) by her committed. There was shee, (being not heard nor called to speake) condemned to die. The suite was commenced and prosecuted ted against her, by the kindred of those whom she had slaine. But it was at Cassanders intigation; who (to batten the execution) sent her word, that he would furnish her, with a ship, and other necessaries, to saue her selfe by flight: which when she refused, saying, that shee would plead for her selfe, and tell her owne tale; the dissembled no longer, but sent vnto her such men as hated her most, who tooke away her miserable life. Shee was daughter, and sister, vnto two Kings of Epirus; wife, and mother, vnto two the mightiest Kings, of that, or many other ages; a stout Lady, and of vnreproueable chastitie, but her ambition was boundlesse, her hatred vnappealable, and her furie in reuenge, most vnwomanly. Her peruerse conditions made her husband seeke other wiues and Concubines, which caused her to hate both him, and them. She was thought priuie to her husbands death; after which, very cruelly she slew his late wife Cleopatra, hauing first murdered one of her two children in her armes, and with a beastly furie broiled the other aliuie in fire, in a copper bason. For these things, her sonne Alexander (otherwise louing her wel) forbade her to meddle in the gouernement of Macedon. But God more seuerely vnto cruell Tyrants, than only to hinder them of their wils, permitted her to liue & fulfill the rest of her wickednesse; (which was his iustice vpon the adulteries of Philip, and the oppression done by him and others) after all which, He rewarded her malice, by returning it vpon her owne head.

†. IIII.

CASSANDER celebrates the funeral of ARIDEVS and EYRYDICE; and seekes to make himselfe King of Macedon.

AFTER her death, Cassander gaue honourable buriall to Aridens and Eurydice, among their Progenitors, Kings of Macedon. And looking further into his owne possibilities of greatnesse, he married the Lady Theffalonica, whom he had taken at 30 Pydna, being the daughter of King Philip, by another of his wiues; that by her he might haue some title to the Crowne. For the same end he committed Roxane, and her yong sonne, to close prison, remouing thereby some part of his impediment. And, the better to encrease his fame, and purchase loue, built a Citie, called by his owne name Cassandria, that soone grew to be very great and powerfull. He redified likewise Thebes in Greece, and restored it vnto the old inhabitants, after it had laine twentie yeeres waste, being vterly razed by Alexander. By these meanes, especially by the reitauration of Thebes, wherunto all Greece voluntarily contributed, he grew so strong, that few remained enemies vnto him; and they, with much labour, hardly could resist him. Leauing him therefore daily preuailling 40 in Greece, we will returne to them, who contended in Asia, for lesse titles, but larger Prouinces, with greater forces.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the great Lordship which ANTIGONVS got in Asia.

§. I.

The iourney of EVMENES into Persia. His wife dealing with those that ioynd with him.

EVMENES, having ioynd vnto his company the Argyrasides, made halte into the Easterne parts, to take possession of those Countries. according to his commission, and strengthen himselfe against Antigo-nus. Hee tooke his iourney through Celsyria and Phenicia, hoping to reclaim those Prouinces, vsurpped with the rest of Syria (as hath bene shewed) by 20 Ptolomie, to the Kings obedience. But to effect this, his halte of his passing forward was too great, his Armie too little, and the readinesse of the people, to returne to their due obedience, none at all. Besides all which impediments, one inconueniencie troubled him in all his proceedings, making them the lesse effectfull. The Capitaines of the Argyrasides were so forward, that they scorned to repaire to him, and take his directions; and their fidelity was so vntied, that he might haue more easily dealt with open Traitors. It was not expedient, that he, being General, should weaken his authority by courting them; neither lay it in his power to keepe them in order by compulsion. Therefore hee 30 fained, that Alexander had appointed vnto him in a dreame, a place for their meeting, namely, in a rich pavilion, wherein an empty throne was placed, as if Alexander himselfe had bene present at their consultations. Thus hee freed himselfe from their vaine pride; but of their faith he could haue no assurance. Yet when Ptolomie requeste them, & Antigonus bribed them to forsake him, they continued (though not without considering of the matter) to take his part. So hee marched on, sending before him the Kings warrant; which Pytho & Seleucus refused to obey; not as reiecting the kings authority, but excepting against the person of Eumenes, as a man condemned to die by the Macedonian Armie, for the death of Craterus. Eumenes, knowing well that he was not to relye vpon their assistance, who stood otherwise 40 affected then his affaires required, and were not to bee dealt with by perswasion, sought passage by strong hand, through the Countrey of Babylon, in such wise that Seleucus, hauing in vaine attempted to hinder him, by opening the sluices of Euphrates, was glad at length to grant him friendly way, as desirous to be ridde of him. Thus he came to Peucestes and the rest of the Easterne Lords, who were glad of his company, because of the differences betweene Pytho, Seleucus, and themselves. Yet the contention about superiortie grew verie hot among them; every one finding water enough, to feede his owne humour of selfe-worthinesse. But the former device of assembling in one pavilion, made all quiet; the conclusion euer being sure to follow that which Eumenes propounded, who was both wisest in giuing aduice, and 50 best able to reward, by means of the authoritie giuen him, to take what he pleased of the Kings treasures. By these meanes he wonne to himselfe many of those, who had most power to doe good or hurt.

§. II.

How ANTIGONVS, coming to set vpon EVMENES, was driven off with losse.

ANTIGONVS, hearing that Eumenes lay in the Prouince of Susa, had an earnest desire to follow him, and driue him further from the Kings treasures, which were kept there. To which end, as soone as he had made himselfe strong enough, he remoued out of Mesopotamia, where he had wintered; and taking to him Pytho and Seleucus, with their men, hee marched directly against the enemies, with intent to giue them battaile.
Eumenes had fortified the Cattle of Susa and was retired backe toward Persia, keeping the Riuer of Tygris betweene him and his pursuers. The passages of the Ri-uer were wel guarded, and good espiall kept vpon Antigonus, to obserue which way he tooke. Before he came to Tygris it selfe, he was to passe ouer Coprates, a great Ri-uer, and not foordable, which he sought to doe by small vessels, whereof he had no great store. A great part of his Armie had gotten ouer, when Eumenes, who kept a bridge vpon Tygris, came with a thousand horse, and foure thousand foot, to see their demeanour: and finding them out of order, charged them, brake them, and draue them headlong back into Coprates, wherein moit of them were drowned; ve-rie few escapng with life, except foure thousand that yielded themselves prisoners, 20 in sight of Antigonus, that was not able to relieue them. This losse made Antigo-nus glad to fall off; and the heat of that Countrey in the dog-daies, breeding diseases in his Army, by which many perished, caused him to remoue as farre as into Media.
So hee tooke Pytho with him; (leauing Seleucus to besiege the Cattle of Susa) and seeking to go the neerest way, passed through savage Nations, that continually vexing him with skirmishes, slew great numbers of his men, before hee could arriue in Media, with his troups that were quite heart-broken.

30

Of EVMENES his cunning. A battaile betweene him and ANTIGONVS.

AFTER his departure, Eumenes with his associates fell into consultation, about the remainder of their businesse. Faine hee would haue had them to enter vpon those Prouinces, which Antigonus had left be-hinde him; to which also the Capitaines of the Argyrasides or Siluershields were very inclinable, as desiring to draw neerer to Greece. But Peucestes, and the rest, whose dominions lay in the high Countries, 40 had more care of their owne particular Estates, and would needes march Eastward. These carried it; for the Armie was not strong enough to diuide it selfe into parts.

When they came into Persia, Peucestes, ruling there, feasted them royally, & fought by all meanes to win the Souldiers loue to himselfe. Eumenes perceiuing wherunto those doings tended, suffred him awhile to keepe good cheare, till the time of warre drew neere. Then did hee faine an Epistle, directed, as from Orontes Gouvernor of Armenia, to Peucestes himselfe: The purport wherof was, that Olympias had vanquished Cassander, and sent ouer a great Armie vnder Polyperchon, to ioyne with Eumenes.
These newes, as they filled the Campe with vaine ioy, so they wrought in all mens minde a great willingnesse to obey Eumenes, by whom was the likeliest apparance of their preferment; whereto they dealt wisely, he being farre the most sufficient Commander, as they found soone after. For when Antigonus, coming out of Media, drew neere vnto them, Eumenes by some mischance was fallen sicke, and faine

faine to be carried in a Litter; the Armie marched in very bad array, and was likely to haue bene forced to take battaile in that disorder. But Eumenes, when the reit of the Captaines were amazed, was carried about the Armie in his Litter, and vpon the se-daine did call his men into so good forme, that Antigonus, perceiuing him a farre off, could not refrain from giuing him deserved commendations. Yet he did not cease to promise great rewards to the Captaines, and all sorts of men, if they would forsake Eumenes: which hopes deceiuing him, he came to the triall of a battaile. Eumenes had more Elephants than Antigonus; other wise, he was inferior in number both of horse and foote by a third part. The battaile was fought with variable successe, and great losse on both sides, continuing a great part of the day, and of the night following. Yet the victorie was vncertaine. For Eumenes could not force his men to lie tarre from their carriages: by which meanes Antigonus (who had a more absolute command ouer his) incamping on the ground whereon they fought, had in his power the dead bodies; which was accounted the signe of victorie; for he buried his owne, and gaue leaue to his enemies crauing it, to doe the like. But a greater signe of victorie had Eumenes. For he abode still in the same place, and not onely buried his men very honourably, at great leisure, but held the Countre round about; whereas Antigonus was glad (hauing tarried but one day) to flicke away by night, and retorne into Media, from whence he came.

20

Of diuers stratagems practised by ANTIGONVS, and EUMENES, one against the other.

THus did the Warre continue doubtfull, and was protracted to a greater length, each part hauing stout Souldiers, and skilfull Generals: but the side which had hitherto preuailed, being hindered by the equall authoritie of many, from pursuing all aduantages to the best. Antigonus grew daily weaker in men and reputation, so that to re-
40 pare himselfe he could finde no way faster, then to put all to aduenture. Hee knew that his enemies lay in their wintering places, quartered farre asunder, so that if he could suddenly come among them, he was likely to put them in great distresse. Betweene him and them, the way was not long, being onely nine daies iourney, but very bad, through a rough drie wildernesse, hardly passable. Another way, fairer and leading through a Countrey well peopled, but requiring twentie fise daies iourney, he forsooke, partly for the length, partly, and chiefly, because he would come vndiscovered. So therefore taking his iourney in the dead of Winter, he forbade vnto his men the vse of fire by night, because he would not haue them desired a 45 farre off. This commandement had bene well obserued foure or fise daies, when continuance of time (as commonly) breeding negligence, and the cold weather pinching them, they were bold to cherish themselves, being neerer to their wayes ende. The sight of these fires gaue notice of their comming; which being reported to Penestes, and other Captaines, they were so astonished with the sodaine danger, that in all haste they betooke themselves to flight. But Eumenes, meeting with the newes, began to harden his affrighted companions, promising to make 50 Antigonus march lesse surely, and willing them to abide, and draw vp their men together. They could scarce beleue him; yet they were content to be ruled, and did as hee appointed, who failed not in making his word good. Hee tooke with him some companies of the readiest men, wherewith hee occupied certaine toppes of mountaines, looking toward the Campe of Antigonus: there he chose a convenient ground to incampe vpon, and made great store of fires in sundrie places, as if the whole Armie had bene present. This was a sorrowful spectacle to Antigonus who thought himselfe preuented of his purpose; and began to feare lest he should be compelled compelled to fight, whilst his men were tired with a long and painefull iourney. Therefore hee resolved to turne aside, and take the way to such places, as might better serue to refresh his Armie. This he did with great care and circumspection, at the first, as knowing how readie Eumenes would be vpon all aduantages. But after a while, considering that no enemy stirred about him, hee began to pause, and thinke in himselfe, that somewhat or other was not fallen out according to his opinion. To be the better informed in the matter, he caused some Inhabitants of that Desert to be taken, and brought before him; of whom he learned, that they had seene no other Armie than his thereabout, but onely a few men that kept fires on the hill-tops. It vexed him exceedingly to finde that he had been so deluded. Therefore he went against these troupes with great furie, meaning to take sharpe vengeance on them, for hauing so deceiued him. But by this time, sufficient strength was arrived there, which could not be forced without much bulineffe, and long stay. All the Armie was come, saue onely Eudamus, Captaine of the Elephants, who, besides those beasts, had no more than foure hundred horsemen in his company. Antigonus hearing of this supply comming to his enemies, sent aboue two thousand horse, and all his light-armed footmen, to cutt off by the way. Eudamus being talen into this danger, was faine to place his Elephants round about his carriages, and so to defend himselfe as well as he could; for his horsemen, overlaid with multitudes, were quickly broken, and driuen to runne away vpon the spurre. Neither knew they, who fate vpon the Elephants, which way to iurne them; for on all sides they receiued wounds, and were not able to requite them with the like. In this extremitie there appeared braue troupes of horse and foot, that came vncpected to the rescue; and charging the assailants vpon the backe, draue them to seeke their owne safetie by speedy flight. These were sent by Eumenes; who though hee knew not what his aduersarie meant to doe, yet hee knew very well what was fittest for him to doe: and therefore, playing both games himselfe, provided the remedie.

The conspiracie of PEVCESTES and others, against EUMENES his life.

Y these meanes Eumenes wanne great honour, and was by the whole Armie acknowledged a most expert Generall, and well worthy of the chiefe command. But Penestes, and the other Captaines, gullie of their owne much insufficiencie, were so transported with enuie, that they could now no longer contain their vile thoughts, but held communication, as vpon a necessarie point, how they might finde meanes to murder him.

Surely, it is great iniustice to impute the mischief, contriued against worthy men, to their owne proud carriage, or some other ill deservings: For, though it often happen, that small vices doe serue to counterpoise great vertues; (the sense of euill being more quicke and lasting, than of good) yet hee shall bewray a very foolish malice, that, wanting other testimonie, will thinke it a part of wisdom, to finde good reason of the euils, done to vertuous men, which oftentimes haue no other cause than their vertue it selfe. Eumenes, among many excellent qualities, was noted to be of singular courtlesse, of a very sweet conuersation among his friends, and careful by all gentle meanes to winne their loue, that seemed to beare him any secret ill affection. It was his meere vertue that ouerthrew him, which euen they that sought his life acknowledged. For they concluded that hee should not be slaine, before the battaile were fought with Antigonus, wherein they confessed that it stood best with their safety, to be gouerned by his directions. Of this reason, son, he was quickly advertised by Eudamus, to whom he had done many pleasures, and by some others of whom he vied to borrow money when hee needed not, to the end that they should be careful of his good, for feare of losing their owne. Considering therefore, and discoursing with himselfe of the villanie intended against him, hee made his last will, and burnt all his writings that contained any matter of secret: which done, hee reuolued many things in his minde; being doubtfull what course were best to follow. All the Nobles of the Empire stood ill affected to the Royall blood, excepting those which were with him, that were more in number, than in worth. How things at that time stood in Macedon and Greece, either he knew not, or knowing the truth, knew nothing that might encourage him to seeke their helpe, that needed his. To make his owne peace with Antigonus, had bene against his faith to Olympias, and the Princes, that had committed this great power into his hands. For which cause also it may be thought, that hee for bare, either to lose the battaile willingly, or to flye into Cappadocia, and make shift for himselfe among his old friends. At length hee refused to doe his best against the common enemy, and afterwards to looke to himselfe as well as he might.

§. VI.

The last battaile betweene ANTIGONVS and

THe Souldiers, especially those old bands of the Silver-shields, finding Eumenes perplexed, and not knowing the cause, entreated him not to doubt of the victorie, but onely to bring them into the field, and set them in array; for the rest, they alone would take sufficient order. The like alacrity was generally found in the common Souldiers faces; but the chiefe Commanders were so mischieuouly bent against him, that they could not endure to thinke vpon being beholding to him for the victorie. Yet he ordered the battaile so well, that, without their owne great fault, they could hardly 30 faile of getting the vpper hand.

Before the Armies came to joyning, a horse-man from the side of Eumenes, claimed with a loud voice to the followers of Antigonus, That their wickednesse, in fighting against their owne fathers, would now bee punished, as it well deserved. This was not spoken in vaine. For the Silver-shields were men of threescore or seuerie yeeres olde, strengthened more by continuall exercise, than decayed by age, and excelling in courage, as having passed through greater dangers, than any like to be presented in that fight. Therefore Antigonus his men (who had often been beaten by them, and were now to trie their last hope with these resolute warriours, the most Ancient and best regarded of all Alexanders Souldiers) grew very pen- 40 sive, and advanced heavily, suspecting their owne cause, and fearing the threatenings vttered would proue true.

Antigonus was now againe farre the stronger in horse, which gave him cause of great hope; the ground, on which they were to fight, being a plaine leuelled field. Placing therefore himselfe and his sonne Demetrius in his right wing, and committing the left wing to Pithon, hee did set forward courageously against the enemies, that were ready to giue him a sharpe entertainment.

Eumenes tooke vnto him Peucestes, with the rest of the Lords, and stood in the left wing of his battaile, in the face of Antigonus, meaning both to prevent the Traitors, his Companions, of all meanes to make head against him on the sodaine, and (withall) to giue proofe of his owne valour, which perhaps he should no more doe, in the face of all his enemies. In the right wing, opposite vnto Pithon, hee bestowed the weakest of his horse and Elephants, vnder one Philip, an honest man, and (which was enough at such a time) obedient: commanding him to protract the fight fight, and make a leisurable retrait, expecting the euent of the other side.

So they joyned very fiercely; Antigonus, labouring to make himselfe master of all; Eumenes, to die an honourable death, or to winne such a victorie vpon his open enemies, as might giue him leisure and opportunitie to deal with his false friends.

The footmen of Antigonus, being, euen in their owne opinions, farre inferior to those whom they must encounter, were at the first brunt presently defeated by the Silver-shields, who slew about five thousand of them, losing of their owne, not one man. But in horse, Eumenes was so ouer-matched, that he could not repell Antigonus, who pressed him very hard, but was faine to stand wholly vpon defence. Yet his courage wrought so well by example, among his followers, that the enemy could not winne one foot of ground vpon him, vntill such time as Peucestes, with one thousand five hundred horse, withdrew himselfe out of the battaile, leaving his companions fighting to defend his backe.

Then did Eumenes desperately rush amongst his enemies, labouring to breake open the way vnto Antigonus himselfe. And though hee failed of his purpose; yet with great slaughter hee did so beate vpon them, which came in his way, that the victorie hung a long time in suspence, vncertaine which way to incline.

The ground whereon they fought, being of a slight sandie mould, through the trampling of horses, men, and Elephants, did cast vp such a cloud of dust, as hindered the prospect, so that no man could see what was done a little from him. Antigonus finding this aduantage, dispatched away some companies of horse, that passed vndiscovered beyond Eumenes his battailes, and came to his carriages, which lay about halfe a mile from the place of fight, slenderly guarded, (for that the whole body of the Armie lay betweene them and danger) and therefore easily taken. Had Peucestes retired himselfe no further than vnto the carriages, hee might not onely haue defended them, but peraduenture haue surprised those which came to surpris 30 them, and so haue done as good a piece of seruise as a better man. But he was gotten somewhat further, to a place, where out of danger hee might expect the euent: and Eumenes was so ouer-laboured both in body and minde, that he could not giue an eye to every place, being not well able to continue where he was. It happened so, that the Elephants meeting together, those of Antigonus had the better hand; whereupon Eumenes, finding himselfe euery way ouer-charged, began to giue back, and withdrew himselfe and his companies in good order, to the other side of the battaile, where Philip (as hee was directed) had by fighting and retiring together, kept that wing from losse. The Antigonians had felt so much of Eumenes that day, that they were well contented to let him depart quietly, and wished not to see him come againe; as faine he would haue done.

The losse of the carriages was reported vnto him, as soone as he had any leisure to heare how things went: whereupon hee presently ordered his men for a fresh 40 charge, and sent for Peucestes that was not farre off, requesting him to bring in his men, and renew the fight, whereby hee trusted, not onely to recouer their owne goods, but to enrich themselves with the spoiles of the enemies. Peucestes not only refused to joyne with him, but immediately withdrew himselfe into a safer place, where he might be further from such dangerous temptations.

By this, the night grew on; and both Armies, wearied with fighting, were desirous to returne into their Campes. Yet Antigonus conceiued hope of doing somewhat more; and therefore taking halfe his horsemen, hee waited vpon Eumenes a part of his way homewards, but found no opportunitie to offend him: the other halfe hee committed to Pithon, willing him to set vpon the Silver-shields in their retraits; which 50 yet he forbore to do, because it appeared too full of danger. So the battaile ended; wherein Antigonus had not so much the better in horse, as the worse in foote: but the spoile which hee got, by surprisng his enemies carriages, made amends for all his other losses.

How EUMENES was betrayed to ANTIGONVS, and slaine.

EUMENES, comming into his Campe, and finding the Siluer-shields extremely discontented with their misfortune, beganne to cheere them vp, and put them in hope of recovering all with aduantage. For their braue demeanor that day had so cruſhed the enemy, that he had no power left, wherewith to abide them in open field, and was much leſſe able to draw their Carts after him, through that great Wilderneſſe, over the 10 high mountaines.

But theſe perſuaſions auailed nothing. Peuceſtes was gone; the other Capitaines would needs returne into the high Countries, and the Soldiers had no deſire either to ſie or to fight, but onely to reſcuer their goods. Wherefore Tenamus, one of the two Capitaines of the Siluer-shields, (who had in former times readily conſented vnto traitorous motions, in hope of gaine, but was letted by his partner Antigenes) finding, as he thought, a fit occaſion of making himſelfe great, and winning the loue of thoſe bands, dealt ſecretly with Antigonus, requeſting him to reſtore vnto thoſe old Souldiers their goods, which he had taken, being the onely reward of their ſeruices, in the warres of Philip and Alexander.

Antigonus, as a ſubtile man, knew very well, that they which requeſted more than they had reaſon to expect, would alſo, with a little entreatie, perſorme a great deale more than they promiſed; and therefore he louingly entertained the meſſengers, ſtilling them with hopes of greater matters than they deſired, if they would put Eumenes into his hands, by whom they were ſeduced to make warre againſt him. This anſwer pleaſed them ſo well, that they forthwith deuſed how to deliuer him aliue. Wherefore comming about him, as at other times, to doe their dutie, and pretending more joy of their victorie, than ſorrow of their loſſe, which they ſaid they would redeeme by another fight, in the middeſt of this goodly talk they leapt vpon him, caught hold of his ſword, and bound him faſt. So they haled 30 him away; and ſtopping their cares againſt all perſuaſions, would not yeeld ſo far, as to looſen one of his hands and let him kill himſelfe, but brought him aliue (that was their owne Generall, vnder whom they had obtained many victories) as it had beene in triumph, into the Campe of their enemies.

The preſſe of men, running out of the Campe to ſee him, was ſo great, that Antigonus was faine, to ſend a guard of horſemen and Elephants, to keep him from being ſmothered; whom he could not ſodainely reſolue, either to kill or ſaue. Very few they were that ſued for his life; but of theſe, Demetrius the ſonne of Antigonus was one; the reſt were deſirous to be rid of him quickly, thinking belike, that if he were ſaued, he would ſoon be the chiefe in reputation, for his great abilitie. So after 40 long deliberation, Antigonus concluded, that it was the ſafeſt way, to put him to death; which intending to haue done by famine (perhaps becauſe he would keep it awhile in his owne power, to reuerſe the ſentence, as deſiring, if it might be, to haue him liue his friend) hate of other buſineſſe made him doe it by the ſword.

To this end came all the trauailes of that worthy generall Eumenes; who had with great wiſdome, fidelitie, and patience laboured in vaine, to vphold the family which God had purpoſed to caſt downe. He is reckoned among the notable examples of Fortunes mutabilitie, but more notable was his gouernment of himſelfe, in all her changes. Aduerſitie neuer leſſened his courage, nor Proſperitie his circumſpection. But all his vertue, induſtrie, and wit, were caſt away, in leading an Armie, without full power, to keepe it in due obedience. Therefore it was not ill anſwered, by Gaſpar de Colligne, Admiral of France in our dayes, to one that foretold his death, which enſued ſoone after in the maſſacre of Paris; That rather than to leade againe an Armie of Voluntaries, he would die a thouſand times.

Antigonus

Antigonus himſelfe gaue to the bodie of Eumenes honourable Funerall; and rewarded the Treason, wrought againſt him, with deſerued vengeance. One chiefe Capitaine of the Siluer-shields he burnt aliue; many of the other Capitaines he ſlue; & to the whole multitude of the Siluer-shields, that had betrayed to worthy a Commander, he appointed a Leader, that ſhould carrie them into ſarre Countries, vnder pretence of warres; but with a priuy charge, to conſume them all, as perierd wretches, letting none of them returne aliue vnto his friends and kindred, or ſo much as once behold the Seas, that beate vpon the ſhoares of Greece and Macedonia.

§. VIII.

How ANTIGONVS ſlew PITHON, and occupied MEDIA. How he removed Governours of Provinces, and made himſelfe Lord of Perſia, carrying away PEUCESTES.

HHe two Armies being ioyned thus in one, were carried into Media, where they ſpent the reſt of the Winter; the common Souldieridly, the principall men intently bent vnto the buſineſſe enſuing. Pithon began to conſider his owne deſertings; for that the whole warre had beene chiefly maintained by the ſtrength and riches of his Province. Beſides, he thought himſelfe as good a man as Antigonus, yntilſe it were in the Souldiers opinion, which he iudged eaſie to be purchaſed with gifts, and therefore ſpared not to aſſay them with great liberality. But in following this courſe, hee was driven by neceſſitie to ruſt many, of whom he ſlumbled vpon ſome, that were vnſecret, and others, bearing him no ſincere affection. Thus was his purpoſe diſcovered to Antigonus, who (nothing like to Pithon) diſſembled his indignation, and rebuked the informers, as breeders of diſſention betwene him, and his honourable friend, vnto whom hee meant to commit the Government of all thoſe Countries: his owne buſineſſe calling him into the lower Aſia. Theſe reports, comming 30 daily to his cares, did finely delude Pithon. By his greatneſſe with Alexander, his authority in that Province where they lay, whereof he was Gouernour; and the loue of the ſouldiers which he had bought with money; he was ſtrong enough to maintaine, even an offenſiue warre. But what neede had he to vſe the ſword, when hee was likely without contention, to obtaine more than his owne asking? Therefore he came as ſoone as he was ſent for, to take his farewell of Antigonus, and to diuide the Provinces with him, that meant nothing leſſe than to yeeld to any ſuch diuiſion. As ſoone as he came, he was taken, and accuſed, condemned to die, and ſlain out of hand. For Antigonus, hauing begunne with Eumenes his ancient friend, was not afterwarde reſtrained by any conſideration of old acquaintance, from cutting down 40 indifferently all that ſtood in his way: but ſwamme careleſſly through the blood, wherein at the firſt he doubtfully waded.

When this buſineſſe was ended, he appointed a new Gouernour in Media, to order the Province, and a Capitaine, to ſuppreſſe all commotions: thinking belike, that the power and authoritie, ſo diuided, would hardly agree in one againſt him, from whom both were deriued.

After this he marched into Perſia, where he was entertained, as abſolute Lord of Aſia. There began he to ſhew how well he vnderſtood his owne mightineſſe. For he placed and diſplaced, at his pleaſure, Gouernours in all Provinces, leaving none in Office, that were not his owne creatures, excepting ſuch as lay too farre off to be diſlodged eaſily.

Peuceſtes, who ruled in Perſia, thought with good cheere to redeeme old offences, but was deceived, hauing to doe with one, that could not be taken with ſuch baits: he was caried away, and traſted with goodly words of promiſe, that neuer rooke effect. Thus he, that enuid the vertue of his friend, was driven to flatter (in vaine) the the fortune of his enemy; after which he liued a contemptible life, till hee died obscurely a man forgotten.

How SELEVCVS was chased out of Babylon, by ANTONIVS. The great riches of ANTONIVS.

SELEVCVS was the next in this visitation; one that had from time to time continued in the same tenor of good-will to Antonius, and now gaue proofe of his heartie affection toward him, by making the Captainie of the Cattle of Susa to meete him on the way, rendering vnto him that strong Peece, and all the treasures therein bestowed. This offer was so great, that Antonius (though hauing in his hands the Keeper of the place) could hardly beleue it; but vfed him with excessive kindnesse, for feare so good a moode should change. In that Cattle he found all the treasures of Alexander, with the Jewels of the Persian Kings, which, added to his former store of money, made vp twentie five thousand talents. Hauing all this, he might well account himselfe a happy man, if riches were sufficient to happinesse. But large dominion was the marke at which hee aimed; therefore hee proceeded, with intent to leaue no Country behind his back, that should not acknowledge him for Soueraigne Lord. Comming to Babylon, hee was entertained by Seleucus with all possible demonstration of loue, and honoured with presents, beseming the Maiestie of a King. All this he accepted with great grauitie, as being due to him, and beganne to require an account of the reuenues of that Prouince. This demand Seleucus held vnreasonable; laying, that it was not needfull for him to render vnto any man an account of that Prouince, which was giuen vnto him, in respect of his many good seruices to the State. But whether he spake reason or no, it sufficed, that Antonius was powerful; who vrged him daily to come to a reckoning. Manifest it was, that neither want of money, nor any other necessitie, moued Antonius to presse him thus, but onely the desire to picke matter of quarrell against him, whereof it was likely that hee should find such issue, as Pithon and Pencestes had done. Therefore taking with him onely fiftie horse, he conueied himselfe away, and fled into Ptolomies Dominions; desiring him to protect him from the violence of such a man, as went about to oppress all, that in former times had bene his betters, or at least his equals. Antonius was glad of his flight; for now all those Countries were yielded vnto him without battaile, whereas to fight with Seleucus for them hee wanted all pretence; and to kill him it was not his desire, hauing receiued many benefits of him, and those not intermixed, as commonly it happens, with any injuries. Yet it is reported, that the Chaldeans brought a strange prophesie to Antonius, bidding him looke well to himselfe, and know, that if Seleucus did escape his hands, hee should recouer Babylon, yea, winne all Asia, and kill Antonius in battaile. Easie beleueers may giue credit to this tale. Had it bene true, me thinks, Antonius rather should haue hanged those Chaldeans, for giuing him no warning till it was too late, than sent pursuers (as they say that hee did) after him, whom the destinies preferred for so great purposes. When he had settled things at Babylon, he tooke his iourne into Cilicia, where hee wintred. There hee tooke vp ten thousand talents more of the Kings treasures, and casting his accounts, found his yeerely income to amount vnto eleuen thousand Talents.

¶ I.

The combination of PTOLOMIE, CASSANDER, and others, against ANTONIVS. Their demands, and his answer.

HIS great riches, and the rest of his power, made Antonius dreaded, enuied, and suspected, whereby hee quickly was embarked in a new War. Ptolomie, Cassander, and Lysimachus, had priuily combined themselves together, intending to hinder his further growth, and bring him to more reason, than of his owne accord he seemed like to yeeld vnto. Of their practices he had some notice; the good entertainment giuen vnto Seleucus, giuing him sufficient cause of mistrust. Therefore he sent Embassadors to them severally, entreating them to continue firme in their loue toward him, that would be readie to requite them with the like. The cold answers which they made, occasioned his hasty preparation against the most forward of them, which was Ptolomie; it being likely that a good arme should preuaile more than a faire message. Therefore, as soone as the season of the yere would permit, hee tooke the way toward Syria, and was encountered by Embassage from them all. These told him, that their Lords did much reioyce at his victorie, obtained against Eumenes their common enemy, and the honor that hee had thereby gotten. In which war, so far as much as they being his Confederates, must haue endured great losse with hazzard of their whole estates, if the contrary faction had preuailed, they held it verie iust, that all should be partakers in the fruits of that voyage, wherein they had been all adventurers. Wherefore they desired him, that making betwene them all an equall diuision of the treasures that were in his hands, (a thing easie to be done) he would also take some conuenient order for enlarging their Dominions, according to the rate of his new purchases. This might best bee to euery ones liking, if hee would make ouer Cappadocia, with Lycia, to Cassander; and Phrygia, bordering vpon the Hellepont, to Lysimachus; for whereas his own Dominions were so much extended Eastward by his late victorie, he might well spare some of those western Prouinces, to those that were seated in the West. As for Ptolomie, he would not craue any new addition, but rest contented within his owne Territories. Provided alwaies, that Seleucus their common friend, and partner in the late warre, might be restored to his owne, out of which he had bene driuen so iniuriously, that all of them were forced to take it deeply to heart; requiring amends, with his friendly consent vnto their demands, which otherwise they must labour to obtaine with armed hands. Antonius knew, that after many losses received, hee should yet be able to redreeme peace whensoever he listed, with these, or perhaps with easier conditions. Neither was he so weak, to giue away quietly any part of his strength into the hands of such bad friends, for feare only, lest it should bee taken from him perforce. Rather he hoped that he should be able to find them worse, more than enough to defend their owne. Therefore, hee roundly answered the Embassadors, that it was no part of his meaning to communicate with other men the profit of that victorie, which hee alone without other mens helpe had obtained. Though indeed they had already sufficiently gained by him, if they could see it, hauing by his means kept their governments, whereof they were like to be dispossessed by Polyperchon, and the counsell of estate in Macedon. But what marvaile was it, if they considered not how he had faued them, seeing one of them had forgotten the time, when comming to him as a fugitive, & begging succour, he was by his meere bountie relieued, and enabled to gett all that he now held? Cassander did not (said he) in those daies command me to surrender Provinces, and giue him his equall share of my treasures; but (for his Fathers sake) desired me to pittie him, and help him against his enemies: which I did; by lending him an Armie, and Fleet, on confidence whereof hee now presumes to threaten me. As for Selencus, how can he complaine of wrong, that durst not slay to plead his guilt? I did vsell him well; but his conscience told him that he had defruded ill: else he would not haue fled. Let them that so curiously search into my doings, consider well their owne, which some of them can hardly iustifie. I am now in the way to Syria, meaning to examine Ptolomies proceedings; and after him to deale with others, if they continue to prouoke me.

§. II.

The preparations and beginnings of the warres.

WHen the Embassadors were dismissed with this answer, nothing was thought vpon but warre. Antigonus perceiuing that he should bee²⁰ invaded from Europe, as soone as hee were entred into Syria; left his Nephew Ptolomie to guard the Sea coasts, and hinder Cassander from landing in Asia: giuing him also in charge, to drive out of Cappadocia some that were already sent ouer to molest him. Likewise he dispatched Messengers into Greece and Cyprus, not vnurnished of monie, to draw friends to his side, and raise vp troubles to his enemies. Especially, he laboured to make himselfe the strongest by Sea; to which purpose he rather hastened, than forelosed his iourney into Syria, that he might gett possession of Mount Libanus, which afforded many excellent commodities for building of a Nauie. Therefore, hauing erected Beacons, and laid post-horles throughout all Asia, to giue swift aduertisement of all occurrences,³⁰ hee invaded Syria, that was not held against him by any power sufficient to maintain the field.

Ptolomy lay in Egypt, the strength and heart of his Dominion, where he was beloued and honoured of the people as their naturall Lord: his other Provinces hee kept with a few Garrisons, better scruiing to containe the people within obedience, than to confront a forraigne enemy. So Antigonus tooke many Cities, and Places, of that Countrey, and beganne to sett great numbers of Artificers on worke in making ships, which was one of his most earnest cares. In these busineses he consumed a yecere and three months; not idly. For he tooke Ioppe, and Gaza, which were yeelded vnto his discretion, and well used. The strong Citie of Tyrus held out long, but was compelled in the end, by famine, to render it selfe vpon composition, that Ptolomies Souldiers might depart with their Armes; which was permitted.

Ptolomie was not asleepe, whilst these things were in doing, though he kept himselfe within the bounds of Egypt, as indeede it behoued him to doe. His forces were not able to stand against Antigonus in plaine field, but likely they were to increase, which made him willing to protract the time. Neuerthelesse by Sea (where his enemy was as yet vnready) he sent his Fleet into all quarters, whereof Selencus had the chiefe command.

Selencus passed with an hundred saile along the coast of Syria, in the full view of Antigonus, and his Armie, to their no little discomfort. He landed in Cyprus, which⁵⁰ was then gouerned by many petty Lords; of whom the greatest adhered to Ptolomie, the rest were, by the Factors of Antigonus, bought for him with gold, but now redeemed by the Egyptian with sharpe Steele.

The same commoditie of aide by Sea encouraged the President of Caria (called also also Cassander, but not the sonne of Antipater, how soeuer by the painefull and learned writer Reimerus Remezius, he is by some oversight, counted for the same) to declare for Ptolomie, and his Confederates, and busily employ in their quarrell all his forces, which he had hitherto kept in good neutralitie, and thereby enioyed rest; but now he threw himselfe into dangerous warre, choosing rather to vndergoe trouble at hand, than to fall vnder certaine ruine, though somewhat further distant, which would haue ouerwhelmed him, if Antigonus had beaten all the rest.

§. III.

How each partie sought to winne the assistance of Greece. ANTIGONVS his declaration against CASSANDER, ALEXANDER the sonne of POLISPERCHON resoluth from ANTIGONVS, who had set him vp.

IN the meane season all care possible was taken on both sides, to assure vnto them the people of Greece, whose aide which way soeuer it inclined was of great importance. Herein at the first, Antigonus sped so well by large effusion of his treasure, that hee drew to him the Lacedaemonians, and other Peloponnesians, of whom hee waged eight thousand, and caused Polyperchon (who had a good while made hard shifts) to rowle²⁰ himselfe againe, and taking vpon him the title of Capitaine of Peloponnesus, to make head against Cassander.

These hopeful beginnings encouraged him to proceed further in the same kind. Wherefore to make Cassander the more odious, hee called together both his owne Souldiers, and all the Greeks and Macedonians; that were to bee found thereabouts. To these he declared, That Cassander had very cruelly slain Olympias, mother to the great Alexander; and not herewith contented, had shut vp in close prison the poore Ladie Roxane, Alexanders wife, and his sonne begotten on her bodie. That all this proceeded from a desire to make himselfe King ouer the Macedonians; which will appeare by his enforcing the Ladie Thessalonica, Daughter to King Philip, a match³⁰ vnit for a man of no greater Parentage than he, to ioyne with him in marriage. That in meere despight of those dead Princes, Philip, and Alexander, hee had planned the Olympians, rooted out by Philip, in a new Citie by him built, and called by his owne name Cassandria; and had reedified the Citie of Thebes, which for the great treason of the inhabitants, was luellued with the ground by the victorious hand of Alexander. For these reasons hee required them to make a decree, that Cassander should restore to absolute libertie the Ladie Roxane, and her sonne; and should yeeld obedience to the Lord Lieutenant Generall of the Empire (by which name Antigonus himselfe was vnderstood) or else should be reputed a Traitor, and open Enemy to the State. Furthermore he propounded, that all the Cities of Greece,⁴⁰ should be restored into freedome; this he did, not because he was carefull of their good, but for the neede which he had of their assistance.

These things being decreed, Antigonus was perswaded, that not only the Greekes would adhere vnto him, as to their louing Patron, and fall off from Cassander; but that the Rulers of Provinces, who had hitherto suspected him as a man regardfull of nothing, but his owne benefite, would correct their opinion, and thinke him the most faithfull of all others to the Royall bloud. But concerning his loyaltye to the young Prince, the world was too wise to be deceived with vaine shewes. His vnder-taking for the libertie of the Greekes was more effectuall, and got easie belief, in regard of his present hatred to Cassander. Yet herein also Ptolomie strove to be as earnest as he, making the like decree, in hope to winne to himselfe that valiant Nation, which afforded men farre more seruiceable in warre, than were to be found in any Province of the Empire.

And this indeede was the point, at which both sides aimed. Wherein Antigonus intending to make all sure, deceived himselfe, not without great cost. For he gaue to Alexander the sonne of Polyperchon five hundred talents, willing him to set the warre on foot in Peloponnesus, whereby it might appeare, that on his side was meant nothing else, than what was openly pretended.

Alexander

In Peloponnesus, Cassanders men had, with much blood-shed, grievously afflicted the contrarie faction; and he himselfe perceiving, that they were more easily spoiled as enemies, than retained as friends, thought it the best way, to make what vie he could of them, that were not long like to continue his. Finally, perceiving that Alexander came furnished with plenty of gold, wherewith he was able, not only to winne the doubtful, but to corrupt such as might seeme best assured: hee thought it a good part of wisdom, to surrender vpon faire conditions, that which he could not assure himselfe to hold any long time by force. Therefore he sent one to deale with Alexander, about the matters in controuersie; letting him know, that Antigonus was verie skillful in setting men together by the eares, not caring who preuailed, but only desiring to haue them weary themselves, whilest he was busied elsewhere; that so at length he might finde opportunitie to set vpon the stronger. If therefore Alexander were so wise, as to keepe in his purse the five hundred Talents which he had, and without broke stricken, to receive the whole Lordship of Peloponnesus; it should be freely put into his hands by Cassander. Provided, that hee should from thenceforth renounce all confederacie made with Antigonus, and enter into a sure and faithfull league with Ptolomie, Cassander, and the rest of the Confederates. Otherwise, he might well perswade himselfe, that the Countrey which his Father could not keepe, when he was indeede the Lieutenant of the Empire, should not in haste be wonne by him, that was only the Factor of a proud inurious man, so stiling himselfe, but not acknowledged by others.

Alexander had liued a while with Antigonus since the beginning of these wars; among whose followers it was not hard to discover the intent, (which hee did not carrie verie secret) of making himselfe absolute Lord of all. Therefore he was soone entreated to accept so good an offer; and did not sticke to enter into that league, whereby he was to become a free Lord, and subiect vnto no mans controule.

Howbeit this his honour continued not long, ere he lost both it and his life together, by treason of the Sisyonians; who thinking thereby to haue made themselves free, were soone after vanquished in battaile by Cratespolis, Alexanders wife, a discrete and valiant Ladie. Shee in reuenge of her husbands death, crucified thirtie of the Citizens taken in fight; and hauing by severity taught them obedience, did afterwards containe her Armie in good order, and governed those places that shee held, with the loue and commendation of her Subiects and Neighbours.

§. IIII.

The Aetolians rise against Cassander in fauour of Antigonus, and are beaten. After and last armie of Antigonus, utterly defeated by PTOLOMIES Lieutenant. In what termes the warre stood at this time. ANTIGONUS drawes nearer to Greece.

ANTIGONUS, when he found, that with so much monie he had onely bought an enemy, beganne to raise troubles to Cassander and his other aduerfaries in Greece, by stirring vp the Aetolians against them; Likewise he laboured to winne to his partie the Ilands in the Greeke Seas, by whose assistance he might be the better able to deale with Ptolomie, that greatly preuailed by reason of his strong fleet. But neither of these attempts had the successe which he expected. The Aetolians, a factious Nation, and alwaies enuying the greatnesse of their Neighbours, were often in commotion, but so, that commonly their gaines equalled not their losses. Cassander wanne some of their owne Countrey; fortified the Acanians against them, and compelled Glaucaus, King of the Illyrians, whom he vanquished in battaile, to forsake their side, and binde himselfe to beare no Armes against Cassanders friends.

On the other side, as many pettie Ilands were drawne to ioyne with Antigonus: so the fleet of the Rhodians vnder Theodatus, who was Admirall to Antigonus, passing along the coast of Asia towards Cyprus, with an Armie vnder conduct of Perilaus marching on the shore for mutuall assistance, was quite overthrowne by Ptolomies Nauie. Polyestus, who in Ptolomies behalfe had been sent into Peloponnesus against Alexander, finding no neede of his seruice in that Countrey, because Alexander was come ouer to their side, returned homewards, and by the way heard of the course which these Antigonians held, whom he very cunningly surprisid. Hee rode with his Fleet behinde a Cape, which the enemies were to double; his Land-forces he placed in ambush, wherinto Perilaus falling was taken prisoner, with many of his men, and many were slaine, making little resistance. Theodatus the Admirall perceiving this, made all haste to helpe his fellows that were on Land; but while he with all his Fleet were intentiue only to that businesse, Polyestus appeared at their backs; who as soone as he perceived their disorder, halted about the Cape, and charging them behinde suffered not one of them to escape him. These ill tidings caused Antigonus to deale with Ptolomie about some composition. First, hee sent Embassadors; afterwards they met in person. But Antigonus would not yeeld vnto the demands of Ptolomie: so the parlie was vaine.

Hitherto each part seemed to haue indifferently sped in the Warre, and thereby to haue equal cause of hope and feare. This late victorie with the good successe of his affaires in Cyprus, did seeme to make amends to Ptolomie for his losses in Syria. Likewise the revolt of Alexander from Antigonus did equal the Confederacy, made betwene the Aetolians and him; as also those pettie skirmishes, that had bene in Asia the lesse, to Antigonus his aduantage, were sufficiently recompensed by others of like regard, but aduerse to him; and by the troubles brought vpon his estates in those parts by the two Cassanders.

Contrariwise, Antigonus valued the losse of his men, monie, and ships, no otherwise than as the paring of his nailes, that were left long enough, and would easily grow againe; but the enlargement of his Territorie by addition of Syria, he prized at a higher rate, as if thereby he had fed vpon a limbe of Ptolomies his enemy, and strengthened the body of his owne Empire. Concerning other accidents, whereof the good were hitherto sufficient to counterpoize the bad, he meant to proceed as occasion should direct, which commonly is not long wanting to them, that want no monie.

That which most molested him was the attempts of his enemies vpon Asia the lesse; wherein though as yet they had gotten little, yet had he cause to feare, lest the people being tyed vnto him by no bond of allegiance, might vpon small occasion revolt from him, to men of as honourable reputation as he himselfe. To prevent this, and to be neerer to Greece, he held it expedient for him to be there in person, where his affaires did seeme to prosper the worke, by reason of his absence. Therefore he left part of his Armie in Syria, vnder his sonne Demetrius, to whom being then but two and twenty yeeres old, he appointed many ancient Captaines as assistants, or rather as Directors: the rest he carried with him into Phrygia, where he meant to winter.

§. V.

§. V.

How LYSIMACHVS and CASSANDER vanquished some enemies; raised against them by ANTIGONVS. The good successe of ANTIGONVS in Asia and Greece: with the rebellion of many Cities against CASSANDER.

THe comming of Antigonus into those parts, wrought a great alteration in the procelle of his businesse thereabouts. For his enemies had short leisure to thinke vpon molesting him in Asia: they themselves were held ouer-hardly to their owne worke on Europe side. Semles a King of the Thracians, ioyning with some Townes that rebelled against Lysimachus, brought also the bordering Scythians into the quarrell. All these relied vpon Antigonus, who was to helpe them with monie, and other aide. The Ætolians likewise tooke courage, and rose against Cassander, having Acides, lately restored to the Kingdome of Epirus, their assistant. But Lysimachus gaue vnto his Rebels no time to confirme themselves. Hee sodainly presented himselfe before two of the Cities that had rebelled, and compelled them by feare to returne to their dutie. He fought a battaile with the Scythians, and wilde Thracians, and draue them out of the Countrie. Finally, he ouercame Seuthes; and following the heate of his victorie, slew Pausanias in battaile, whom Antigonus had sent ouer with an Armie; and all his men he did either put to ranfome, or fill vp with them his owne Bands. The like successe had Philip, Cassanders Lieutenant, against the Ætolians. For he waisted their Countrie; fought with the Epirotos, that came to helpe them; and after the victorie, fought againe with their forces ioynd in one, overthrowing them, and killing Acides that vnfortunate King. Finally, hee draue the Ætolians out of most of their Countrie, and forced them to seek their safetie among the wild Mountaines. Of the Epirotes he sent as prisoners to Cassander, the principall authors of the Kings restitution, and of the present Warre.

Yet these actions required some time, and wearied Antigonus his aduerfaries with painefull trauaile; after which they remained onely fauers. Antigonus himselfe at faire leisure, wanne all Caria the whilest, and sent Armies into Peloponnesus, and other parts of Greece, bestowing libertie vpon all the Cities he tooke out of Cassanders hands. The whole Countrie of Peloponnesus (excepting Steyon and Corinth) with the Ile of Eubœa, and many places of the firme Land, were by these meanes wonne to be his in true and vehement affection, ready to do or suffer any thing for him that had made for euident a demonstration of his readinesse, to giue them the libertie indeede, which others promised in idle words. Many States desirous of the same benefit, would faine haue shewed their good will; but they were kept in by Cassanders Garrisons, who was too wise to trust them loose. Therefore Antigonus made shew as if he would passe ouer into Macedon: by which terror he forced Cassander to repaire thither in al haste, with the best of his strength, leauing many good Townes of Greece so weakly guarded, that well they might take courage to helpe themselves, if any fortaile succour appeared. The aide which they desired was not long wanting. The Lieutenants of Antigonus, taking the aduantage of Cassanders departure, entred the Countrie; draue his Garrisons out of diuers Cities; forced the Governour of Athens to enter into league with their Lord; wanne the Citadell of Thebes, and set the people at libertie. This last action was somewhat remarkable. For Thebes had not long before beene raised out of her old ruines by the meere power of Cassander; of which act he was accused by Antigonus, as if it had beene some hainous crime. Yet now the same Antigonus winneth the Citie, and the loue of the Inhabitants, onely by expelling him that was their Founder. So much are men readier to thanke the Inreaser, than the Author of their good; and rather to looke forward vpon those hopes, which vainely they extend beyond all measure, than than backward vpon their miserable nullitie, that held them vncapable of being any thing.

§. VI.

Victories of PTOLOMIE by Sea. A great battaile at Gaza, which PTOLOMIE and SELEVCVS wanne, against DEMETRIUS the Sonne of ANTIGONVS.

AS the preface or neerenes of Antigonus gaue life to his affaires in the lower Asia, and Greece; so the desires of his enemies, taking aduantage of his absence, ruined the very foundations of those great works in the Easterne parts, wherewith in the yere preceding he had ouertopped them. The Ile of Cyprus, whose Princes wauered betwene contrarie affections, inclining one while to Antigonus, another while faintly regarding their couenant with Ptolomie, was visited by an Ægyptian fleet, wherewith Ptolomie, in his owne person, easily reduced them to a more settled order, putting some to death, carrying others away prisoners, and leauing a Lieutenant of his own appointment, Governour of the whole Countrie. With the same fleet he ranne alongst the Sea-coasts, waisting a great part of Caria and Cilicia, with the spoiles of which he enriched his followers, and returned loden to Cyprus Demetrius the sonne of Antigonus, hearing frequent reports of the miseries, wherewith his Fathers subjects were oppressed, made all haste out of Syria to the rescue, taking only his Horse and light-armed foot with him, because the businesse required expedition. But in vaine did he tire himselfe and his followers, in hastic seeking of one, that by lanching out into the deepe, could in a few minutes delude the labour of so many daies, if neede had so required. Answerable to the vanitie of this expedition was the successe. For Ptolomie was gone, before Demetrius came into Cilicia. Neither was it certaine, whether hauing lightened his ships of their burthen in Cyprus, hee would returne vpon those maritime Countreies; or make toward Syria, where his comming was expected. Hee was indeede gone into Ægypt, and there with Seleucus was describing a royall Armie, which he leuied with all conuenient speed, for the recovery of Syria. This was more than Demetrius knew. Therefore hee was faine to choose out of vncertainties the most likelihood, and returne the way that hee came, with all his companies, which were fitter for seruice in the open field, than to be bestowed in Garrisons among the Cilicians. He had scarce refreshed his Men and Horses in Syria, when the newes arriued of Ptolomies comming with a puissant Armie, to giue him battaile. Hereupon he called to counsaile his principall friends, who aduised him to giue way to the time, & expect some better opportunity in the future: being a yong man, and weakly furnished with meanes to resist such ancient and famous Generals, as Ptolomie and Seleucus. His counsaile seemed rather to proceede from the cold temper of those aged men that gaue it, than from any necessity growing out of the present businesse. For Demetrius considering himselfe to be the sonne of Antigonus, and now Generall of his Fathers Armie, thought his owne title waightie enough to be laid in ballance against the bare names of those two great Commanders. Neither found he much reason that should moue him to distrust his forces, as insufficient. His men were better exercised than the enemies, and promised as much as could be required. Therefore perswading himselfe, that such odds of number, and of great fame, would rather serue to adorne his victorie, than hinder him in obtaining it, he resolved to put the matter to trial, without expecting the aduantage of more help. So animating his Soldiers with hope of spoile and rewards, he abode the comming of the Enemies at Gaza, with purpose to encounter them, as soone as they had finished their wearisome iourne ouer the Deserts of Arabia.

Ptolomie

Ptolomie and Selenus issuing out of such a Province, as Egypt, came so well provided of all necessities, that their Armie felt not any great grievance of the cull way, when battaile was presented them, which confidently they undertooke. In all things else they had the odds of Demetrius; of Elephants they were utterly unprovided. But how to deale with those beasts they were not ignorant. They had prepared a kinde of Palisado, fastened together with chaines, and sharpened in such manner, that the Elephants could not seeke to breake upon it, without receiving much hurt. The rest of their forces, which (besides that they had advantage in multitude) were heartened with many fortunate services, by them performed that yeere, whilst the enemies had wearied themselves, either with vaine iournies, or long and dulling expectation, they disposed in such order, as best answered to the forme, wherein Demetrius was embattailed. The fight beganne, and was maintained with equall courage, for a long time, each part striving more to winne honour, than to satisfie any other passion, as having little cause of hatred, or revenge. But after some continuance, the greater number holding better out, the error of Demetrius, who upon no necessitie would needs fight a battaile with disadvantage, beganne to appeare by his losses. Hee had committed himselfe to Fortune, having more to lose by her then he could get: but in this fight shee was idle, and left all to be decided by strong hands; unless it may be said, that the terror brought upon his men, by the losse of his Elephants, was bad luck. Those beasts were in that kinde of warre hardly to be resisted on plaine ground, and therefore at the first they made great spoile amongst Ptolomies men. Afterward seeking to breake through the Palisado, they were sorely hurt, and every one of them taken. This disaster caused the Horsemen of Demetrius to faint. They had laboured hard, and prevailed little, till now perceiving that all must lie upon their hands, who were ill able to make their owne places good, they beganne to shrink, and many of them to provide for their safetie by timely flight, which example the rest quickly followed. When Demetrius had strouen so long in vaine to make his men abide, that hee himselfe was likely to be lost; he was faine to give place to the stronger, making a violent retreat as farre as to Azotus, which was about thirtie miles from the place of battaile. A great part of his carriages was in Gaza, whither some of his company turned aside, hoping to save such goods, as in haste they could pack vp. This foolish couetousnes was their destruction, and the losse of the Towne. For whilst they forgetfull of the danger, had filled the streets with sumpter Horses, & cloied vp the gates, thronging, some to get in and fetch others, to carrie out what they had already laden, Ptolomies Armie brake in without resistance, taking them with their goods and the Citie altogether.

This victorie restored vnto Ptolomie the best part of Syria, a Province more easie in those times to get, than to keepe; and opened the way vnto all the greatnesse of Selenus. For betweene Gaza and Phœnicia no place offered resistance. In Caloſyria and Phœnicia, some townes held out a while, but were soon taken in by Ptolomie. Among these were the great Cities of Tyrrus and Sidon; of which Sidon was given vp by the Inhabitants; Tyrrus by the Garrison, falling to mutinie against their Capitaine; who trusting to the strength of it, had made great vaunts, but was pardoned by Ptolomie, and honourably entertained, in respect of his fidelitie.

How Selenus recovered Babylon, and made himselfe Lord of many Countries in the highest Asia, The Rise of the Kingdome of the Greeks, which beganne with the Dominion of Selenus.

While Ptolomie followed his businesse with such prosperitie, Selenus tooke leave of him, and went vp to Babylon, to trie his owne fortune; which hee found so favourable, that recovering first his owne Province, hee became length master of the better part of Alexanders purchases.

This expedition of Selenus was very strange, and full of vnlikelihoods. His traine consisted of no more then eight hundred foote, and two hundred horse, a number too small to have been placed as Garrison, in some one of those maine great Cities, against which he carried it into the higher Asia. But little force is needfull, to make way into strong places, for him that already stands possessed of their hearts which dwell within the walls. The name of Selenus was enough; whom the Babylonians had found so good a Governour, that none of them would finde courage to resist him; but left that worke to Antigonus his owne men, wishing them ill to speede. Some of the Macedonians that were in those Countries, had the like affection; others made a countenance of warre, which by easie compulsion they left off, and followed new Ensignes. This added courage to the people, who came in apace, and submitted themselves ioyfully to Selenus. In a defection so generall, it was not a safe course for the Antigonians, to thrust themselves into the Townes of most importance: for every man of them should have been troubled with daily enemies, in his owne lodging. It remained that they should issue forth into the field, and trie the matter by fight. But the treason of one principall man, who revolted to the enemy, with more then a thousand Souldiers following him, so dismayed the rest, that they did no more then seeke to make good one strong place, wherein were kept the Hostages and Prisoners, that Antigonus held for his securitie in those quarters. This Castle, belike, they had not fortified in times of leisure, against dangers, that were not then apparent. Selenus quickly tooke it; and so got the entire possession of Mesopotamia and Babylon.

Antigonus had bestowed in Media and Persia, forces convenient for defence of those Provinces, that were the vtmost of his Dominion. In the Countries about Euphrates he had not done the like: for his owne great Armie lay betweene them and all enemies. Therefore when the victorie at Gaza had opened vnto Selenus the way into those parts; hee found little impediment in the rest of his businesse. Having now gotten what he fought; it behoued him to seeke how he might keepe his gettings: for his owne forces were too small, and his friends were ill able to lend him any more. That which his friends could not doe for him; his enemies did. Nicanor, to whom Antigonus had committed his Armie in Media, ioyning vnto himselfe, out of Persia and other Countries, all needfull helpe came with ten thousand foote, and seuen thousand horse, either to save all from being lost, or to drive Selenus out of that which he had wonne.

Against this power, Selenus had only foure hundred horse, and somewhat about three thousand foot, where with to oppose himselfe: his large conquest of vnwarlike Nations having yielded him many louing subiects, but few souldiers. Therefore when his enemies were neere to the Riuer of Tigris, hee withdrew himselfe from the place where his resistance was expected, into certaine marishes not farre off; where he lay secretly waiting for some advantage. Nicanor thought that hee had bene fled, and was the lesse carefull in fortifying his campe. In recompence of this vaine securitie, his campe was taken by surprise, the first night of his arruall; the the Satrapa, or Lieutenant of Persia, together with sundry of the Captaines, were slaine, he himselfe was druen to flee for his life into the Desarts; and the whole Armie yielded vnto Seleucus: whose gentle demeanour, after the victorie, drew all Media, Susiana, and the Neighbour Prouinces, to acknowledge him their Lord without any further stroke stricken.

This victorie of Seleucus gaue beginning vnto the new stile, of The Kingdome of the Greekes, an accompt much vled by the Iewes, Chaldeans, Syrians, and other Nations in those parts. I will not make any long disputation about the first yeere of this Æra. The authoritie of that great Astrologer Ptolemy, from which there is no appeal, makes it plain, that the five hundred and nineteenth yeere of NABONASSAR, was the fourescore and two yeere of this accompt. Other inference hereupon is needlesse, than that note of the learned GAVRICVS, That the first of these yeeres was reckoned compleat, as Babylon, together with the end of foure hundred thirte and eight yeeres after NABONASSAR. With the obseruation of the Saturne, recorded by Ptolemy, agrees (as it ought) the calculation of Bunting; finding the same Planet to haue beene so placed in the signe of Virgo, as the Chaldeans had obserued it, in the same yeere; which was from Nabonassar the five hundred and nineteenth; from Seleucus the fourescore and two yeere; and the last of the hundred thirte and seuenth Olympiad. These obseruations of the Celestiall bodies, are the surest markes of time: from which he that wilfully varies, is inexcusable. As for such occurrences in Historie, and the yeeres of succeeding Princes (that are not seldom ambiguous, by reason of vncremembered fractions) they seem to be here againe, it is not greatly materiall. Yet thus much is worthy of note; that these yeeres of the Greekes were not reckoned in all Countries from one beginning; as plainly appears in the difference of one yeere, that is found betweene actions, related by the seuerall Authors of the two Bookes of the Machabees, who follow diuers accompts. Hee that shall adhere to the time defined by Ptolemy, may apply the other supputations thereunto, as being no farther from it, than a yeeres distance.

§. VIII.

How PTOLOMIE lost all that he had wonne in Syria. What the causes were of the quiet obedience, performed vnto the Macedonians, by those that had beene subiect vnto the Persian Empire. Of diuers petite enterprizes, taken in hand by ANTIGONVS and DEMETRIVS, with ill successe.

IN a happy houre did Seleucus aduenture, to goe vp to Babylon, with fo few men as his friend could then well spare: for had he staid longer vpon hope of getting more Soldiers, Ptolemy could haue spared him none at all. Demetrius the sonne of Antigonus, hauing lost the battaile at Gaza, receiued from Ptolemy all his owne goods, his Pages, and Seruants, in free gift, and therewithall a courteous message, to this effect: That no personall hatred was the ground of this Warre, which hee and his Confederates held with Antigonus; but only termes of honour, wherein they would seeke to right themselves after such manner, that other friendly Offices, without reference to the quarrell, should not be forgotten.

This Noble dealing of Ptolemy, did kinde in Demetrius an earnest desire of requiting him, with some as braue liberalitie. Which to effect, he gathered together 50 the remainder of his broken troups; drew as many as could be spared, out of the Garrisons in Cilicia, or other Prouinces therabouts, and aduertising his Father of his misfortune, besought him to send a new supply, wherewith he might redeeme his honour lost. Antigonus, vpon the first newes of this ouerthrow, had said,

Tha

That the victorie which Ptolemy wanne vpon a beardedle Boy, should bee taken from him by bearded men: yet vpon desire that his sonne, whom hee tenderly loued, should amend his owne reputation. He was content to make a stand in Phrygia. Ptolemy hearing of Demetrius his preparations, did neuerthelesse follow his owne businesse in Calasyria; thinking it enough, to send part of his Armie vnder Cilles his Lieutenant, againt the remnant of those, that had beene already vanquished, when their forces were entire. This peraduenture would haue beene sufficient: had not Cilles too much vnderualued the power of such an Enemy. Hee thought that this yong Gallant, hauing lately saved his life by flight, would now be more carefull of 10 hauing a faire way at his back, than aduenturous in setting further forward; and then vrgent reason should prouoke him. In this confidence he passed on withoutall feare; as one that were already Master of the field, and should meete with none, that would issue out of their places of strength, to make resistance. When Demetrius was informed of this carelesse march; he tooke the lightest of his Armie, and made his iourne with such diligence, one whole night, that early in the morning, hee came vpon Cilles vnexpected, and was on the suddaine, without any battaile, Master of his Campe: taking him aliue, with his Souldiers, and their carriages all at once.

This exploit serued not onely to repaire the credit of Demetrius, which his losse at Gaza had almost ruined: but further it enabled him, to recompence the bountie of 20 Ptolemy, with equal fauor, in restoring to him Cilles, with many other of his friends, accompanied with rich presents. But neither was Ptolemy to weaken by this losse, nor Demetrius so emboldened by his victorie, that any matter of consequence thereupon ensued. For Demetrius feared the coming of Ptolemy; and therefore hee fortified himselfe in places of aduantage: Ptolemy on the other side was loth to engage himselfe in an enterprize, wherein he might perceiue, that if the coming of Antigonus found him entangled, he should either bee druen to make a shamefull retreat, or a dangerous aduenture of his whole estate, in hope of not much more than alreadie he possessed.

Antigonus, indeede, was nothing slow in his way towards Syria; whither hee 30 made all haste, not so much to rescue his sonne, as to embrace him. For hee rejoyced exceedingly, that the yong man had so well acquitted himselfe, and being left to his owne aduice, performed the office of a good Commander. Wherefore to increase the reputation of this late victorie, he brought such forces, as might serue to re-conquer all Syria; meaning, that the honour of all, should be referred vnto the good foundation, layed by his sonne; whom from this time forwards, he imploied in matters of greatest importance.

Ptolemy had now lesse reason, to encounter with Antigonus, than before his coming to haue assailed the Campe of Demetrius. Yet he made it a matter of consolation; as if he had dared more than he meant. But all his Capitaines aduised him 40 to retire into Egypt; alleging many good arguments, to that purpose: which they might well perceiue to be agreeable to his owne intent, by his propounding that course; not without remembrance of the good successe against Perdiccas, in the like defensive warre. So he departed out of Syria, preserving his honour; as being rather led by mature deliberation, than any suddaine passion of feare; and hee departed at faire leisure, not onely carrying his treasures along with him, but flying to dismantle some principall Cities, that he thought most likely to trouble him in the future. All the Countrie that hee left at his back, fell presently to Antigonus, without putting him to the trouble of winning it by pieces: so easie was it in those times, for the Captaine of a strong Armie, to make himselfe Lord of a great Prouince.

We may iustly wonder, that these Kingdomes of Syria, Media, Babylon, and many other Nations, (which the victorie of Alexander had ouer-runne, with so hastie a course, as gaue him not leisure to take any good view of them) were so easily held not onely by himselfe, but by the Capitaines of his Armie after him. The hot con- 50 tentions tentions for superiority between the King of Israel, and those of Damascus; between Aegypt, and Babylon, Babylon, and Ainene; the Persians, and many Countries; argue a more manly temper, to haue once bene in those people; which are now so patient of a forraigne yoke, that like Sheepe or Oxen, they suffer themselves to be distributed, fought for, wonne, lost, and againe recovered, by contentions Matters; as if they had no title to their owne heads, but were borne to follow the fortune of the Macedonians. This will appeare the more strange, if wee shall consider, how the severall States of Greece (many of which had neuer possessed so large Dominion, as might cause their Spirits to swell beyond their ability) did greedily embrace all occasions of libertie; and how these proud Conquerours were glad to offer it, desiring to haue them rather friends than seruants, for feare of further inconuenience.

It muſt therefore be noted, that moſt of theſe Countries had alwaies bene ſubject vnto the rule of Kings, or petty Lords, whom the Babylonians and Persians long ſince had rooted out, & held them in ſuch bondage, that few of them knew any other Law, than the command of forraigne Matters. This had vtterly taken from them all remembrance of home-borne Princes, & incorporated them into the great body of the Persian Empire: ſo that wanting within themſelves all ſoueraigne power, or high authority, the life & ſpirit of euery Eſtate; they lay aſe dead, and were bereaued of motion, when that Kingdome fell, whereot they lately had bene members.

Why the Persian Satrapas, or Princes of that Empire, did not when Darius was taken from them, as the Macedonian Captaines, after the death of Alexander, ſhould lay hold vpon thoſe Provinces, which had many ages bene ſubject vnto them, and ſearce foure yeeres in quiet poſſeſſion of their enemies, or why at leaſt they contended not (when the terrible name of that great Conquerour did caſe to affright them) to get their ſhares among his followers, if not wholly to diſpoſſeſſe them of their new purchaſes: it is a queſtion, wherein, who is not ſatisfied, may find no leſſe reaſon to ſuſpect the Hiſtorie, than authority to confirme it. For we ſeldome reaſe, that any ſmall Kingdome, preuailling againſt a farre greater, hath made ſo entire a conqueſt, in the compaſſe of ten yeeres, as leſt vnto the vanquiſhed no hope of recovery, nor meanes to rebell; eſpecially when ſuch diſorders, or rather vtter conſuſion hath enſued, by the furie of ciuill warre among the Victors.

The cauſe why the Macedonians held ſo quietly the Persian Empire, is well ſet downe by Machiavell; and concerneſ all other Kingdomes, that are ſubject vnto the like forme of Government: the ſumme whereof is this. Whereſoeuer the Prince doth hold all his Subjects vnder the condition of ſlaues; there is the conqueſt eaſie, and ſoone aſſured: Where ancient Nobilitie is had in due regard, there is it hard to winne all, and harder to keepe that which is wonne. Examples of this are the Turkiſh Empire, and the Kingdome of France. If any Inuaider ſhould preuaile ſo farre vpon Turkie, that the great Sultan and his Children (for brethren hee vſeth not to ſuffer alie) were taken or ſlaine: the whole Empire would quickly bee wonne, and eaſily kept, without any danger of rebellion. For the Baſſies, how great ſouer they may ſeeme, are mere ſlaues; neither is there in all that large Dominion, any one man, whoſe perſonall regard could get the people to follow him in ſuch an attempt, where in hope of priuate gaine, ſhould not counteruaile all apparent matter of feare. Contrariwiſe, in France, it were not enough for him that would make a conqueſt, to get into his hands the King and his Children; though hee further got the better part of the Countie, and were by farre the ſtrongest in the field. For, beſides the Princes of the Royall bloud, there are in that Kingdome ſcore of great men; who are mightie in their ſeueral Countries, and hauing certaine Royalties and Principalties of their owne; are able to raiſe Warre, in all quarters of the Realme; whereunto the remembrance of their owne ancient Families, and long continued Nobilitie, will alwaies ſtirre vp and inflame them, ſo that vntill euery one piece were wonne, and euery one (an endleſſe work) of the chiefe Nobilitie, brought brought vnder or delroyed, the victorie were not compleat, nor well aſſured. It is true, that ſuch power of the Nobilitie, doth often-times make way for an Inuaider; to whom the diſcontentments of a few can eaſily make a faire entrance. But ſuch aſſiſtants are not ſo eaſily kept, as they are gotten: for they looke to bee ſatisfied at full in all their demand; and hauing what they would, they ſoone returne to their old allegiance, vpon condition to keepe what they haue, vnleſſe they be daily hired with new rewards: wherein it is hard to pleaſe one man, without offending another as good as himſelfe. The Turke, on the other ſide, needes not to feare any perill, that might ariſe from the diſcontented ſpirits of his principall men. The great- eſt miſchiefe that any of them could work againſt him, were the betraying of ſome frontier Towne, or the willfull loſſe of a battaile: which done, the Traitor hath ſpent his ſling, and muſt either flie to the enemy, whereby he loſeth all that hee formerly did hold, or elſe, in hope of doing ſome further harme, he muſt adventure to excuſe himſelfe vnto his Maſter, who ſeldome forgiues the Capitaine, that hath not ſtriven by deſperate valour againſt miſfortune. As for making head, or arming their followers againſt the great Sultan, and ſoiourning themſelves vnto any Inuaider; it is a matter not to be doubted: for none of them haue any followers or dependants at all, other than ſuch, as are ſubject vnto them, by vertue of their Offices and Commiſſions. Now as this baſe condition of the principall men, doth leaue vnto them no meanes, whereby to oppoſe themſelves againſt the flouriſhing eſtate of their Prince; ſo would it weaken both their power and their courage in giuing him aſſiſtance, if aduerſitie ſhould make him ſtand in neede of them. For there is ſcarce any one among the Turkeſh Baſſies, or prouinciall Governours, that knowes either from whence hee was brought, or from whom defended, nor any one among them, that by the loſſe and vtter ruine of the Turkiſh Empire, can loſe any ſhor of his proper inheritance, and it is the proper inheritance of the ſubiect, which is alſo a Kingdome vnto him, which makes him fight with an armed heart againſt the Conquerer, who hath no other deuice painted on his Enſigne, than the picture of ſlaucerie.

As is the Turkiſh Empire, ſo was the Persian, void of libertie in the Subjects; and vtterly deſtitute of other Nobilitie, than ſuch as depended vpon mere fauour of the Prince. Some indeede there were of the Royall bloud, and others, deſcended from the Princes that ioynd with Darius, the Sonne of Hſtaſpes, in oppreſſing the Magi: theſe were men of reputation in Persia; but their reputation conſiſted only in their Pedigree, and their ſaſetic in not meddling with affaires of State, which made them little eſteemed. In what ſmall account theſe Persian Princes were held, it may appeare by this, that the King, Vncles, Couſin Germans, and Brethren, were called by the Kings, Their Slaves, and ſo did ſtile themſelves, in ſpeaking vnto theſe great Monarchs. That vpon euery light occaſion of diſpleaſure they were handled as Slaves; it is eaſie to be diſcerned, in that example of crueltye, praſt by Xerxes vpon his owne brother Mſites, which hath bene formerly noted, in place more conuenient. As for the Satrapas, or Governours of the Provinces, it is needleſſe to cite examples, prouing them to haue bene mere ſlaues: it may ſuffice, that their heads were taken from them at the Kings will; that is, at the will of thoſe Women and Eunuchs, by whom the King was gouerned.

To this want of Nobilitie in Persia, may be added the generall want of libertie conuenient among the people: a matter no leſſe available, in making eaſie and ſure the conqueſt of a Nation, then is the cauſe aſſigned by Machiavell. For as Aſeſpe his Aſſe did not care to runne from the enemies, becauſe it was not poſſible, that they ſhould loade him with heavier burthens, then his Maſter cauſed him daily to beare: ſo the Nations, that endure the work vnder their owne Princes, are not greatly fearefull of a forraigne yoke; Nor will be haſtic to ſhake it off, if by experience they finde it more light, then was that whereunto they had bene accuſtoaccustomed. This was it that made the Gaſcoignes beare ſuch faithfull affection to the Kings of England; for that they gouerned more mildly than the French: this enlarged the Venetian iuriſdiction in Lumbardie; for the Townes that they wanne, they wanne out of the hands of Tyrannous oppreſſors: and this did caule the Macedonians, with other Nations, that had beene ſubiect vnto the poſteritie of Alexanders followers, to ſerue the Romans patiently, if not willingly; for that by them they were eaſed of many burthens, which had beene impoſed vpon them by their owne Kings.

So that of this tameneſſe, which we finde in thoſe that had beene ſubiects of the Perſian Kings, the reaſons are apparent. Yet ſome of theſe there were, that could not ſo eaſily be contained in good order by the Macedonians: for they had not indeede beene abſolutely conquered by the Perſian. Such were the Sogdians, Bactrians, and other Nations about the Cauſian Sea. Such alſo were the Arabians bordering vpon Syria: againſt whom Antigonus ſent part of his Armie; thinking therewith to bring them vnder, or rather to get a rich bootie. The Captaine that he ſent, fell vpon the Nabathians; at ſuch time as they were buſied in a great Mart, wherein they traded with the more remote Arabians, for Myrrhe, Frankincenſe, and other ſuch commodities. All or moſt of theſe rich wares, together with ſiue hundred taents of ſiluer, and many priſoners, the Macedonians laid hold vpon: for their coming was ſuddaine, and vnexpected. But ere they could recover Syria,²⁰ the Nabathians ouertooke them, and finding them wearie with long marches, made ſuch a ſlaughter, that of foure thouſand foot, and ſixe hundred horſe, onely ſittie horſes eſcaped. To reuenge theſe loſſes, Demetrius was ſet out with a greater power: yet all in vaine; for he was not reſiſted by any Armie, but by the natural defence of a vaſt Wilderneſſe, lacke of water, and of all things neceſſarie. Therefore he was glad to make peace with them; wherein he loſt not much honour: for they craued it, and gaue him preſents. Returning from the Nabathians, hee viewed the Lake Alphalites, whence he conceiued hope of great profit that might be raiſed, by gathering the Sulphure. With this good buſbandrie of his ſonne, Antigonus was well pleaſed; and appointed men to the worke: but they were ſlaine by the Arabians,³⁰ and ſo that hope vaniſhed.

Theſe petty enterpriſes, with the ill ſucceſſe accompanying them, had much impaired the good aduantage againſt Ptolomee: when the newes of Selenus his victories in the high Countreies, marked all together. For neither was the loſſe of thoſe great and wealthy Prouinces, a matter to be neglected, neither was it ſafe to tranſport the warre into the parts beyond Euphrates, whereby Syria and the lower Aſia ſhould haue beene expoſed, to the danger of ill-affected Neighbour. A middle courſe was thought the beſt; and Demetrius, with ſittene thouſand foot and three thouſand horſe, was ſent againſt Selenus. Theſe forces being ſent away, Antigonus did nothing, and his ſonne did leſſe. For Selenus was then in Media; his Lieutenants about Babylon withdrew themſelues from neceſſitie of fight; ſome places⁴⁰ they fortified and kept; Demetrius could hold nothing that he got, without ſetting in Garrifon more men then he could ſpare; neither did he get much; and therefore was faine to ſet out the brauerie of his expedition, by burning and ſpoiling the Countreie; which he did thereby the more alienate, and as it were acknowledge to belong vnto his enemy, who thenceforth held it as his owne aſſured.

Antigonus had laid vpon his ſonne a peremptorie commandement, to returne vnto him at a time preſcribed: reaſonably thinking (as may ſeeme) that in ſuch an vnſettled ſtate of things, either the Warre might bee ended, by the furie of the firſt brunt; or elſe it would bee vaine to ſtrive againſt all difficulties likely to ariſe, where want of neceſſaries ſhould fruſtrate the valour, that by length of time was like to become leſſe terrible to the Enemy. Demetrius therefore leauing behind him ſiue thouſand foot, and a thouſand horſe, rather rather to make ſhew of continuing the warre, than to effect much, where himſelfe, with greater forces could doe little more then nothing, forſooke the enterpriſe, and went backe to his Father.

A general peace made and broken. How all the houſe of ALEXANDER was deſtroyed.

²⁰ Beſides that maine point, of retaining the Prouinces which euery one held, there were two Articles of the peace, that gaue a faire, but a falſe colour, to the bulineſſe: That the ſonne of ALEXANDER by ROXANE, ſhould be made King, when hee came to fullage; and, That all the Eſtates of Greece ſhould be ſet at libertie. The aduancement of yong Alexander to his Fathers Kingdome, ſeemes to haue bene a matter, forcibly extorted from Antigonus; in whom was diſcouered a purpoſe, to make himſelfe Lord of all. But this, indeede, more neerely touched Cauſander. For in his cuſtodie was the yong Prince and his Mother: neither did hee keepe them in ſort auſerable to their degree; but as cloſe priſoners, taken in that warre, wherein they had ſcene the old Queene Olympias taken and murdered, that ſought to haue put³⁰ them in poſſeſſion of the Empire. The mutuall hatred and feare betwene them, rooted in theſe grounds, of iniuries done, and reuenge expected; vpon this concluſion of peace, grew vp ſalter than any time before, in the heart of Cauſander: who ſaw the Macedonians turne their fauourable expectation, towards the ſonne of their late renowned King.

All this, either little concerned Antigonus; or tended greatly to his good. The yong Prince muſt firſt haue poſſeſſion of Macedon: whereby Cauſander ſhould be reduced to his poore office, of Captaine ouer a thouſand men, if not left in worſe caſe. As for them that held Prouinces abroad, they might either doe as they had done vnder Arideus; or better, as being better acquainted with their owne ſtrength. He in⁴⁰ the meane time, by his readineſſe to acknowledge the true Heire, had freed himſelf from that ill-fauoured imputation, of ſeeking to make himſelfe Lord of all that Alexander had gotten.

The like aduantage had he in that Article, of reſtoring the Greekes to their libertie. This libertie had hitherto bene the ſubiect of much idle diſconſe: but it neuer tooke effect. Antigonus held ſcarſe any Towne of theirs, Cauſander occupied moſt of the Countreie: which if hee ſhould ſet free; hee muſt be a poore Prince; if not; there was matter enough of quarrell againſt him, as againſt a Diſturbur of the common peace.

In the meane ſeaſon, the Countreies lying betwene Euphrates and the Greeke ſeas;⁵⁰ together with a great Armie, and monie enough to entertaine a greater, might ſerue to hold vp the credit of Antigonus, and to raiſe his hopes, as high as euer they had bene.

With much diſaduantage doe many men contend, againſt one that is equall to them

them all in puillance, Cassanders friends had left him in an ill case; but he could not doe withall: for where every one mans helpe is necessarie to the warre, there may any one make his owne peace; but no one can stand out alone, when all the rest are wearie. The best was, that hee knew all their affections: which tended to no such end as the becoming Subjects vnto any man; much lesse to the sonne of an A-fatique woman, of whom they had long since refused to heare mention. Therefore he tooke a short course, and cauled both the child & his Mother to be slaine: freeing thereby himselfe in a trice, from the dangerous necessitie of yeelding vp his gouernement, which he must haue done when the child had come to age. Roxane was a Ladie of singular beauty, was perhaps the cause, why Perdiccas desired to haue her sonne, being as yet vnborne, proclaimed Heire to the great Alexander. Immediately vpon the death of Alexander, (he had vsed the fauour (if it were not loue) of Perdiccas, to the satisfying of her own bloudy malice, vpon Statira, the Daughter of King Darius; whom Alexander had likewise married according to the custome of those Countries, wherein pluralitie of wiues is held no crime. For hauing by a counterfeit letter, in Alexanders name, gotten this poore Lady into her hands, shee did, by assistance of Perdiccas, murder her and her Sister, and threw their bodies into a Well, causing it to be filled vp with earth. But now, by Gods iust vengeance, were she and her sonne made away, in the like secret fashion; euen at such time, as the neere approaching hope of a great Empire had made her life, after a wearisome imprisonment, grow dearer vnto her than it was before.

The fact of Cassander was not so much detested in outward shew; as inwardly it was pleasing vnto all the rest of the Princes. For now they held themselves free Lords, of all that they had vnder them; fearing none other change of their estates, than such as might arise by chance of warre; wherein every one perswaded himselfe of successe, rather better than worse. Heereupon all of them (except Lysimachus and Seleucus, that had worke enough at home) beganne to rowze themselves: as if now the time were come, for each man to improve his owne flock. Antigonus his Lieutenants were buile in Peloponnesus, and about Hellepont: while their Master was carefull in following other, and some greater matters that were more secretly to be handled. He pretended the libertie of Greece: yet did the same argument minister vnto Ptolomie, matter of quarrell, against both him and Cassander; Ptolomie complaining (as if he had taken the matter deeply to heart) that Antigonus had put Garrisons into some Townes, which ought, in faire dealing to be set at libertie. Vnder colour of redressing this enormitie, he sent an Armie into Cilicia; where he wan foure Townes, and soone after lost them, without much labour of his owne or his Enemies.

After this, putting to Sea with a strong Fleet, hee ranne along the coast of Asia, winning many places; and in that voiage allured vnto him a nephew of Antigonus (a good Commander, but discontented with the ill requitall of his seruices) whom finding shortly, as false to himselfe as he had bene to his owne Vncle, he was faine to put to death. But in doing these things, his desire to see the Greekes at libertie, appeared not so plaine, as he wished that it should: for their case was no way bettered, by his molesting Antigonus in Asia. Therefore to get the loue of that valiant Nation, He made at the last an expedition into Greece it selfe: where hauing set free some little Ilands, and landed in Peloponnesus, he raised fo great an expectation of finishing the long desired worke, that Cratesipolis, the Widdow of Alexander, Polyperchon sonne, gaue vp into his hands the Townes of Sicyon and Corinth.

Ptolomie had conceived a vaine beliefe, that the Greekes emboldened by his countenance and assistance, would all of them take heart, and rise vp in armes; whereby with little labour, their libertie might be gotten; and hee beacknowledged as Author of this immortal benefit. But long seruitude had wel-neere extinguished the ancient valour of that Nation: and their ill fortune, in many likely attempts recouer

recouer freedome, had so tired their spirits, that they would no more stirre in pursuit thereof; but sat idly still, as wishing it to fall into their mouths.

The Lacedaemonians, about these times, beganne to fortifie their Towne with walls; trusting no longer in their vertue (for both it, and the discipline that vpheld it were too much impaired) that had been a wall to their Towne and Territorie.

The Athenians were become as humble seruants, as they had been, in times past, insolent Masters: erecting as many statues in honor of Demetrius Phalerus, as there were daies in the yeere. This Demetrius was now their Gouernour; and hee gouerned them with much moderation: but in spite of their hearts, as being set ouer them by Cassander. By this base temper of the principall Cities, it is easie to gather, how the rest of the Countrey stood affected. Ptolomie could not get them, to set their helping hands, to their owne good; and to furnish him with the promised supplies of monie and victuals. Credible it is, that he had a true meaning to deliver them from thraldome; as iudging the commoditie that would arise by annexing them to his partie, a matter of more weight, than the losse that Cassander should receiue thereby, who could hardly retaine them, if once Antigonus tooke the worke in hand. But when he found such difficultie in the businesse, hee changed his purpose: and renewing his former friendship with Cassander, he retained Sicyon, and Corinth in his owne possession.

Before the coming of Ptolomie into Greece, Cassander had bene held occupied with very much worke. For (besides his paines taken in warres among barbarous Princes) hee found meanes to allure vnto himselfe, the Lieutenants of Antigonus, that were in Peloponnesus, and about Hellepont: making his own advantage, of their discontentments. By the like skillfull practice, Hee freed himselfe from a greater danger: and made those murders which he had committed seeme the lesse odious, by teaching his enemies to doe the like. Old Polyperchon, that had made fo great a stirre in the raigne of Arideus, did after the death of Roxane and her Child, enteragaine vpon the Stage; leading in his hand another sonne of the great Alexander, an I meaning to place him in his Fathers Throne.

The name of this yong Prince was Heracles: hee was begotten on Barsine, the Daughter of Artabazus a Persian; but had bene lesse esteemed than the sonne of Roxane, either for that his Mother was helde no better than a Concubine, or else perhaps, in regard of the fauour which Perdiccas, and after him Olympias, did beare vnto Roxane. At this time, the death of his brother had moued such compassion, and regard of his being Alexanders only liuing child, had procured vnto him such good will, that the demand which Polyperchon made in his behalf, was deemed very iust and honourable. There were indeede more hearts then hands, that ioyned with this yong Prince: yet wanted he not sufficient strength of hands, if the heart of him that least ought, had not bene most false. Cassander had raised an Armie, to withstand his entrie into Macedon: but little trust could hee repose in that Armie, whose wilhes he perceived to be with Heracles. Therefore hee assailed Polyperchon himselfe with gifts and promises; wherewith at length hee preuailed so farre, that the old Villaine was contented to murder his Pupill, choosing rather with many curses, and foule dishonour, to take the offered Lordship of Peloponnesus, and Commander of an Armie; than to purchase a Noble fame with dangerous trauaile, in maintaining his faith, vnto both his dead and liuing Soueraignes.

Antigonus had not all this while bene asleepe; though his losses were hitherto the chiefe witnesses, of his hauing bene a stirrer in these commotions. He thought it enough for him at the present, to retaine his owne: and therefore tooke order for the recouerie of those places, which Ptolomie had taken paines to winne. As for the rest, it no way grieved him, to see Cassander incurre the generall hatred of men by committing those murders, of which the profit was like to redound vnto him that was the most powerfull: or to see Polyperchon and Ptolomie swear, in a busie warre against against Cassander. If they would haue continued their quarrels, he could well haue afforded them leisure, and haue thought the time well spent, in beholding their contentions. For hee was thoroughly perswaded, that when the rest had wearied themselves in vaine with long strife, his armies and treasures, wherein he exceeded them all, would bring all vnder. According to these haughtie conceits, he demeaned himselfe among his followers; looking big vpon them, and like a King before his time. This was it that caused so many of them, to reuolt from him: but it was no great losse to be forsaken by those that looked with enuious eyes vpon that fortune whereon their owne should haue depended. Against this enuie of his owne men, and the malice of others, Antigonus busily sought a remedie, such as was like to giue him a goodly title to the whole Empire.

Cleopatra, Sister vnto the great Alexander, lay for the most part in Sardes; whom he had a great desire to take to wife. This his desire was not without good hope: for howloeuer shee discovered much willingness thereunto, yet was shee in his power, and might therefore be entreated, were it onely for feare of being enforced. But it was not his purpose, to get her by compulsiue meanes: either because his fanatic being an old man, was not ouer-violent; or rather because his ambition, whereunto all his affections had reference, could haue made small vse of her, by doing such apparent wrong. Shee had bene married vnto Alexander King of Epirus, after whose death shee came to her brother in Asia; hoping, belike, to finde a new husband in his Campe. But neither any of those braue Captaines, that were, in times following, so hot in loue with her, durst then aspire vnto her marriage: nor did her brother, full of other cares, trouble himselfe with providing her of an husband. Shee therefore, being a luttie widow, suffered her blood, so farre to preuaile against her honour, that shee supplied the want of an husband by entertainment of Parramours. Alexander hearing of this, turned it to a iest: saying, that shee was his sister, and must be allowed this libertie, as her portion of the Empire. When by his death, the Empire lay in a manner, void, and the portion due to her therein, grew, in mens opinion, greater than it had bene: then did many seeke to obaine her, while shee herselfe desired only a proper man, with whom she might lead a merrie life. To this purpose did shee inuite Leonatus vnto her; who made great haste; but was cut off by death, ere he came to her presence. Now at the last, after long tarrying, shee had her choice of all the great Commanders: Antigonus, Ptolemeus, Lysimachus, and Cassander, being all her earnest wooers. All these (Antigonus excepted) had wiues already, Ptolemeus had many wiues, and many Concubines, whom he respected as much as his wiues, being noted of too much dotage in that kinde. This hindered not his futeperadventure it aduanced it, by giuing to Cleopatra, some hope of mutuall toleration. To him therefore she bequeathed her selfe, and was taking her iourne from Sardes towards him; when Antigonus his Deputie in that Citie, made her to stay, vntill his Matters further pleasure should be knowne. Antigonus had now a Wolfe by the eares; he neither could well hold her, nor durst let her goe. Shee would not be his wife; he had none honest pretence to force her; and to keepe her prisoner, had bene the way by which he might haue incurred a general hatred, lasting perhapp beyond her life; as the course taken by Cassander against Roxane (a Ladie lesse respected than Alexanders owne sister) did well testifie. Therefore he thought it the wisest way to procure her death: for to let any other enjoy the commoditie of so faire a riele to the Kingdome, it was no part of his meaning. To this purpose he sent instructions to the Governour of Sardes; willing him in any case to doe it secretly. Sothe fact was committed, and certaine women about her put in trust with the murder: which women afterwards were put to death, as y^e mischievous conspirers against the life of that good Ladie. So was Antigonus freed from blame, at the least, in his owne opinion: but the world was lesse foolish, than so to be so deluded. How the murder was detected, wee need not aske: for seldom is that bloudie crime vnreuealed; and neuer so ill smothered, as when great persons are the Authors.

Thus was the whole race of Philip and Alexander the Great extinguished, and it was extinguished by the hands of such as thought vpon nothing lesse than the execution of Gods iustice, due vnto the crueltie of these powerfull, but mercilesse Princes. Wherefore the ambitious frames, erected by these Tyrants, vpon so wicked foundations of innocent blood, were soone after cast downe, ouerwhelming themselves or their children, with their ruines, as the sequelle will declare.

How Demetrius, the sonne of Antigonus, gaue libertie to Athens, expelling the Garrison of Cassander, out of those parts. The immoderate honors decreed by the Athenians to Antigonus and Demetrius.

One being left aloue, that had any title to the Kingdome; it stood with good reason, that they which were Lords of the Provinces, acknowledging no Superior, should freely protest themselves Kings in name, as they were already in substance. Yet had this name ill becomed the weaker, while the strongest of all did forebear it: neither seemed it conuenient in the judgement of Antigonus, to crowne his last action with such a title, as if he had attained vnto greatness by that foule murder, the infamie whereof he was carefull how to discharge from his owne head. He purposed therefore to vndertake a plausible enterprise, even the libertie of Greece: whereby it was apparent, that he might get such honour as would not onely drowne all bad reports, but make him be thought equal to any name of royaltie, whereof in seeming modestie, hee was not conceitious. To this purpose, hee deliuered a strong Armie, with a Naue of two hundred and fiftie saile, and fife thousand talents of silver, vnto Demetrius his sonne: willing him to beginne at Athens; and thence to proceed, in setting all the Countrey free.

Demetrius came to Athens before he was expected: so that without resistance he entred the Hauens; it being thought that a flect of Ptolemeus, Cassanders good friend, had bene arriued. But when it was knowne, both who he was, and what was the cause of his coming; the joy of the Citizens brake out into loud acclamations; Demetrius Phalerens forsooke the Towne, and withdrew himselfe to Thiber, vnder safe conduct; onely the Garrison in Megara strove to make good that piece, which after a while was wonne vpon them by force. During the siege of Aten; chica, Demetrius went to Megara; whence he expelled the Garrison of Cassander, and so restored the Citie to libertie.

I thinke it not impertinent, sometimes to relate such accidents, as may seeme no better than meer trifles: for euen by trifles, are the qualities of great Persons as well disclosed, as by their great actions; because in matters of importance, they commonly straine themselves, to the obseruance of general commended rules; in lesser things they follow the current of their owne Natures. The Ladie Cratesipolis lay in Patras, and had a great desire to see Demetrius; hoping, belike, that she might, by his meanes, better her estate, and recover her Townes of Syeon and Corinth, detained by Ptolemeus, to whose Lieutenant, in those places, Demetrius before his departure out of Greece, offered monie for the surrender of them. Yet the onely business pretended was loue. He being advertised hercof, left his forces in the Countrey of Atagara, and taking a companie of his lightest armed, for guard of his person, made a long iourne to meete with her. This troupe also, hee caused to lodge a great great way from his Tent, that none might see her when she came. As closely as the businesse was carried, some of his enemies had gotten knowledge of it; whereby they conceived good hope, that the diligence of a very few men, might overthrow all the great preparations of Antigonus; and bring him to any termes of reason, by taking his deare sonne prisoner. Their project fell but a little short of the effect. For they came so suddainly vpon him, that hee had no better shift, than to muffle himselfe in an old cloake, and creepe away disguised, leaving them to ransack his Tent. There was in this Prince a strange medly of conditions; especially an extreme dissolutesse in wanton pleasures, and a painefull industrie in matter of warre. He was of a most amiable countenance, a gentle nature, and a good wit; excellent in devising Engines of warre, and curious in working them with his own hands. He knew better how to reforme his bad fortune, then how to rule his good. For aduersitie made his valour more active; prosperitie stupified him with an overweening, wherein he thought, that he might doe what he listed. His fortune was as changeable, as were his qualities: turning often round, like the picture of her wheele, till shee had wound vp the threed of his life, in such manner as followeth to be shewed.

Returning to his Campe, and finishing his businesse at Megara; hee resolved no longer to attend the issue of a siege, to assault Munychia by force, that so hee might accomplish the libertie of Athen; which, untill it was fully wrought out, he refused to enter into the Citie. Munychia was strongly fortified: yet by continuance of the assault, the multitude without, through help of their Engines that scoured the walls, prevailed vpon the resolution of those that lay within it, and wanne the place in two daies. The walls, and all the defences of that piece against the Citie, were leuelled with the ground, & so was it freely put into the Citizens hands, to whom withall was giuen their libertie, with promise to aide them in maintaining it.

The fame of this action was lowder, than of any other victory, gotten by Demetrius with greater skill and industrie. For the Athenians, hauing forgotten how to employ their hands, laboured to make vp that defect with their tongues: conuerting to base flatterie, that eloquence of theirs, which the vertues of their Ancestors had suted vnto more manly arguments.

They decreed, vnto Antigonus and Demetrius, the name of Kings; they consecrated the place, in which Demetrius leaped from his Chariot, when he entered their Citie, and built there an Altar, calling it of Demetrius the a-lighter; they called them by the Names of the gods their saviours, ordaining that euery yeere, there should be chosen a Priest of these gods; and further, that such as were employed by their State, in dealing with either of these two Princes, should not be called Embassadors, but Theori, or Consulters with the gods; like as were they, whom they sent vnto the Oracle of Iupiter or Apollo.

It were a fruitlesse diligence, to rehearse all their flatteries; these being so grosse. Hereby they not only corrupted the yong Prince; but made that acclamation, which best would haue pleased the old man, to bee of no vse. For hee could not handsomely take vpon him the name of King, as imposed by the Athenians; vnlesse hee would seeme to approoue their vanitie, in loading him with more than humane honors. Yet was hee so tickled, with this their slye handling him, that when their Theori, or Consulters came shortly after, desiring him to relieue them with Corne, and Timber to build ships; he gaue them almost a hundred thousand quarters of wheat, and matter sufficient to make a hundred Gallies. So gracious was his first Oracle: or rather, so weake is great power in resisting the assaults of flatterie.

§. XI.

§. XI.

The great victorie of Demetrius against Ptolomie in Cyprus. How Antigonus and Demetrius tooke vpon them the stile of Kings; wherein others followed their example.

From this glorious worke, Antigonus called away Demetrius, vnto a businesse of greater difficultie: meaning to employ his seruice against Ptolomie in Cyprus. Before his departure out of Greece, he was willed to establish a generall Counsaile, that should treat of matters, concerning the common good of the Countrie. About the same time, Antigonus withdrew his owne Garrison out of Inabros, committing their libertie entire, into the peoples hands; whereby it might appeare, that as he would not permit any other to oppresse the Greekes, so would he be farre from doing it himselfe. This was enough, to hold his reputation high, amongst these new purchased friends: it followed, that hee should conuert his forces, to the winning of ground vpon his Enemies.

A pittifull Tragedie had lately happed in Cyprus; through the indiscretion of Meneleus, Ptolomies brother, and his Lieutenant in that Isle. Nicoles, King of Paphos, was entred into some practice with Antigonus: yet not so farre that he thought himselfe past excuse; by which confidence, hee was perhaps, the more easily deceived. To cut off this negotiation, & the false-hearted King of Paphos at one blow, Meneleus was sent thither: who surrounding Nicoles his house with Souldiers, required in Ptolomies name, to haue him yielded to the death. Nicoles offered to cleere himselfe; but Meneleus told him, that die he must, and bade him come forth quietly. This desperate necessitie caused the vnhappie King to rid himselfe of life: and his death strooke such an impression into his wife, that she not onely slew her selfe, but perswaded the wiues of her husbands brethren, to doe the like. Also those brethren of Nicoles, vnto whom Ptolomie had intended no ill, being amazed with the suddainesse of this calamitie, did shut vp the Palace, and setting it on fire, consumed it, with all that was in it, and themselves together.

Whatsoever the crime objected was; Nicoles perished as a man innocent, because he was not suffered to make his answer. Of this sad accident, though Meneleus deserued the blame, for his rigoros proceeding: yet is it to be thought, that much dislike fell also vpon Ptolomie: as men that are grieved, cast an ill affection, euen vpon those, that gaue the farthest remoued occasion.

Not long after this, Demetrius came into Cyprus, with a power sufficient, against any opposition that Ptolomie was like to make. The Cypriots did little or nothing against him: either because they had small strength, or for that they held it a matter indifferent, whom they acknowledged as their Lord, being sure that they should not themselves haue the rule of their owne Countrie. Meneleus therefore, out of his Garrisons, drew forth an Army, and fought with Demetrius. But hee was beaten, and driuen to saue himselfe within the walls of Salamis; where he was so hardly besieged, that without strong succour hee had no likelihood to make good the place, much lesse to retaine possession of the whole Iland. His greatest helpe at the present, was the fidelitie of his Souldiers; whom no rewards could winne from him, nor good vsage (when any of them were taken prisoners, and inrolled in the enemies bands) keepe from returning to him, with the first opportunitie. Most of them were Mercenaries: but all their goods were in Aegypt, which was enough to keepe them faithfull. Yet could not this their resolution haue stood long, against the odds of number, which Demetrius had of men as resolute, and against his terrible Engines of batterie, if Ptolomie had not halted to the rescue.

Ptolomie brought with him, a hundred and fortie Gallies, besides two hundred ships ships of burden, for transporting his Armie and Carriages. This fleet made a terrible shew, when it was descried a farre; though more than halfe of it, was vnfit for seruice, in fight at Sea. Wherefore to make the opinion of his forces the more dreadful, Ptolomie sent vnto Demetrius, a threatening message: willing him to be gone, vnlesse hee would bee ouerwhelmed with multitudes, and trampled to death in a throng. But this young Gallant repaid him with words of as much brauerie, promising to let him escape, vpon condition, that hee should withdraw his Garrisons out of Siegon and Corinth.

Demetrius had no more then one hundred and eightene Gallies; but they were, for the most part, greater than those of Ptolomie; better stored, with weapons fit for that seruice; and very well furnished with Engines in the prowes, to beat vpon the Enemy. Neuerthelesse he stood in great doubt of threescore Gallies that lay in the Hauens of Salamis, left Menelaus with them should set vpon his back: in which case, it was likely that all should goe very ill with him. Against this mischiete, hee bestowed two of his owne Gallies in the mouth of that Hauen, to keepe Menelaus from issuing forth, and setting his horse-men on the shore, to giue what assistance they could, be with the rest of his fleet, puts to Sea against Ptolomie.

The fight began early in the morning, and continued long, with doubtfull success. The Generals were not ranged opposite one to the other; but held each of them the left wing of his owne fleet. Each of them preuailed against the Squadron where with hee encountered; but the success of Demetrius was to better purpose. For his victorie in one part was such, as caus'd others to fall out of order, and finally draue all to betake themselves vnto speedie flight. As for Ptolomie, he was faine to leaue his aduantage vpon the enemy in one part of the fight, that hee might relieue and animate those of his owne which needed him in another. Wherein hee found his losse ouer-great to be repaired, by contending any longer against the fortune of that day; and therefore he laboured only to saue himselfe, in hope of better euent, that might follow some other time.

There fell out in this battaile no vnusuall accident; yet was the victorie greater then could haue bene expected. The occasions whereof were, partly the great skill in Sea-seruices, which the Greekes and Phenicians, that were with Demetrius, had, about those which followed Ptolomie: partly the good furniture of the Ships, wherein consisted no lesse, than in the qualitie of those with whom they were manned. Further, wee may reasonably iudge, that the two hundred ships of burthen, carrying the strength of Ptolomies Armie, did not more encourage his owne men, and terrifie his enemies the day before the fight; than breed in each part the contrary affections, when in the beginning of the fight, they fell off, and stood aloofe. For though it were fitting, that they should so doe; yet a multitude, prepossessed with vaine conceits, will commonly apprehend very slight occasions, to thinke themselves abandoned. Besides all this, the expectation, that Menelaus issuing with his fleet out of Salamis, should charge the enemies in Rerne, was vtterly frustrate. Hee was kept in perforce, by the ten ships appointed to barre vp the mouth of the Hauen: which they manfully performed, as great necessitie required.

Such disappointment of expectation, doth much abate the courage of men in fight; especially of the assailants: whereas on the contrarie, they that finde some part of their feares vaine, doe easily gather hopefull spirits, and conceiue an opinion of their owne abilitie to doe more than they had thought vpon, out of their not suffering the harme that they had imagined.

Whatsoever the causes of this victorie were, the fruit was very great. For Ptolomie had no more than eight Gallies that accompanied him in his flight: all the rest of his fleet was either taken, or sunk. Neither did Menelaus any longer strive against the violence of Fortune; but yielded vp all that hee held in Cyprus, together with his Armie, consisting of twelue thousand foote, and a thousand and two hundred horse, horse, and those Gallies in the Hauen of Salamis. The same deiection of Spirit was found in the common Souldier, as well that was taken at Sea, as that had seru'd the Egyptian by Land: none of them repoling any more confidence in Ptolomit, but willingly becoming followers of a new Lord, whose Armie they now increased.

It was generally beleueed, that much more depended on the euent of this fight, than the Ile of Cyprus; for which they contended. Wherefore the common expectation was great; especially Antigonus, whom it most concerned, was deeply perplexed with cares, thinking euery day a yeere, till hee were aduertised of the issue. In this moode Ariflodemus found him, a notable flatterer, whom Demetrius had honoured, with the Message of these good newes. Ariflodemus had bethought himselfe of a trick, whereby to double the welcome of his ioyfull errand: He caus'd his ships to ride at Anchor, a good distance from the shore; hee himselfe landed in a Cock-boat, which he sent immediately backe to the ship; and so all alone, he went forward, looking very sadly that no part of his tidings might appeare in his countenance. Report of his arriual (for it was not knowne where he had been) came presently to Antigonus, who sent Messenger after Messenger, to meet him on the way, and bring speedie word how all went. But neither any answer, nor so much of a looke, as might intimate the purport of his errand, could bee wonne from this demure Gentleman. Thus marched he faire and softly forward, with a great throng at his heeles (that serued well to set out his Pageant) vntill he came in sight of Antigonus; who could not containe himselfe, but went downe to meet him at the Gate, and heare the newes. Then did Ariflodemus, vpon the suddaine, with a high voice salute Antigonus by the name of King; vntering the greatnesse of the victorie (with as much pompe, as before he had couered it with silence) in the hearing of all the people; who with loud acclamations, gaue that name of King, both to Antigonus, and to his sonne Demetrius. Antigonus, in requittall of the long suspense, wherein Ariflodemus had held him, said that it should also be long ere hee receiued his reward. But the title of King, together with the Diademe, which his friends did set on his head, he could not with a fairer occasion to assume: wherefore he readily accepted them, and sent the like to his sonne.

When it was once noised abroad, that Antigonus and Demetrius called themselves Kings; it was not long ere their fellowes were readie to follow the good example. Ptolomie his friends would by no meanes endure, that their Lord should be thought a man deiect for the losse of a fleet: therefore they saluted him also King. Lysimachus in Thrace had boldnesse enough, to put the Diademe about his owne head. Seleucus had, before this time, among the Barbarous people, taken vpon him as King: but now he vs'd the stile indifferently, as well among the Greekes and Macedonians, as in dealing with others. Only Cassander held himselfe contented with his owne name: whereby howsoever he might shadow his pride, he no way lessened the fame of his crueltie, against his Masters house. But the name which before, his sonnes, after him, were bold to vsurpe, though with ill success, as wil appeare, when they shall enter vpon the Stage; whereon these old Tragedians, vnder new habits, as no longer now the same persons, beginne to play their parts, with bigger looks, and more boisterous actions, not with greater grace and iudgement, than in the Scenes already past.

Of the warres betweene the Kings of Ægypt, Asia, Macedon, Thrace, and others: untill all ALEXANDERS Princes were consumed.

§. I.

The Expedition of ANTIGONVS against Ægypt, with ill successe.

ALL the rest of these Kings had taken that name vpon them, an imitation of Antigonvs himselfe, as becoming his greatnesse: which was such as gaue him hope to swallow them vp, together with their new titles. Being not ignorant of his owne strength, hee resolved to single out Ptolomie, and make him an example to others: who should hardly be able to stand, when the greatest of them was fallen. To this purpose hee prepared an Armie of eighteene thousand foot, and eight thousand horse, with foure-score and three Elephants: as likewise a fleet of a hundred and fiftie Gallies, and a hundred ships of burden. The Land-forces hee commanded in person: of the Name Demetrius was Admirall.

When all was readie for the iourney, the Sea-men aduised him to stay yet eight dayes longer, and expect the setting of the Pleiades. But his hastie desire to preuent all preparations for resistance that Ptolomie should make, reiected this counsaile; imputing it rather to their feare than skill: wherefore he departed from Antigonia (a Towne which he had built in Syria, and called after his owne name, that was soone changed into Selenia, by his mortall Enemy) and came to Gaza; where hee met with his fleet. The neerer that he drew to Ægypt, the more haste hee made: thinking by celeritie to preuaile more then by his great power. He caused his Souldiers to carrie ten daies prouision of victuals; and had many Camels laden with all necessaries for passing the Darys, ouer which he marched with no small toyle, though he met with no resistance. At Mount Cassius, which is neere adioyning to Nilus, he law his Fleet, riding at Anchor, not farre from the shore; in ill case, and many ships wanting. It had bene sorely beaten with foule weather, wherein some were lost, others driuen back to Gaza, or scattered elsewhere into such creeks as they could recover: Demetrius himselfe, with the best and strongest vessels, did so long beat it vp against the winde, that all his fresh water was spent; in which extremitie, he and all his must haue perished, had not the tempest cea'd when it did, and Antigonus appeared in sight, from whom these ouer-weared, thirsty and Sea-beaten Souldiers receiued reliefe. After these painefull trauailes there followed a Warre no lesse painefull than to little purpose; for Ptolomie had so fortified all the passages vpon the Riuer of Nilus, as he assured himselfe either to ende the warre there, or if his euards should happen to be forst, yet could it not be done, but so much to the weaking of the Assailants, as he should afterward, with a second Armie (which he held entire) entertaine the Inuader vpon aduantage enough. All that Antigonus fought, was to come to blowes pecdily: Ptolomie on the contrarie, to beat Antigonus by the belly. It is true that Nilus gaue him water enough, but wood hee had none to warme it, and while Antigonus assaulted the Rampiers raised vpon the Riuer in vaine, Ptolomie assaid the faith of his Souldiers with good successe, for with great gifts, and greater promises, he ferried them ouer so fast, as had not Antigonus thrust some assured Regiments, vpon the passages next the enemie, and in the meane while taken a resolution to returne, Ptolomie had turned him out of Ægypt, ill attended.

Some of them indeede he laid hands on, in the way of their escape, and those hee put to death with extreme torments; but in all likelihood with the same ill successe that Perdicas had formerly done, when he inuaded Ægypt: had he not readily removed his Armie further off, from the noise of their entertainment, that had already bene wonne from him. To preuent therefore as well the present danger of his stay, as the shame following a forst retrain, hee secretly practized the aduice of his Councell, vpon whom the burden must be laid of his entrance, and leaving Ægypt.

It is indeede lesse predudiciall in such like cases, that errors, dishonours, and losses, be laid on Councellours and Captaines, than on Kings, on the Directed, than on the Director: for the honour and reputation of a Prince is farre more precious, than that of a Vallall. Charles the first, as many other Princes haue done, laide the losse and dishonour hereciued in the inuasion of France, by the way of Prouince, to Antonie de Lesa, whether iustly or no, I know not; but how foucra all the Historians of that time agree, that the sorrow thereof cost that braue Captaine his life. Certainly to giue any violent aduice in doubtfull enterprises, is rather a testimonie of loue, than of wisdom, in the giuer; for the ill successe is alwaies cast vpon the Councell, the good neuer wants a Father, though a false one, to acknowledge it. Yet I haue sometime knowne it, that great commanders, who are for the present in place of Kings, haue not only bene dissuaded, but held in a kinde by strong hand, from hazarding their owne persons, and yet haue those kinde of Mutiners neuer bene called to a Marshalls Court.

§. II.

How the Citie of Rhodes was besieged by DEMETRIVS.

HIS departure of Antigonus left behinde it many dead carcasses, and a great deale of ioi in Ægypt. Ptolomie held a solemne feast, and sent Messengers abroad, laden with glad newes, to Selenus, Lysimachus, and Cassander, his Confederates: strongly encouraging all that side with the report of this his late felicitie, though it appeared but in a defenseiue warre. Antigonus on the contrarie flattered himselfe with another interpretation, calling the ioies of his enemies for witness of his owne greatnesse, seeing they arose but from so little things: his enemies being but bare sauers by the last bargain, and himselfe, as he supposed, hauing lost but a little time, and no part of his honour in the late retrain. How foucra it were, yet he meant to follow his affaires henceforth in another fashion, for that which he could not cleaue a-funder by great blowes, he purposed by little & little to pare off, by cutting off the branches first, to fell the Tree it selfe with the more facilitie. To effect which, hee resolved (leaving the great ones to grow awhile) to roote vp the Dependants of his Enemies: Dependants, whom the forenamed Confederates should be forst, either to relieue, or to loose; and hereby he doubted not, to draw them into the field, where the aduantage of power, and of all other warlike prouisions, promised him victorie.

At this time the Citie of Rhodes was very mightie, being well gouerned, and hauing long held it selfe in good Neutralitie, it drew the better part of all the trade of those parts, and thereby a great deale of riches to it selfe, to maintaine which, and to increase it, it furnished and kept on the Seas a Fleet of well armed ships, by which it not only beat off all Pyrates and pettie Theues, but the reputation of their strength was thereby so much increased, as all the Neighbour Princes sought their alliance and confederacie.

In this so dangerous time (in which they must either refuse all that sought them, and so stand friendlesse and apart, or ioyne themselves to some one; and thereby forgoe the peace, by which their greatnesse had growne) their affections carried them to the Aegyptians: both because the greatest part of their trade lay that way, as also for that Antigonus his disposition, greatnesse, & neighbourhood was fearful vnto them. This affection of theirs, with some other passages, more apparent; gaue argument of quarrel to Antigonus, who began to declare himselfe against them by pettie iniuries, of taking some of their ships, with such other grieuances, while he made a more weightie preparation, to pursue the warre against them, openly & strongly. All things soone after ordered according to the greatnesse of the enterprise, hee employed his sonne Demetrius against them in their owne Iland, who brought such terrour vpon the Citizens, that laying aside all respect of friendship and honour, they offered him their assistance, and seruice against whomsoever Demetrius, who knew from whence this change came, and that the alteration was perswaded by feare, and not by loue, raised his demands to an intolerable height, requiring a hundred Hostages to be deliuered him, and libertie to lodge in their Port as many ships of warre as himselfe pleased. These conditions more properly to be imposed vpon a State already conquered, then on those who as yet had heard of nothing but a constrained assistance, restored vnto the Rhodians their lost courage, and made them resolute to defend their libertie to the last man: this taught them to infranchise all their able bond-men, and wisely rather to make them their fellow-Citizens, than to make themselves fellow-slaves with them.

Demetrius having refused the faire conditions offered, (as the Rhodians the fearefull ones propounded vnto them) makes preparation for a long siege, and finding no appearance to carrie the place in furie, he set in hand with his Engines of battell; in the inuention and vse of which, he neuer shewed himselfe a greater Artisan, than in this warre. But in conclusion, after the Citizens had sustained all the assaults giuen them for a whole yeere, after many braue sallies out of the Towne, and the famine which they endured within the Towne, which had proued farre more extreme, if Ptolomie had not with many hazards relieved them, Demetrius by mediation of the Grecian Embassadors, gaue ouer the siege; a hundred Hostages they gaue him for performance of the peace made, but with exception of all the Magistrates and officers of the Citie.

Hereunto Demetrius was brought by the vsuall policie of warre, and state: for while with the flourish of his fathers forces, he lay before Rhodes, Cassander recovered many of those places in Greece, which Demetrius had formerly taken from him, neither did Cassander make the warre as in former times, by practice and surprise, but by a strong and well compounded armie, which hee himselfe led as farre as into Attica, and therewith greatly distressed and indangered Athens it selfe. On the other side (though with lesse successe) did Polyperchon invade Peloponnesus. These dangerous vndertakings vpon Greece, aduised the Athenians and Ætolians to dispatch their Embassadors towards Demetrius, and aduised Demetrius, rather to abandon the enterprise of Rhodes, than to abandon the great honour which hee had formerly gotten, by setting all Greece at libertie.

Demetrius was no sooner out of the Iland, then that the Rodians erected statues in honour of Lysimachus, & Cassander, but for Ptolomie, whom they most affected, and from whom they received their most reliefe, they consulted with the Oracle of Iupiter, whether it were not lawfull to call him a God. The Priests which attended in the Temple

Temple of Isomon, gaue the same faire answer for Ptolomie, which they had formerly done for Alexander his Matter, for as Alexander consulted the Oracle with an Armie at his heeles; so was Ptolomie at this time Lord of the soile: and yet was this a farre more cleanly creation, than that done by the Athenians, who Deified Antigonus and Demetrius, by decree of the people. A madage it was, when so many of Alexanders Captaines not content themselves with the stile of Kings, but that they would needes be called gods.

§. III.

How Demetrius prevailed in Greece. Cassander desires peace of Antigonus, and cannot obtaine it. Great preparations of warre against Antigonus.

DEMETRIUS comming with a strong Fleet and Armie into Greece; quickly draue Cassander out of Attica, and pursuing his fortune, chased him beyond the straits of Thermopyle. Herein his reputation did much auail him; which was so great, that sixe thousand of his enemies Souldiers revolted vnto him. So partly by the greatnesse of his name, partly by force, he recovered in short space all that Cassander held in those straits, and giuing libertie vnto the people, he bestowed vpon the Athenians those peeces, which had bene fortified against them, to blocke them vp. Then went he into Peloponnesus, where he found the like, or more ealie successe: for hee suddenly tooke Argos, Corinth, Sicyon, and the most of the Countie, bestowing libertie vpon such as needed it. The Towne of Sicyon hee translated by consent of the Citizens, from the old seat into another place, and called it after his owne name Demetrius. This done, he betook himselfe to his pleasure: At the Isthmian games, he caused himselfe to be proclaimed Capitaine General of Greece, as Philip and Alexander had been in former times: whereupon (as if he were now become as great as Alexander) hee despised all others, making it a matter of iest, that any, saue himselfe or his father, should vsurpe the name of King. But in his behauiour hee was so farre vnlike to a King, that in all the time of his leisure, hee deserved none other name then of a drunken Palliard. Yet were the Athenians as readie as euer to deuise new honours for him: among which they made one decree, that whatsoever King Demetrius should command, ought to be held sacred with the gods, and iust with Men.

All Greece being now at the disposition of Antigonus, Cassander stood in great feare, lest the warre should fall heauily vpon him in Macedon: which to auoide, he knew no better way, then to make peace with his enemies betimes. And to that purpose hee sent Embassadors; but had no better answer from Antigonus, then that he should subnit his whole citate to his discretion. This proud demand made him looke about him, and labour hard in soliciting his friends, both to assist him, and take heede to themselves; neither found hee them slow in apprehending the common Danger: for Lysimachus knew, that if once Cassander had lost Macedon, Demetrius would soone be Master of Thrace. Neither were Ptolomie and Selenus ignorant of that, which was like to befall them, if Antigonus were suffered to put himselfe in quiet possession of those Prouinces in Europe. Wherefore it was agreed, that with ioynt forces they should all together set vpon the common Enemy.

Hereof Antigonus had notice: but scorned all their preparations, saying, That hee would as ealie scatter them, as a flocke of Birds are driuen away with a stone. With these conceits hee pleased himselfe, and no way hindred the proceedings of his Enemies. He lay at that time in his Towne of Antigonia (a name that it must shortly loose) where he was carefully providing to set out some stately game and Pageants, in ostentation of his glorie. But thither was brought vnto him the tumultuous newes of Lysimachus his victories about Hellepont. For Cassander had committed vnto Lysimachus part of his forces, wherewith to passe ouer into Asia, while himself with the rest should oppose Demetrius on Europe side. So Lysimachus passing the Hellepont, beganne to make hot warre vpon the subiects of Antigonus; getting some of the Cities in those parts, to ioyne with him, by faire means; winning others by force, and waiting the Countrey round about.

To repress this vnexpected boldnesse, Antigonus made hastie iournies, and came soone enough to recouer his losses, but not strong enough to driue Lysimachus home, or compell him to come to battaile. Lysimachus waited for the coming of Seleucus; keeping himselfe the whilest from necessitie of fighting. But Babylon was farre off; and Seleucus his preparations were too great to be soone in a readinesse. The Winter also did hinder his journey: which forced them on both sides to rest in some quiet, without performing any matter of importance. This delay of debating the quarrell in open field, held all those Nations in a great suspence, and bred much expectation. Yet might all haue come to nothing, had not Antigonus beene so froward, that hee refused to yeelde vnto any peaceable conditions. At length Seleucus drew neere with a mighty Armie of his owne (for hee had gathered strength in that long time of leisure, which Antigonus had giuen him) and with great aide from Ptolomie, that was ioynd with his forces.

To helpe in this needfull case, Demetrius was called ouer into Asia by his Fathers letters: which he readily obeyed. Before his departur out of Greece, he made peace with Cassander, vpon reasonable termes: to the end he might not be driuen to leaue any part of his Armie for defence of the Countrey; and that his iourne might be without any such blemish of reputation, as if he had abandoned his Dependents: for one Article of the peace was, That all the Cities of Greece should be at libertie. Cassander was glad to be so rid of an Enemy, that was too strong for him. Yet would this league haue done him little good, if things had fallen out contrariwise then they did in Asia; seeing the ratification thereof was referred vnto Antigonus. It sufficed, that for the present, euery one found meanes to cleare himselfe of all incumbrances else where, to the end that each might freely apply himselfe to the triall of the maine controuersie in Asia.

§. IIII.

How ANTIGONVS was slaine in a great battaile at Issus, neere vnto Ephesus; wherein his whole estate was lost.

SELEVCVS, with his sonne Antiochus, ioyning with Lysimachus, compounded a great Armie, which was (all considered) not inferiour to that of the Enemy. In greatnesse of name (that helpeth much in all warres, but especially in the Ciuill) they were rather vnanswerable, than equall to their aduersaries: for Antigonus had of long time kept them vnder with a mastering spirit, and had beene reputed a King indeede, when the rest were held but Vsurpers of the title. Like wise Demetrius was generally acknowledged a braue Commander, hauing giuen proofe of his worth in many great seruices of all kinds, and enriched the Art of war with many inuentions, which euen his enemies, & particularly Lysimachus, did much admire. Seleucus, who had sometimes flattered Antigonus, and fearfully stolen away from him to saue his life; with yong Antiochus, a Prince not heard of before this iourne; and Lysimachus, that had liued long in a corner, hardly keeping his owne from the wilde Thracians; wanted much in reputation, of that which was yeelded to their opposites: yet so, that as ancient ancient Captaines vnder Philip and Alexander, two of them were held worthie enough, to receive any benefit that fortune might giue, and the third a Prince of great hope, whereof he now came to make experience.

The Souldiers, on both sides, were for the most part hardie and well exercised: many of them hauing serued vnder Alexander; though of thole old Companies, the long space of two and twentie yeeres had consumed the greatest number. But concerning their affections; the followers of Seleucus were easily perswaded, that in this battaile they must either get the vpper hand, or put in extreme danger all that belonged vnto the Confederate Princes: whereas Antigonus his men could discern no other necessitie of fighting, than the obliuate qualitie of their Lord, that needes would be Master of all. Antigonus had about three-score and ten thousand foot, ten thousand horse, and three-score and fifteen Elephants. His enemies were five thousand thort of him in number of their foot; in horse they had the ods of five hundred; of Elephants they had foure hundred, and a hundred and twentie armed Chariots of warre; which helps, though they little had auailed the Persians, yet were they not to be despised, in the hands of a good Captaine.

Antigonus himselfe, either troubled with the vnexpected greatnesse of his enemies forces, or preasing little good like to ensue, grew very peniue, communing much in priuate with his sonne whom he commended to the Armie as his Successor: whereas in former times he had neuer been so iocund, as towards the houre of battaile, nor had beene accustomed to make his sonne, or any other, priue to his counsaile, before it required execution. Other tokens of bad lucke, either foregoing the fight, or afterwards deuised, I hold it needlesse to recount: Diana of Ephesus dwelt neere to the place of battaile, a busie Goddess in many great fights, and therefore likely to haue been thrust into the fable, if any matter, neerly resembling a miracle, had chanced.

It is easie to beleue, that these two so gallant Armies, containing well-neere all the strength of Alexanders whole Empire, performed a notable fight, being led by such worthie Commanders, and whom the issue thereof did highly concerne. Yet are few of the particulars recorded: an easie losse in regard of the much variety, wherewith euery storie aboundeth in this kinde. The most memorabile things in the battaile, were these: Demetrius with his best force of horse, charged valiantly vpon yong Antiochus; whom when hee had broken, and put to flight, hee was so transported with the heat of his good successe, that he neuer gaue ouer his pursuit, but left his Father naked, and lost thereby both him, and the victorie. For when Seleucus perceiued this aduantage, he enterpoised his Elephants, between Demetrius and the Phalanx of Antigonus; and with many troupes of horse offering to breake vpon the enemies battaile, wherefoeuer it lay most open, he did so terrifie the Antigonians; that a great part of them rather chose to reuolt from their Lord, whilst they were fairely inuited, than to sustaine the furie of so dangerous an impression. This cowardize or rather treason of some, discouraged others; and finally, cast them all into flight; exposing their Generall to the last end of his destinies. Antigonus was then foure-score yeeres old, very fat and vnweildy, so that he was vnapt for flight, if his high spirit could haue entertained any thought thereof. Hee had about him some of his most trustie followers, and as many others as hee could hold together. When one that perceiued a great troupe making towards his person told him, Sir King, yonder companie meanes to charge you; he answered, Well may they; for who desires me? but anon DEMETRIVS will relieue vs. Thus expecting, to the very last, that his sonne should come to the rescue, he receiued so many Darts into his body, as tooke away his lately ambitious, but then fearefull hopes, together with his troublesome life.

His great abilitie in matter of Armes, together with his vnassatiable desire of Empire, haue sufficiently appeared in the whole Volume of his action. Hee was more feared by his enemies, than loued by his friends; as one that could not moderate his fortune, but vsed inolerance towards all alike, as if it had beene some vertue neere representing a Kingly Maiestie. This was the cause that so many of his followers reuolted to his enemies; and finally, that a great part of his Armie forsooke him in his last necessitie. For those Kings and Princes that call all the carefull indeuours of their Vassalls, onely dutie and debt; and are more apt to punish the least offences, than to reward the greatest seruices: shall finde themselves vpon the first change of fortune, (seeing it is loue only that staies by aduersitie) not only the most friendlesse, but even the most contemptible, and despised of all other. This Antigonus found true in part, while he liued; in part he left it to be verified vpon his son.

How DEMETRIUS forsaken by the Athenians after his ouerthrow, was reconciled to SELEVCUS and PTOLOMIE, beginning a new fortune, and shortly entring into new quarrells.

FOR Demetrius, at his returne, from the idle pursuit of yong Antiochus, finding all quite lost, was glad to saue himselfe, with foure thousand horse and fise thousand foot, by a speedy reitrait vnto Ephesus, whence hee made great haite towards Athens, as to the place, that for his sake would suffer any extremity. But whilest he was in the middle of his course thither, the Athenian Embassadors met him with a decree of the people, which was, that none of the Kings should be admitted into their Citie. These were Embassadors, not Theori, or *Consul*ters with the Oracle. It was a shamelesse ingratitude in the Athenians, to reward their Benefactor, in his miserie, with such a decree: neither did any part of his calamitie more afflict the vnfortunate Prince, than to see his aduersitie despised by those whom he had thought his surest friends. Yet was he faine to giue good words. For he had left many of his ships in their Hauen, of which he now stood in great neede, and therefore was faine to speake them faire, that sometimes had grossly flattered him. But he shall liue to teach them their old language, and speake vnto them in another tune. When he had gotten his ships, he failed to the Isthmus, where he found nothing but matter of discomfort. His Garrisons were euerie where broken vp; the Souldiers hauing betaken themselves to his enemies pay. So that he was King only of a small Armie and Fleet, without monie or meanes wherewith to sustaine him and his followers any long time. All the rest or the greatest part of his Fathers large Dominion, was now in diuiding among the Conquerers, and those few places which as yet held for him (hauing not perchance heard the worst of what had happened) he no way knew how to relieue, for to put himselfe into the field on that side of the Sea, he had no power, and to inclose himselfe in any of them, how strong soeuer, were but to imprison his fortune, and his hopes, or therein indeede to burie himselfe and his estate: Hee therefore creeping thorow those bushes that had fewest briars, fell vpon a corner of Lysimachus his Kingdome, wherof he gaue all the spoile, that was gotten, to his Souldiers, his owne losses hauing beene too great to be repaid againe by small prizes.

In the meane while the Confederate Princes had wherewithall to busie themselves, in the partition of those Provinces, of which their late victorie had made them Lords, wherein Seleucus had a notable aduantage by being present, and Master of the field, for neither Ptolomie, nor Cassander were at the ouerthrow giuen, hauing only sent certaine troupes to re-inforce the Armie which Seleucus led, who tooke hold of a part of Asia the lesse and all Syria, being no otherwise deuided from his owne Territorie, than by the Riuer of Euphrates. For there had not any order beene taken by the Confederates, for the diuision of all those Lands: because they did not expect so prosperous an issue of that warre, which they made onely in their

their owne common defence. It was therefore lawfull for Seleucus, to make the best benefit that he could of the victorie, at which, neuertheless others did repine, and though they neither could nor durst accuse him of ill dealing for the present, yet seeing the ouer-gratnesse of Seleucus brought no lesse danger to the rest of the new Kings, than that of Antigonus had done, they consulted vpon the same reason of state as before, how to oppose it in time. Neither was Seleucus ignorant of what they had determined, for he read it in the Law vniuersall of Kingdoms and States, needing no other intelligence. Hereupon they forget friendship on all sides, and cure themselves of all vnprofitable passion, the hatred of each to other, and their loues 10 being laid on the one side, against their profits on the other, were found so farre too light, as Seleucus, who had to day slaine Antigonus, the father, and driven Demetrius the sonne out of Asia, sought to morrow how to match himselfe with Stratonice, Demetrius his daughter, and so by Demetrius to serue his turne against Lysimachus.

The storie of this Stratonice, with whom yong Antiochus, the sonne of Seleucus fell so passionately in loue, and so dilttempered, as Seleucus his father, to saue his sonnes life, gaue her (though she were his wife) vnto him, and how his passion was discouered by his pulse, is generally noted by all Writers. But neither did this alliance betwene Seleucus and Demetrius; betwene Ptolomie and Lysimachus; betwene Demetrius and Cassander; betwene Demetrius and Ptolomie; though for the 20 present it brought him againe into the rancke of Kings; other wise tye any of them to each other, than the marriages betwene Christian Kings haue done in later times, namely betwene the Austrians, the Aragonians, the French, and other Princes; neither haue the Leagues of those elder times bene more faithfull, then those of the same later times haue bene; as in the stories of Charles the eighth of France, and of Charles the Emperour, of Francis the first, and of the Kings of Naples, Dukes of Milan and others, the Reader may obserue: betwene whom from the yeere of our Lord, One thousand, foure hundred, ninctie and fise, when Charles the eighth vnderooke the Conquest of Naples, to the yeere one thousand fise hundred fitic and eight, when Henrie the second died, the Histories of those times tell vs, 30 that all the bonds, either by the bed or by the booke, either by weddings, or Sacramentall Oathes, had neither faithfull purpose nor performance. Yet did Demetrius reape this profit by giuing his daughter to his enemy Seleucus, that he recovered Cilicia from Plistarchus, the brother of Cassander; who had gotten it as his share in the diuision of Antigonus his possessions: for the Intruder was not strong enough to holde it by his proper forces from him, that entred vpon it as a lawfull Heire, neither would Seleucus lend him any helpe, as by the rule of Confederacie he should haue done against the common enemy. So Plistarchus with very angry complaint, as well against Seleucus as Demetrius, went vnto Cassander; whither Phila, their sister, followed him shortly, to pacifie them both, and keepe all quiet; being sent for that 40 purpose by Demetrius her husband, that was not strong enough to deale with Cassander, and therefore glad to make vse of that bond of alliance betwixt them, whereof in his owne prosperitie, he neuer tooke notice to the others good. About the same time he tooke to wife a daughter of Ptolomie (plurallitie of wiues being familiar with these Macedonians, that had learned it in their Easterne conquests) and so was he by two marriages rather freed from two enemies, then strengthened with two friends, for neither of them wished him any good, other wise then might seeme to aduance their owne ambitious desires.

Seleucus and Ptolomie could both of them haue bene contented better, that Demetrius, with helpe of their countenance, should seeke his fortune somewhat farther 50 off, than settle his estate vnder their noses. Particularly, Seleucus thought that Cilicia lay very fitly for himselfe: and Ptolomie had a great appetite (which yet he concealed a while) to the Isle of Cyprus. Now whether it were so, that Seleucus would faine haue set his new father in law vpon the neck of Lysimachus; or whether hee were indeede greedie of the bargain, he offered to buy of Demetrius for ready monie, his late purchase of Cilicia. Hercunto Demetrius would not barken, but meant to keepe as much Land as hee could, having already found in Cilicia twelue thousand talents of his fathers treasure, that would serue him to make sport a while. This reuifall so displeased Seleucus, that in angrie termes he demanded the Citie of Tyre and Sidon, to bee surrendered vnto him; which were the only places in Syria, that had not followed the fortune of the late great battail. In stead of giuing them vp, Demetrius tooke present order to haue them better manned; and spake it stoutly, That were hee ouer-come a thousand times, yet would hee not hire Seleucus to become his sonne in law. In this quarrell Seleucus was generally reprehended, as one of a malignant disposition, that would breake friendship with his father-in-law for two Townes, from whom he had already taken more then well hee knew how to gouerne. But the fire consumed it selfe in words, which had it fastned vpon armes, like it is that the weaker should haue found friends out of enuie to the stronger.

How Demetrius manne the Citie of Athens, and preuailed in Greece, but lost in Asia. Of troubles in Macedon following the death of Cassander.

IN the meane while, the Athenians not knowing how to vse the libertie, which Demetrius had bestowed on them, were fallen by sedition, vnder the tyrannic of Lachares. Through which alteration their disempowered Citie was so weakened, that it seemed ill able to keepe off the punishment due to their late ingratitude. This aduantage hastened him, whom they had once called their God and Saviour, to present himselfe vnto them, in the habit of a reuenging furie. Hee brought against them all the force that he could wel spare from other emploiments, which were at that time perhaps the more, because his doubtfull Easterne friends, were vnwilling to giue impediment to any businesse, that might entangle him in Greece. His first enterprize in Athens had ill successe; a great part of his fleet perishing in a tempest. But hee soone repaired the losse; and (after some victories in Peloponnesus, where hee wanne diuers Townes that had fallen from him) returning to the enterprize, wasted the Countrie of Attica, and cut off all reliefe from the Citie, both by Land and Sea.

Athens was not able to feede the great multitude within it, any long time: for it stood in a barren soile, and wanted now the command of those Islands, and places abroad, from whence it was wont to be stored with victuals; being also destitute of meanes to keepe such a Nauie, as might bring in supply, or dare to doe any thing at Sea, against that of Demetrius. Yet was there some hope of succour from Ptolomie, who (trusting thereby to winne the loue of Greece) had loaden a hundred and fiftie ships with corne, and sent them to releue the hungrie Citie. But these hundred and fiftie were vnable to deale with three hundred good fighting ships, which Demetrius had; rather they feared to become a prey to him, and therefore halted them away betimes, as hauing done enough, in aduenturing to come so neere, that they might be discried. This brake the heart of the people; among whom the famine was so extreme, that a Father and his Sonne did fight for a dead Moulse, which dropped downe betwene them from the house top. Wherefore they sent Embassadors to yeeld vp the Towne, and craue pardon, hauing so farre offended, that out of desperation, they made it a capitall offence, to propose any motion of peace. Yet were they faine to abolish this decree: rather because they knew not what else to doe, then because they hoped to be forgiven.

Demetrius, contented with the honour of the victorie, did not only forbear to take away the liues of these vntankefull men; which they had submitted vnto his mercie; mercie; but out of his liberalitie gaue them foode, and placed in Office amongst them such as were most acceptable to the people. Neuertheless hee was growne wiser then to trust them so farre as he had done in times past. And therefore, when (among other flattering acclamations) they bade him take their Hauens, and dispose of them at his pleasure; he was ready to lay hold vpon the word, and leaue a sure Garrison within their walls, to keepe them honest perforce. After this he went into Peloponnesus, vanquished the Lacedemonians in two battailes, and was in very faire possibilitie to take their citie: when the dangerous news called him in all haste, of Lysimachus and Ptolomie; that preuailed faster vpon him elsewhere, than himselfe did vpon his enemies in Greece. Lysimachus had wonne many Townes in Asia; Ptolomie had gotten all the Ile of Cyprus, except the Citie of Salamis, wherein Demetrius had left his Children & Mother, that were straightly besieged. Whilest he was be-thinking himselfe which way to turne his forces, a notable piece of businesse offered it selfe, which thrust all other cares out of his head.

Cassander was lately dead in Macedon, and soone after him, Philip his eldest sonne; whose two younger brethren, Antipater and Alexander, fought for the Kingdom. In this quarrell Theffalonia the Daughter of King Philip, whom Cassander had married, seemed better affected to Alexander, then to her elder sonne: who thereupon grew so enraged, that most barbarously he slew his owne Mother. The odiousnesse of this fact gaue a faire lustre to Alexanders cause: drawing the generallitie of the Macedons to take his part, as in reuenge of the Queenes death, vpon that wicked parricide Antipater. But Antipater was so strongly backed by Lysimachus, whose Daughter he had married; that Alexander could not hope to make his party good without some forraigne aide. For which cause he called in both Pyrhus and Demetrius, who how they dealt with him, it will soone appeare, in the following Tragedie, of him and his brother. Their Father Cassander had bene one that thifted well for himselfe, at such time as euery man sought how to get somewhat, in the ill ordered diuision of the Empire. Hee was cunning in practize, and a good Souldier: one of more open dealing then were his Companions, but withall more impudent, rudely killing those, whom others would more wisely haue made away. Hee deeply hated the memorie of Alexander, that had knocked his head against a wall, vpon some opinion of contempt. With Olympias hee had an hereditarie quarrell, deriued from his Father, whom shee could not abide. Her feminine malice did so exasperate him, by crueltie, that shee vsed against his friends, both alie and dead; as it made him aduerture vpon shedding the Royall blood; wherewith, when once hee had stained his hands, he did not care how farre he proceeded in that course of murder. His carelesnesse to destroy those women and children, whose liues hindered his purpose, argues him to haue bene rather skilfull in matters of Armes, than a valiant man: such crueltie being a true marke of cowardize, which feares a farre off the dangers, that may quietly passe away: and seekes to auoid them by base and wicked meanes, as neuer thinking it selfe safe enough, vntill there be nothing left, that carries likelihood of danger. Of Olympias and Roxane it may bee said, that they had well deserued the bloody end which ouer tooke them; yet ill becomed it Cassander to doe the office of a Hang-man. But Alexanders children had by no law of men deserued, to die for the tyrannie of their Father. Wherefore, though Cassander died in his bed, yet the diuine Iustice brought swords vpon his wife and children, that well reuenged the crueltie of this bloody man, by destroying his whole house, as hee had done his Masters.

of PYRRHVS and his doings in Macedon. The death of CASSANDERS children. DEMETRIVS gets the Kingdome of Macedon; prenailes in warres against the Greeks; Loseth reputation in his warre against PYRRHVS, and in his Ciuill Government, and prepares to win Asia. How all conspire against DEMETRIVS.

PYRRHVS and LYSIMACHVS invade him, his Armie yeelds to PYRRHVS, who slayes the Kingdome of Macedon with LYSIMACHVS.

PYRRHVS, the Sonne of that vnfortunate Prince Acides, which perished in warre against Cassander, was hardly preferred, being a sucking Infant, from the furie of his Fathers enemies. When his Fosterers had conueighed him to Glancius, King of Illyria; the deadly hatred of Cassander would haue bought his life with the price of two hundred talents. But no man can kill him that shall be his Heire. Glancius was so far from betraying Pyrrhus, that hee restored him by force to his Fathers Kingdome, when he was but twelve yeeres of age. Within the compasse of fixe yeeres, either the indiscretions of his youth, or the rebellious temper of his Subjects, draue him out of his Kingdome, and left him to trie the world anew. Then went hee to Demetrius (who married his sister) became his Page; followed him awhile in his wars; was with him in the great battaile of Issus, whence hee fled with him to Ephesus; and was content to be hostage for him, in his reconciliation with Ptolomie. In Egypt he so behaved himselfe, that he got the fauour of Berenice, Ptolomies principall wife; so that he married her Daughter, and was thereupon sent home, with monie and men, into Epirus; more beholding now to Ptolomie, than to Demetrius. When he had fully recovered the Kingdome of Epirus, and was settled in it, then fell out that businesse betwene the children of Cassander, which drew both him and Demetrius into Macedon.

Antipater, the elder of Cassanders sonnes, was so farre too weake for Pyrrhus, that hee had no desire to attend the comming of Demetrius, but made an halfe agreement, and diuided the Kingdome with his younger brother Alexander; who likewise felt the aide of Pyrrhus so troublesome, that he was more willing to send him away, than to call in such another helper. For Pyrrhus had the audacitie to request, or take as granted, by strong hand, Ambracia, Acornania, and much more of the Countrey, as the reward of his paines: leaving the two brethren to agree as well as they could about the rest. Necessitie enforced the brethren to composition: but their compolition would not satisfie Demetrius, who tooke the matter haينously, that he was sent for, and made a foole, to come so farre with an Armie, and finde no worke for it. This was a frivolous complaint; whereby it appeared, that Demetrius had a purpose to doe as Pyrrhus had done, and so much more, by how much he was stronger. Hereupon it seemed to Alexander a wife course, to remove this over-diligent friend, by murdering him vpon some aduantage. Thus Demetrius reported the storie, and it might be true; though the greatest part, and perhaps the wisest, beleued it not. But the issue was, that Alexander himselfe was seased and slaine by Demetrius; who tooke his part of the Kingdome, as a reward of the murder; ex-culcating the fact so well, by telling his owne danger, and what a naughtie man Cassander had been, that all the Macedonians grew glad enough to acknowledge him their King. It fell out happily, that about the same time Lysimachus was busied in warre with a King of the wilde Thracians: for thereby he was compelled to seeke peace of Demetrius, which to obtaine, he caused the remainder of Macedon to bee giuen vp; that is, the part belonging to Antipater, his sonne in law. At this ill bargain Antipater grievously stormed, though he knew not how to amend it: yet till he stormed, vntill his Father in law, to saue the labour of making many excuses, tooke away his trouble-troublesome life. Thus in batle, with a kinde of neglect, and as it were to auoide molestation, were slaine the children of Cassander: of Cassander that had slaine his owne Masters children, in a wife course of policie, with careful meditation (so much the more wicked as the more long) studying how to erect his owne house, that fell downe vpon his graue, ere the earth on it was thoroughly settled.

It might be thought, that such an access of Dominion, added much to the greatness of Demetrius. But indeede it shewed his infirmite; and thereby made him neglected by many, and at length hated by all. For he had no Art of ciuill Government: but thought (or shewed by his actions that he thought) the vse and fruit of a Kingdome, to be none other, than to doe what a King listed. He gaue himselfe ouer to Women and Wine, laughing openly at those that offered to trouble him with supplications, and the tedious discourse of doing iustice. He had more skill in getting a Kingdome, than in ruling it: warre being his recreation, and luxurie his nature. By long rest (as fixe yeeres raigne is long to him, that knows not how to raigne one yeere) he discouered so much of his worst condition, as made both the people wearie of his idleness; and the Souldiers, of his vanitie. He was freed from care of matters in Asia, by hearing that all was lost: though more especially, by hearing that Ptolomie had with great honor, entertained and dismissed his mother and children. This afforded him the better leisure, of making warre in Greece: where he vanquished the Thebans, and wonne their Citie twice in short space, but vsed his victorie with mercie. Against Lysimachus he would faine haue done somewhat (the peace betwene them notwithstanding) at such times as he was taken by the Thracians; but Lysimachus was freely dismissed, and in good case to make resistance ere Demetrius came; so as this journey purchased nothing but enmitie. Another expedition he tooke in hand against Pyrrhus, with no better, or rather with worse cunct. Pyrrhus held somewhat belonging to Macedon; which hee had indeede as honestly gotten, as Demetrius the whole Kingdome; he had also made excursions into Thessalie. But there needed not any hand some pretence of quarrell, seeing Demetrius thought himselfe strong enough, to ouer-runne his enemies Countrey, with two great Armies. It is a common fault in men, to despise the vertue of those, whom they haue knowne raw Nouices in that facultie, wherein themselves are noted as extraordinarie. Pyrrhus was a Captaine, whom later ages, and particularly the great Hannibal, placed higher in the ranke of Generalls, than either Demetrius, or any of Alexanders followers. At this time, he mist that part of the Armie, which Demetrius led, and fell vpon the other halfe: which he ouerthrew, not with more commendations of his good conduct, than of his priuate valour, shewed in single combat against Pantauchus, Demetrius his Lieutenant; who being a strong man of body, challenged this yong Prince to fight hand to hand, and was vtterly beaten. The losse of this battaile did not so much offend the Macedonians, as the gallant behauiour of Pyrrhus delighted them. For in him they seemed to behold the liuely figure of Alexander in his best qualitie. Other Kings did imitate, in a counterfeit manner, some of Alexanders graces, and had good skill in wearing Princely vestures: but (said they) none, save Pyrrhus, is like him indeede, in performing the office of a Captaine.

These rumours were not more nourished by the vertue of the Epirot, than by dislike of their owne King; whom they began to dislike, not so much in regard of his vnprofitable iourney into Epirus (for he had wasted much of the Countrey, and brought home his Armie in good case) as of his insolence, that grew daily more and more intolerable. His apparel seemed, in the eyes of the Macedons, not only too sumptuous and new-fangled, but very vnmanly; and fruing chiefly to be a daily witnesse, how much he contemned them and their good opinion. Of his Souldiers lines he was rechelesse; and suffered vnwisely this vn-princely sentence to escape out of his mouth; That the more of them died, the fewer he was to pay. Hee made a mockerie of iustice; and (as it were, to publish vnto all his Subjects, how little little he esteemed it or them) hauing by a shew of popularitie inuited Petitioners, and with a gracious countenance entertained their Supplications, he led the poore suters after him in great hope, till comming to a bridge, hee threw all their writings into the Riuer; pleasing himselfe, in that hee could so easily and so boldly delude the cares of other men. By these courtes he grew so odious, that Pyrrhus gathered audacitie, and inuading Macedon, had almost wonne it all with little resistance. Demetrius lay then sicke in his bed: who recouering health, and taking the field, had such great oddes of strength, as made Pyrrhus glad to forsake his winnings and be gone.

At length he beganne to haue some feeling of the generall hate; which to redresse, he did not (for he could not) alter his owne conditions; but purposed to alter their idle discourses of him, by setting them on worke in such an action, wherein his best qualities might appeare; that is, in a great warre. His intent was to inuade Asia, with a Royall Armie: wherein the fortune of one battaile might giue him as much, as the fortune of another had taken from him. To this end, hee first made peace with Pyrrhus; that so hee might leaue all safe and quiet at home. Then did he compose a mighty Armie, of almost a hundred thousand foot, and twelue thousand horse: with a Naue of five hundred saile, wherein were many ships, farre exceeding the greatnesse of any that had beene scene before; yet so swift and vselfall withall, that the greatnesse was least part of their commendation.

The terrible fame of these preparations, made Seleucus and Ptolemy suspect their owne forces, and labour hard with Lysimachus and Pyrrhus, to ioyne against this ambitious sonne of Antigonus; that was like to proue more dangerous to them all, than euer was his Father. It was easily discerned, that if Demetrius once prevailed in Asia, there could be no securitie for his friends in Eurepe; what league sooner were of old concluded. Therefore they resolu'd to beginne with him betimes, and each to inuade that quarter of Macedon, that lay next his owne Kingdome. Lysimachus came first, and against him went Demetrius with a great part of his Armie: but whilst he was yet on the way, newes were brought into his Campe, that Pyrrhus had won Berthea. The matter was not ouer-great: were it not, that mindes prepared with long discontent, are ready to lay hold vpon small occasions of dislike. All the camp was in vp-rose: some wept, others raged, few or none did forbear to vtter seditious words, and many desired leaue of Demetrius, to goe to their owne houses, meaning indeede to haue gone to Lysimachus.

When Demetrius perceived the bad affection of his Armie, hee thought it the wisest way, to lead the Macedonians further off from Lysimachus their owne Countreiman, against Pyrrhus that was a stranger: hoping by victorie against the Epirot, to recouer the loue of his followers, in such sort that hee might afterwards at leisure deal with the other. But herein his wisdome beguiled him. For the Souldiers were as hattie as he, to meet with Pyrrhus; nor intending to hurt him, but longing to see that noble Prince, of whom they daily heard the honourable fame. Some spake of his valour; some enquired, others answered, of his person, his armor, and other tokens whereby hee might be knowne; as particularly, by a paire of Goats hornes, that he wore on his crest. It was not likely, that these men should hurt him. Diuers of them stole away, and ranne ouer into Pyrrhus his campe: where the newes that they brought, were better welcome than their persons. For they said, and it was true, that if the Macedonians might once get sight of Pyrrhus, they would all salute him King. To trie this, Pyrrhus rode forth, and presented himselfe bare-headed in view of the camp, whether some were sent before to prepare his welcome. The newes of his arrival found a generall applause, and euery one began to looke out, with desire to see eye on him. His face was not so well knowne as his helmet; therefore hee was admonished to put it on; which done, all came about him, and proffered their service; neither were there any, that spake for Demetrius; only some (and they the most moderate of tongue) bade him be gone betimes; and (hist for himselfe.

himselfe. So Demetrius threw aside his maskers habit, and attiring himselfe poorly, did fearefully steale away out of his owne Campe: desiruing well this calamitie, whether it were so, that he would not hearken to the good counsaile of his friends, or whether his behauiour deprived him of such friends, as would dare to let him heare the vnpleasant sound of necessarie truth.

Whilst Pyrrhus was making this triumphant entrie into the Kingdome of Macedon, Lysimachus came vpon him very vnpleasantly, and would needs haue halfe saying, that he had done as much as Pyrrhus in the warre, and therefore had reason to challenge his part of the gaines. The bargain was quickly made, and the diuision agreed vpon: each of them being rather desirous to take his part quietly, than to fight for the whole; as hoping each of them, to worke his fellow quite out of all, vpon better opportunitie.

¶ VIII.

How Demetrius gathering forces, enterprised many things with ill successe, in Greece and Asia. How he was diuised vpon Seleucus, and compelled to yield himselfe. His imprisonment and death.

The Athenians, were as vnthankfull to Demetrius in this his aduersitie, as they had beene in former times. For they presently forsooke his friendship, and called Pyrrhus out of Macedon to be their Patron. Demetrius, when he went against Lysimachus, had left a great part of his forces in Greece, vnder his sonne Antigonus. Therefore it is like, that he had soone gotten an Armie, though Phila his wife (who is highly commended for a wise and vertuous Ladie) did poison her selfe, vpon desperate griefe of his misfortune. The first, vpon whom he attempted to siew his anger, were the Athenians, that had well deserued it. Hee beganne to lay siege to their Towne: but was pacified by Crates the Philosopher, whom they made their spokesman; and taking faire words instead of satisfaction, passed ouer into Asia, with cleuen thousand Souldiers, meaning to trie his fortune against Lysimachus, for the Prouinces of Lydia and Caria.

At his first comming into those parts, fortune seemed to smile vpon him. For many good Townes, willingly, or by compulsion, yielded to his obedience. There were also some Capitaines, that fell from Lysimachus to him, with their companies, and treasures. But it was not long, ere Agathocles the sonne of Lysimachus, came vpon him, with an Armie so strong, that it was not for Demetrius his good, to hazard his last stocke against it. Wherefore, he resolu'd, to passe through Phrygia and Armenia, into Media, and the Prouinces of the higher Asia; trusting to finde a Kingdome somewhere in those remote quarters. The execution of this counsaile was grieuouly impeached by Agathocles: who pursued him close, and cut off all his prouisions, druing him to take which waies he could, without following his intended course. In many skirmishes, Demetrius vanquished this troublesome enemy: neuertheless, hee could not be shaken off, but continued afflicting the poore titularie King, with extreme famine. At length, in passing the Riuer Lycus, so many of Demetrius his men were lost, that the rest could no longer make resistance: but were druen to trauaile with such speede, as might well be called a plaine flight. So that with famine, pestilent diseases following famine, and other accidents of warre, eight thousand of them were consumed: the rest, with their Capitaine, escaped into Cilicia. Seleucus had gotten possession of Cilicia, whilst Demetrius was occupied in Greece: yet was it no part of Demetrius his errand, to lay claime to the Countrie; but with vehement and humble letters he besought his sonne in law, to call to minde their alliance, and to pity him in his great misery. These letters at the first wrought wel with Seleucus, and he condescended to the request: yet considering further how

Demetrius

Demetrius had carried him selfe, when he recovered strength after the battaile at Issus, he changed his purpose, and went against him with an Armie.

Many treaties were held betweene them; of which none tooke effect, through the jealousie of Seleucus. Therefore, mere desperation enforced Demetrius, to fight like a mad man; and his furie got him some victories, though of small importance. At length sicknesse tooke and held him fortie dayes, in which time a great number of his few men, ranne to the enemie. This notwithstanding hee still held out, and once had like to haue taken Seleucus in his bed, had not his coming beene discovered by fugitiues, that gaue the alarme. Finally, when all his Armie had forsaken him, and left him with a few of his friends to shift for himselfe, hee was compelled by the last of thole adherents (for euen some of those few forooke him) to yeele vnto Seleucus.

Seleucus hearing this, was exceeding glad and sent him very comfortable messages. But the approbation of his owne humanitie, by his followers, was such, as renewed his jealous thoughts; and hindred him from admitting Demetrius to his presence, though otherwise he vsed him with as much fauor, as any prisoner could wish. He was kept vnder sure guard in a demie island, wherein were goodly walks, Orchards, and Parks for hunting. He had all that he asked roially, and friends allowed to visit him, at his, and their pleasure. Only his libertie was refused vnto the coming of young Antiochus and Stratonica, out of the high Countries. In this sort he spent three yeres, liuing merrily all the while (as one that now enioyed the happinesse, which with so much trauaile and blood-shed, he had fought in vaine) and then died, leauing to his sonne Antigonus, the same which his father had left vnto himselfe; that is, friends and hope. His ashes were honourably buried in Cornibus; his qualities haue appeared in his actions, and the fortune of his house will shew it selfe hereafter, in times and places conuenient.

The death of PTOLOMIE, of LYSIMACHVS, and of SELEVCVS, that was list of ALEXANDERS Captaines: with other occurrences.

ABout the same time that Demetrius died, died also Ptolomie King of Egypt; a vertuous Prince, warlike, gentle, bountifull, and (which in those times was a rare commendation) regardfull of his word. Hee had, by many Wiues and Concubines, many children, out of whom he selected Ptolomie Philadelphus, and caused him to raigne together with him selfe, two or three yeres before he died, that so he might confirme him in the inheritance of the Kingdome. At this, Ptolomie Ceraunus (for all of that house assumed the name of Ptolomie) was grieuously incensed. But no man cared for his anger. Therefore he went to Seleucus, who gaue him louing entertainment. There were now only two of Alexanders Captaines left, Seleucus and Lysimachus. These two needed would fight for it, who should be the longest liuer of that braue Company. The true ground of their quarrell was, their neare equalitie of strength, and want of one to part them. The pretence was the murders which Lysimachus had committed vpon many of his Nobles, together with his poisoning Agathocles his eldest sonne: whose wife and children fled vnto Seleucus for aide.

The Macedons after seuen Moneths pause, hauing spent their first heat of admiration, beganne to hearken so well to Lysimachus, their naturall Countre-man, that they forooke Pyrrhus, vpon none other ground than because hee was an Alien. This they had knowne well enough before: but they did him no great wrong in taking lightly from him, which they lightly gaue him. Lysimachus had raigned about about fise yeaeres alone, when the Citie of Lysimachia (built by him, and called after his name) falling by an earthquake, appeared, by euents, to haue foretold the fall of his house. His owne icalousie, and the instigation of a mother in law, caused him to poison his Sonne Agathocles, which drew vpon him that warre, wherein (after the losse of all his fiftene children, that were taken away by diuers accidents) he perished himselfe.

Seleucus was encountered by Lysimachus on Asia side, where one battaile concluded the warre, with Lysimachus his death. It pleased Seleucus more than the victorie, that he was the last of all the great Heröes which had followed Alexander. For now he seemed to himselfe, as Lord and Heire of all the conquered world. So he passed ouer into Macedon, to take possession of Europe, where there was none to withstand him. But there he ended his daies, and within seuen moneths followed Lysimachus, and other of his fellows, by a bloudie death: being treacherously slaine by Ptolomie Ceraunus, whose friend and Patron he had bene. Seuentie and seuen yeaere old he was, when hee fought with Lysimachus, and Lysimachus was seuentie and foure. With them ended the generation of old Captaines, that had scene the daies, as it were of another world vnder the Persian: yet was there left one equall to any of them, in the Art of warre: euen Pyrrhus the Epirot, of whom we spake before; that is now readie to enter into warre with the Romans, a more warlike people, than Alexander himselfe euer did encounter. Of which warre, and of which people, it is needfull that we here make mention, as of a storie more important, than any likely to ensue in Greece, or in the great Kingdomes, that were held by Alexanders Successors, with lesse (and still decreasing) vertue, than was that, by which they were first purchased.

CHAP. VII.

§. The growth of Rome: and setting of the Easterne Kingdomes.

§. I.

How the Romans enlarged their Dominion in Italie, from the death of TULLVS HOSTILIVS, vnto such time as they were assailed by PERSEVS.

ROW Rome was founded by Romulus; settled in good order by Numa Pompilius; and by many, though small victories, it gathered strength; vnto such time as it became the head of Latium, by the conquest of Alba; in the raigne of Tullus Hostilius: it hath bene already noted, in due order of time. But whereas now the Roman greatness, beginning to encounter the power of Greece; and extending it selfe out of Italie, to ouerwhelme the Dominions of other States and Princes: I hold it conuenient (as in like cases I haue done) briefly to set downe the growth of this mighty Citie, in a compendious relation, of those many actions, which could not haue beene deliuered in the ages, wherein they were actually performed, without much interruption of the Historie, that was then occupied in matter more important.

Bbbbb

After

After the death of Tullus Hostilius (who when hee had reigned two and thirtie yeares, was burnt together with his house by lightning) Anous Martins, Grand-child to Numa Pompilius by his daughter, and not much vnlike him in disposition, succeeded in the Kingdome of Rome. He walled the Citie about; enlarged it with the hill Auentine, which hee enclosed; built a bridge ouer Tybris, and the Citie of Ostia vpon the Sea, sixteene miles distant from Rome. Finally, hauing reigned foure and twentie yeares, he died, and by his last Will he left his children in charge with one Lucumon, the sonne of Damaratus a Corinthian, who auoiding Cypselus King of Corinth his tyranny, had fled into Hetruria, and dwelt in Tarquiny, by the name of which Towne hee was afterwards called Tarquinius. From that Citie in Hetruria 10 coming to Rome, and encouraged by some ominous occurrences, together with his wife *Tauaquil*s prophetic, hee grew a favorite of Anous Martins; by his Gracian wit humoring the factions of the Roman Court, in so much that after his decease, he became not only Protector to the children, but Governour to the Citie. He doubled the number of Senators, and enlarged the Centuries of Horse-men: neither was he lesse eminent in warre, than in peace: for he prevailed often against the *Tuscan*s, and from his victories, the chiefest ornaments of triumph tooke their originall. When this Lucius Tarquinius had reigned eight and thirtie yeares, he was slaine by the sonnes of Anous Martins, to whom he had been left Guardian. But Tauaquil his wife, perceiuing what was done, enformed the people, from out of an high Turret, 20 that her Husband was wounded, and sicke, but not dangerously. And withall signified vnto them, that in the interim of his sickness, one Seruius Tullius, whom from his birth she alwaies prophesied to be borne to great hopes, (the sonne of P. Corniculanus and Cersilia, a well defended, but captiue woman) brought vp in her house, and husband vnto her daughter, should supplie her husbands place, in gouerning the State, vntill his reuenerie: which gouernment, being thus at first obtained by cunning, he afterwards vsurped vs his right. He first ordained Ratements, Subsidies, and valuations of the peoples wealth; among whom, at that time, fourescore thousand were mustered, of which number consisted their whole corporation; and by distinction of Dignities, Ages, Trades, and Offices, he managed the King- 30 dome in as good sort, as if it had beene a priuate household. At length, hauing two daughters of different natures, the one milde and gentle, the other fierce and outrageous: and finding also that the two sonnes of Tarquinius Prius, Sextus and Aruns, which had been committed to his tuition, were of different dispositions, proportionably answering to his daughters; he (willing to adde water, not oile, to fire) gaue the milde daughter to Sextus the hot-headed sonne; and the violent, to Aruns, the gentle, in marriage. But whether by inticed courtes, or by accident, it happened; the two milde ones being made away, the furious natures were readily ioyned in marriage: who loone concurring, and calling the Senate together, beganne to lay claime to the Kingdome. Vpon this tumult, Seruius Tullius halting to the Senate, 40 (where he thought by authoritie to haue bridled insolencie) was throwne downe the staires, and going home sore bruised, was slaine by the way, when he had reigned fortie and foure yeares. Then Tullia his daughter, first proclaiming her husband Tarquinius Superbus King; returning home, enforced her Coach-man to driue his Chariot ouer her fathers corpse; whereupon the street had the denomination of wicked street. This Tarquine, exercising crueltie without iustice, and tyrannie without mercie, vpon the people and Senators; hauing tired himselfe and them at home, vsed the same rage of treacherie vpon his borders. He tooke Oriculum, Stiffa Pometia, and the Gabii. The issue of besieging Ardea, a towne eightene miles distant from Rome, was of bad successe. In the heate of which warre, his sonne Sextus Tar- 50 quinius violently rauished that chaste Ladie Lucretia, his kinsman *Collatine*s wife: who in way of expiation for so vnchaste a deed, thought good to walk out those spots of infamie with her owne blond; so (hauing first bequeathed the reuenge vnto her father Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, her husband Collatine, and Iunius Brutus): she

she killed her selfe: whereupon (chiefly by Iunius Brutus his resolution) Tarquinius Superbus, with his wife and children, was depofed and banished; and fled to Porfenna King of Hetruria for succour, in the five and twentieth yeare of his raigne, and the two hundred fortie and fourth from the building of their Citie: in which space Rome had scarce gotten full possession of fiftene miles round about her.

Iunius Brutus by the helpe of Collatine, hauing expelled Tarquine, and freed his Country from that heauie yoke of bondage, enforced the people by solemne oath, neuer to admit any gouernment by Kings amongst them: whereupon they 10 ranficked their Kings goods, consecrated their fields to Mars, and conferred the gouernment of the State vpon Brutus and Collatine. But because the name of King was odious in their eares, they changed the manner of their gouernment, from perpetual to annuall, and from a single gouernour to a double; left perpetual or sole dominion might be some motiue to vsurpation; and in stead of Kings they called them Consuls, signifying, as it may be interpreted, Providers: that their titles might remember them of their place, which was to be alwaies mindefull of their Citizens welfare. And yet was it so hard setting of troubled waters, that the people, after this innouation of State, scarce daring to assure themselves of their owne securitie, enforced Tarquinius Collatine to religne vp his authoritie, fearing that tyrannie 20 would be hereditarie, and supposing that the very name & affinity with the house of Tarquine, fauoured alreadie of their condition. In his room was substituted Valerius Publicola, who that he might (as his name reporteth) be gracious in the peoples eyes, gaue liberty, in matters of controuersie, to appeale from the Consuls to the people: and that he might as well in goods as in person, auoyde occasion of suspition, caused his owne house to be pulled downe, because it was built in a place defensible, as if it had beene a Citadell. Neither was Brutus any wayes deficient in matter of greater moment; which concerned as well the peoples safetie, as their fauour: for hauing got intelligence, that some greener wits, and in the first ranke his owne sonnes, were itching after innouations, hoping to restore the banished Kings; 30 he caused them, publicly in the Market-place, to be whipt, and then to be brought all vnpartially to the blocke.

Hitherto the Romans, hauing by the vnblemished integritie of Brutus, well appeased all inbred quarrels at home, now hereafter employ their militarie designments, against Forrainers; first, for their libertie; secondly, for enlarging of their possessions; and lastly, for defending their confederate Prouinces, and extending their Empire. For Rome, situated as it were in the mid-way betwene Latium and the *Tuscan*s, hauing as yet but narrow bounds, being in her minoritie, could not but giue occasion of offence to her neighbours: vntill by maine opposition, hauing pre- 40 uailed against her borderers, shee vsed them as instruments, whereby to obtaine thereof.

Their first warre, in the first yeare of Consuls, was against Porfenna King of Hetruria: who being ouer-perfwaded by Tarquines lamentation, came to Rome, together with the banished King, and with great forces, to seate him againe in his Kingdome.

In the first conflict, Horatius Codes, hauing long time borne the maine brunt of his enemies, on the bridge ouer Tybris; at length, feeling himselfe too faint to stand against so many, caused the bridge behinde him to be broken downe, and with his armour, leaping into the Riuier, like a hunted Stagge, refreshed his hote spirits, and returned safe to his fellowes, with the like resolution to sustaine a new charge. Por- 50 fenna, although by this he had well-nigh won the hill Ianiculus, which is the verie entrance vnto the Citie, and found the victorie, in a manner, assuredly his own: yet admiring their valour, and terrified by the constant resolution of Alutius Scauola (who hauing by error slaine Porfenna his Secretarie, in stead of the King himselfe, did in scorn of torments threatned, burne off his owne hand) hee thought it not any waie prejudiciall, either to his fate, or credite, to enter league with them at the worl hand. And yet the edge of Tarquinius his spleene, was not quite abated, though Arms his lonie, and brutus his enemy, in single combat, had slaine each other. And here the Romans, although they lost Brutus, got the field; and their Ladies, whose Champion hee was, for their chastitie, not for beautie, mourned the losse of him one whole yeare. Into his place, for the residue of his yeare, was subrogated Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, rather to Lucretia: and in his roome (deceasing naturally before the yeare expired) Horatius Pulvillus.

Tarquine, vpon his overthrow, feeling the fates disastrous, thought it no boot to strue against the streame, and spent the residue of his time, which was about foure yeares, priuately at Tusculum. Yet his sonne-in-law Mamilius Tusculanus, stomaching afresh at those old repulses, because Porfenna had made peace with the Romans, and denied further succour vnto the Tarquines, mustered vp his Latines, and gaue battaile to the Romans, at the Lake Regillum; where the conflict was fierce, and the issue vncertaine, vntill Anulus Posthumus, the Roman Dictator, (for they had created this Magistracy greater than Consuls, purposely for this Warre, when first it was expected) to exasperate his Souldiers courage, threw their owne Ensignes amidst the Enemies; and Cassius or Spurius Cassius (master of the Horse men, an assistant Officer to the Dictator) commanded to take off their bridles, that they might runne with free violence, to recover againe their Ensignes. This fight was so well performed, that a report went current of Castor and Polux, two Gods, who came on mike-white steeds, to be eye-witnesses of their valour, and fellow helpers of their victorie; for the Generall consecrated a Temple to them, as a stipend for their paines. After this the Romans fierce spirits, hauing no object of valour abroad, reflected vpon themselves at home; and the sixteenth yeare after the Kings expulsion, vpon instigation of some desperate bankrupts, thinking themselves wrongfully oppressed by the Senate and Consuls, they made an vproare in the holy Mount, vntill by Mucienus Agrippa, his discreet allusion, of the inconuenience in the head and bellies discord, to that present occasion, they were reconciled to the Senate: with condition, that they might haue some new Magistrates created, to whome they might appeale in cases of variance, and make them Solicitors in their controuersies, the Consuls authoritie notwithstanding. This was enacted; and they were called the Tribunes of the people. After this attonement amongst themselves, they had continuall Warre with the Latines, concerning their bounds and limits, and with other neighbouring States. Amongst these, the Volsci and Aequi held them longest; who made warre, of themselves, vpon the Romans: whereby they lost the best Citie in their whole iurisdiction, Corioli.

In this conquest, T. Martius got the surname of Coriolanus; a name honorable then, as deriued from a great victorie: although, by reason of the pueritie of the Towne, a Roman Generall, in after times, would haue bene ashamed of that title. But yet these graces had bene no occasion of disparagement, had hee not afterwards, in a great time of dearth, aduised to sell corne, which they procured from Sicily, at too high a rate, to the people: whereupon, Decius Mus, their Tribune, in their behalfe, accused him, and after judgement, banished him. Coriolanus flying to the Volsci, whom lately before he had vanquished, incensed them to renew their forces againe; which being committed vnto him, and to Attius Tullus, he prevailed in field, so farre forth, that he was come within foure or five miles of the Citie. Incamping there hee made so sharpe warre, and was at such defiance, with his Countie, that hee would not relent by any supplications of Embassadors, vntill his Mother Veturia, and Volumnia his wife, with a pittifull tune of deprecation, shewing themselves better Subjects to their Countie, than friends to their sonne and husband, were more available to Rome, then was any force of armes. Hereupon Coriolanus dismissing his Armie, was after put to death among the Volsci, as a Traitor; for neglecting such opportunitie: or (as others surmise) liuing with them vntill old age, hee died naturally.

Not

Not long after this, the Veij in Hetruria, prouoked the Romans; against whom the Fabij, three hundred and fixe in number, all of one Familie, intreated and obtained, that they only might be imploied, as it had been in a priuate quarrell. These Fabij, after some good seruices, lying incamped at Cremora, were circumvented and all slaine: one only of that whole house, had bene left, by reason of infancie, at home; from whom afterward sprang Fabius Maximus, who vanquished Hannibal.

In proceesse of time, the Romans were also troubled with the Volsci, at the hill Agidum, two miles from Rome; where Lucius Minucius their Consul, with his whole Armie, had bene discomited, had not L. Quinctius Cincinnatus chosen Dictator, and taken from the plough to the highest honour in Rome, with successe answerable to his expedition, dispersed his enemies, and freed his Countie in the space of sixteen dayes. In the continuance of this Volscian warre it was, that Appius Claudius, one of the ten men, whom they had two yeares before chosen Governours of the State, and inactors of Solons lawes amongst them, procured from Athens (abrogating in the meane while the Consuls, and all other Magistrats) would haue ransified Virginia, the daughter of T. Virginus, Captain of a Compaignie, and lying then in campe at Agidum. Hereupon the people, in an vproare, tooke the hill Auentine, and after much variance, enforced the ten men, to resigne vp their authoritie againe, to new Consuls.

After this, either new quarrels, or desire to reuenge old losses, drew the Romans into a new warre, against the Veientes, and their adherents, vpon whom hauing tried their forces, with diuersitie of Captains, and varietie of euents, they vanquished the Falisci, and the Faerates, and vtterly subdued the Veientes. In conquering the Falisci, Furius Camillus shewed no lesse int gritie then fortitude. For when a Schoole-master, by trayning forth into the Roman campe, many children of the principall Citizens, thought to betray the Towne, yeelding them all vp as Hostages: Camillus deliuered this Traitor bound vnto his Schollers, willing them to whip him back into the Citie; which forthwith yeelded vnto him in reuerence of his iustice. The siege of Veij was tenne yeares, and so troublefome, that the Romans were there first enforced to winter abroad vnder beaues skinnes (to which they were the more easily induced, because then first they receiued pay) and to make vowes neuer to returne without victorie.

At length winning the Citie by a Mine, they got so large spoiles, that they consecrated their tenths to Apollo Pythius: and the whole people in generall, were called to the ransacking of the Citie. But yet they were no lesse vnthankfull to Camillus for his seruice, then before they had bene to Coriolanus; For they banished him the Citie, vpon some occasion of inequality in diuiding the spoiles: yet he requited their vnkindnesse with a new peece of seruice, against the furie of the Gauls: who being a populous Countie, and verie healthfull, the fathers (as sometimes now) liued so long, that the sonnes, destitute of means, were enforced to roaue abroad, seeking some place, where to set vp their reit: and withall being a Nation vast in body, rude by nature, and barbarous in conditions, wandred as Rouers ouer many Countries. Some of them lighting on Italic, set vpon Clusium, a Towne in Hetruria; whereof Rome hauing information (and being carefull of her Confederate Townes) sent Embassadors, warning them to desist from such inuiros enterprises. But the barbarous people, not regarding the message, vpon some iniurie offered by the Roman Embassadors, conuerted their forces from Clusium towards Rome; and giving a great overthrow to the Romans, by the River Albia, vpon the sixteenth day before the Calends of August (which day was after branded for vn-luckie, and called Allenis in the Roman Kalendar) they hastened towards the Citie. Then was Rome the true map of miserie and desolation. For some leauing the citie; some creeping into holes; Priests hiding their reliques; and euery one shifing for himselfe, ere the enemy came; Rome was abandoned, as indefensible. The Vestall Virgins, in this tumult, were safely conuaued away; the Ancients of the Citie, gathering phering boldneſſe out of deſperate feare, did put on their Robes, and taking their leave of the world, did ſeate themſelves in Thrones, in their ſeverall houſes, hourly expecting the meſſengers of death, and meaning to die, as they had lived, in State. The younger ſort, with M. Manlius their Captaine, tooke vpon them to make good the Capitoll.

By this, the Gauls were entred the Citie, who ſeing all quiet, at firſt ſuſpected ſome ambuſh; afterward finding all ſecure, they ſell to the ſpoile, committing all to the fire and ſword. As for the old Senators, that ſate in their Maieſtie, with a graue reſolution: hauing firſt reuerenced them as Gods, anon they tryed whether they would die like men. When the Citie was thoroughly rifled, they attempted the Capitoll: which held them worke for the ſpace of ſeuē Moneths. Once they were like to haue ſurpriſed it by night, but being deſcried by the gaging of Geſſe, M. Manlius did awaken, and kept them from entrance. At length a compoſition was agreed vpon: the Gauls being wearie, and the Romans hungry. The bargain was, that the Gauls ſhould take a thouſand pound waight in gold, to deſiſt from their ſiege. Whileſt the gold was in waighing, the Gauls, with open inſolencie, made their waight too heauie: Brennus, their Captaine, caſting his ſword into the ballance, and, with a proud exprobration, ſaying, that the vanquiſhed muſt be patient perforce. But in the miſt of this cauſling, came Enrius Camillus, with an Arme, from Ardea, (where he had liued in his baniſhment) and fell vpon the Gauls, with ſuch violence, that hee diſperſed their troups, quenched the fire of the Citie with their bloud, forcing them to reſtore the ſpoils with aduantage, and forbore the gold, in accepting which, they had lately bene ſo nice. Further, hauing rid the Citie of them, he ſo hotly purſued them, through a great part of Italie, that the remainder of their Arme, which eſcaped from him, was very ſmall. Other Armies of the Gauls, which followed this firſt, had the like ill ſucceſſe. They were often beaten by the Romans; eſpecially the victories of M. Torquatus, and of M. Valerius Corvinus (each of which in ſingle fight, ſlew a Champion of the Gauls) abated their preſumption, and reſtored courage to the Romans. Camillus, for his notable ſeruiſe, was afterwards accompted a ſecond Romulus.

The people, after this deſtruction of their Citie, were carneſtly bent to goe to the Vey to inhabit; but Camillus diſſwaded them.

About the ſame time, ſomewhat before the ſiege of Veij, they changed their government from Conſulls to militarie Tribunes. The government of theſe alſo, after ſome yeares, was by ciuill diſſenſion interrupted: ſo that one while Conſulls ruled; another while there was an Anarchie: Then the Tribunes were reſtored and ruled againe, till after many yeares expired, the Conſular authoritie was eſta bliſhed; it being enacted, that one of the Conſulls ſhould alwaies bee a Plebeian. This was after the building of the Citie, three hundred ſixtie ſix yeares. And now Rome, by ſuppreſſion of her neighbour Countries, creeping well forward out of her Minoritie, dares ſet forth againſt the warlike Sannites, who dwelt almoſt one hundred and thirtie miles off: ſituated betwene Campania and Apulia. Theſe did ſo ſtrongly invade the Campanians their Neighbours, that they forced them to yeeld themſelves ſubiects to Rome, and vndergoe any conditions of Tribute, or whatſoeuer elſe to obtaine protection: which the Romans, although both Countries had bene their Confederates, yet not willing that the greater, like fiſh, ſhould deuour the leſſe, eaſily allowed off; aiming themſelves at the good ſituation of Campania, the abundance of Corne and Wine, pleaſant Cities and Townes, but eſpecially Capua it ſelfe, the faireſt Citie then in all Italie.

The Families of the Papirii and Fabij were moſt employed in the managing of this warre, which indured the ſpace of fiftie yeares. And in this ſeaſon were the Romans oftentimes dangerously encountered by the Sannites, as when T. Veturius, and Sp. Poſthumius were Conſulls, and diſcomfited by Pontius at Caudium, with no ſmall ignominie: and when Q. Fabius Gurgus loſt the field with three thouſand men.

But

But for theſe loſſes, many great victories made large amends: The greateſt whereof were gotten by L. Papyrius, and by Quintus Fabius Maximus.

The Sannites drew the Hetrurians into their quarrell. But the force of the Sannites was well broken, ere the Hetrurians (the greater and richer, but leſſe warlike Nation) beganne to ſurre. So the one and the other of theſe two Countries, became at length, tributarie to Rome.

In the continuance of this long warre it was, (though in time of truce betwene the Romans and Sannites) that the Latines beganne to challenge equal freedom in the Corporation of Rome, and right in bearing Office, ſo that they required to haue one of the Conſulls yearly choſen out of them.

This demand, of the Latines, was not vnreaſonable. For the Romans themſelves were a Latine Colonie; beſides all which, they made offer, to change their name, and to be all called Romans. But the Romans were too proud, to admit any ſuch capitulation. So a great battaile was fought betwene them: wherein the fortune of Rome preuailed, by the vertue of the Conſulls.

Manlius Torquatus, and the elder Decius, were then Conſulls, whom the Soothſayers aduerted, that the ſide ſhould be victorious, which loſt the General in fight. Herevpon, Decius the Conſull, expoſed his life to the Enemy, and purchaſed victorie (as was beleueed) by his death. In which kind of deuoting himſelfe for his Arme, the ſonne of this Decius, being after Conſull, did imitate his father, in the Hetrurian warre. But (as Tullie well notes) it was rather the deperate reſolution of theſe Decijs, that purchaſed victorie, by ruſhing into the miſt of the enemies, wherein their Souldiers followed them, than any great commendation of ſuch a religion, as required the liues of ſo wortheie Citizens, to be ſacrificed for their Countrey. The diſcipline of Manlius was no leſſe reſolute, than the valour of Decius. He forbade any one to forſake his place, and fight ſingle with an enemy. For breach of which order, he cauſed his owne ſonne to be put to death, who had ſlaine a Captaine of the Latines, being challenged in ſingle fight.

When the Latines, the Aequi, Volſci, Hernici, Campani, Sannites, and Hetrurians, with ſome other people, were brought vnder obedience; it was a vaine labour for any people of Italie, to contend againſt the Romans.

Yet the Sabines aduentured to trie their fortune; and found it bad. For Curius Dentatus, the Roman Conſull, waſting all their Countrey with fire and ſword, from the River Nar and Felice, to the Adriatique Sea, brought them into quiet ſubjection.

The laſt of the Italians, that made triall of the Roman Armes, were the Tarentines, and their adherents. Theſe had interpoſed themſelves as Mediators, betwene the Romans and Sannites; with a peremptorie denunciation of warre, vnto that partie, which ſhould dare to reſuſe the peace by them tendered. Theſe threats, which diſcouered their bad affection to Rome, ended in words; but when the Sannites were vtterly ſubdued, matter enough of quarrell was found, to examine their abilitie of performance.

The Romans complained, that certaine ſhips of theirs were robbed; and ſent Embaſſadours vnto Tarentum, to require amends. Vpon ſome wrong done to theſe Embaſſadours, was laid the foundation of that Warre; wherein the Lucans, Meſſapians, Brutians, and Apulians, joyning with the Tarentines, procured the Sannites, and other Subjects of Rome, to rebell, and take their part. But ſome experience of the Roman ſtrength, taught all theſe people to know their owne weakneſſe. Wherefore they agreed to ſend for Pyrrhus, by whole aide (being a Grecian, as the Tarentines alſo were) great hope was conceiued, that the Dominion of Rome ſhould bee confined, vnto more narrow bounds, than all Italie, which alreadie, in a manner it did ouerſpread.

§. II.

How Pyrrhus warred vpon the Romans, and vanquished them in two battailes.

PYRRHVS, forsaken by the Macedonians, and vnable to deale with Lysimachus, was compelled a while to liue in rest: which he abhorred no lesse than a wiser Prince would haue desired. He had a strong Armie, and a good Fleet, which in that vnsetled estate of things, was enough to purchase a Kingdome: but the fall of Demetrius had so increased the power of Lysimachus, that it was no point of wisdom, to make an offensive warre vpon him, without farre greater forces. Antigonus, the sonne of Demetrius, held Corinth, at the same time, and some other Townes, with the remainder of his fathers Armie and treasures, left in his hand. Vpon him it is like that Pyrrhus might haue wonne; but it was better to let him alone, that hee might serue to giue some hindrance to Lysimachus.

In this want of imploiment, and couetous desire of finding it, the Tarentine Embassadors came very fitly to Pyrrhus: and they came with braue offers, as needing none other aide then his good conduct, which to obtaine, they would cast themselves vnder his protection. They had in their companie, some of the Samnites, Lucanians, Messapians, and others; which promised, in behalfe of their seuerall Nations, as much as could be desired. This encouraged Pyrrhus, and filled him with hopes of goodly conquests; that he might enlarge his Empire to the West, as farre as Alexander had gotten Eastward; and still by one victorie open the gate vnto another. To which effect it is said, that once he answered Cyneus his chiefe Counsaillour, asking what he meant to doe after euery of the victories which hee hoped to get: that, hauing wonne Rome, he would soone be Master of all Italie; that, after Italie he would quickly get the Isle of Sicily; that, out of Sicily hee would passe ouer into Africke, and winne Carthage, with all the rest of the Countrey; & being strengthened with the force of all these Provinces, hee would be too hard, for any of those, that were now so proud and troublesome. But Cyneus enquired yet further, what they should doe, when they were Lords of all: Wherevnto Pyrrhus (finding his drift) answered pleasantly, that they would liue merrily; a thing (as Cyneus then told him) that they presently might doe, without any trouble, if he could be contented with his owne.

Neuerthelesse, this Italian expedition seemed vnto Pyrrhus, a matter of such consequence, as was not to be omitted, in regard of any scholasticall disputation. Wherefore he prepared his Armie; of almost thirtie thousand men, well sorted, and well trained Souldiers: part of which he sent ouer before him vnder Cyneus, with the rest he followed in person. At his coming, he found the Tarentines very prompt of tongue, but in matter of execution, vtterly careless to provide for the Warre. Wherefore he was faine to shut vp their Theater, and other places of pleasure and resort; enforcing them to take Armes, and making such a strickt muster, as was to them very vnpleasing, though greatly behoouing to their estate.

Whilest he was occupied with these cares, Lucius the Roman Consul drew near, and beganne to wast Lucania, a Province confederate with the Tarentines in this Warre.

The Lucanians were not readie to defend their owne Countrey; the Samnites were careless of the harme, that fell not (as yet) vpon themselves; the Tarentines were better prepared than they would haue bene, but their valour was little: all of these had bene accustomed to shrinke, for feare of the Roman fortitude; and therefore it fell out happily, that Pyrrhus relied more vpon his owne forces, than the issue of their vaunting promises. Hee was now driven, either to set forward, with those that himselfe had brought into Italy, and the assistance of the Tarentines, wherein wherein little was to be reposed; or else to weaken the reputation of his owne sufficiency, which by all meanes he was carefull to vp-hold. In good time a great part of his forces, that had bene scattered by foule weather at Sea, were safely come to him: with which he resolved to assay the valour of the Romans, against whom hee proudly marched.

Lucius the Consul was not affrighted, with the terrible name of a great King; but came on confidently to meet him, and giue him battaile, ere all his adherents should be ready to ioyne with him. This boldnesse of the Roman, and the slacknesse of the Messapians, Lucanians, Samnites, and others, whom the danger most concerned, caused Pyrrhus to offer a treatie of peace: requiring to haue the quarrell, betweene the Romans and his Italian friends, referred to his arbitrement. Whether he did this to winne time, that the Samnites and their fellowes might arrive at his Campe; or whether, considering better at neare distance, the weight of the business, which he had taken in hand, he were desirous to quit it with his honour, the short answer, that was returned to his proposition, gaue him no meanes of either the one or the other: for the Romans sent him this word, that they had neither chosen him their Iudge, nor feared him their enemy.

Hereupon, both Armies halted their march vnto the River of Siris: Lucius intending to fight, before the arrival of the Samnites; Pyrrhus, to hinder him from passing that River, vntill his owne Armie were full. Vpon the first view of the Roman Campe, it was readily conceiued by Pyrrhus, that he had not now to doe with barbarous people, but with men well trained in a braue discipline of warre: which caused him to set a strong Corps de garde, vpon the passage of the river, that he might not be compelled to fight, vntill he saw his best aduantage. But he quickly found, that this new enemy was not only skilfull in the Art of war, but courageous in execution. For the Roman Armie entred the Ford, in face of his Corps de garde; and their horse, at the same time, beganne to passe the River, in sundrie places: which caused the Greekes to forsake the defence of their banke, and speedily retire vnto their Campe.

This audacitie forced Pyrrhus to battaile; wherewith he thought it best to present them, ere their whole Armie had recovered firme footing, and were in order. So directing his Captaines how to marshall his battailes; himselfe with the horse, charged vpon the Romans: who stoutly receiued him, as men well exercised in sustaining furious impressions. In this fight, neither did his courage transport him beyond the dutie of a carefull General, nor his prouidence in directing others, hinder the manifestation of his personall valour. It behooued him in dedee to doe his best; for he neuer met with better opposers. Once, and shortly after the fight began, his horse was slaine vnder him: afterwards, he changed armour with a friend; but that friend paid his life for the vse of his Kings armour, which was torne from his backe. This accident had almost lost him the battaile: but he perceiving it, discovered his face, and thereby restored courage to his men, and tooke from the Roman their vaine ioy. The fight was obdurate, and with the greater losse (at least of more eminent men) on Pyrrhus his side, as long as only speare and sword were vsed. But when the Elephants were brought into the wings, whose vniuersall forme and terrible aspect, the horses of the Romans (vnaccustomed to the like) were not able to sustaine; then was the victorie quickly gotten. For the Roman battailes, perceiving their horse put to rout, and driven out of the field; finding also themselves both charged in flanke, and ouer-borne, by the force, and huge bulke, of these strange beasts; gaue way to necessity, and saved themselves, as well as they could, by hasty flight in which conternation, they were so forgetfull of their discipline, that they tarried not to defend their Campe, but ranne quite beyond it, leauing both it, and the honour of the day, entirely to Pyrrhus.

The fame of this victorie was soone spread ouer Italy; and the reputation was no lesse than the fame. For it was a matter very rare to bee heard, that a Roman Consul, Confull, with a select Armie, should loose in plaine battaile, not only the field, but the Campe it selfe, being so notably fortified, as they alwaies were. And this honour was the more brauely wonne by Pyrrhus, for that hee had with him none of his Italian friends, save the vnwarlike Tarentines. Neither could he well diffemble his content that he rooke, in hauing the glory of this action peculiarly his owne, at such time as he blamed the Lucans and Samnites, for comming (as we say) a day after the faire. Neuerthelesse, he wisely considered the strength of the Romans, which was such, as would better endure many such losses, than he could many such victories. Therefore he thought it good to compound with them, whilest with his honour he might; and to that purpose hee sent vnto them Cyneas his Embassadour, demanding only to haue the Tarentines permitted to liue at rest, and himselfe accepted as their especiall friend. This did Cyneas, with all his cunning, and with liberal gifts, labour to effect; but neither man nor woman could be found in Rome, that would take any bribe of him; neither did their desire of recouering their captiues, or their danger, by the rising of many States in Italie against them, so incline them to peace, as the vehement exhortation of Appius Claudius, an old and blinde Senator, did stirre them vp to make good their honour by warre. So they returned answere, that whilest Pyrrhus abode in Italie, they would come to no agreement with him.

Such was the report, that Cyneas made, at his returne, of the Roman puissance and vertue; as kindled in Pyrrhus, a great desire of confederacie, with that gallant Citie. Hereupon many kinde Offices passed betweene them: but still when hee vrged his motion of peace, the answere was, He must first depart out of Italie, and then treat of peace.

In the meane season, each part made prouision for warre; the Romans leauing a more mightie armie than the former, and Pyrrhus being strengthened with access vnto his forces, of all the East parts of Italie. So they came to triall of a second battaile, wherein (though after long and cruell fight) the boisterous violence of the Elephants, gaue to Pyrrhus a second victorie. But this was not altogether so joyfull as the former had bene: rather it gaue him cause to say, that such another victorie would be his vtter vndoing. For he had lost the flower of his Armie in this battaile: and though he draue the Romans into their Campe, yet he could not force them out of it, nor saw any likelihood of preuailling against them, that were like to be relieued with daily supplies, whilest he should be driuen to spend vpon his old Rock. Neither could hee expect, that his Elephants should alwaies stand him in stead. A little knowledge of their manner in fight, would soone teach the Romans, that were apt Scholers in such learning, how to make them vnseruicable. Wherefore hee desired nothing more, than how to carrie his honour safe out of Italie: which to doe (seeing the Romans would not helpe him, by offering or accepting any faire conditions of peace, or of truce) he tooke a slight occasion, presented by 40 fortune, that followeth to be related.

§. III.

The great troubles in Macedon and Sicill. How Pyrrhus, being inuited into Sicill, forooke Italie; wanne the most of the isle; and lost it in short space.

Pyrrhus returns into Italy; where he is beaten by the Romans, and so goes backe to his owne Kingdome.

10 When Ptolomie Ceraunus had traiterously murdered his Benefactor and Patron Selenus, he presently seized vpon all the Dominions of Lysimachus in Europe, as if they had bene the due reward, vnto him, that had slaine the Conquerour. The houses of Cassander and Lysimachus were then fallen to the ground: neither was there in Macedon any man of strength and reputation enough, to aduance himselfe against Ceraunus. The friends of Lysimachus were rather pleased to haue him their King, that had (as hee professed) reuenged their Lords death; than any way offended with the odiousnes of his fact, by which they were freed from subiection, to one, against whom they had stood in opposition. Many there were, that vpon remembrance of his Fathers great vertue, gathered hope of finding the like in Ceraunus: perswading themselves that his raigne might proue good, though his entrance had bene wicked. These 10 affections of the Macedonians did serue to defeat Antigonus the sonne of Demetrius, that made an attempt vpon the Kingdome. As for Antigonus, the sonne of Selenus, he was farre off, and might be questioned about some part of Asia, ere he should be able to bring an Armie neare vnto Europe. Yet hee made great shew of meaning to reuenge his fathers death: but being stronger in monie then in armes, he was content, after a while, to take faire words, and make peace with the murderer. While these three stroue about the Kingdome, Pyrrhus, who thought his claimes good as any of theirs, made vse of their dissention: threatening warre, or promising his assistance, to euery one of them. By these meanes he strengthened himselfe, and greatly 30 aduantaged his Italian voiage, which he had then in hand: requesting monie of Antiochus, ships of Antigonus, and souldiers of Ptolomie, who gaue him his daughter in marriage, and lent him a strong power of Macedonian Souldiers, and of Elephants (covenanting to haue them restored at two yeeres end) more for feare than for loue: that so he might free himselfe from trouble, & quietly enioy his Kingdome.

Thus Ptolomie grew mightie on the suddaine; and the power that by wicked meanes he had gotten, by meanes as wicked he increased.

All Macedon and Thrace being his, the strong Citie of Cassandria was held by Arsinne his sister, the widow of Lysimachus, who lay therein with her yong children. Her hee circumvented by making loue to her, and (according to the fashion of those times, wherein Princes regarded no degree of consanguinitie) taking her to wife, 40 with promise to adopt her children: a promise that he meant not to performe; for it was not long, ere he flew them, and draue her into exile.

In the pride of this good successe, which his villanie found; vengeance came vpon him from a farre, by the furie of a Nation, that hee had neuer heard of. Belgius a Captaine of the Gauls, hauing forced his passage through many Countries, vnto the confines of Macedon, sent a proud messlage to Ceraunus, commanding him to buy peace with monie, or otherwise, to looke for all the miseries of warre. These Gauls were the race of those, that issued out of their Countrie, to seeke new feates in that great expedition, wherein Brennus tooke and burnt the Citie of Rome. They had diuided themselves, at their setting forth, into two Companies; of which the one fell 50 vpon Italie; the other passing through the Countries that lie on the Northerne side of the Adriatick Sea, made long aboade in Pannonia, and the Regions adjoining, where they forced all the neighbour Princes to redeme peace with tribute; as now they would haue compelled Ceraunus to doe; vnto whose borders they came about an hundred and eight yeares after such time as their fellowes had taken Rome.

Cccc

When

When their Embassadors came to Ptolomie, asking what he would giue : His answer was, that he would be contented to giue them peace, but it mult bee with condition, that they should put into their hands their Princes as hostages, and yeeld vp their armes ; for otherwife, he would neither pardon their boldnesse, nor giue any credit to their words. At this answer, when it was returned, the Gauls did laugh, saying, that they would soone confute with deedes, the vanitie of such proud words. It may seeme strange, that he, who had giuen away part of his Armie vnto Pyrrhus, for very feare ; should bee so confident in vndertaking more mightie enemies. The King of the Dardanijs offered to lend him twenty thousand men against the Gauls ; but hee scorned the offer, saying, that hee had the children of those, 10 which vnder the conduct of Alexander, had subdued all the East. Thus hee issued forth against the barbarous people, with his famous Macedonians, as if the victorie must needs haue followed the reputation of a great name. But hee soone found his great error, when it was too late. For the enemies were not only equal in strength of body, and fiercenesse of courage, but so farre superiour to the Macedonians in numbers, that few or none escaped their furie, Ptolomie himselfe grievously wounded, fell into their hands, whilst the battell continued ; and they presently strooke off his head, which they shewed to his men, on the top of a Lance, to their vtter astonishment.

The report of this great ouerthrow filled all Macedon with such desperation, that the people fled into walled Townes, and abandoned the whole Countrey as lost. Only Sophenes, a valiant Captaine, animating as many as he could, gathered a small Armie, with which hee many times got the vpper hand, and hindred Belgius from vsing the victorie at his whole pleasure. In regard of this his vertue, the Souldiers would haue made him King, which title hee refused, & was content wth the name of a Generall. But (as mischiefs doe seldom come alone) the good successe of Belgius, drew into Macedon, Brennus, another Captaine of the Gauls, with an hundred and fiftie thousand foot, and fiftene thousand horse ; against which mightie Armie, when Sophenes with his weake troups made opposition, he was easily beaten, and the Macedonians againe compelled to hide themselves within their walls, lea- 30 uing all their Countrey to the spoile of the Barbarians.

Thus were the Macedonians destitute of a King, and troden downe by a Nation, that they had not heard of ; in lesse then fiftie yeares after the death of Alexander, who sought to discour and subdue vnkowne Countries, as if all Greece, and the Empire of Persia had bene too little for a King of Macedon.

Very seasonably had these newes bene carried to Pyrrhus in Italie, who sought a faile pretext of relinquishing his warre with the Romans ; had not other tidings out of Sicill distracted him, and carried him away in pursute of nearer hopes. For after the death of Agathocles, who ragined over the whole Iland, the Carthaginians sent an Armie to conquer Sicill, out of which, by him, they had bene expelled. This 40 Armie did so fast preuaile, that the Sicilians had no other hope to auoide slaue-ry, than in submitting themselves to the rule of Pyrrhus ; whom, being a Grecian, and a noble Prince, they thought it more for their good to obey, then to liue vnder the well knowne heauie yoke of Carthage. To him therefore, the Syracusans, Leontines, and Agragintines, principall Estates of the Iste, sent Embassadors, earnestly desiring him to take them into his protection.

It grieued Pyrrhus exceedingly, that two such notable occasions, of enlarging his Dominions, should fall out so vnluckily, both at one time. Yet whether hee thought the businesse of Sicill more important, or more full of likelihood, or whether perhaps hee beleued (as came after to passe) that his advantage vpon Macedon would not so hastily passe away, but that hee might finde some occasion to lay hold on it, at better leisure, ouer into Sicill he transported his Armie, leauing the Tarentines to shift for themselves ; yet not leaving them free as hee found them, but with a Garrison in their Towne, to hold them in subiection.

As

As his departure out of Italie, was rather grounded on head-long passion, than mature aduice ; so were his actions following, vntill his returne vnto Epirus, rather many and tumultuous, then well ordered, or note-worthie. The Armie which he carried into that Iste, consisted of thirtie thousand foot and two thousand five hundred horse : with which, soone after his descent in Sicill, he forc't the Carthaginians, out of all, in effect, that they held therein. He alsoe wonne the strong Citie of Eryx, and hauing beaten the Mamertines in battaile, hee beganne to change condition, and turne Tyrant. For he draue Sofstratus (to whom his crueltie was suspect) out of the Iland, and put Theron of Syracuse to death, being jealous of his greatnesse ; 10 which two persons had faithfully serued him, and deliuered the great and rich Citie of Syracuse into his hands. After this, his fortunes declined so fast, as hee serued himselfe, and salued the dis-reputation of his leauing Sicill, by an Embassage sent him from the Tarentines, and Samnites, imploring his present helpe against the Romans, who since his leauing Italie, had well-nere dispossest them of all that they had.

Taking this faire occasion, hee embarked for Italie ; but was first beaten by the Carthaginian Gallies, in his passage, and secondly assailed in Italie itselfe, by eigh- 15 teene hundred Mamertines, that attended him in the straits of the Countrey. Lastly, after hee had recovered Tarentum, hee fought a third battaile with the Romans, led by M. Curius, who was victorious ouer him, and forc't him out of Italie, into his owne Epirus.

A Prince hee was farre more valiant then constant, and had hee been but a General of an Armie, for some other great King or State, and had been directed to haue conquered any one Countrey or Kingdome, it is to be thought, that hee would haue purchased no lesse honour than any man of warre, either preceding or succeeding him ; for a greater Captaine, or a valiant man, hath bene no where found. But hee neuer staid vpon any enterprize ; which was, indeede, the disease hee had, whereof not long after hee died in Argos.

§. IIII.

How ANTIGONVS, the sonne of DEMETRIVS, deliuered Macedon from the Gauls. How PYRRHVVS wonne the Kingdome of Macedon from ANTIGONVS.

THe vertue of Sophenes being too weake, to defend the Kingdome of Macedon ; and the fortune which had accompanied him against Belgius, failing him in his attempts against Brennus ; the Macedonians were no lesse glad to submit themselves vnto the gouernment of Antigonus, 40 than they had formerly bene desirous to free themselves from the impotent rule of his father Demetrius. His coming into the Countrey, with an Armie, Nauie, and treasure beleeeming a King, did rather breed good hope in the people, than fill them with much confidence : for hee was driuen to vse against the Barbarians, only those forces, which he brought with him, hauing none other than good wilhes of the Macedons, to take his part. Brennus, with the maine strength of his Armie, was gone to spoile the Temple of Apollo at Delfos, hauing left no more behinde him, than he thought necessarie to guard the borders of Macedon, and Pannonia ; which were about fiftene thousand foot, and three thousand horse. These could not be idle, but thought to get somewhat for themselves, in the absence of 50 their fellowes : and therefore sent vnto Antigonus, offering to sel him peace, if hee would pay well for it ; which by the example of Cerannus, hee had learnt (as they thought) not to refuse. Antigonus was vnwilling to weaken his reputation by condescending to their proud demaids ; yet hee judged it vnfit to exasperat their furious choler, by vn courteous words or vllage, as Cerannus had ouer-fondly done. Wherefor

he entertained their Embassadors in very louing and sumptuous maner, with a roial feast : wherein he exposed to their view, such abundance of masse gold and siluer, that they were not so much delighted with the meat, as with sight of the vefells, wherein it was serued. He thought hereby, to make them vnderstand, how great a Prince he was, and how able, if need required, to wage a mighty Armie.

To which end, he likewise did shew vnto them, his Camp and Nauie, but especially his Elephants. But all this brauerie serued only to kindle their greedie appetites; who seeing his ships heauily laden, his Campe full of wealth, and ill fortified, himselfe (as it seemed) secure, and his men, both in strength and courage inferior vnto the Gauls, thought all time lost, wherein they suffered the present possessors, to spend the riches which they accounted assuredly their owne. They returned therefore to their Companions, with none other newes in their mouthes, than of spoile and purchase: which tale, carried the Gauls head-long, to Antigonus his camp, where they expected a greater bootie, then the victorie ouer Ceranus had giuen to Belgius. Their comming was terrible and suddaine; yet not so suddaine, but that Antigonus had notice of it, who distrustful the courage of his owne men, dislodged somewhat before their arriual, and conueighed himselfe, with his whole armie and carriage, into certaine woods adioyning, where he lay clofe.

The Gauls, finding his Camp forsaken, were not baltie to pursue him, but fell to ransacking the emptie Cabbinnes of the Souldiers; in hope of finding all that was either lost or hidden. At length, when they had searched euery place in vaine, angrie at their lost labour, they marched with all speed toward the Sea-side; that they might fall vpon him, while he was buisie in getting his men and carriages a ship-board. But the successe was no way answerable to their expectation. For being proud of the terror which they had brought vpon Antigonus, they were so carelesse of the Sea-men, that without all order, they fell to the spoile of what they found on the shore, and in such ships as lay on ground.

Part of the Armie had left Antigonus, where he lay in couert; and had saued it self by getting aboard the fleet: in which number were some well experienced men of warre: who discovering the much aduantage offered vnto them, by the desperate presumption of their enemies, tooke courage, and encouraged others, to lay manlie hold vpon the opportunitie. So the whole number, both of Souldiers and Mariners, landing together, with great resolution, gaue so braue a charge vpon the disordered Gauls, that their contemptuous boldnesse was thereby changed into suddaine feare, and they, after a great slaughter, driuen to cast themselves into the seruice of Antigonus.

The fame of this victorie, caused all the barbarous Nations in those quarters, to re-entertaine their ancient beliefe of the Macedonian valour: by which, the terrible and resistlesse oppressors of so many Countries, were overthrowne.

To speake more of the Gauls, in this place; and to shew how, about these times, three Tribes of them passed ouer into Asia the lesse, with their warres and conquests there; I hold it needlesse: the victorious armes of the Romans, taming them hereafter, in the Countries which now they wanne, shall giue better occasion, to rehearse these matters briefly.

Howsoeuer the good successe of Antigonus got him reputation, among the barbarous people, yet his owne Souldiers, that without his leading, had wonne this victorie, could not thereupon be perswaded to thinke him a good man of warre: knowing that he had no interest in the honour of the seruice, wherein his conduct was no better, then creeping into a wood.

This (as presently will appeare) was greatly helpfull vnto Pyrrhus: though as yet he knew not so much. For Pyrrhus, when his affaires in Italie stood vpon hard termes, had sent vnto Antigonus for helpe: not without threats, in case it were denied. So was he sure to get, either a supply, wherewith to continue his war against the Romans, or some seeming honourable pretence, to forsake Italie, vnder colour of making making his word good, in seeking reuenge. The threats which he had vsed in brauerie, meere necessitie forced him, at his returne into Epirus, to put in practise.

He brought home with him, eight thousand foot, and five hundred horse: an armie too little to be employed, by his resistlesse nature, in any action of importance; yet greater then he had meanes to keepe in pay: Therefore he fell vpon Macedon; intending to take what spoile he could get, and make Antigonus compound with him, to be freed from trouble. At his first entrance into this businesse, two thousand of Antigonus his Souldiers, reuolted vnto Pyrrhus; and many Cities, either willingly or perforce, receiued him. Such faire beginnings, easily perswaded the courage of this daring Prince, to set vpon Antigonus himselfe, and to hazard his fortune, in triall of a battaile, for the whole Kingdome of Macedon.

It appeares, that Antigonus had no desire to fight with this hot warrior; but thought it the wisest way, by protracting of time, to wearie him out of the Countrie. For Pyrrhus ouertooke him in a straight passage, and charged him in the reare; wherein were the Gauls, and the Elephants, which were thought the best of his strength: a manifest prooffe that he was in retreat. The Gauls very brauely sustained Pyrrhus his impression; yet were broken at length (when most of them were slaine) after a sharpe fight: wherein it seemes, that Antigonus keeping his Macedonian Phalanx within the streight, and not aduancing to their succour, tooke away their courage, by deceiuing their expectation. The Captaines of the Elephants were taken soone after; who finding themselves exposed to the same violence that had consumed so many of the Gauls, yielded themselves and the beasts. All this was done in full view of Antigonus, and his Macedonians, to their great discomfort: which emboldened Pyrrhus, to charge them where they lay in their strength. Where the Phalanx could be charged only in a front, it was a matter of extreme difficultie (if not impossible) to force it. But the Macedonians had sene so much, that they had no desire to fight against Pyrrhus; who discovered so well their affections, that hee aduentured to draw neare in person, and exhort them to yeeld. Neither the common Souldier, nor any Leader, refused to become his follower. All forooke Antigonus, a few horse-men excepted, that fled along with him to Thessalonica; where he had some small forces left, and monie enough to entertaine a greater power, had he known where to leaue it. But while he was thinking how to allure a sufficient number of the Gauls into his seruice; whereby hee might repaire his losse: Ptolomie, the sonne of Pyrrhus, came vpon him, and easily defeating his weake forces, draue him to flie from the parts about Macedon, to those Townes a farr off in Peloponnesus, in which hee had formerly lurked, before such time as he looked abroad into the world, and made himselfe a King.

This good successe reuiued the spirits of the Epirs, and caused him to forget all sorrow, of his late misfortunes in the Roman warre: so that he sent for his sonne Helenus (whom he had left with a Garrison, in the Castle of Tarentum) willing him to come ouer into Greece, where was more matter of conquest, and let the Italians shift for themselves.

¶ V.

How Pyrrhus assailed Sparta without successe. His enterprise vpon Argos, and his death.

PYRRHVS had now conceiued a great hope, that nothing should be able to withstand him; seeing, that in open fight, he had vanquished the Gauls, beaten Antigonus, and won the Kingdome of Macedon; There was not in all Greece, nor, indeede, in all the Lands that Alexander had wonne, any Leader of such name and worth, as deserved to be set vp against him: which filled him with the opinion that he might do what he pleased. He raised therefore an Armie, consisting of five and twenty thousand foot, two thousand horse, and foure and twentie Elephants; pretending warre against Antigonus, and the giuing libertie to those Towns in Peloponnesus, which the same Antigonus held in subiection; though it was easily discovered, that such great preparations were made, for accomplishment of some designe more important, then warre against a Prince already vanquished, and almost vterly dejected. Especially the Lacedemonians feared this expedition, as made against their State. For Cleonymus, one of their Kings, being expelled out of his Countrey, had betaken himselfe to Pyrrhus: who readily entertained him, and promised to restore him to his Kingdome. This promise was made in secret; neither would Pyrrhus make thew 10 of any displeasure that he bare vnto Sparta; but contrariwise professed, that it was his intent, to haue two of his owne yonger sonnes trained vp in that Citie, as in a place of noble discipline. With such colours he deluded men, euen till he entred vpon Laconia; where presently he demeaned himselfe as an open enemy: excusing himselfe and his former dissembling words, with a iea; That he followed herein the Lacedemonian custome, of concealing what was truly purposed. It had been, indeede, the manner of the Lacedemonians, to deale in like sort with others, whom, in the time of their greatnesse, they fought to oppresse: but now they complained of that, as falsehood, in Pyrrhus, which they alwaies practised as wisdom, till it made them distrustful, forsaken, and almost contemptible. Neuertheless, they were not wanting to themselves in this dangerous extremitie. For the old men and women laboured in fortifying the Towne; causing such as could beare armes, to reserue themselves fresh against the assault: which Pyrrhus had vnwisely deferred, vpon assurance of preuailing.

Cccce j he

Sparta was neuer fortified, before this time, otherwise then with armed Citizens: soone after this (it being built vpon vncuen ground, and for the most part, hard to approach) the lower and more accessible places, were fenced with walls; at the present, only trenches were cast, and barriadoes made with Carts, where the entrance seemed most easy. Three daies together it was assailed by Pyrrhus, exceeding fiercely; and no lesse stoutly defended. The desperate courage of the Citizens persued 30 the Towne the first day, wherinto the violence of Pyrrhus had forced entrance the second day, but that his wounded horse threw him to the ground, which made his Souldiers more mindfull of sauing the person of their King, than of breaking into the Citie, though already they had torne in funder the barriadoes. Presently after this, one of Antigonus his Captaines got into Sparta with a good strength of men; and Arcus the King returned out of Crete (where he had been helping his friends in warre) with two thousand men, little knowing the danger, in which his owne countrey stood vntill he was almost at home. These succours did not more animate the Spartans, then kindle in Pyrrhus a desire to preuaile against all impediments. But the third daies worke shewed, how great his error had bene, in forbearing to assault 40 the Towne at his first coming. For he was so manfully repelled, that he saw no likelihood of getting the place, otherwise than by a long siege: in which tedious course he had no desire to spend his time.

Antigonus had now raised an Armie, though not strong enough to meet the enemy in plaine field, yet able to hinder all his purposes. This made Pyrrhus doubt what way to take; being diuersly affected, by the difficultie of his enterprise in hand, and the shame of taking a repulse in his first attempt. Whilest hee was thus perplexed, letters came from Argos, inviting him thither; with promise, to deliuer that Citie into his hands.

Ciuitil dissension raging then hotly in Argos, caused the heads of severall factions to call in Pyrrhus and Antigonus; but the coming of these two Princes, taught the Citizens wit, and made them desirous to rid their hand of such powerfull Assailants, as each of the two Kings pretended himselfe to be. Antigonus told the Arguines, that he came to saue them from the tyrannie of Pyrrhus; and that hee would be be gone if they needed not his helpe. On the other side, Pyrrhus would needes persuade them, that he had none other errand, than to make them late from Antigonus; offering in like manner, to depart if they so desired.

The Arguines tooke small pleasure, in hearing the Foxe and Kite at strife, which of them should keepe the Chickens from his enemy: and therefore prayed them both, to diuert their powers some other way. Hercunto Antigonus readily condescended, and gaue hostages to assure his word: for he was the weaker, and stood in neede of good-will. But Pyrrhus thought it enough to promise: hostages he would giue none, to his inferiours: especially, meaning deceit. This made them suspect 10 his purpose to be such, as, indeede, it was. Yet he lesse regarded their opinions, than to hold them worthe of assurance, by giuing such a bond, as he intended to breake ere the next morning.

It was concluded, that a Gate of the Citie should be opened by night vnto Pyrrhus, by his Complices within Argos: which was accordingly performed. So his Armie, without any tumult, entred the Citie: till the Elephants, with Towers on their backs, cloyed the way, being too high to passe the Gate. The taking off, and setting on againe, of those Towers, with the trouble thereto belonging, did both giue alarme to the Citie, and some leisure to take order for defence, before so many were entred, as could fully master it. Argos was full of ditches, which greatly hindered the Gauls (that had the vanngarde) being ignorant of the waies, in the darke night. The Citizens, on the other side, had much advantage, by their knowledge of euery by-passage: and setting vpon the enemies on all sides, did put them to great losse, and more trouble.

Pyrrhus therefore, vnderstanding by the confused noyse, and vnequall shoutings of his owne men, that they were in distresse, entred the Citie in person, to take order for their reliefe, and assurance of the place. But the darkenesse, the throng, and many other impediments, kept him from doing any thing of moment, vntill breake of day. Then beganne he to make his passage by force, and so farre preuailed, that he got into the Market-place. It is said, that seeing in that place, the Image of a 30 Wolfe and a Bull, in such posture as if they had bene combattant, hee called to minde an Oracle, which threatened him with death, when he should behold a Bull fighting with a Wolfe: and that hereupon he made retreat.

Indeede, the coming of Antigonus to the rescue, the disorder and confusion of his owne men; with diuers ill accidents, gaue him reasonable cause to haue retired out of the Citie, though the Wolfe and Bull had bene away. The tumult was such, that no directions could be heard; but as some gaue back, so did others thrust forward, and the Arguines pressing hard vpon him, forced Pyrrhus to make good his retreat, with his owne sword. The tops of the houses were covered with women, that stood looking on the fight. Among these was one, that saw her owne sonne in 40 dangerous case, fighting with Pyrrhus. Wherefore, shee tooke a tile-stone, or slate, and threw it so violently downe on the head of Pyrrhus, that hee fell to ground astonished with the blow; and lying in that case, had his head cut off.

Thus ended the restless ambition of Pyrrhus, together with his life: and thus returned the Kingdome of Macedon to Antigonus; who forthwith possessed the armie, the bodie, and the children of his enemy. The bodie of Pyrrhus had honourable funeral, and was giuen by Antigonus vnto Helenus his sonne; which yong Prince he graciously sent home, into his Fathers Kingdome of Epirus. From this time forwards, the race of Antigonus held the Kingdome of Macedon; the posteritie of Seleucus reigned ouer Asia and Syria; and the house of Ptolomie had quiet 50 possession of Aegypt: vntill such time, as the Citie of Rome, swallowing all vp, digested these, among other Countries, into the bodie of her owne Empire.

A discussion of that probleme of LIVIE; Whether the Romans could haue resisted the great ALEXANDER. That neither the Macedonian nor the Roman Souldier, was of equall valour to the English.

HAT question handled by LIVIE; Whether the great ALEXANDER could haue preuailed against the Romans, if after his Easterne conquest, he had bent all his forces against them, hath bene, and is, the subject of much dispute; which (as it seemes to me) the arguments on both sides do not so well explaine, as doth the experience that PYRRHUS hath giuen, of the Roman power, in his daies. For, if he, a Commander (in HAN-NIBALS judgement) inferior to Alexander, though to none else, could with small strength of men, and little store of monie, or of other needfull heips in warre, vanquish them in two battailes, and endanger their estate, when it was well setled, and held the best part of Italie, vnder a confirmed obedience: what would Alexander haue done, that was abundantly prouided of all which is need-full

full to a Conquerour, wanting only matter of employment, comming vpon them before their Dominion was halfe so well fetled. It is easie to say, that Alexander had no more, than thirty thousand foot, and foure thousand horse (as indeede, at his first passage into Asia, he carried ouer, not many more) and that the rest of his followers were no better than base effeminate Asiaticques. But he that considers the Armies of Perdiccas, Antipater, Craterus, Eumenes, Ptolome, Antigonous, & Lysimachus, with the actions by them performed, every one of which (to omit others) commanded only some fragment of this dead Emperours power; shall easily finde, that such a reckoning is farre short of the truth.

It were needlesse to speake of Treasures, Horses, Elephants, Engines of batterie, 10 and the like: of all which, the Macedonian had abundance; the Roman hauing nought, save men and armes. As for Sea-forces; he that shall consider after what sort the Romans, in their first Punicke warre, were trained, in the rudiments of Navigation; sitting vpon the shoare, and beating the sand with poles, to practise the stroke of the Oare, as not daring to lanch their ill-built vessels into the Sea; will easily conceiue, how farre too weak they would haue proued in such seruices.

Now for helpers in warre; I doe not see, why all Greece and Macedon, being absolutely commanded by Alexander, might not well deferre to be laid in ballance, against those parts of Italie, which the Romans held in ill-assured subiection. To omit therefore all benefit, that the Easterne world, more wealthy, indeede, than 20 valiant, could haue afforded vnto the Macedonian: let vs only conjecture, how the States of Sicill and Carthage, nearest neighbours to such a quarrell (had it happened) would haue stood affected. The Sicilians were, for the most part, Græci; neither is it to be doubted, that they would readily haue submitted themselves vnto him, that ruled all Greece besides them. In what termes they commonly stood, and how ill they were able to defend themselves, it shall appeare anon. Sure it is, that Alexander 30 comming into those parts, would haue brought excellẽt joy, to them that were faine to get the helpe of Pyrrhus, by offering to become his subjects. As for the Carthaginians; if Agathocles, the Tyrant of Syracuse, hated of his people, and ill able to defend his owne besieged Citie, could, by aduenturing to saile into Africk, put their Dominion, yea and Carthage it selfe, in extreme hazard; shall wee thinke that they would haue beene able to withstand Alexander? But, why doe I question their abilitie, seeing that they sent Embassadours, with their submission, as farre as 40 Babylon, ere the warre drew neare them? Wherefore it is manifest, that the Romans must, without other succour, than perhaps of some few Italian friends (of which yet there were none, that forsooke them not, at some time, both before and after this) haue opposed their valour, and good militarie discipline, against the power of all Countries, to them knowne, if they would haue made resistance. How they could haue sped well, in vndertaking such a match; it is vneasie to finde in discourse of humane reason. It is true; that vertue and fortune worke wonders: but it is 40 against cowardly fooles, and the vnfortunate: for who soeuer contends with one too mightie for him; either must excell in these, as much as his enimie goes beyond him in power; or else must looke, both to be ouer-come, and to be cast downe so much the lower, by how much the opinion of his fortune and vertue renders him suspected, as likely to make head another time against the vanquisher. Whether the Roman, or the Macedonian, were in those daies the better Souldier, I will not take vpon me to determine: though I might, without partialitie, deliuer mine owne opinion, and preferre that Armie, which followed not onely Philip and Alexander, but also Alexanders Princes after him, in the greatest dangers of all sorts of warre; before any, that Rome either had, or in long time after did send forth. Concerning 50 fortune; who can giue a rule that shall alwaies hold? Alexander was victorious in euery battaile that he fought: and the Romans in the issue of euery warre. But forasmuch as Liui hath judged this a matter worthe of consideration; I thinke it a great part of Romes good fortune, that Alexander came not into Italie: where in three three yeares after his death, the two Roman Consuls, together with all the power of that State, were surprized by the Sammites, and enforced to yeeld vp their armes. We may therefore permit Liui to admire his owne Romans, and to compare with Alexander those Capitaines of theirs, which were honoured sufficiently, in being thought equal to his followers: that the same conceit should blind our iudgement, we cannot permit without much vanitie.

Now in deciding such a controuersie, me thinks it were not amiss, for an Englishman, to giue such a sentence betwene the Macedonians and Romans, as the Romans once did (being chosen Arbitrators) betwene the Ardeates and Aruntini, that 10 sirooue about a peece of land; laying, that it belonged vnto neither of them, but vnto the Romans themselves.

If therefore it be demanded, whether the Macedonians, or the Roman, were the best V Varriour? I will answer: The Englishmen. For it will soone appeare, to any that shall examine the noble acts of our Nation in warre, that they were performed by no aduantage of weapon; against no savage or vmanlike people; the enimie being farre superiour vnto vs in numbers, and all needfull prouisions, yea as well trained as we, or commonly better, in the exercise of warre.

In what sort Philip wanne his Dominion in Greece; what manner of men the Per- 20 sians and Indians were; whom Alexander vanquished; as likewise of what force the Macedonian Phalans was, and how well appointed, against such armes as it commonly encountered: any man, that hath taken paines to reade the foregoing storie of them, doth sufficiently vnderstand. Yet was this Phalans neuer, or very seldome, able to stand, against the Roman Armies: which were embattailed in too excellent a forme, as I know not, whether any Nation besides them haue vsed, either before or since. The Roman weapons likewise, both offensive and defensive, were of greater 30 vltie, than those with which any other Nation hath serued, before the fierie instruments of Gunne-powder were knowne. As for the enimies, with which Rome had to doe: we finde, that they, which did ouer-match her in numbers, were as farre ouer-matched by her, in weapons; and that they, of whom she had little ad- 40 uantage in armes, had as little aduantage of her in multitude. This also (as Plutarch well obserueth) was a part of her happinesse; that shee was neuer ouer-laid with too great warres at once.

Hereby it came to passe, that hauing at first increased her strength, by accession of the Sabines; hauing wonne the State of Alba, against which shee aduentured her owne selfe, as it were in wager, vpon the heads of three Champions: and hauing thereby made her selfe Princess of Latium: shee did afterwards, by long warre, in many ages, extend her Dominion ouer all Italie. The Carthaginians had well-neere oppressed her: but their Souldiers were Mercinarie; so that for want of proper strength, they were easily beaten at their owne doores. The Ætolians, and with 40 them all, or the most of Greece, assisted her against Philip the Macedonian: hee being beaten, did lend her his helpe, to beat the same Ætolians. The warres against Antiochus, and other Asiaticques, were such as gaue to Rome small cause of boast, though much of joy: for those opposites were as base of courage, as the lands which they held were abundant of riches. Sicill, Spaine, and all Greece, fell into her hands by vsing her aide, to protect them against the Carthaginians and Macedonians.

I shall not neede to speake of her other conquests: it was easie to get more when shee had gotten all this. It is not my purpose to disgrace the Roman valour (which was very noble) or to blemish the reputation of so many famous victories: I am not so idle. This I say; that among all their warres, I finde not any, wherein their 50 valour hath appeared, comparable to the English. If my iudgement seeme ouer-partiall; our warres in France may helpe to make it good.

First, therefore it is well knowne; that Rome (or perhaps all the world besides) had neuer any so braue a Commander in warre, as Julius Cæsar: and that no Roman 60 armie was comparable vnto that, which serued vnder the same Cæsar. Likewise, it is apparent, that this gallant Armie, which had giuen faire proofe of the Roman courage, in good performance of the Helusion warre, when it first entred into Gaul, was neuertheless vtterly disheartned, when Cæsar led it against the Germans. So that we may iustly impute, all that was extraordinarie in the valour of Cæsars men, to their long exercise, vnder so good a Leader, in so great a warre. Now let vs in general, compare with the deeds done by these best of Roman Souldiers, in their principall seruice, the things performed in the same Countrey, by our common English Souldiers, leauied in haste, from following the Cart, or sitting on the shop-stall: so shall we see the difference. Herein will we deale fairly, and beleue Cæsar, in relating the acts of the Romans: but will call the French Historians to witnesse, that actions were performed by the English. In Cæsars time, France was inhabited by the Gauls, a stout people, but inferiour to the French, by whom they were subdued; euen when the Romans gaue them assistance. The Countrey of Gaul was rent in sunder (as Cæsar witnesseth) into many Lordships: some of which were gouerned by petty Kings, others by the multitude, none ordered in such sort as might make it applicable to the nearest Neighbour. The factions were many, and violent: not only in general through the whole Countrey, but betweene the petty States, yea in euery Citie, and almost in euery house. What greater aduantage could a Conquerour desire? Yet there was a greater. Arminius, with his Germans, had ouerrunne the Countrey, and held much part of it in subjection, little different from meere slauierie: yea, so often had the Germans preuailed in warre vpon the Gauls, that the Gauls (who had sometimes bene the better Souldiers) did hold themselves no way equall to those daily Inuaders. Had France bene so prepared vnto our English Kings, Rome it selfe, by this time, and long ere this time, would haue bene ours. But when King Edward the third beganne his warre vpon France, hee found the whole Countrey setled in obedience to one mightie King: a King whose reputation abroade, was no lesse than his puissance at home; vnder whose Ensigne, the King of Bohemia did serue in person; at whose call, the Genowyes, and other Neighbour States, were ready to take armes: finally, a King, vnto whom one Prince gaue away his Dominion, for loue; another sold away a goodly Citie and Territorie for monie. The Countrey lying so open to the Roman, and being so well fenced against the English; it is note-worthy, not who preuailed most therein (for it were meere vanitie, to match the English purchases, with the Roman conquest) but whether of the two gaue the greater proofe of militarie vertue. Cæsar himselfe doth witness, that the Gauls complained of their owne ignorance in the Art of warre, and that their owne hardinesse was ouer-masted, by the skill of their enemies. Poore men, they admired the Roman Towers, and Engines of batterie, raised and planted against their walls, as more than humane works. What greater wonder is it, that such a people was beaten by the Roman; than that the Caribes, a naked people, but valiant, as any vnder the skie, are commonly put to the worlde, by small numbers of Spaniards? Besides all this, we are to haue regard, of the great difficultie that was found, in drawing all the Gauls, or any great part of them, to one head, that with ioynt forces they might oppose their assailants: as also the much more difficultie, of holding them long together. For hereby it came to passe, that they were neuer able to make vse of opportunitie: but sometimes compelled to flay for their fellows; and sometimes driuen, to giue or take battaile, vpon extreme disadvantages, for feare, least their Companies should fall asunder: as indeede, vpon any little disaster, they were ready to breake, and returne euery one to the defence of his owne. All this, and (which was little lesse than all this) great oddes in weapon, gaue to the Romans, the honour of many gallant victories. What such helpe? or what other worldly helpe, than the golden metall of their Souldiers, had our English Kings against the French? Were not the French as well experienced in feats of VVarre? Yea, did they not thinke themselves therein our superiours? VWere they not in armes, in horse, and in all prouision, exceedingly beyond vs?

Let

a The Dolphin of Viennois.
b The King of Majorca.

Let vs heare, what a French writer saith, of the inequality that was betweene the French and English, when their King John was ready to giue the on-set, vpon the Black Prince, at the battaile of Poitiers. John had all aduantages ouer Edward, both of number, force, shew, Countrey, and conceit (the which is commonly a consideration of no small importance in worldly affaires) and withall, the choise of all his horse-men (esteemed then the best in Europe) with the greatest and wisest Captaines of his whole Realme. And what could he with more?

I thinke, it would trouble a Roman antiquarie, to finde the like example in their Histories, the example, I say, of a King, brought prisoner to Rome, by an Armie of eight thousand, which he had surrounded with fortie thousand, better appointed, and no lesse expert warriors. This I am sure of; that neither Syphax the Numidian, followed by a rabble of halfe Scullions, as Liuit rightly termes them, nor those cowardly Kings Perseus and Gentius, are worthe patternes. All that haue read of Cresite and Agincourt, will beare me witnesse, that I doe not allege the battaile of Poitiers, for lacke of other, as good examples of the English vertue: the proof whereof hath left many a hundred better marks, in all quarters of France, than euer did the valour of the Romans. If any man impute these victories of ours to the long Bow, as carrying farther, piercing more strongly, and quicker of discharge than the French Crosse-bow: my answer is ready; that in all these respects, it is also (being drawne with a strong arme) superiour to the Musket; yet is the Musket a weapon of more vse. The Gunne, and the Crosse-bow, are of like force, when discharged by a Boy or Woman, as when by a strong Man: weakenesse, or sickenesse, or a fore finger, makes the Long-Bow vsuerficable. More particularly, I say, that it was the custome of our Ancestors, to shoot, for the most part, point blank: and so shall he perceiue, that will note the circumstances of almost any one battaile. This takes away all objection: for when two Armies are within the distance of a Butts length, one flight of arrowes, or two at the most can be deliuered before they close. Neither is it in general true, that the long Bow reacheth farther, or that it pierceeth more strongly than the Crosse-bow: But this is the rare effect of an extraordinarie arme; whereupon can be grounded no common rule. If any man shall aske, How then came it to passe, that the English wanne so many great battailes, hauing no aduantage to helpe him? I may, with best commendation of modestie, referre him to the French Historian: who relating the victorie of our men at Creuant, where they passed a bridge, in face of the enemy, vseth these words; The English comes with a John de Serres, conquering brauerie, as he, that was accustomed to gaue euery where, without any stay: hee forcel our garde, placed vpon the bridge, to keepe the passage. Or I may cite another place of the same Authour, where hee tells, how the Britons, being innad by Charles the eighth, King of France, thought it good policie, to apparel a thousand and two hundred of their owne men in English Callocks; hoping that the very sight of the English red Crosse, would be enough to terrifie the French. But I will not stand to borrow of the French Historians (all which, excepting De Serres, and Paulus Æmilius; report wonders of our Nation) the proposition which first I undertooke to maintaine; That the militarie vertue of the English, preuailed against all manner of difficulties, ought to be preferred before that of Romans, which was assisted with all aduantages that could be desired. If it be demanded; why then did not our Kings finish the conquest, as Cæsar had done? my answer may bee (I hope without offence) that our Kings were like to the race of the Æacids, of whom the old Poet Æmilius gaue this note; Belli potentes sunt magis quam sapienti potentes; They were more warlike than politique. Who so notes their proceedings, may finde that none of them went to worke like a Conquerour: saue only King Henric the fifth, the course of whose victories, it pleased God to interrupt by his death. But this question is the more easily answered, if another be first made. Why did not the Romans attempt the conquest of Gaul, before the time of Cæsar? why not after the Macedonian warre? why not after the third Punicke, or after the Numantian? At all these times they had good leisure:

John de Serres,
IEAN auoit tout l'auantage par dessus EDWARD. Je n'ay pas de la multitude, la force, le pays, le prince (qui n'est pas communément une considération de peu d'importance aux affaires du monde), et auant l'élite de sa cavallerie, lors qu'il s'agit de tout son Royaume.

Xenoph. Grec.

whereby they themselves might have the better means to occupie all Sicill, whilst that Island should be destitute of Italian succours. Hereupon we finde good cause, of the joy that was in Carthage, and of the Crowne of gold, weighing twenty & five pound, sent from thence to Rome, when the Sannites were overthrowne. But the little state of Rome prevailed faller in Italie, than the great power of Carthage did in Sicill. For that mightie Armie, of three hundred thousand men, which Hannibal conducted out of Africk into Sicill, wanne only two Cities therein; many great fleets were devoured by tempests; and howsoever the Carthaginians prevailed at one time, the Sicilians, either by their owne valour, or by assistance of their good friends out of Greece, did at some other time repaire their owne losses, and take reuenge vpon these Innadaours. But neuer were the people of Carthage in better hope, of getting all Sicill, than when the death of Agathodes the Tyrant, had left the whole Island in combustion; the estate of Greece being such, at the same time, that it seemed impossible, for any succour to be sent from thence. But whilst the Carthaginians were busie, in making their advantage, of this good opportunity; Pyrhus, inuited by the Tarentines, and their fellows, came into Italie, where hee made sharpe warre vpon the Romans. These newes were vnpleasing to the Carthaginians, who, being a subtle Nation, easily foresaw, that the same busie disposition, which had brought this Prince, out of Greece into Italie, would as easily transport him ouer into Sicill, as soone as he could finish his Roman warre. To prevent this danger, they sent Mago Embassadour to Rome, who declared in their name, that they were sorry to heare, what misadventure had befallen the Romans, their good friends, in this warre with Pyrhus; and that the people of Carthage were very willing to assist the state of Rome, by sending an Armie into Italie; if their helpe were thought needfull, against the Epiriots.

It was, indeede, the maine desire of the Carthaginians, to hold Pyrhus so hardly to his worke in Italie, that they might, at good leisure, pursue their businesse in Sicill: which caused them to make such a goodly offer. But the Romans were too high-minded: and refused to accept any such aide of their friends, lest it should blemish their reputation, and make them seeme vnable to stand by their owne strength. Yet the message was taken louingly, as it ought; and the former league betweene Rome and Carthage renewed, with couenants added, concerning the present businesse; That if either of the two Cities made peace with Pyrhus, it should be, with reservation of libertie, to assist the other, in case that Pyrhus should inuade either of their Dominions. All this notwithstanding, and notwithstanding that the same Mago went and treated with Pyrhus, vying all means to sound his intentions (a matter very difficult, where one vpon euery new occasion changeth his owne purposes) yet Pyrhus found leisure to make a step into Sicill: where, though in fine he was neither getter norauer, yet hee cleane defeated the purposes of Carthage, leauing them at his departure thence, as farre from any end, as when they first beganne.

So many disasters, in an enterprize, that from the first vndertaking, had beene so strongly pursued, through the length of many generations, might well haue induced the Carthaginians to beleue, that an higher providence resisted their intentment. But their desire, of winning that fruitfull Land, was so inueterate; that with vnwearied patience, they still continued in hope, of so much the greater an harvest, by how much their cost and paynes therein buried had beene the more. Wherefore they re-continued their former courses; and by force or practice, recovered in few yeeres, all their old possessions: making peace with Syracuse, the chiefe Citie of the Land, that so they might the better enable themselves to deale with so

Somewhat before this time, a troupe of Campanian Souldiers, that had serued vnder Agathodes, being entertained within Messana as friends, and finding themselves too strong for the Citizens, tooke aduantage of the power that they had to doe doe wrong; and with perfidious crneltie, slew those that had trusted them; which done, they occupied the Citie, Lands, Goods, and Wines, of those, whom they had murdered. These Mercenaries called themselves Mamertines. Good Souldiers they were: and like enough it is, that meere desperation, of finding any that would approue their barbarous treachery, added rage vnto their stoutelic. Having therefore none other colour of their proceedings, than the law of the Stranger, they ouerranne the Countrie round about them.

In this course, at first, they sped so well, that they did not onely defend Messana against the Cities of Sicill Confederates; to wit, against the Syracians, and others, but they rather wan vpon them, yea, and vpon the Carthaginians, exacting tribute from many Neighbour places. But it was not long, ere fortune turning her back to these Mamertines, the Syracians wan salt vpon them, and finally, confining them within the walls of Messana, they also with a powerfull Armie besieged the Citie. It happened ill, that about the same time, a contention began, betwene the Syracian Souldiers, then lying at Megara, and the Citizens of Syracuse, and Gouernours of the Common-wealth; which proceeded so farre, that the Armie elected two Gouernours, among themselves; to wit, Artemidorus, and Hieron, that was afterward King. Hieron, being for his yeares excellently adorned with many vertues, although it was contrarie to the policy of that State, to approue any election made by the Souldiers, yet for the great clemencie hee vied at his first entrance, was by generall consent established and made Gouernour. This Office, hee rather vied as a Scale, thereby to clime to some higher degree, than rested content with his present preferment.

In brife, there was somewhat wanting, whereby to strengthen himselfe within the Citie; and somewhat without it, that gaue impediment, to his obtaining, and safe keeping, of the place he sought; to wit, a powerfull partie within the Towne, and certaine mutinous troups of Souldiers without, often and easily moued to sedition and tumult. For the first, whereby to strengthen himselfe, hee tooke to wife the daughter of Lepines, a man of the greatest estimation and authoritie among the Syracians. For the second, leading out the Armie to besiege Messana, he quartered all those Companies, which he held suspected, on the one side of the Citie, and leading the rest of his horse and foot vnto the other side, as if he would haue assaulted it in two seueral parts, he marched away vnder the couert of the Towne walls, and left the Mutiners to be cut in pieces by the assieged: So returning home, and leauing an Armie of his owne Citizens, well trayned and obedient, hee hastied againe towards Messana, and was by the Mamertines (growne proud by their former victorie ouer the Mutiners) incountried in the plaines of Mylaeum, where hee obtained a most signall victorie, and leading with him their Commander Captiue into Syracuse, himselfe by common consent was elected and saluted King. Hereupon the Mamertines, finding themselves vtterly infected, some of them resolved to giue themselves to the Carthaginians, others to craue assistance of the Romans: to each of whom, the seuerall factions dispatched Embassadours for the same purpose.

The Carthaginians were soone readie to lay hold vpon the good offer: so that a Captaine of theirs got into the Castle of Messana, wherof they that had sent for him gaue him possession. But within a little while, they that were more inclinable to the Romans, had brought their Companions to so good agreement, that this Captaine, either by force, or by cunning, was turned out of dores, and the Towne reserved for other Masters.

These newes did much offend the people of Carthage; who crucified their Captaine, as both a Traitor and Coward; and sent a Fleet and Armie to besiege Messana, as a Towne that rebelled, hauing once beene theirs. Hieron, the new made King of Syracuse (to gratifie his people, incensed with the smart of injuries lately received) added his forces to the Carthaginians, with whom hee entered into a league, for exterminating the Mamertines out of Sicill. So the Mamertines on all sides were closed vp within Messana: the Carthaginians lying with a Naue at Sea, and with an Armie on the one side of the Towne, whilest Hieron with his Syracusians, lay before it on the other side.

In this their great danger, came Appius Claudius the Roman Consull, with an Armie to the streights of Sicill: which passing by night with notable audacitie, hee put himselfe into the Towne, and sending Messengers to the Carthaginians, and to Hieron, required them to depart; signifying vnto them, that the Mamertines were now become confederate with the people of Rome, and that therefore hee was come to giue them protection, euen by force of warre, if reason would not preuaile.

This message was vtterly neglected; And so beganne the warre betwene Rome 10 and Cuthage; wherein, it will then be time to shew, on which part was the iustice of the quarrell, when some actions of the Romans lately foregoing this, haue bene first considered.

§. III.

The beginning of the first Punick warre. That it was vniustly undertaken by the Romans.

When Pyrhus beganne his warres in Italie, the Citie of Rhegium, being well affected to Rome, and not onely fearing to be taken by the Epirot, but much more distrusting the Carthaginians, as likely to seize vpon it in that bulie time, fought aide from the Romans, and obtained from them a Legion, consisting of foure thousand Souldiers, vnder the conduct of Decius Campanus, a Roman Prefect; by whom they were defended and assured for the present. But after a while, this Roman Garrison, considering at good leisure, the fact of the Mamertines, committed in Messana, (a Citie in Sicill, situate almost opposite to Rhegium, and no other wise diuided than by a narrow Sea, which seuereth it from Italie) and rather weighing the greatnesse of the bootie, than the odiousnesse of the villanie, by which it was gotten; resolved finally, to make the like purchase, by taking the like wicked course. Confederating therefore themselves with the Mamertines, they entertained their Hosts of Rhegium, after the same manner; diuiding the spoile, and all which that State had among themselves.

When complaint was made to the Senate & people of Rome, of this outrage; they finding their honour thereby greatly stained (for no Nation in the world made a more seuerer profession of iustice, than they did, during all the time of their growing greatnesse) resolved, after a while, to take reuenge vpon the offenders. And this they performed shortly after, when they had quenched the fires, kindled in Italie, by Pyrhus. For, notwithstanding that those Romans in Rhegium (as men for the foulencesse of their fact, hopelesse of pardon) defended themselves with an obstinate resolution: yet in the end, the assailants forced them; and those which escaped the present furie, were brought bound to Rome, where after the vsual torments by whipping inflicted, according to the custome of the Countrey, they had their heads stricken from their shoulders; and the people of Rhegium were againe restored to their former liberties and estates.

This execution of iustice being newly performed, and the same thereof founding honourably through all quarters of Italie: messengers came to Rome, from Messana, desiring help against the Carthaginians, and Syracusians, that were in a readinesse to inflict the like punishment vpon the Mamertines, for the like offence. An impudent request it was, which they made: who hauing both giuen example to that villanie to the Roman Souldiers, and holpen them with ioynt forces to make it good; intreate the Iudges to giue them that assistance, which they were wont to recieue from their fellow-theeues.

The

The Romans could not suddenly resolue, whether the way of honestie, or of profit, were to be followed; they euenmore pretended the one, but they many times walked in the other. They considered, how contrarie the course of licouring the Mamertines was, to their former counsells, and actions: seeing for the same offences they had lately put to torment, and to the sword, their owne Souldiers, and restored the oppressed to their libertie. Yet when they beheld the description of the Carthaginian Dominion, and that they were already Lords of the best parts of Africa, of the Mediterran Ilands, of a great part of Spain, and some part of Sicill it selfe; whilest also they feared, that Syracuse therein seated (a Citie in beautie and riches, 10 little, at that time, inferior to Carthage, and farre superiour to Rome it selfe) might become theirs, the safetie of their owne citie spake for these Mamertines: who, if they (driven to despair by the Romans) should deliuer vp Messana, with those other holds, that they had, into the hands of the Carthaginians, then would nothing stand betwene Carthage, and the Lordship of all Sicill: for Syracuse it selfe could not, for want of succour, any long time subsist, if once the Carthaginians, that were Masters of the Sea, did fasten vpon that passage from the maine Land. It was further considered; that the opportunitie of Messana was such, as would not only debarre, all succours out of the continent, from arrivall in Sicill; but would serue as a bridge, whereby the Carthaginians might haue entrance into Italie, at their owne pleasure.

These considerations, of profit at hand, and of preventing dangers, that threatened from a farre, did so preuaile, aboue all regard of honestie, that the Mamertines were admitted into Confederacie with the Romans, and Ap. Claudius the Consull, presently dispatcht away for Messana: into which he entred, and vnder-tooke the protection of it, as is shewed before. The besiegers were little troubled with his arrivall; and lesse moued, with his requiring them, to desist from their attempt. For they did farre exceede him in number of men; The whole Iland was ready to relieue them in their wants; and they were strong enough at Sea, to hinder any supply from getting into the Towne. All this Appius himselfe well vnderstood: and against all this, he thought the stiffe metall of his Roman Souldier, a sufficient remedy. Therefore, he resolved to issue out into the field, and to let the enemies know, that his coming was to send them away from the Towne; not to be besieged by them within it.

In executing this determination, it was very beneficiall to him, that the enemy lay encamped in such sort, as one quarter was not well able to relieue another in distresse. Hieron was now exposed to the same danger, wherinto hee had wilfully cast his owne mutinous followers, not long before: only he was strong enough (or thought so) to make good his owne quarter, without helpe of others. Against him Ap. Claudius issued forth, and (not attempting, by vnexpected sallie, to surprize his trenches) arranged his men in order of battaile, wherewith hee presented him. 40 The Syracusian wanted not courage to fight; but surely, hee wanted good aduice: else would he not haue hazarded all his power against an enemy, of whom he had made no triall; when it had bene easie, and as much as was requisite, to defend his owne Campe. It may be, that he thought to get honour, wherewith to adorne the beginning of his raigne. But he was well beaten; and driven to saue himselfe within his Trenches: by which losse, he learned a point of wisdom, that stood him and his Kingdome in good stead, all the daies of his life. It was a foolish desire of reuenge, that had made the Syracusians so bulie, in helping those of Carthage, against the Mamertines.

Had Messana bene taken by the Carthaginians, Syracuse it selfe must haue sought 50 helpe from Rome, against those friends which it now so diligently assisted. Hieron had (in respect of those two mightie Cities) but a small stock, which it behooued him to gouerne well: such another losse would haue made him almost bankrupt. Therefore hee quickly brake vp his Camp, and retired home: intending to let them stand to their aduentures, that had hope to bee gainers by the bargain. The next day, day, Claudius perceiving the Sicilian Armie gone, did with great courage, and with much alacritie of his souldiers, giue charge vpon the Carthaginians: wherein he sped so well, that the enimie forsooke both field and campe, leaving all the Countre open to the Romans; who hauing spoiled all round, without resistance, intended to lay siege vnto the great Citie of Syracuse.

These prosperous beginnings, howsoever they animated the Romans, and filled them with hopes, of attaining to greater matters, than at first they had expected: Yet did they not imprint any forme of terrour in the Citie of Carthage, that had wel enough repaired greater losses than this; in which no more was lost, than what had beene prepared against the Mamertines alone, without any suspicion of warre to from Rome.

Now in this place I hold it seasonable, to consider of those grounds, wherupon the Romans entred into this warre; not how profitable they were, nor how agreeable to rules of honestie (for questionlesse the enterprize was much to their benefit, though as much to their shame) but how allowable in strict termes of lawfulnessse; wherupon they built all their allegations in maintenance thereof. That the Mamertines did yeeld themselves, and all that they had, into the Romans hands (as the Campanes, distressed by the Samnites, had done) I cannot finde: neither can I finde, how the messengers of those folke, wherof one part had already admitted the Carthaginians, could be enabled to make any such surrendrie, in the publike name of all 20 their Companie.

If therefore the Mamertines, by no lawfull surrendrie of themselves and their possessions, were become subject vnto Rome, by what better title could the Romans assilt the Mamertines, against their most ancient friends the Carthaginians, than they might haue aided the Campanes, against the Samnites, without the same condition? which was (as they themselves confessed) by none at all. But let it be supposed, that some point serving to clear this doubt, is lost in all Histories. Doubtlesse it is, that no companie, of Pirates, Thieves, Outlawes, Murderers, or such other malefactours, can by any good successe of their villanie, obtaine the priuiledge of ciuill societies, to make league or truce, yea, or to require faire warre: but are by all meanes, 30 as most pernicious vermine, to be rooted out of the world. I will not take vpon me, to maintaine that opinion of some Cinilians, that a Prince is not bound to hold his faith, with one of these; it were a Position of ill consequence: This I hold; that no one Prince, or State, can giue protection to such as these, as long as any other is vying the sword of vengeance against them, without becoming accessarie to their crimes. Wherefore, we may esteeme this action of the Romans, so farre from being justifiable, by any pretence of Confederacie made with them; as that contrariwise, by admitting this nest of Murderers and Thieves, into their protection, they justly deserved to be warred vpon themselves, by the people of Sicily; yea, although Messana had beene taken, and the Mamertines all slaine, ere any newes of the Confede- 40 racie had beene brought vnto the besiegers. The great Alexander was so farre perswaded herein; that he did put to sword all the Branchiada (a people in Sogdiana) and razed their Citie, notwithstanding that they joyfully entertained him as their Lord and King; because they were descended from a Companie of Milesiens, who to gratifie King Xerxes, had robbed a Temple, and were by him rewarded with the Towne and Countre, which these of their posteritie enjoyed. Neuerthelessse, in course of humane iustice, long and peaceable possession giues ius acquisitum, a kinde of right by prescription, vnto that which was at first obtained by wicked means: and doth free the defendants, from the crime of their Ancestors, whose villanies they doe not exercise. But that the same generation of Thieves, which by a deto- 50 stable fact hath purchased a rich Towne, should be acknowledged a lawfull companie of Citizens, there is no shew of right. For euen the Conquerour, that by open warre obtaineth a Kingdome, doth not confirme his title, by those victories which gaue him first possession: but length of time is requisite, to establish him, vnlesse by some some alliance with the ancient inheritors, he can better the violence of his claime; as did our King Henrie the first, by his marriage with Maud, that was daughter of Malcolme, King of the Scots, by Margaret, the Niece of Edmund Ironside. Wherefore I conclude, that the Romans had no better ground (if they had so good) of justice, in this quarrell, than had the Goths, Hunnes, Vandals, and other Nations, of the warres that they made vpon the Roman Empire, wherein Rome her selfe, in the time of her visitation, was burnt to ground.

§. IIII.

Of the Iland of Sicil.

†. I.

The qualitie of the Iland: and the first Inhabitants thereof.

20 THe defence of the Mamertines, or the possession of Messana, being now no longer, since the first victories of Appius Claudius, the objects of the Roman hopes; but the Dominion of all Sicil being the prize, for which Rome and Carthage, are about to contend: it will bee agreeable vnto the order, which in the like cases we haue obserued, to make a briebe collection, of things, concerning that noble Iland, which hath bene the stage of many great acts, performed, as well before and after, as in this present Warre.

30 That Sicil was sometimes a Peninsula, or Demie-Iste, adjoynd to Italie, as a part of Brutium in Calabria, neare vnto Rhegium, and afterward by violence of tempest severed from the same: it is a generall opinion of all antiquitie. But at what certaine time this diuision happened, there is no memorial remaying, in any ancient writer. Strabo, Plinie, and Dionysius, affirme, that it was caused by an earthquake; Silius, and Castellus, doe thinke it to haue bene done by the rage and violence of the tide, and furies of the Sea. Either of these opinions may be true; for so was Euboea scuered from Baotia; Atalante and Maeria, from Euboea; Sillie here in England, from the Cape of Cornwall; and Britaine it selfe (as may seeme by Pershegans arguments) from the opposite continent of Gaule. But for Sicil, they which tend their cares to fables, do attribute the cause of it to Neptune (as Enstathius witnesseth) who with his three-forked Mace, in fauour of Iocastus, the sonne of Eolus, diuided it 40 from the maine land, and so made it an Iland, which before was but a Demie-Iste; that by that meanes, hee might the more safely inhabite, and possesse the same. Diodorus Siculus, moued by the authoritie of Hesiodus, ascribeth the labour of fundering it from Italie, to Orion: who, that he might be compared to Hercules (cutting through the rocks and mountaines) first opened the Sicilian streights, as Hercules did those of Gibraltar.

They which value the Ilands of the mid-land Sea, according to their quantitie and content, doe make this the greatest, as Enstathius and Strabo, who affirme this, not only to excell the rest for bignesse, but also for goodnesse of soile. As concerning the forme of this Iland, Pomponius Mela saith, it is like that Capitall letter of 50 the Greeks, which they call Delta, namely, that it hath the figure of a triangle, which is generally knowne to be true. That the whole Iland was consecrated to Ceres and Proserpina, all old writers with one consent affirme: To Ceres it was dedicated, because it first taught the rules of setting and sowing of Corne: to Proserpina, not so much, for that shee was from hence violently taken by Pluto, as because (which Plu- tarch and Diodorus doe report for truth) that Pluto, as soone as hee, vncouering her selfe, first shewed her selfe to be fene of him, gaue her the Dominion thereof.

Of the fertilitie and riches of this Countrey, there is a famous testimonie written by Cicero, in his second Oration against Verres, where he saith, that Marcus Cato did call it the Granarie, and Store-houfe of the Common-wealth, and the Nurse of the vulgar sort. The same Cicero doth adde in that place, that it was not only the store-houfe of the people of Rome; but also that it was accounted for a well furnished treasure. For without any cost or charge of ours (saith he) it hath visually clothed, maintained, and furnished our greatest Armies, with leather, apparell, and corne. Strabo reporteth almost the same thing of it. Whatsoever Sicilie doth yeeld (saith Solinus) whether by the Sunne, and temperature of the aire, or by the industrie and labour of man, it is accounted next vnto those things that are of best estimation: were it not, that such things, as the earth first putteth forth, are extremely ouer-grown with saffron. Diodorus Siculus saith, that in the fields, neere vnto Leontium, and in diuers other places of this land, wheat doth grow of it selfe, without any labour, or looking to, of the husbandman. Martianus sheweth, that there were in it fixe Colonies, and fixtie Cities: there are that reckon more, whereof the names are found scattering in many good Authours.

Now besides many famous acts, done by the people of this Land, as well in peace as warre, there be many other things, which haue made it very renowned, as the 20 birth of Ceres; the raising of Proserpina; the Giant Enceladus; the mount Atna, Seylla and Charibdis, with other antiquities, and rarities; besides those learned men, the noble Mathematician Archimedes, the famous Geometrician Euclides; the painfull Historian Diodorus; and Empedocles the deepe Philosopher.

That Sicil was at first possessed and inhabited by Giants Lastrigones, and Cyclopes, barbarous people, and vnciuill; all histories and fables doe joyntly with one consent auerre. Yet Thucydides saith, that these sauage people dwelt onely in one part of the Iland. Afterward the Sicani, a people of Spaine, possessed it. That these Sicani were not bred in the Ile (although some doe so thinke,) Thucydides and Diodorus doe constantly auousch.

Of these it was named Sicania. These Sicani were invaded by the Siculi; who, inhabiting that part of Latium, whereon Rome was afterward built, were driven by the Pelasgi from their owne seates, and finding no place vpon the continent, which they were able to master and inhabit, passed ouer into this Iland, three hundred years before the Greekes sent any Colonies thither: and (saith Philistus) eightie years before the fall of Troy. These Siculi gaue the name of Sicilia, to the Iland; and making warre vpon the Sicani, draue them from the East and Northerne part thereof, into the West and South. At their landing, they first built the Citie Zancle, afterward called Messena; and after that, Catana, Leontium, and Syracuse; the selfe, bearing from thence the Etolians, who long before had set vp a Towne in that place. 40 As for the name of Syracuse, it was not knowne, till such time as Archias of Corinth (long after) wonne that part of the Iland from the Siculi; Neither did the Siculi at their first arrival dispossesse the Etolians thereof, but some hundred years after their descent, and after such time as they had founded the Cities before named, with Nea, Hybla, Trinacria, and diuers others.

After these Siculi came another Nation out of Italy, called Morgetes; who were thence driven by the Oenotrians. These sate downe in that part of Sicil, where they afterward raised the Cities of Morgentum, and Leontium. For at this time the Siculi were diuided, and by a ciuill warre greatly feeble. Among these ancient 50 stories, we finde the last voiage, and the death of Minos, King of Creet. Thucydides, an Historian of vnquestionable sinceritie, reports of Minos, that he made conquest of many Ilands: and some such businesse, perhaps, drew him into Sicil. But the common report is, that he came thither in pursuit of Dadalus. The tale goes thus: Dadalus fleeing the reuenge of Minos, came into Sicil to Cocalus, King of the Sicani, and and during his abode there, he built a place of great strength, neere vnto Megara, for Cocalus, to lay vp his treasure in; together with many notable works, for which he was greatly admired and honoured.

Among the rest, he cast a Ramme in gold, that was set vp in the Temple of Fe-nus Erycinus; which he did with so great arte, as those that beheld it, thought it rather to be liuing, than counterfait.

Now Minos, hearing that Cocalus had entertained Dadalus, prepares to invade the Territorie of Cocalus; but when he was arrived, Cocalus doubting his own strength, promisseth to deliuer Dadalus. This he performs not, but in the meane while, kills 10 Minos by treason, and perswadeth the Cretans, Minos his followers, to inhabite a part of Sicil; the better (as it seemes) to strengthen himselfe against the Siculi. Hercunto the Cretans (their King being dead) gaue their consent, and builded for themselves the Citie of Minos, after the name of their King Minos. After, they likewise built the Towne of Engyum, now called Gange; and these were the first Cities, built by the Greekes in Sicil, about two ages before the warre of Troy; for the grand children of Minos serued with the Greekes at the siege thereof.

But after such time as the Cretans vnderstood, that their King had by treason bene made away; they gathered together a great Armie, to invade Cocalus: and landing neere vnto Camicus, they besieged the same five yeares, but in vaine. In the 20 end (being forced to returne, without any reuenge taken) they were wrackt on the coast of Italie; and hauing no meanes to repaire their ships, nor the honor they had lost, they made good the place whereon they fell, and built Hyria, or Hyrium, betwene the two famous Ports of Brundisium, and Tarentum. Of these Cretans came those Nations, afterward called Iapyges, and Messapij.

After the taking of Troy, Aegestus and Elymus, brought with them certaine troups into Sicil, and seated themselves among the Sicani; where they built the Cities of Aegesta and Elyma.

It is said, that Aeneas visited these places in his passage into Italie: and that some of the Troians, his followers, were left behinde him, in these Townes of Sicil: 30 whereof there want no good Authours, that make Aeneas himselfe the founder.

About the same time, the Phenicians seised vpon the Promontories of Pactinus, and Lilybaeum, and vpon certaine small Isles adjoining to the maine Iland: which they fortified, to secure the trades that they had with the Sicilians; like as the Portugals haue done in the East Indies, at Goa, Ormuz, Mosambiq, and other places. But the Phenicians staid not there; for after they had once assured their descents, they built the goodly Citie of Panormus, now called Palerma.

These we finde, were the Nations, that inhabited the Ile of Sicil, before the warre of Troy, and ere the Greekes in any numbers began to straggle in those parts.

It may perchance seeme strange to the Reader, that in all ancient storie, he findes 40 one and the same beginning of Nations, after the flood; and that the first planters of all parts of the World, were said to bee mightie and Giantlike men; and that, as Phenicia, Aegypt, Lybia, and Greece, had Hercules, Orestes, Anteus, Typhon, and the like; as Denmarke had Starbaterus, remembered by Saxo Grammaticus; as Scythia, Britanie, and other Regions, had Giants for their first Inhabitants; so this Ile of Sicil had her Lastrigones and Cyclopes. This discourse I could also reject for fained and fabulous; did not Moses make vs know, that the Zamzammims, Emims, Anakims, and Og of Babylon, with others, which sometime inhabited the Mountaines and Delarts of Moab; Ammon, and Mount Seir, were men of exceeding strength and stature, and of the races of Giants: and were it not, that Tertullian, St. Augustine, 23 Josephus, Procopius, Isidore, Plinie, Diodore, Herodotus, Solinus, Plutarch, and many other Authours, haue confirmed the opinion. Yea, Pythagoras, in his second Navigation into America, hath reported, that himselfe hath sene the like men in those parts. Again, whereas the selfe-same is written of all Nations, that is written of any one; as touching their simplicitie of life, their meane fare, their feeding on a cornes cornes and roots, their poore cottages, the couering of their bodies, with the skins of beasts, their hunting, their armes, and weapons, and their warfare, their first passages ouer great Riuer, and armes of the Sea, vpon rafts of trees tied together; and afterward, their making boats, first, of twigs and leather, then of wood; first, with Oares, and then with saile, that they esteemed as Gods, the first finders out of Arts; as of Husbandrie, of Lawes, and of Politie: it is a matter, that makes me neither to wonder at, nor to doubt of it. For they all liued in the same newnesse of time, which we call Old time, and had all the same want of his instruction, which (after the Creator of all things) hath by degrees taught all Mankind. For other teaching had they none, that were removed far off from the Hebrewes, who inherited the knowledge 10 of the first Patriarchs, than that from variable effects they beganne, by time and degrees to finde out the causes: from whence came Philosophie Naturall; as the Morall did from disorder and confusion; and the Law from crueltie and oppression.

But it is certaine, that the Age of Time hath brought forth stranger and more incredible things, than the Infancie. For we haue now greater Giants, for vice and iniustice, than the World had in those daies, for bodily strength; for cottages and houses of clay and timber, we haue raised Palaces of stone; we carue them, we paint them, and adorne them with gold; inasmuch as men are rather knowne by their houses, than their houses by them; we are fallen from two dishes, to two hundred; from water, to wine and drunkennesse; from the couering of our bodies with the 20 skinnies of beasts, not only to silke and gold, but to the very skinnies of men. But to conclude this digression, Time will also take reuenge of the excesse, which it hath brought forth; Quam longa dies peperit, longior, auxit, longissima subruit; Long time brought forth, longer time increas'd it, and a time, longer than the rest, shall ouerthrow it.

†. II.

When the first inhabitants had contended long enough about the Dominion of all Sicil: it happened, that one Theodes, a Greeke, being druen vpon that coast by an Easterly winde; and finding true the commendations thereof, which had bene thought fabulous, being deliuered onely by Poets; gaue information to the Athenians of this his discouerie, and proposed vnto them the benefit of this easie conquest, offering to become their guide. But Theodes was as little regarded by the Athenians, as Columbus, in our Grand-fathers times, was by the Englishe. Wherefore hee tooke the same course, that Columbus afterwards did. 40 Hee ouer-laboured not himselfe in perfwading the Noble Athenians (who thought themselves to bee well enough alreadie) to their owne profit; but went to the Chalcidians, that were needie and industrious, by whom his project was gladly entertained. By these was built the Citie of Naxos, and a Colony planted of Euboeans.

But the rest of the Greeks were wiser than our western Princes of Europe: for they had no Pope, that should forbid them, to occupie the void places of the World. Archias of Corinth followed the Euboeans, and landed in Sicil, neare vnto that Citie, called afterward * Syracuse: of which, that part onely was then compassed with a

* Syracuse, as Cicero relates, was the greatest, and most goodly Citie of all that the Greekes possist. For the situation is both strong, and of an excellent prospect, from euery entrance, by Land, or Sea. The Port was (for the most part) enuironed with beautifull building; and that part which was without the Citie, was on both sides bankt vp, and sustained with beautifull walls of Marble. The Citie it selfe was one of the greatest of the World: for it had in compasse (as Strabo reporteth) without the treble wall thereof, 180. furlongs; which made of our miles about 18. It was compounded of foure Cities (Strabo saith, of five) to wit, Insula, Acadina, Tycha, and Neapolis: of which greaunelle, the ruines and foundations of the walls doe yet witness.

wall, which the Ætolians called Homothermon; the Greeks, Nafos; the Latines, Insula. He with his Corinthians hauing ouer-come the Siculi, drave them vp into the Countrey; and after a few yeares, their multitudes increaseth, they added vnto the Citie of the Iland, that of Acadina, Tycha, and Neapolis. So as well by the commodity of the double Port, capable of as many ships, as any Haven of that part of 10 Europe, as by the fertilitie of the soyle; Syracuse grew vp in great haile, to be one of the goodliest Townes of the World. In short time the Greekes did possess the better part of all the Sea-coast; forcing the Sicilians to withdraw themselves into the fast and mountainous parts of the Iland, making their Royall residence in 10 Trinacia.

Some seuen yeares after the arrivall of Archias; the Chalcidians, encouraged by the successe of the Corinthians, did assaile, and obtaine the Citie of Leontium, built and possist by the Siculi. In briefe, the Greekes winne from the Siculi, and their Associates, the Cities of Catana, and Egbla, which, in honour of the Megarians that for'cit, they called Megara.

About five and fortie yeares after Archias had taken Syracuse; Antiphenus and Entimus, the one from Rhodes, the other from Crete, brought an Armie into Sicil, and built Gela; whose Citizens, one hundred and eight yeares after, did erect that magnificent and renowned Citie of Agrirentum, governed according to the Lawes 20 of the Dorians.

The Syracusians also, in the seuentieth yeare after their plantation, did fer vp the Citie of Akra, in the Mountaines; and in the ninetieth yeare Casmena, in the Playnes adjoining; and againe, in the hundred and thirtieth yeare of their dwelling in Syracuse, they built Camerina; and soone after that, Enna, in the very Center of the Iland. So did the Cumani, about the same time, recover from the Siculi the Citie of Zanle, which they had founded in the streight betwene Sicil and Italie. They of Zanle had bene founders of Himera.

Not long after this Dorians the Lacedemonian built Heraclia; which the Phenicians, and Carthaginians, fearing the Neighbourhood of the Spartans, soone after invaded and ruined, though the same were againe ere long re-edified.

Selinus also was built by a Colonie of Megara: and Zanle was taken by the Messinians; who hauing lost their owne Countrey, gaue the name thereof vnto this their new purchase. Such were the beginnings of the greatest Cities in this Iland.

The most part of the Cities in Sicil, were governed by the rule of the people, till such time as Phalaris began to vsurpe the state of Agrirentum, and to exercise all manner of tyrannie therein.

This was that Phalaris, to whom Perillus, the cunning Artificer of a detestable Engine, gaue an hollow Bull of brass, wherein to enclose men, and scorch them to death: praying the deuice with this commendation; That the noise of one tormented therein, should bee like vnto the bellowing of a Bull. The Tyrant gaue a due reward to the Inuentour; by causing the first trial to be made vpon himselfe. Hee reigned one and thirtie yeares, saith Engelbins; others giue him but sixteene: Howloeuier it were, one Telemachus, in the end, fell vpon him with the whole multitude of Agrirentum, and stoned him to death; being thereto animated by Zeno, even whilest the Tyrant was tormenting the same Zeno, to make him confesse some matter of conspiracie.

After the death of Phalaris, the Citizens recovered their libertie, and enjoyed it long, till Thero usurped the government of the Common-weale: at which time also Panatus made himselfe Lord of Leontium; and Cleander, of Gela: but Cleander, hauing ruled seuen yeares, was slaine by one of the Citizens. Cleander being dead, his brother Hippocrates succeeded in his roome, and greatly afflicted the people of Naxos, of Zancle or Messena, and of Leontium; whom with diuers other of the ancient inhabitants, he forced to acknowledge him their Lord. Hee also made warre with the Syracusians, and, in the end, got from them, by composition, the Citie of 10 Camerina. But when he had reigned seuen yeares, he was slaine in a battell against the Siculi, before Hybla.

At this time did the Syracusians change their forme of Gouvernement, from Popular to Aristocratically; a preparation towards a Principalltie, whereinto it was soone after changed. After the death of Hippocrates, Gelon descended from the Rhodiens, which together with the Cretans had long before, among other of the Greeks, feared themelues in Sicily that had commanded the forces of Hippocrates, in the former warre, with notable successe, became Lord of Gela. Hee, after his Masters death, breaking the trust committed vnto him by Hippocrates ouer his children, and being in possession of Gela, took the occasion and aduantage of a contention in Syracuse, 20 betweene the Magistrates and the People. For comming with a strong Armie to the succour of the Governours, driuen out by the multitude, they elected him their Prince, being the first, and (indeede) the most famous, that euer gouerned the Syracusians. This change hapned in the second yeare of the threescore and twelfth Olympiads; wherein the better to establish himselfe, he tooke to wife the Daughter of Thero, who had also usurped the state of Agigentum.

Now this Gelon, the sonne of Dinomenes, had three brethren; Hiero, Polyzelus, and Thrasibulus: to the first of which hee gaue vp the Citie of Gela, when hee had obtained the Principalltie of Syracuse. For, after that time, all his thoughts travelled in the strengthening, beautifying, and amplifying of Syracuse. He defaced 30 Camerina, that a little before was fallen from the obedience of the Syracusians who built it, and brought the Citizens to Syracuse. The Megarians that had moued a warre against him, he ouer-came; the richer fort he brought to Syracuse, and the people he sold for slaves. In like manner dealt he with other places vpon like occasion. Not long after this, Thero, a Prince of the Agigentines, hauing dispossessed Terillus, of his Citie Himera; the Carthaginians were drawne into the quarrell by Amxilus, Lord of Messena, Father-in-law to Terillus: and Gelon was also solicited by his Father-in-law, Thero. Gelon was content, and in fine, after diuers conflicts, the Carthaginians, and other Africans, led by Amilcar, were ouerthrowne by Gelon: and an hundred and fiftie thousand of them left their bodies in Sicily. 40

This Gelon it was, to whom the Athenians and Lacedemonians sent for succour, when Xerxes with his huge Armie past the Hellefont. Hee, for their reliefe hauing armed thirtie thousand Souldiers, and two hundred ships, refused neuertheless to send them into Greece, because they refused him the commandement of one of their Armies, either by Sea, or by Land. So he vied to their Embassadors onely this saying, That their Spring was withered; accomplishing the Armie, by him prepared, to be the flower of the Greeke Nations.

The Carthaginians, after this great losse received, fearing the inuasion of their owne Countrey, sent to Gelon by their Embassadors, to desire peace; who grants it them on these conditions; That from thenceforth they should not sacrifice their children to Saturne; That they should pay him two thousand talents of silver; and present him with two armed ships, in signe of amitie. These conditions the Carthaginians, not onely willingly accepted, but with the two thousands talents, and the ships for warre, they sent vnto Demarata; Gelon's wife, a crowne, valued at an hundred hundred talents of gold, with other presents. Whereby we see, that some Nations, and some Natures, are much the better for being well beaten. The warres ended; and Sicily in peace; Gelon beautified the Temples of the gods; and erected others in honour of them. So being exceedingly beloued and honoured of his Subjects, he left the World, and left for his Successour his brother Hiero. Philistus and Plinie report, That, when his body was burnt, according to the custome of that Age, a Dogge of his, which alwaies waited on him, ranne into the fire, and suffered himselfe to be burnt with him.

To Gelon, Hiero his brother succeeded, a man rude, cruell, couetous, and so suspicious of his brethren Polyzelus, and Thrasibulus, as hee fought by all means to destroy them. Notwithstanding all this; by the conuersation which hee had with Simonides, he became of better condition, and greatly delighted with the studie of good Arts. Diuers quarrells he had, as well with Theron of Agigentum, as with other Cities: all which he shortly after compounded, and gaue a notable ouerthrow to the Carthaginians, whom Xerxes had incited to invade Sicily, fearing the succours which Gelon had prepared, to aide the Grecians, against him. Hee also ouerthrew in battaile Thrasylus, the sonne of Theron, and thereby restored the Agigentines, to their former libertie. But in the end, hee lost the loue of the Syracusians; and after he had reigned eleuen yeares, he left the Kingdome to his brother Thrasibulus, who 20 became a most vnjust and bloudie Tyrant. Thrasibulus enioyed his Principalltie no longer then ten moneths. For, notwithstanding the force of mercinarie Souldiers, which he entertained for his guards, he was beaten out of Syracuse by the Citizens; to whom, being besieged in Acadina, hee restored the government, and was banished the Island. From whence he sailed into Greece, where he died a priuate man, among the Locrians.

And now had the Syracusians recovered againe their former libertie, as all the rest of the Cities did, after which they had neuer sought; had the Successours of Gelon inherited his vertue, as they did the Principalltie of Syracuse. For in all changes of Estates, the preferuation ought to answere the acquisition. Where a 30 liberrall, valiant, and aduised Prince, hath obtained any new Signiorie, and added it to that of his owne, or exalted himselfe from being a priuate man, to the dignitie of a Prince; it behoueth the Successour to maintaine it by the same way and arte, by which it was gotten.

To conclude, Syracuse (though not without blowes, ere shee could cleanse her selfe of the creatures and louers of Gelon) was now againe become Mistresse of her selfe, and held her selfe free, well-neare threescore yeares, to the time of Dionysius; though she were in the meane while greatly endangered by a Citizen of her owne, called Tindario.

Now, to prevent the greatnesse of any one among them, for the future, they 40 deuised a kind of banishment of such among them, as were suspected; taking patterne from the Athenian Ostracisme. They called this their new deuised judgement of exile, Petalismus, wherein euery one wrote vpon an Olive leafe (as at Athen they wrote vpon shells) the name of him, whom hee would haue expelled the Citie. Hee that had most suffrages against him, was banished for five yeares. Hereby, in a short time, it came to passe, that those of judgement, and best able to gouerne the Common-weale, were by the worst able, either suppressed, or thrust out of the Citie. Yea, such as feared this Law, though they had not yet felt it, withdrew themselves as secretly as they could; seeking some place of more securitie, wherein to maintaine themselves. And good reason they had fo to doe; 50 seeing there is nothing so terrible in any State, as a powerfull and authorized ignorance. But this Law lasted not long. For their necessitie taught them to abolish it, and restore againe the wiser sort to the Government; from which, the Nobilitie hauing practised to banish one another, the State became altogether Popular. But after a while, being invaded by Duceius, King of the Sicilians, that inhabited the inner part of the Iland (who had already taken Enna, and some other of the Græcian Cities, and overthrowne the Armie of the Agrigentines) the Syracusians sent forces against him, commanded by an unworthy Citizen of theirs called Nolcon. This their Captaine made nothing so much haste to finde Ducetius, against whom he was employed, as he did to flee from the Armie he led, as soone as Ducetius presented him battaile. So for want of conduct, the greatest number of the Syracusians perished.

But making better choice among those, whom they had banished, they leue other troupes; by whom, in conclusion, Ducetius being beaten, submitteth himselfe, and is constrained to leaue the Iland for a time. Yet it was not long, ere hee 10 returned againe, and built the Citie Collatina on the Sea-side.

Ducetius being dead; all the Greeke Cities did in a fort acknowledge Syracuse: Trinacia excepted; which also by force of armes, in the foure score and fift Olympiads, they brought to reason.

But they doe not long enjoy this their Superintendence. For the Citizens of Leontium, being oppressed by them, secke aide from the Athenians, about the sixth year of the Peloponnesian Warre. In this suite they prevailed by the eloquence of Gorgias their Orator; and got an hundred Athenian Gallies to succour them, vnder the leading of Laches, and Charades. To this fleet, the Leontines, and their Partners, added one hundred more; with which forces, and with some supplies brought 20 by Sophocles, Pythodorus, Eurymedon, and other Athenian Captaines, they invaded the Territories of the Syracusians, and their Partisans; wanne and lost diuers places; rooke Messana; and, in the seventh year of the Peloponnesian Warre, lost it againe. They also at the same time, attempted Himera, but in vaine. The siege of this quarrell tooke hold vpon many Cities, which invaded each others Territories with great violence. But when they had wearied themselves on all hands, and yet could see none issue of the warre; the Leontines, without the aduice of the Athenians, came to an accord with the Syracusians, and were admitted into their societie, with equall freedom. So the Athenians, who hoped to haue greatened themselves in Sicily, by the diuision and ciuill warre, were disappointed of their expectation, by 30 the good agreement of the Sicilians, and faine to bee gone with the broken remainder of their fleet. This they knew not how to amend; but (according to the custome of popular Estates) by taking reuenge vpon their owne Commanders. So they banished Pythodorus, and Sophocles, and layd an heauy fine vpon Eurymedon. Shortly after this, followed the most memorable Warre, that euer was made by the Greekes in Sicily: which was that of the Athenians, against the Selinuntines, and Syracusians, in fauour of the Cities of Egesta, Leontium, and Catana. They of Selinus had oppressed the Egestians; and they of Syracuse, the Leontines, and the Catanians: which was the ground of the warre. For, the Athenians undertooke the protection of their old friends: And, in barred of the Athenians, aide from Lacedæmon was sent 40 to the Syracusians. The Lacedæmonians dealt plainly, hauing none other end, than that which they pretended, namely, to helpe a people of their owne Tribe, that craued their succour, being in distresse. The Athenians scarce knew what to pretend: for their preparations were so great, as discovered their intent to be none other, then the conquest of the whole Iland. Yet they which had called them in, were so blinded with their owne passions, that they would not beleue their own eyes; which presented vnto them a Fleet, and Armie, farre greater, than the terrible report of fame had made it.

In this expedition, the Citie of Athens had engaged all her power; as regarding, not only the greatnesse of the enterprize, but the necessitie of finishing it in a short 50 space of time. For the Lacedæmonians (as hath already beene shewed in due place) stood at that time in such broken termes of peace with Athens, as differed not much from open warre. Wherefore it was thought necessary, either to spare cost in this great expeditio, or altogether to forbear it: which was likely to be hindred by wars

at home, if their proceedings were slacke abroad. And surely, had not the desire of the Athenians beene over-passionate, the arguments of Nicias had caused them to abstaine from so chargeable a businesse, and to reserue their forces for a more needfull use. But yong counsailes prevailed against the authoritie of ancient men, that were more regardfull of safetie than of honour.

Of this businesse, mention hath beene already made, in that which wee haue written of the Peloponnesian warre. But what was there deliuered in general termes, as not concerning the affaires of Greece, otherwise than by consequence; doth in this place require a more perfect relation, as a matter, wherein the whole State of Sicily 10 was like to haue felt a great conuersion.

Though Alcibiades had preuailed against Nicias, in exhorting the people to this great voiage; yet Nicias, together with Alcibiades, and Lamachus, was appointed to be one of the chiefe Commanders therein.

These had commision and direction, as well to succour the Segestians, and to re-establish the Leontines, cast out of their places by the Syracusians, as also, by force of armes, to subiect the Syracusians, and all their adherents, in Sicily, and compell them by tribute, to acknowledge the Athenians for their supreme Lords. To effect which, the fore-named Captaines were sent off, with an hundred and thirtie Gallies, and six thousand one hundred Souldiers, besides the thirtie ships of burden, which 20 transported their victualls, engines, and other munitions for the warre: and these were Athenians, Mantineans, Rhodians, and Candians: there were, besides these, sixe thousand Megarians light armed, with thirtie horse-men.

Thucid. l. 6. c. 9.

With these troupes and fleets they arrive at Rhegium, where the Rhegiens refuse to giue them entrie; but sell them victualls for their monie. From thence they sent to the Egestians, to know what treasure they would contribute towards the warre, seeing for their sakes, they had entred thereinto. But they found by their answers, that these Egestians were poore, and that they had abused the Athenian Embassadors with false shewes of gold, hauing in all but thirtie talents. The Athenians further were discouraged, when they found that the Rhegiens, their ancient friends, and 30 allied vnto the Leontines, refused to trust them within their walls. Hereupon Nicias aduiseeth to depart towards the Selinuntines, and to force them, or perswade them, to an agreement with the Egestians; as likewise to see what disburlements the Egestians could make; and so to returne againe into Greece, and not to waite Athens in a needlesse warre. Alcibiades, on the other side, would sollicite the Cities of Sicily to confederacie against the Syracusians and Selinuntines, whereby to force them vnto restitution of all that they had taken from the Leontines. Lamachus, bee perswaded them to assaile Syracuse it selfe, before it were prepared against them. But in the end (being excluded out of diuers Cities) they surprize Catana: & there they take new counsaile, how to proceede. Thence they imploied Nicias to those of Egesta, who 40 receiued from them thirtie talents towards his charges; and one hundred & twentie talents more there were of the spoiles they had gotten in the Iland. Thus, the Summer being spent in idle consultations, & vaine attempts, the Athenians prepare to assaile Syracuse. But Alcibiades hauing beene accused at home, in his absence, was sent for backe by the Athenians, to make his answer: and the Armie was left to the conduct of Nicias and Lamachus. These Commanders obtaine a landing place very neare vnto Syracuse, by this deuice.

They imploie to Syracuse an inhabitant of Catana, whom they trust; and instruct him, to promise vnto the Syracusians, that he would deliuer into their hands all the 50 Athenians, within Catana. Hereupon the Syracusians draw thitherward with their best forces. But in the meane while, the Athenians, setting saile from Catana, arrive at Syracuse, where they land at faire ease, and fortifie themselves against the Town. Shortly after this, they fight, and the Syracusians had the losse: but the Athenians, wanting horse, could not pursue their victorie to any great effect. They then retire themselves, with a resolutio to refresh their Armie at Catana, for the winter-season.

From

From thence they made an attempt vpon Messana, hoping to haue taken it by an intelligence, but in vaine. For Alcibiades had discovered such as were Traitors within the Citie to the Messanians. This he now did, in despite of his owne Citizens, the Athenians; because they had recalled him from his command, with a purpose either to haue put him to death, or to haue banished him: whereof being assured by his friends, he tooke his way towards the Lacedaemonians, and to them he gave mischievous counsaile against his country. While this winter yet lasted, the Syracusians send Embassadors to Lacedaemon, and Corinth, for aide: as likewise the Athenian Captaines in Sicily, send to Athens, for supplies. Which both the one and the other obtained.

In the Spring following (which was the beginning of the eighteenth yeare of the Peloponnesian warre) the Athenians in Sicily, saile from the Port of Catana, to Megara, forsaken of the Inhabitants; from whence foraging the Countrey, they obtaine some small victories ouer the straggling Syracusians: and at their returne to Catana, they receiue a supply of two hundred men at armes, but without horse, which they hoped to furnish in the Island, from the Segeffians, and other their adherents: they were also strengthened with a companie of Archers and with three hundred talents in monie.

Hereupon they take courage, and incampe neere Syracuse, vpon the banks of the great Port, repelling the Syracusians, that sallied to impeach their intrenchments. They also receiued from their Confederates foure hundred horse-men, with two hundred other horse to mount their men at armes. Syracuse was now in effect blockt vp, so as hardly any succours could enter, but such as were able to force their passage: yet the Athenians receiue diuers losse; among which it was not the least, that Lamachus, one of their best Commanders, was slaine.

In the meane while, Gylippus, and Python, with the Lacedaemonian, and Corinthian forces arrive, and take land at Hymera. The Citizens of Hymera, and of Gela, together with the Selinuntines, joyne with them; so that with these and his own troupes, Gylippus aduentured to march ouer-land towards Syracuse. The Syracusians send a part of their forces to meet him, and conduct him. The Athenians prepare to counter them, expecting his arrival neere vnto the Citie, vpon a place of aduantage. At the first encounter, they had the better of their enemies, by reason that the Syracusan horse-men could not come to fight in those fireights: but soone after, Gylippus charging them againe, brake them, and constrained Nicias to fortifie himselfe within his Campe. Whereupon Nicias made the state of his affaires knowne, by his letters, to the Athenians; shewing, that, without great supplies by Sea and Land, the enterprise would be lost, together with the small Armie remaining. These letters receiued, the Athenians appoint two other Generalls, Eurymedon, and Demofthenes, to joyne with Nicias: the one they dispatch presently with some supply; the other they send after him in the Spring following.

In the meane while, Gylippus at Syracuse, fights with the Athenians, both by Sea and Land, sometimes with ill, and at other times with good successe: but in conclusion, he tooke from them their Fort, neere vnto Syracuse, at the Promontorie, called Phormyrum; wherein the Athenians lost their treasure, and a great part of all their provisions. Notwithstanding which losse, and that the Athenians themselves, in Greece, were (in effect) besieged within Athens, by the Lacedaemonians; yet were they most obstinate in prosecuting the Warre in Sicily, and dispatched away Demofthenes with new succours. Demofthenes, in his way towards Sicily, encountered with Polyarchus, the Corinthian, with his fleet: both the Captaines being bound for Sicily, the one to succour Nicias; the other, Gylippus. The losse betwene them was in effect equal; and neither so broken, but that each of them prosecuted the enterprise they had in hand. But before the succours arrived to either, Gylippus and Ariflon had assailed the Athenians in the great Port of Syracuse, and in a Sea-fight put them to the worst, to the great discouragement of the Athenians. On the neck of this, Demofthe- nes arrived with three-score and thirteene Gallies, charged with foot-men; and (blaming the slouth of Nicias) he invaded the Syracusians, the same day that he arrived. But he made more haste, than he had good speede; being shamefully beaten, and repulst with great losse. Hereupon Demofthenes and Eurymedon, determine to rife vp from before Syracuse, and returne to the succour of Athens: but Nicias disputed to the contrarie, pretending that hee had good intelligence within Syracuse, whereby he learned, that the Towne could not long hold out.

Whatsoeuer Nicias his intelligence was; vpon the arrivall of a new supply into the Towne, the Athenians had all consented to depart, and to lodge at Catana: had not an Eclipse of the Moone, boding (as was thought) ill successe, caused them to deferre their departure. But this superstition cost them deare. For the Syracusians, Lacedaemonians, and Corinthians, with three-score and seuentene saile of Gallies, entered the great Port of Syracuse, wherein the Athenians kept their fleet, and whereon they had fortified themselves. The Athenians, in the same Port encountered them with foure-score and fixe Gallies, commanded by Eurymedon, in which the Athenian fleet was beaten, by the lesser number, and Eurymedon slaine. Now, though it were so, that the Syracusians receiued the more losse by Land (for the fight was generall) yet when the Athenians were beaten by Sea, in which kinde they thought themselves invincible, they were wonderfully cast downe. For it was well said of Gylippus, to the Syracusians; When any people doe finde themselves vanquished in that manner of fight, as I with those weapons, in which they persuade themselves that they exceede all others, they not only loose their reputation, but their courage. The Athenians, besides the Gallies sunck and wrackt, had seuentene taken, and posselt by the enemy: and with great labour and losse they defended the rest from being fired, hauing drawne them within a Palisado, in one corner of the Port, vnadvisedly: for it is as contrarie to a Sea-warre, to thrust ships into a straight roome and corner, as it is to scatter foot in a plaine field against horse; the one subsisting, by being at large; the other, by close imbatailing.

The Syracusians, hauing now weakened the Athenian fleet, resolute to imprison them within the Port. And to that purpose they range all their Gallies in the mouth of the Hauens, being about a mile ouer, and there they came to Anchor; filling the Out-let with all manner of Vessels, which they man most strongly, because the Athenians, being now made desperate, should not with double ranks of Gallies breake through the Syracusan fleet; which lay but single, because they were forst to range themselves ouer all the Out-let of the Port. They therefore, not onely mored themselves strongly by their Anchors, but chained the sides of their Gallies together, and layd behinde them againe certain ships, which serued in the former warre for victuallers: to the end, that if any of their Gallies were sunke; or the chaines, which joined them to their fellows, broken; the Athenians might yet finde themselves, a second time, intangled and arrefted. To disorder also those Athenian Gallies, which came on in forme of a wedge, to breake through, and force a passage, the Syracusians had left within these Gallies and Ships, incained together, a certaine number of loose ones, to stop their course and furie. For where the way of any vessel, vnder oare or sailes, is broken, and their speede fore-slowed, they cannot force with any weight and violence, the resistance opposing.

On the other side, the Athenians knew that they were vtterly lost, except with an invincible resolution, they could make their way, and breake downe this great bridge of boats; or (at least) force a passage through them in some part or other: which they resolute to hazard, with all their shipping (to the number of one hundred and ten, of all sorts) and with all the strength of their Land-armie; in them imbarqued. But the Gallies, which were within the bridge of boats, did so disorder the Athenian fleet, ere they came to force the bridge, as, albeit some few of them had broken through the chaines, yet being stopt by the ships without, and assailed by other loose Gallies of the Syracusians, which were purposely left at large in the Sea, they

they were either taken or sunke. Three great disadvantages the Athenians had: the first, that fighting within a Haven, and (as it were) in a streight, they had no room to turne themselves, nor to free themselves one from another, being intangled; the second, that hauing ouer-pestered their Gallies with Souldiers, who vsed offensive armes of darts and slings, they had not place vpon the decks to stretch their armes: the third was, the discomfortable end for which they fought, namely, to force a passage, by which they might saue themselves by running away. To be short, the fight was no lesse terrible than the confusion; the slaughter great on all sides; and the noise, and the cries, so lowd and lamentable, as that no direction could be heard. But in the end, the Athenians, as many as suruiued, were beaten back to the Land, with losse of threescore of their Gallies, broken, sunke, or abandoned. The Syracusians did also loose twentie of theirs, with Python, Commander of the Corinthians. The rest of the Athenian Gallies, running themselves into the bottome of the Port, saued themselves by the helpe and countenance of the Land-armie, there fortified. In this desperate estate, the Athenian Commanders goe to counsell. Demosthenes perswades them, to furnish with fresh Souldiers those few Gallies which remained; and while the Syracusians were triumphing, and made secure by their present victorie, to set vpon them, and forcing their way out of the Port, to returne to Athens. This was no ill counsaile. For, as we haue heard of many great Capitaines (yea, the greatest number of all that haue bene victorious) that haue neglected the speedie prosecution of a beaten enemy; so might we produce many examples of those, who, hauing slept securely in the bosome of good successe, haue bene suddenly awaked, by the re-allied Companies of a broken Armie, and haue thereby lost againe all the honour, and aduantage, formerly gotten. But Nicias opposeth the aduice of Demosthenes: Others say, that the Sea-men were against it. Whereupon abandoning their Gallies, they all resolute to march ouer land to the Cities of their Confederates, till some more fauourable fortune should call them thence. On the other side, Gylippus, and other the Lacedaemonian and Corinthian Capitaines, with Hermocrates, exhort the Syracusians to put themselves presently into the field, and to stop all the passages, leading to those Cities of their enemies, to which the Athenians might make retreat. But many were weary, and many were wounded, and many of them thought that they had done enough for the present. Which humour in some of our Commanders at Cadex, lost vs both the Indian fleet, and the spoiles of many other Neighbour-places. Hermocrates, the Syracusan, finding it a lost labour, to perswade his Countymen to any hasty prosecution, deuised this good stratagem, thereby to gaine time; not doubting, but that after a day or two, hee should draw them willingly out. He sent two or three horse-men out of Syracuse by night, willing them to finde Nicias, and (after they had assured him, that they were of the Athenians faction) to giue him aduice not to march away ouer-hastily from the place, wherein he was fortified; alleging that the Syracusians had lodged their Armie, which could not long stay there, vpon the passages & places of aduantage, leading towards the Cities of their Allies. These tidings Nicias easily beleued, and put off his iourne to the third day. For men newly beaten, are (for the most part) more fearefull than wise; and to them, euery thistle in the field, appeares, by night, a man at armes.

The third day (leaving all their Gallies, and all their baggage) they remoue; being pierced and pursued with the lamentable out-cries of those that were sick and hurt: whom they abandon to the cure of their enemies swords. The rest march away, to the number of fortie thousand; and make their first passage by force, ouer the River of Anapus, notwithstanding the opposition of their enemies. But being euery day charged in their marches, & by the Syracusan horse-men, beaten in from foraging, and prouision of foode, they grow weake and heartlesse. The Syracusians also possesse the Mountain Lepus, by which they were to passe towards Camerina, and thereby force them to fall back againe towards the Sea coast, and to take what what way they could: being vnable to proceede in their iourney intended. Many hard shifts they made, in difficult passages, and blinde marches by night; which they were faine to endure, as hauing none other meanes to escape from the enemy that pursued them, and held them waking with continual skirmishing. To keepe all in order, Nicias vnder-tooke the leading of the Vanguard; and Demosthenes conducted the Rearre. At the River Erinus, Nicias takes the start of a whole nights march, leaving Demosthenes to make the retreat: who being incompassed, and ouerprest with numbers, in the end renders himselfe. The conditions he obtained, were farre better than he could haue hoped for; and the faith of his enemies farre worse than he suspected. For he was afterward, with Nicias, murdered in prison. The Armie of Demosthenes being dissolued, they pursue Nicias with the greater courage: who being vtterly broken, vpon the passage of the River Asinarus, rendered himselfe to Gylippus, vpon honest conditions. Gylippus sought to persue him, and to haue had the honour, to haue brought these two to Sparta; Nicias, as a noble enemy to the Lacedaemonians, and who, at the ouerbrow, which they receiued at Eylus by the Athenians, had saued the liues of the vanquished; Demosthenes, as one that had done to Lacedemon the greatest hurt. Hermocrates also, the Commander of the Syracusan Armie, dissuaded the rest, by all the arte he had, from vsing any barbarous violence, after so noble a victorie. But the cruell, and the cowardly sort, (cowardlie and cruelitie being inseparable passions) preuailed, and caused these braue Capitaines to be miserably murdered; one part of their Souldiers to bee starued in lothsome prisons; and the rest, sold for slaues. This was the successe of the Sicilian warre: which tooke end at the river Asinarus, the foure and twentieth day of May, in the fourescore and eleuenth Olympiad.

The Athenians being beaten out of Sicily, the Egeans (for whose defence, against the Selinuntines, this late warre had bene taken in hand) fearing the victorious Syracusians, sought helpe from the Carthaginians; to whom they offered themselves, and their Citie, as their Vassals. The Carthaginians, though ambitious enough of enlarging their Dominion in Sicily, yet considering the prosperitie of the Syracusians, and their late victories ouer the Athenians, they staied a while to dispute of the matter, whether they should refuse, or accept, the offer made vnto them: for the Selinuntines were streightly allied to the Syracusians, as may appeare by what is past. In the end, the Senators of Carthage resolute vpon the enterprize; and (by a trick of their Punicke wit) to separate the Syracusians from the Selinuntines, they send Embassadors to Syracuse: praying that Citie, as in the behalfe of the Egeans, to compell the Selinuntines to take reason, and to rest content with so much of the lands in question, as they of Syracuse should thinke meet to allow them. The Syracusians approued the motion; for it tended to their owne honour. But the Selinuntines would make no such appointment: rather they tooke it ill, that the Syracusians, with whom they had run one course of fortune, in the Athenian war, should offer to trouble them, by interposing as Arbitrators, in a busines, that themselves could end by force. This was right as the Carthaginians would haue it. For now could they of Selinus with an ill grace craue aide of Syracuse; and the Syracusians as ill grant it vnto those, that had refused to stand to the Arbitrement, which the Carthaginians would haue put into their hands. Hereupon, an Armie of three hundred thousand men is set out from Carthage, vnder the conduct of Hannibal, Nephew to that Amilcar, who (as you haue heard before) was ouerthrowne with the great Carthaginian Armie at Himer by Gelon. Hannibal was exceeding greedy of this impliment, that he might take reuenge, as well of his Vncles, as of his Fathers death; the one of whom hauing bene slaine by the Himerians; the other by those of Selinus. Both these Cities, Hannibal, in this warre, wonne by force of armes, sackt them, and burnt them; and hauing taken three thousand of the Himerians prisoners, he caused them to be led vnto the place, where Amilcar was slaine, and buried them there.

Hermocrates, who had lately bene Generall of the Syracusan forces, against the Athenians. The malice of his enemies had so farre prevailed with the ingratefull multitude, that he was condemned to exile for his meere vertue, at such time, as he was aiding the Lacedaemonians, in their warre against Albens; wherein hee did great service. All the honestest sort within Syracuse were sorie for the injurie done vnto him, and fought to haue him repealed. Hermocrates himselfe, returning into Sicill, gathered an Armie of fixe thousand; with which he beganne to repaire Selinus; and by many noble actions laboured to winne the loue of his Citizens. But the faction that opposed him was the stronger. Wherefore, he was aduised to seize vpon a Gate of Syracuse, with some strength of men; whereby his friends, within the Towne, might haue the better meanes to rise against the aduerser partie. This he did: but presently the multitude fell to armes, and set vpon him; in which conflict hee was slaine. But his sonne-in-law, Dionysius, shall make them with Hermocrates aliue againe.

†. IIII.

Of DIONYSIUS the Tyrant: and others, following him, in Syracuse.

THE Syracusians had enjoyed their libertie about threecore yeares, from the death of Thrasylbulus, to the death of Hermocrates: at which time Dionysius was raised vp by God, to take reuenge, as well of their crueltie towards strangers, as of their ingratitude towards their owne best Citizens. For before the time of Dionysius, they had made it their pastime, to reward the vertue of their worthiest Commanders with death, or disgrace: which custome they must now bee taught to amend.

Dionysius obtained the Principalltie of Syracuse, by the same degrees, that many others, before him, had made themselves Masters of other Cities, and of Syracuse it selfe. For, being made Pretor, and commanding their Armies against the Carthaginians, and other their enemies, he behaued himselfe so well, that he got a generall loue among the people, and men of warr. Then beganne he to follow the example of Pisistratus, that made himselfe Lord of Athens; obtaining a band of fixe hundred men, to defend his person: vnder pretence, that his priuate enemies, being traiterously affected to the State of Syracuse, had laied plots how to murder him, because of his good seruices. He doubled the pay of the Souldiers; alledging, that it would encourage them to fight manfully: but intending thereby to assure them to himselfe. He perswaded the Citizens, to call home, out of exile, those that had bene banished, which were the best men of Syracuse; and these were afterwards at his deuotion, as obliged vnto him by so great a benefite. His first fauour, among the Syracusians, grew from his accusation of the principall men. It is the delight of base people to raigne ouer their betters: wherefore, gladly did hee helpe them to break downe, as setters imprisoning their libertie, the barres that held it vnder safe custodie. Long it was not, ere the chiefe Citizens had found whereat hee aimed. But what they saw, the people would not see: and some that were needie, and knew not how to get Offices without his helpe, were willing to helpe him, though they knew his purposes to be such, as would make all the Citie to smart. He began early to hunt after the tyrannie; being but fixe and twentie yeares of age when he obtained it: belike, it was his desire to raigne long. His first worke, of making himselfe absolute Lord in Syracuse, was, the possession of the Citadell; wherein was much good prouision, and vnder it the Gallies were moored. This hee obtained by allowance of the people; and hauing obtained this, he cared for no more, but declared himselfe without all shame or feare: The Armie, the chiefe Citizens, restored by him from banishment; all the needie fort within Syracuse, that could not thirue thirue by honest courtes; and some neighbour-townes, bound vnto him, either for his helpe in warre, or for his establishing the faction, raigning at that present, were wholly affected to his assistance. Hauing therefore gotten the Citadell into his hands, he needed no more, saue to assure what hee had alreadie. Hee strengthened himselfe by diuers marriages; taking first to wife the daughter of Hermocrates; and after her, two at once, the one a Leucian, Doris, by whom he had Dionysius, his Successor; the other, Aristomache, the daughter of Hipparimus, and sister to Dion, honorable men in Syracuse, which bare vnto him many children, that serued to fortifie him with new alliances.

Yet it was not long, ere some of the Syracusians (enuying his prosperitie) incited the multitude, and tooke armes against him, euen in the noueltie of his Rule. But their enterprise was more passionately, than wisely gouerned. He had shamefully been beaten by the Carthaginians at Gela: which, as it vexed the Sicilian men at armes, making them suspect that it was his purpose to let the Carthaginians waste all, that hee might afterwards take possession of the desolate places; so it inflamed them with a desire to free themselves from his tyrannie. They departed therefore from him, and marched hastily to Syracuse, where they found friends to helpe them: there they forced his Palace, ranfaked his treasures, and so shamefully abused his wife, that for the griefe thereof shee poisoned her selfe. But hee followed their heeles apace; and firing a Gate of the Citie by night, entred soone enough to take reuenge, by making a speedie riddance of them. For he spared none of his knowne, nor, nor of his suspected enemies. After that, he grew so doubtfull of his life, as he neuer durst trust Barber to trim him, nor any person, no, not so much as his brother, to enter into his chamber, vntript and searched. He was the greatest Robber of the people, that euer raigned in any State; and withall the most vnrespectfully cruell.

After this, hee separated with fortification that part of the Citie, called the Iland, from the rest; like as the Spaniards did the Citadell of Antwerpe: therein he lodged his treasures, and his Guards.

He then beganne to make warre vpon the free Cities of Sicill: but while hee lay before Herbesse, an in-land Towne, the Syracusians rebelled against him; so, as with great difficultie hee recovered his Citadell: from whence, hauing allured the old Souldiers of the Campanians, who forced their passage through the Citie, with one thousand and two hundred horse, hee againe recovered the masterie ouer the Syracusians. And when a multitude of them were busied in gathering in their Haruest, hee disarmed all the Townes-men remayning; and new strengthened the Fort of the Iland, with a double wall. He inclosed that part also, called Epipoles; which, with threecore thousand labourers, hee finished in three weekes; being two leagues in compasse. He then built two hundred new Gallies, and repaired one hundred and ten of the old; forged one hundred and fortie thousand Targets, with as many swords, and head-peeces, with fourteene thousand corslets, and all other futable armes. Which done, he sent word to the Carthaginians, (greatly enfeebled by the plague) That except they would abandon the Greeke Townes, which they held in Sicill, he would make warre vpon them: and, not staying for answer, hee tooke the spoile of all the Phenician ships, and merchandize, within his Ports; as King Philip the second did of our English, before the warre in our late Queenes time. He then goes to the field with fourescore thousand foot, and three thousand horse, and sends his brother Leptines to sea, with two hundred Gallies, and five hundred ships of burden. Most of the Townes which held for Carthage yielded vnto him; sauing Panormus, Segesta or Egesta, Amyra, Motya, and Entella. Of these, hee first wonne Motya by assault, and put all therein to the sword; but before Egesta hee lost a great part of his Armie, by a fallie of the Citizens. In the meane while Himilco arriues; but, ere hee tooke land, hee lost in a fight at Sea, with Leptines, fiftie ships of warre, and five thousand Souldiers, besides many ships of burden. This notwithstanding, hee recovered againe Motya vpon his first descent. From thence marching towards Messene, sen, he tooke Lypara, and (soone after) Messena, and raised it to the ground. Now beganne Dionysius greatly to doubt his estate. Hee therefore fortified all the places hee could, in the Territorie of the Leontines, by which hee supposed that Himilco would passe toward Syracuse; and he himselfe tooke the field againe, with foure and thirtie thousand foot, and one thousand horse. Now, hearing that Himilco had diuided his Armie into two parts, marching with the one halfe ouer land, and sending Mago with the other by Sea: he sent Leptines, his brother, to encounter Mago. But Leptines was vterly beaten by the Carthaginians; twentie thousand of his men were slaine, and an hundred of his Gallies lost. It is very strange, and hardly credible, which yet good Authours tell vs; That one Citie should be able to furnish fise hundred saile of ships, and two hundred Gallies: (for, so many did Syracuse arme in this warre) and more strange it is, that in a battaile at Sea, without any great Artillerie, or Musket-shot, twentie thousand should be slaine in one fight. In all our fights against the Turkes, of which that at Lepanto was the most notable, we heare of no such number lost; nor in any other fight by Sea, that euer hapned in our age, nor before vs. When Charles the fift went to besiege Algier, hee had in all his fleet, transporters and others, but two hundred and fiftie saile of ships, and threecore and fise Gallies: for the furnishing of which fleet, he sought helpe from all the Cities and Ports of Spaine, Naples, and the rest of Italie. But in old times it was the manner to carrie into the field, vpon extremitie, as many as were needfull, 20 of all that could beare armes, giuing them little wages, or other allowance: in our daies it is not so; neither indeede, is it often requisite. Vpon this ouerthrow, Dionysius postes away to Syracuse, to strengthen it: Himilco followes him, and besiegeth the Towne by Land and Sea. But the Tyrant, hauing receiued aide from the Lacedemonians, vnder the conduct of Pharacidas, puts himselfe to Sea, to make prouision for his Citizens: who, in his absence, take twenty of the Carthaginian Gallies, and sinke foure. Hereupon, finding their owne successe prosperous, and that of the Tyrant exceeding ill; hauing also at the present weapons in their hands; they consult how to recouer their libertie. And this they had done, had not Pharacidas the Lacedemonian resisted them. It also fell out, to his exceeding aduantage, that the plague was so increased, and so violent, among the Carthaginians; as it is said, that aboue an hundred thousand of them died thereof. Hee therefore, with the power that he could gather together, sets vpon them both by Sea and Land; and hauing slaine great numbers of them, forceth Himilco to desire peace. This peace Dionysius sold him for a great summe of monie; on condition that he should steale away with his Carthaginians only: which he basely accepted, betraying the rest of the Africans and Spaniards. Yet no faith was kept with him: for he was pursued, and lef many of his Carthaginians behinde him. The rest of the Africans fell vnder the swords of their enemies; only the Spaniards, after they had a while brauely defended themselves, were (after their submission) entertained, and serued the Conquerour. 40

Many such examples of perfidious dealing haue I noted in other places, and can hardly forbear to deliuer vnto memorie the like praetises, when they meete with their matches: That which hapned vnto Monsieur de Piles, was very futable to this treacherie, wherewith Dionysius pursued Himilco. I was present, when De Piles related the iniurie done vnto him. He had rendered St. Iohn d' Angelle, to the French King Charles the ninth, who besieged him therein. Hee rendered it, vpon promise made by the faith of a King, that he should be suffered to depart in safetie, with all his followers. Yet in presence of the King himselfe, of the Duke of Anion his brother, Generall of his Armie, of the Queene Mother, and of diuers Dukes and Marshalls of France, he was set vpon, and broken in his march; spoiled of all that he had; 50 and forced to saue his life by flight, leauing the most of his Souldiers dead vpon the place: the Kings hand and faith, warranting him to march away with ensignes displaid, and with all his goods and prouisions, no whit auailing him. It needes not therefore seeme strange, that an Heathen Tyrant should thus break his faith, since Kings, Kings, professing Chritianitie, are bold to doe the like, or command their Captaines to doe it for them.

Dionysius, after this great victorie, tooke care to re-edifie Messena. Mago, who staid in Sicily, to hold vp the Carthaginians therein, is againe beaten by Dionysius; who is also beaten by the Tauromenians. A new supply of fourecore thousand Souldiers is sent from Carthage to Mago; but they take egges for their monie, and make peace with Dionysius, leauing the Sicilians in Tauromenium, to shift for themselves: whom Dionysius, after a long siege, ouer-came, and gaue their Citie to his mercinarie Souldiers.

10 He then past into Italie, obtained diuers victories there, brought the Rhegians on their knees, forced them to pay him one hundred & fourecore thousand crownes, to furnish him with threecore Gallies, and to put in an hundred pledges, for assurance of their future obseruance of covenants. This he did, not with any purpose to performe vnto them the peace that they had so dearly bought; but that hauing taken from them their Gallies, he might besiege them, and ruine them vterly, with the more ease. Now to the ende hee might not, without some colour, falsifie the faith that hee had giuen to them; he pretended to want victual for his Armie, at such time as hee seemed ready to depart out of Italie, and sent to them to furnish him the rewth; promising to returne them the like quantitie, at his coming 20 home to Syracuse.

His resolution was, that if they refused to furnish him, hee would then make their refusal the cause of his quarrell: if they yeilded to aide him with the proportion which he desired, that then they should not be able, for want of food, to endure a siege any long time against him. For to ruine them hee had fully determined, at what price soeuer. And great reason he had to take reuenge of them, if he had done it fairly, and without breach of faith. For when in the beginning of his raigne, he desired them to bestow a daughter of some of their Nobilitie vpon him, for a wife: they answered, That they had not any one fit for him, saue the Hang-mans daughter. Princes doe rather pardon ill deedes, than villanous words.

30 Alexander the Great forgave many sharpe swords, but neuer any sharpe tongues; no, though they told him but truly of his errors. And certainly, it belongs to those that haue warrant from God, to reprehend Princes: and to none else, especially in publike.

It is said, that Henrie the fourth of France, had his heart more inflamed against the Duke of Biron, for his ouer-bold and biting taunts, that hee vsed against him before Amiens, than for his conspiracie with the Spaniard, or Sanoyan: for he had pardoned tenne thousand of such as had gone farther, and drawne their swords against him. The contemptuous words that Sir Iohn Parret vsed of our late Queene Elizabeth, were his ruine; and not the counterfait 40 letter of the Romish Priest, produced against him. So fared it with some other, greater than hee, that thereby ranne the same, and a worse fortune, soone after.

To bee short, hee made them know new bread from old. Hee assaulted their Towne on all sides, which he continued to doe eleuen moneths, till he wonne it by force. He vsed his victorie without mercie; specially against Phyton, who had commanded within it.

Some other warres hee made with the Carthaginians, after the taking and raising of this Citie; and those with variable successe. For as in one encounter hee 50 slue Mago, with ten thousand Africans: so the sonne of Mago beat him, and slue his brother Leptines, with fourecore thousand of his Souldiers. After which hee bought his peace of the Carthaginians, as they had formerly done of him; following therein the aduice of Prosperitie and Aduersitie, as all Kings and States doe.

When

When he had reigned eight and thirtie yeeres, he died: some say, in his bedde, peaceably; which is the most likely, though others report it otherwise. A cruel man he was, and a faithlesse; a great Poet, but a foolish one. He entertained Plato a while, but afterward, for speaking against his tyrannie, hee gaue order to haue him flaine, or sold for a slaue. For he could endure no man, that flattered him not beyond measure. His Parallites therefore stiled his crueltie, The hate of euill men; and his lawlesse slaughters, The ornaments and effects of his iustice. True it is, that flatterers are a kinde of vermine, which poison all the Princes of the World; and yet they prosper better than the worstest and valiantest men doe: and I wonder not at it; for it is a world: and as our Sauour Christ hath told vs, The World will loue her owne.

To this Dionysius, his Sonne of the same name succeeded; and inherited both his Kingdome, and his Vices. To winne the loue of the People, he pardoned, and released out of prison, a great number of persons, by his Father locked vp, and condemned. Withall, hee remitted vnto his Citizens diuers payments, by his Father imposed vpon them. Which done, and thereby hoping, that hee had fastned vnto himselfe the peoples affections; he cast off the Sheepes skinne, and put on that of the Woollfe. For being jealous of his owne Brethren, as men of more vertue than himselfe, he caused them all to be slaine; and all the Kindred that they had by their Mothers side. For Dionysius his Father (as hath bene said) had two Wiues; 20 Doris of Loeis; and Aristomache a Syracusan, the sister of Dion, which Brother-in-law of his he greatly enriched.

By Doris hee had this Dionysius, who succeeded vnto him: and by Aristomache, he had two Sonnes and two Daughters; of which the elder, called Sophrasmus, he gaue in marriage to his eldest Sonne, and her halfe-brother, Dionysius; the younger, called Arete, he bestowed on his Brother Theorides: after whose death, Dion tooke her to Wife, being his Nece.

This Dion, a iust, and valiant man, finding that Dionysius had abandoned all exercise of vertue, and that hee was wholly giuen ouer to sensuality, prevailed so much with Plato, whose Disciple he had bene, as he drew him into Sicily, to instruct 30 the young King. And hauing perswaded the King to entertaine him, hee wrought so well with him, as Dionysius beganne to change condition; to change Tyrannie, into Monarchie; and to hold the Principalltie, that he had, rather by the loue of his People, and his Nationall Lawes, than by the violence of his Guards and Garrisons. But this goodnesse of his lasted not long. For Philistus the Historian, and other his Parallites, that hated Dions severity, wrought him out of the Tyrants fauour; and caused him soone after to be banished out of Sicily, to the great griefe of the whole Nation. For whereas Dion had made offer to the King, either to compound the quarrels betwene him and the Carthaginians, of whom Dionysius stood in great feare, or (at least) if they refused it, to furnish him with fiftie Gallies 40 at his owne charge, during the warre against them: his enemies found means, by sinister interpretation, to conuert his good will into matter of treason. They told Dionysius, that al the great commendations, giuen of Plato, had tended to none other end, then to soften his minde, and to make him neglect his owne affaires, by the studie of Philosophie; whilst Dion, in the meane time hauing furnished fiftie Gallies, vnder colour of the Kings seruice, had in his owne power, either to deliuer to the Syracusians their former liberty, or to make himself Lord and Soueraigne of their State.

It is likely, that the honest and liberrall offer which hee made, to serue the King with so greata preparation, at his owne charge, begot him many enemies. For 50 they that had serued the King for none other end, than to raise and enrich themselves, and had already bene raised and enriched, thought themselves bound to make the same offer, that Dion had made, if the King had had the grace to conceiue ceiue it aright. But these couetous and ignorant cowards, that had neither the knowledge, nor the daring, that Dion had, were bold to stile his Loue and Liberality, Pride and Presumption; and heartned the young King, in his oppressing, and eating vp his owne people, of whose spoiles they themselves shared no small portion. I haue heard it, That when Charles the fift had the repulse at Algier in Africa, Ferdinando Cortese, one of the brauest men that euer Spaine brought forth, offered vnto the Emperour, to continue the siege at his owne charge. But he had neuer good day after it. For they that enuid his victories, and his conquest of Mexico in the west Indies, perswaded the Emperour, that Cortese sought to value himselfe aboue him; and to 10 haue it said, That what the Emperour could not, Cortese had effected, and was therefore more worthy of the Empire, than he that had it.

When Dion was newly banished, the Tyrant was contented, at first, to send him thereuenews of his Lands, and permit him to dispose of his moucables, at his own pleasure: not without giuing hope, to recall him in short time. Had he continued in this good moode, like enough it is, that Dion would haue bene well pleased to liue well, as he did, at Athens. But after sometime, Dionysius made Port-sale of this Noble-mans goods; and thereby vrge him to take another course; euen to seeke the restitution of his Countrie to libertie. The vertues of Dion, especially his great liberalitie, had purchased much loue in Greece. This loue made him suspected and 20 hated of the Tyrant: but it stood him in good stead, when he sought to raise men, with whose helpe he might returne into Sicily. Yet he got not aboue eight hundred (for hee caried the matter closely) to follow him in this aduventure. But many of them were men of quality, and fit to be Leaders. Neither did he doubt of finding in Syracuse, as many as should be needfull, that would readily assist him. Therefore he landed boldly in Sicily; marched to Syracuse; entered the Citie without resistance; armed the multitude; and wonne all, saue the Citadel.

Dionysius was then absent in Italie; but hee quickly had aduertisement of this dangerous accident. Wherefore hee returned hastily to Syracuse: whence, after many vaine treaties of peace, and some forceable attempts to recover the Towne, 30 he was faine to depart; leauing yet the Castle to the custodie of Apollocrates, his eldest sonne. Yet ere he went, his Minion Philistus, comming with a strength of men to assist him, was beaten, taken, and put to death by torment. But Dion, for the recouerie of his Countries libertie, had the same reward, that all worthy men haue had from popular Estates. He was disgraced, assaulted, and forced to abandon the Citie. Hee retired himselfe to the Leontines, who receiue him with great joy. Soone after his departure from Syracuse, new troups enter the Castle: they sallie out, assaile, spoile, and burne a great part of the Citie. Dion is sent for, with humble request: yet, ere hee could arriue, Dionysius his Souldiers were retired; and the Townsmen, thinking themselves secure, shut the gates against Dion. But the next 40 night they of the Castle sallie againe, with greater furie then euer; they kill Man, Woman, and Child, and set fire in all parts of the Towne. In this their extremitie Dion comes the second time to their succour; the loue of his Countrie surmounting all the injuries that he had received. Hee sets vpon the Garrison of the Castle; with the one part of his Armie; and quencheth the fire, euery where kindled; with the other part. In conclusion, after hee had conquered both the fire and the sword, that had well-neere burnt to ashes, and depopulated Syracuse, he recovered the Castle, with the munition and furniture thereof, and sent Apollocrates, after Dionysius his Father, into Italie. But their malice, of whom he had best deserved, and whom he had loued most, gaue an vntimely end to his dayes. For he was soone after this 50 his victorie, murdered by Calippus; who, after hee had, with ill successe, a while governed Syracuse, was slaine with the same Dagger, with which hee had murdered Dion.

Ten yeeres after the death of Dion, Dionysius, with the assistance of his friends in Italie, recouers his estate, and returns to Syracuse, driving Nysseus thence, whom hee found found Governour therein. The better sort of the Citizens, fearing, more then euer, his crueltie, flee to Ietes, a Syracusian borne, and then ruling the Leontines. Ietes enters into confederacie with the Carthaginians, hoping by their assistance, not onely to preuaile against Dionysius; but by the hatred of the Syracusians towards Dionysius, to make him also Lord of their Citie. The Syracusians, being deservingly afflicted on all sides, lend to the Corinthians for succour. Ietes also sends thither, and dissuades the Corinthians, as well as he can, from intermeddling in the businesse. He tells them, by his messengers, That he had entred into league with the Carthaginians, who were so strong by Sea, that it was not in the power of Carthage, to land any Armie in Sicill. But the Corinthians, being by this treason of Ietes, 10 more enraged then dissuaded, sent Timoleon with nineteene Gallies, to deliuer Syracuse from tyrannic. In the meane while, Ietes had entred Syracuse, and with the helpe of the Carthaginians, driven Dionysius into the Caille, where hee besieged him.

Ietes, being himselfe a Tyrant in Leontium, rather sought how to enlarge his power, than, how to deliuer his Countrey. Therefore, hearing that Timoleon was arrived at Rhegium, he sent to perswade him, to returne his fleet; for that all things were (in effect) established in Sicill. The Carthaginian Gallies were also in the same Port of Rhegium; whose Capitaines aduised Timoleon, to get him gone in peace. They had iare more Gallies there, then he had, and were like to compell him, if he would not be perswaded. Timoleon, finding himselfe ouer-mastered, makes request to the Carthaginian Capitaines, that they would be pleased to enter into Rhegium, and there, in an open assembly of the people, to deliuer vnto him those arguments, for his returne, which they had vied to him in private; that he might, by publike testimony, discharge himselfe to the Senate of Corinth.

The Carthaginians, perswading themselves, that a victorie, obtained by a few faire words, was without losse, and farre more easie, than that of many blowes and wounds, yelded to Timoleon's desire. But while the Orations were deliuering, Timoleon, fauoured by the Rhegians, stole out of the presse, and having set saile, before the Gates were opened to the Carthaginians, he recovered the Port of Tauromenium, 30 where he was joyfully receiued by Andromachus the Governour. From thence he marched toward Adranum, were surpising Ietes his Armie, hee slue a part thereof, and put the rest to runne. It is the nature of victorie to beget friends. The Adranians ioyned with him; and so did Mamercus, the Tyrant of Catana. Dionysius also sent to Timoleon, offering to surrender the Caille of Syracuse into his hands, as thinking it better to yeld vp himself, and the places which he could not defend, vnto the Corinthians, than either to Ietes, whom hee disdained, or to the Carthaginians, whom hee hated. Now Timoleon, who within fiftie daies, after his arriual, had recovered the Caille of Syracuse, and sent Dionysius to Corinth, to liue there a priuate man, was still inuaded by the Armies, and molested by the practices of Ietes. 40 For hee besieged the Corinthians within the Caille of Syracuse, and attempted (but in vaine) the murder of Timoleon.

The Corinthians send vnto Timoleon a supply of two thousand foot, and two hundred horse, which are slaid in Italie by foule weather. Ietes is strengthened with threecore thousand Africans, brought vnto him by Mago (all which hee lodgeth within Syracuse) and with an hundred and fiftie Gallies, to keepe the Port. This was the first time, that euer the Carthaginians had dominion within the walls of that Citie. With this great Armie, Ietes assaulteth the Caille. Timoleon sends them victuals, and succour, in small boats, by night, from Catana. Mago and Ietes doe therefore resolute to besiege Catana; but they were no sooner on their way towards 50 it, with part of their forces, than Leon, Capitaine of the Corinthians, sallied out of the Caille, and tooke that part of Syracuse, called Acradina, which hee fortified.

In the meane while, the two thousand Corinthians arriue: with whom, and two thousand other Souldiers, Timoleon marcheth towards Syracuse. Mago abandoneth Ietes, Ietes, being frightened out of Sicill (which he might easily haue conquered) with an idle rumour of treason. This made him returne to Carthage; where the generall exclamation against his cowardize, did so much affright him, that for feare of farther punishment, he hanged himselfe. Timoleon enters the Citie, and beats downe the Caille (which hee called the nest of Tyrants) to the ground. But hee found the Citie when the strangers were fled, in effect desolate; so as their horses did feede on the grasse, growing in the market-place. Therefore, he writes to Corinth, for people to re-inhabite it. Ten thousand are sent out of Greece; many come from Italie; others, from other parts of the Iland.

10 But a new storme ariseth. Asdrubal and Amilcar, Carthaginians, arriue about Lilybeum, with threecore and ten thousand Souldiers, transported (with all their provisions) in a thousand ships of burden, and two hundred Gallies. Timoleon marcheth thither, and chargeth this great Armie vpon the passage of a Riuer.

A tempest of raine, haile, and lightning, with boyliterous windes, beating vpon the faces of the Carthaginians, they are vtterly broken: ten thousand slain; fife thousand taken; with all their carriages and provisions: among which there were found a thousand corslets, gilt, and grauen. After this Timoleon, gaue an overthrow to Ietes, and following his victorie, tooke him, with his sonne Enplemus, and the Generall of his horse, prisoners; whom he caused all to be slaine: and afterwards (which 20 was imputed to him for great crueltie) he suffered Ietes his wiues and daughters to be put to death. But this was the reuenge of God vpon Ietes, who (after the murder of Dion) had caused Arete, Dion's wife and a young child of his, with Aristomache his sister, to be cast into the Sea.

He againe preuailed against Mamercus, Tyrant of Catana, and wonne Catana it selfe. Mamercus fled to Hippion Tyrant of Messena: but Timoleon, pursuing him, wonne the towne; deliuering Hippion, to his Citizens, who tormented him to death. The same end had Mamercus, and all other, the Tyrants in Sicill.

Finally, he made peace with the Carthaginians; on condition, That they should nor passe the Riuer of Lycus. After this, he liued in great honour among the Syracusians, till his death; and was solemnly buried by them in the market-place of their Citie: the day of his Funeralls, being for euer ordained to bee kept holy among them.

After such time, as Timoleon had deliuered Syracuse, from the tyrannic of Dionysius, and brought peace to the whole Iland; the inhabitants enioyed their libertie in peace, about twentie yeeres. The Cities and Temples were repaired; the Trade renewed; the Merchant sailed in safetie; and the Labouring man enioyed the fruits of the earth in quiet. But it was impossible that a Nation which neither knew how to gouerne, nor how to obey; which could neither endure Kings, nor men worthe to be Kings, to gouerne them; should any long time subsist.

40 Twentie yeeres after the death of Timoleon, there started vp an Agabades among them, a man of base birth, and of baser condition; who from a Begger, to a common Souldier; from a Souldier to a Capitaine; and so from degree to degree, rising to bee a Prator; finally became Lord and Soueraigne of the Syracusians. Many fortunes he ranne, and vnder-went as many dangers, ere hee obtained the Principalltie. For hee had more than once attempted it, and was therein both beaten and banisht. A passing valiant man hee was, and did notable seruice, as well for those by whom hee was imployed, as also for the Syracusians, and against them. For in their warres against those of Enna, and the Campanes, hee did them memorable seruice; and on the contrarie, as memorable seruice for the Murgantines, against the Syracusians. For being entertained by the people of Murgantia, and made Generall of their forces, hee sackt Leontium; and besieged Syracuse so fireghtly, that the Citizens were driuen to craue aide, euen from their ancient and naturall enemies, the Carthaginians. Amilcar was sent by the Carthaginians, to relieue Syracuse. With him Agabades wrought so well, that hee got him to make peace betweene himselfe and 50 the the Syracusians; binding himselfe by promise and oath, to remaine a friend and seruant to the state of Carthage, for euer after. Amilcar entertained the businesse, and compounded the quarrels betwene Agathocles, and the Syracusians. Agathocles is chosen Prator; he entertaines fise thousand Africans, and diuers old Souldiers of the Murgantines, vnder colour of a purpose to besiege Herbita. With these, and with the assistance of the poore and discontented Syracusians (the Citie beinge al diuided into many factions) he assailes the Senators, kills all his enemies and opposites; diuides the spoile of the rich, among the poore; and giues libertie to his Souldiers, to robbe, to raiue, and to murder, for two whole dayes and nights, without contrinment: the third day, when they had blunted their barbarous appetites, and strewed the streets with ten thousand dead carkasses, besides those that had broken their necks ouer the walls; their furie had no further subject to worke on.

Agathocles, in an assembly of the people (beinge an eloquent knaue) perswaded them, that, for the violent sickness, by which the common-wealth was vtterly consumed, he found no better, than the violent remedies, which he had admitted; & that he affected no other thing, than the reducing of the state from an Oligarchie, or the rule of a few tyrannous Magistrates, to the ancient & indifferent Democratie, by which it had bene gouerned, from the first institution, with so great glorie and prosperitie. This he did, to haue the crowne clapt on his head (as it were) per 20 force. For as hee knew, that hee had left none liuing, within the Citie, fit, nor able, to exercise the office of a Magistrate: so knew he right well, that all they which had assisted, in the murder and spoile of their fellow-Citizens, had no other hope of defence, then the support of a lawlesse Lord, who had bene partaker with them, in their villanies and cruelties committed. So as this Rabble, his Oration ended, proclaimed him King: againe and againe, saluting, and adoring him, by that name, as if it had bene giuen to him by some lawfull election. Hence had our King Richard the third a peece of his patterne; but the one was of base; the other, of Kingly parents; the one tooke libertie from a Common-wealth; the other fought only to succede in a Monarchie; the one continued his cruelty to the end; the other, after he had obtayned the Crowne, fought, by making of good lawes, to recover the loue of his people.

The life of this Tyrant, is briefly written by Iustine; more largely and particularly by Diodorus Siculus: the summe whereof is this. The same Amilcar that had brought him into Syracuse, and that had lent him fise thousand men to helpe in the massacre of the Citizens, was also content to winke at many wrongs, that hee did vnto the Confederates of the Syracusians. It was the purpose of Amilcar, to settle Agathocles in his tyrannie, and to let him vex and waste the whole Iland; because it was thereby like to come to passe, that he should reduce all Sicily into such termes, as would make it become an easie prey to Carthage. But when the Citie, confederate, with the Carthaginians, sent their Embassadors, with complaint of this ill dealing, to Carthage; the Punicke faith (so much taunted by the Romans, as no better, than meere fallshood) shewed it selfe very honourable, in taking order for their redresse. Embassadors were sent to comfort the Sicilians, and to put Agathocles in mind of his covenants. Amilcar was recalled home into Affrike, and a new Capitaine appointed to succede in his charge, with such forces, as might compell Agathocles to reason, if otherwise he would, not harken to it. All this tended, to save their Confederates, from suffering such iniuries in the future. For that which was past (since it could not be recalled) they tooke order to haue it severely punished. Amilcar was accused secretly, and by way of scrutiny: the suffrages being giuen, but not calculated; and so referred, until he should returne. This was not so closely handled, but that Amilcar had some notice of it. In managing his businesse with Agathocles, it is likely that hee had an eye to his owne profit, as well as to the publike benefit of his Countrey. For he had made such a composition with the Syracusians, as gaue him not onely meanes to weaken others, but to strengthen himselfe, both in power and authoritie, euen against the Carthaginians. Such is commonly the custom of those, that hope to worke their owne ends by cunning practices: thinking to deale subtilly, and finely, they spinne their threads so small, that they are broken with the very wind. Amilcar saw, that his Carthaginians had a purpose to deale substantially; and that therefore it would bee hard for him, to make them follow his crooked deuiCES: which if he could not doe, it was to be expected, that their anger would breake out into so much the greater extremitie, by how much the more they had concealed it. Therefore he followed the example, which some of his foregoers had taught him; and, for feare of such a death, as the Iudges might award him, he ended his owne life in what sort he thought best. This desperation of Amilcar serued to informe Agathocles of the Carthaginians intent. He saw they would not be deluded with words, and therefore relolued to get the start of them in action. He dissembled no longer; but, in stead of spoile and robberie, made open warre vpon all their Adherents. He had made the better part of Sicily his owne, ere the Carthaginian forces arrived: which thinking to haue encountered an ill-establied Tyrant, found him readie, as a King, to defend his owne, and giue them sharpe entertainment. They were beaten by him; and their Nauie was so Tempel-beaten, that they could neither doe good by Land, nor Sea, but were glad to leaue their 20 businesse vndone, and returne into Affrike.

The Carthaginians prepare a new fleet; which being very gallantly manned and furnished, was broken by foule weather, and the best part of it cast away, euen whilst it was yet within kenning of their Citie. But Amilcar, the sonne of Gisoga, gathering together the remainders of this ship-wrack, was bold to passe ouer into Sicily, and landed not farre from Gela; where Agathocles was soone readie to examine the cause of their coming. Many skirmishes passed betwene them, in which (commonly) the Syracusian had the better. But his good success begat presumption, whereby he lost a battaile, more important than all the other fights. One aduersel chance is enough to ouerthrow the state of a Tyrant, if it be not vp-held by great 30 circumspection. The warre was soone transferred to the walls of Syracuse; within which Agathocles was closed vp, and driuen to make his last defence by their helpe, who may be judged to haue loued him not very greatly. But the Inhabitants of Syracuse, after that great massacre of the principal men, made in the beginning of this new tyrannie, were (for the most part) such, as had bene either mercinarie Souldiers, enfranchised slaues, or base and needie people; helpers in establishing the present Gouernement, and Executioners of the murders, and spoils, committed in that change. If there were any other (as some there were) they were so well observed, and (withall) so fearfull, that they durst not flirre. But it was not enough, that they all agreed in the common defence of themselves and their Citie; Famine 40 was likely to grow vpon them, and enforce them to change their resolution. In this necessitie, Agathocles aduentured vpon a strange course, which the euent commended, as wise. He imbarqued as many as he thought meet, in those vessels that rode in the Hauens; and committing the gouernment of the Citie to his brother Antander, willed the people to be of good courage, for that (as he told them) hee had be thought himselfe of a meane, both to raise the siege, and to repaire all other losses. A Carthaginian fleet lay in the mouth of the Hauens, both to hinder the entrance of victuals, and to keepe the besieged from issuing forth.

Now, at such time as Agathocles was readie to depart, aduertisement came, that many ships of burden, laden with corne, and other prouisions, were drawing nere 50 vnto Syracuse. To intercept these, the Carthaginians hoise saile, and lanch forth into the deepe. They were not farre gone, when they might behold Agathocles, issuing forth of the Port, with purpose (as they thought) to giue conuoy vnto his victuals. Hereupon they wheele about, and make a maine towards him, as thinking him the better bootie. He neither abode their coming, nor fled back into the

Citie,

Citie, but made all speede towards Africk; and was pursued by the Carthaginians, as long as day would giue them light. In the meane season, the victuallers were gotten into Syracuse; which was the more plentifully relieved by their coming, for that Agathocles had vnburdened the place of no small number. When the Carthaginian Admirall perceived; first, that by pursuing two fleets at once, he had mislead of them both; and secondly, that Agathocles returned not againe, but was gone to seeke his fortune elsewhere; he thought it good to pursue those that were fled, and to attend so well vpon them, that they should not haue leifure to doe muchie in some other part.

The Carthaginian Nauie followed Agathocles (whether by chance, or by relation 10 of such as had met with him at Sea) directly towards Africk, and ouer-tooke him after sixe dayes. He had (at the first) a great start of them; so that (belike) they rowed hard, and wearied themselves, in seeking their owne misfortune. For he fought with them, and beat them; and, hauing funke, or taken many, draue the rest to flight which way they could, laden with strange tidings of his voiage.
